Peucer [b] tells of Diuinations vsed in some parts of Lycia: betwixt Myra and Phellus there was a Fountaine full of Fishes, by whose forme, nature, motion, and feeding, the Inhabitants vsed Diuination. The same Lycians in the Groue of Apollo, not farre from the Sea, had a drie ditch, called Dina, in which the Diuiner put in fishes, and ten gobbets of rosted flesh, fastened on spits, with certaine Prayers: after which, the drie ditch became full of water, and fishes of all kindes and formes, by which the Priests obserued their Predictions. And not farre from hence, at Myræ in Lycia, was the Fountaine of Apollo Curius, where the fishes being three times called with a Pipe, assembled themselues, and if they deuoured the meats giuen them, it was interpreted a good bode and happy presage: if they strucke away the same with their tayles, it was direfull and dreadfull. CHAP. I.

Of ARMENIA MAIOR, and GEORGIA: and the neighbouring Nations.

HITHERTO haue wee proceeded in the discouerie of a part of Asia; sometime the store, sometimes the want of conuenient matter, detaining our pen: In the one, Time, the Consumer of things, causing much time and paines to be spent in curious search, that wee might produce some light out of darknesse: In the other, store of Stories, and varietie of varying Authors hath dimmed our weaker eyes with multiplicitie of lights; vncertaine in so many Tracts and Tractates, where to begin, and when to end. Now at last are wee passed Euphrates, into a Countrey that often exalteth it selfe, as though it would pierce the skies, and as often receiueth the due punishment of aspiring pride, being cast downe into so many lowly valleyes and dejected bottomes. The World, which after the Floud was repeopled from hence, still carrieth in the seuerall Ages, Places, Peoples, and Men thereof, the resemblance of her Cradle, now vp, now downe, in all varietie and vicissitude of chance and change, constant in vnconstancie, treading this Armenian Measure with vnequall paces, ouer Hills and Dales, like it selfe onely in vnlikenesse. Here Noes Arke seuled, and here must our Ship hoyse sayle.

§. I.

Of the Armenians and Turcomanians.

ARMENIA hath a great part of Cappadocia and Euphrates on the West; Mesopotamia on the South; on the North part, Colchis, Iberia, Albania; on the East, the Caspian Sea, and Media. Part of this greater Armenia is now called Turcomania, the other part is contained in Georgia. Ptolomey [a] reckoneth in it principall Mountaines, the Moschici, Paryarges, or Pariedri, Vdacespes, Antitaurus, Abos, and the [b] Gordæi, which which the Chaldean Paraphraſt calleth Kardu; and Q. Curtius, Cordei; Beroſus, Cordyes.

c Haithonus, or Antonius Armenius.

On theſe Hils the Arke reſted, whereof wee haue ſpoken in the firſt Booke. c Haithon (if wee beleeue him of his owne Countrey, where hee was of royall linage) calleth this Mountaine Arath, little differing from the Scripture-appellation Ararat, and addeth, That although, in regard of abundance of Snow, alway poſſeſſing the top thereof, none be able to goe vp thither, yet there alway appeareth in the top a certaine blacke thing, which the vulgar people eſteeme to be the Arke. Perhaps it may be ſome cloud or miſt, which groſſe vapours doe often cauſe on the tops of high Hills. For before Haithons dayes, Beniamin Tudelenſis telleth that one Ghamar ben Alchetab had taken thence the remainder of the Arke, and therewith built an Iſmaelitical Meſchit. And yet a man may herein doubt alſo: for concerning reliques pretending ſuch Antiquitie, Faith can finde no foundation in ſuch ruinous rubbiſh; and wee haue before ſhewed out of Beroſus and Nicolaus Damaſcenus of old, and Cartwrights later trauels, what may be thought thereof.

Lib. 1. c. 8.

d Lib. 11.

Armenia (as Strabo d affirmeth) receiued the name of one of Iaſons companions, which followed him in his Nauigation out of Haſmenia, a Citie of Theſſaly, betweene Pheræ and Lariſſa. The wealth of this Region appeared, when Ptolomey appointing Tigranes to bring in to the Romans ſixe thouſand Talents of Siluer, he added voluntarily, beyond that ſumme, to euery Souldier in the Campe fiftie drammes of Siluer, to euery Centurion a thouſand, to euery Deputie of a Countrey, and Chiliarch, a Talent.

Their Religion muſt at firſt be that which Noah and his Family profeſſed; after by time corrupted. Here (e ſaith our Beroſus) Noah inſtructed his poſteritie in Diuine an Humane Sciences, and committed many naturall ſecrets vnto writing, which the Scythian Armenians commend to their Prieſts onely; none elſe being ſuffered to ſee, or reade, or teach them. He left alſo Rituall Bookes, or Ceremoniall, of the which hee was termed Saga, that is, Prieſt, or Biſhop. Hee taught them alſo Aſtronomy, and the diſtinction of yeeres and moneths: For which, they eſteemed him partaker of Diuine Nature, and ſurnamed him Olybama and Arſa, that is, the Heauen and the Sunne, and dedicated to him many Cities; ſome (ſaith he) remaining at this day, which beare theſe names. And when hee went from thence to gouerne Cytim, which now (as hee affirmeth) they call Italy, the Armenians were much affected to him, and after his death accounted him the Soule of the heauenly bodies, and beſtowed on him Diuine Honors. Thus Armenia, where hee began, and Italy, where he ended, doe worſhip him, and aſcribe to him Names, Heauen, Sunne, Chaos, the Seed of the World, the Father of the greater and leſſe Gods, the Soule of the World, mouing Heauen, and the Creatures, and Man; the GOD of Peace, Iuſtice, Holineſſe, putting away hurtfull things, and preſeruing good. And for this cauſe both Nations ſignifie him in their writings with the courſe of the Sunne, and motion of the Moone, and a Scepter of Dominion, perſecuting and chaſing away the wicked from among the ſocietie of men, and with the chaſtitie of the bodie, and ſanctimony of the minde, the two keyes of Religion and Happineſſe. They called alſo f Tidea, the mother of all, after her death, Aretia, that is, the Earth; and Eſta, that is, the Fire, becauſe ſhee had beene Queene of the Holy Rites, and had taught maidens to keepe the holy euerlaſting fire from euer going out. Noah, before he went out of Armenia, had taught men Husbandry, more ayming at Religion and Manners, then Wealth and Dainties, which prouoke to vnlawfull things, and had lately procured the wrath of GOD. And firſt of all men he found out and planted Vines, and was therefore called Ianus, which to the Aramæans ſoundeth as much as The Author of Wine. Thus farre Beroſus lib. 3. and in the fourth Booke hee addeth, that Nymbrot (the firſt Saturne of Babylon) with his ſonne Iupiter Belus, ſtole away thoſe Rituall or Ceremoniall bookes of Iupiter Sagus, and came with his people into the land Sennaar, where he appointed a Citie, and laid the foundation of a great Tower, a hundred thirtie and one yeeres after the Floud; but neither finiſhed this, nor founded the other. Old Ianus when hee went hence, left Scythus, with his mother Araxa, and ſome inhabitants, to people Armenia, being the firſt King there of; Sabatius Saga being conſecrated High Prieſt, from Armenia vnto the Bactrians: all which ſpace (ſaith he) in our Age is called Scythia Saga. In his fifth booke hee reporteth, That Iupiter Belus, poſſeſſed with ambition of ſubduing the whole world, cloſely endeuoured to make (or take) away Sabatius Saga, who, being not able otherwiſe to eſcape his treacherie, fled away ſecretly. But Ninus the ſonne of Belus, purſued his fathers intent againſt Sabatius, who ſubſtituted his ſonne Barzanes in his place, and fled into Sarmatia, and after from thence into Italy, to his father Ianus. Barzanes was ſubdued by Ninus.

How much can the shadow, how little can the substance of Religion perswade men to? The Image of Tanais, or Anaitis was set vp in her Temple, all of solid gold: and when, as Antonius warred against the Parthians, this Temple was robbed. The fame [i] went, That hee which first had layed sacrilegious hands on the spoyles, was smitten blind, and so diseased, that he died thereof. But when Augustus, being encountred of an ancient warriour at Bononia, asked him of the truth of this report, he answered, Thou now, O Emperour, drinkest that bloud; for I am the man, and whatsoeuer I haue came by that bootie. This Goddesse is supposed to be the same with Diana. A Region of Armenia bare the same name Anaitis.

Haue bloudy Rites the Armenians sometimes vsed, appeareth [k] by the Historie of the Riuer Araxes, before called Halmus, borrowing this later name of a King there raigning; to whom, in warres betwixt him and the Persians, the Oracle prescribed the sacrifice of his two faire daughters. Pietie forbade what pietie commanded; and whiles the King would be an Vmpire betweene Nature and the Oracle (which is the vsuall euent in arbitrements) he satisfied neither. That the Oracle might bee fulfilled, he sacrificed two of noble birth, of notable beautie: that Nature might not be wronged, hee wronged Iustice (the true touch-stone of true pietie) hee spared his owne, and offered the daughters of Miesalcus: but so hee lost both his daughters by Miesalcus reuenging sword, and himselfe in this Riuer by himselfe drowned. Bacchus loued Alphœsibœa, an Armenian Damsell, and while Tygris, then (if you beleeue the Story) called Sollax, was too coole a Mediatour betweene the two hot louers, hee swam ouer on a Tygers backe. Hence the Fable of his Metamorphosis into a Tygre: hence that name left to the Riuer. Armenia was subdued to the Persians by Cyrus: one part thereof payed to the Persians twentie thousand Colts for yeerely tribute. [l] Sariaster, sonne to Tigranes the Armenian King, conspired against his father: the Conspirators sealed their bloudie faith with a bloudie ceremonie; they let themselues bloud in the right hands, and then dranke it. Wonder, that in such a treachery (as immediately before the same Author affirmeth of Mithridates his sonne) that any man would helpe: or that hee durst importune the Gods: and wonder, that so bloudie a seale was annexed to such euidence.

The Mountaines [n] of Armenia pay tribute vnto many Seas: by Phasis and Lycus vnto the Pontike Sea; Cyrus and Araxes vnto the Caspian; Euphrates and Tygris vnto the Red or Persian Sea: these two last are famous for their yeerely ouerflowings, the former of them arising amidst three other Seas, yet by the incroaching violence of the beetle-browed Hils enforced to a farre longer, more intricate, and tedious way, before hee can repose his wearied waues: the other, for his swiftnesse, bearing the name of Tygris, which with the Medes signifieth an Arrow. Plinius cap. 40. saith, That it passeth through the Lake Arethusa, neither mingling waters nor fishes, quite of another colour from the Lake; it diueth vnder Taurus, and bringeth with (much drosse on the other side of the Mountaine, and is againe hidden, and againe restored, and at last carrieth Euphrates into the Sea. The Armenians, besides their naturall Lords, haue been subiect to the Persians, after that, to the Macedonians, and againe to the Persians, after to Antiochus Captaines: then, to the Romans and Parthians, tossed betwixt the Grecians and Saracens; subdued after successiuely to the Tartarians, Persians, and Turkes. Of these present Armenians Master Cartwright [p] reporteth, That they are a people very industrious in all kinds of labour: their women very skilfull and actiue in shooting and managing any sort of weapon, like the ancient Amazons. ther and all his posteritie dwelling together vnder one roofe, hauing their substance in common: and when the father dieth, the eldest sonne doth gouerne the rest; all submitting themselues vnder his Regiment: after his death, not his sonne, but the next brother succeedeth; and so after all the brethren are dead, to the eldest sonne. In diet and clothing they are all alike. of their two Patriarches, and their Christian profession, wee are to speake in fitter place.

The Turcomanians (later inhabitants) are as other the Scythians or Tartarians, (from whence they are deriued) theeuish, wandring vp and downe in Tents without certaine habitations, like as the Curdi also their Southerly neighbours, their cattell and their robberies being their greatest wealth. Of their Religion (except of such as after their manner bee Christians, which wee must deferre till a fitter time) wee can finde little to say, more then is said alreadie in our Turkish Historie. This wee may here deplore of the vnhappy sight of Armenia, which though it repeopled the world, yet is it least beholding to her viperous offspring, a Map of the worlds miseries, through so many ages. For being hemmed alway with mightie neighbours on both sides, it selfe is made the bloudie Lists of their ambitious encounters, alway losing whosoeuer wonne, alway the Gauntlet of the Challenger, the Crowne of the Conquerour. This (to let passe elder times) the Romans and Parthians, Greeke Emperours and Saracens, Turkes and Tartarians, Turkes and Mamulukes, Turkes and Persians, doe more then enough proue.

§. II.

Of IBERIA.

PTOLOMEY placeth to the North of Armenia, Colchis, washed by the Pontike Sea; Albania by the Caspian; and betwixt these two Iberia, now together with some part of Armenia) called Georgia, either for the honour of their Patron Saint George, or haply because they descended of those Georgi, which Plinie [a] nameth among the Caspian Inhabitants. Strabo [b] recordeth foure kindes of people in this Iberia: of the first sort are chosen two Kings, the one precedent in age and nobilitie, the other a Leader in Warre, and Law-giuer in Peace; the second sort, are the Priests: the third, Husbandmen and Souldiers: the fourth, the vulgar seruile people. These haue all things common by Families, but hee is Ruler with his eldest; a thing obserued of the Armenian Christians (as before is said) euen at this day. Constantinus Porphyrogenitus [c] the Emperour writeth, That the Iberians boast and glorie of their descent from the wife of Vriah, which Dauid defiled, and of the children gotten betweene them. Thus would they seeme to bee of kin to Dauid and the Virgin Mary: and for that cause they marry in their owne kindred. They came (say they) from Ierusalem, being warned by Vision to depart thence, and seated themselues in these parts. There departed from Ierusalem Dauid, and his brother Spandiates, who obtained (say they) such a fauour from GOD, that no member of his could bee wounded in warre, except his heart, which hee therefore diligently armed; whereby he became dreadfull to the Persians, whom hee subdued, and placed the Iberians in these their habitations. In the time of Heraclius they ayded him against the Persians, which after that became an easie prey to the Saracens. Of the Roman conquests and exploits in [d] Armenia, Colchis, Iberia, Albania, I list not here to relate.

Of ALBANIA.

ALBANIA [e] (now Zuiria) lyeth North and East, betwixt Iberia and the Sea, of which Strabo affirmeth, that they need not the Sea, who make no better vse of the Land: for they bestow not the least labour in husbandrie, and yet the earth voluntarily and liberally yeeldeth her store: and where it is once sowen, it may twice or thrice be reaped. The men were so simple, that they neither had vse of money, nor did they number aboue an hundred; ignorant of weights, measures, warre, ciuilitie, husbandrie: there were in vse among them sixe and twentie languages. They had [f] Spiders which would procure death vpon men smiling, and some also which did men to die weeping.

They worshipped the Sunne, Iupiter, and the Moone, whose Temple was neere to Iberia. The Priest, which ruled it, was next in honour to the King; hee performeth the Holy Rites, ruleth ruleth the Holy Region, which is large and full of people: of the sacred Seruants, many being inspired, doe Diuine or Prophecie. Hee which is most rauished with the spirit, wandreth alone through the Woods: him the Priest taketh and bindeth with a sacred Chaine, allowing him sumptuous nourishment the space of a yeere, and after bringeth him to bee slaine with other sacrifices to the Goddesse. The Rites are thus: One which is skilfull of this businesse, holding the sacred Speare, wherewith they vse to slay the man, stepping forth, thrusteth it into his heart: in his falling they obserue certaine tokens of diuination: then doe they bring out the bodie into some place, where they all goe ouer it. The Albanians honoured olde-age in all men, death in none, accounting it vnlawfull to mention a dead man; with whom they also buried his wealth. [g] Plinie out of Isigorus affirmeth, that a people called Albani (not these I thinke, if any) were hoarie haired from their childhood, and saw as well by night as by day.

Of Colchis or Mengrelia.

MENGRELIA (sometime Colchis [h]) adioyneth to the Euxine Sea, in which Countrey Strabo mentioneth the Temple of Leucothea, builded by Phryxus: where was also an Oracle, and where a Ram might bee slaine. This Temple was sometimes very rich, but spoiled by Pharnax, and after of Mithridates. This country the Poets haue made famous by the fables of Phryxus, and Iason. Phryxus the sonne of Athemas, Prince of Thebes, and of Nephele, with his sister Helle fled from their cruell stepdame Ino, vpon the backe of a golden Ram, from which Helle falling into the water, gaue name thereto, of her called Hellespont: Phryxus comming safe into Colchis, sacrificed to Iupiter, and hanged vp the fleece of his Ram in the Groue of Mars; which custome was yeerely practised of his posteritie. Iason after by command of Pelias (seeking by a barbarous enemy, or a dangerous Nauigation to destroy him) with fourescore and nineteene other companions in the Ship, called Argo, fetched this Fleece from hence by the helpe of Medæa: and the Ship and the Ram filled Heauen with new Constellations. That fable [i] had ground of Historie, howsoeuer by fictions obscured. For the Riuers here in Colchis are reported to carrie gold downe with their streames and sands, which the people take with boords bored full of holes, and with fleeces of Wooll. Spaine hath of late yeelded many such Argonauts, with longer voyages, seeking the golden Indian Fleece, which their Indian conquest may make the Ensigne of their Order more fitly, then the Burgundian inheritance. Suidas applieth this Fleece and Ram, to Bookes of Alchymie, written in parchments made of Rams skins, which Delrio accounteth an Art of Naturall Magicke, and possible, howsoeuer these Colchians, as well as the Armenians, Egyptians, Persians, and Chaldeans were infamous for that other, which hee calleth Deuillish: and Medæa is most renowned for that science, the ignorance whereof is best learning.

Of the Curdi.

SOme [h] adde vnto Armenia, in their moderne Maps and Diſcoueries, beſides the Turcomani, a people that came thither out of Tartaria, the Curdi, both ſtill retaining the Tartarian and Arabian manner of life in Tents, without Cities, Townes, or Houſes. Their Religion halteth betwixt diuers Religions of the Turkes, Perſians, and Chriſtians, of the Iacobite and Neſtorian Sects. In heart, they are neither faſt to GOD nor Man; diſſembling with the Perſian and Turke; and better skilled in robberie, murther, and faithleſſe treacherie (their daily practiſe) then myſteries of Faith and Religion. They are alſo Lords of Bitlis, and ſome other Cities and Holds in thoſe parts. They are called Courdines by Sir Anthony Sherley; who ſaith, they know no other fruits of the earth, but what belonged to the ſuſtenance of their cattell, vpon the milke, butter and fleſh of which they liue, ruled by certaine Princes of their owne, which giue partly an obedience to the Turke, partly to the Perſian, as they are neereſt the confines of the one or the other. Yet in that ſimplicitie of liuing, through ambition, warres grow daily among them, euen to the extirpation of a whole Nation. As we found freſhly when wee paſſed by one of their Princes, called Hiderbeague, all whoſe people were deuoured by the ſword, or carried away captiue by Cobatheague; and himſelfe remained onely with ſome twentie ſoules in a Rocke. Ten thouſand of their Courdines, ſubiect to the Turke, abandoned their Countrey, and requeſted ſome waſte land to be giuen them by Abas the preſent Perſian, which gaue them entertainment: one occaſion of quarrell betwixt him and the Turke. They are ſuppoſed to be a remnant of the ancient Parthians, and neuer go abroad without their Armes, Bowes, Arrowes, Scimitars and Bucklers, euen when age ſeemeth to haue faſtned one foot in the graue. They adore [i] and worſhip the Deuill, that hee may not hurt them, nor their cattell: they are cruell to all ſorts of Chriſtians: their Countrey is therefore called Terra Diaboli. One of their Townes is named Manuſcute, a mile from which is an Hoſpitall dedicated to Saint Iohn Baptiſt, much frequented as well by Turkes as Chriſtians, whom ſuperſtition hath perſwaded, that whoſoeuer will beſtow Kidde, Sheepe, or Money, to releeue the poore of that place, ſhall both proſper in his iourney, and obtaine the forgiueneſſe of his ſinnes.

Of the Medes.

ARmenia extending it ſelfe (if Iuſtine [k] haue meaſured rightly) eleuen hundred miles, on the Eaſt encountereth Media, in which lieth our next perambulation. It receiued the name of Madai the ſonne of Iaphet, not of Medus the ſonne of Medea and Iaſon. It limited [l] on the North, with the Caſpian Sea; on the South, with Perſia; on the Eaſt, with Parthia. Ecbatana, the chiefe Citie, built (as Plinie [m] affirmeth) by Seleucus, (indeed farre more ancient, and by them happily reedified) is diſtant from the Caſpian ſtraits twentie miles. Theſe Straits are a narrow way made by hand thorow the Hills, ſcarce wide enough for a Cart to paſſe, eight miles in length, the Rocks manifeſting their indignation at this interruption, by obſcure frownes, and ſalt [n] teares continually ſtreaming from them, which I know not by what ſudden horror are preſently congealed into Ice; alſo all the Summer time armies of Serpents keeping the paſſages. Well may this bee the houſe of Enuie: ſo fitly doth that fable of the Poet [o] agree with the nature of this place.

r Iustin. lib. 1. Iustine r reporteth that Arbactus or Arbaces, Lieutenant of the Medes vnder Sardanapalus, rebelled against him for his effeminate life, and translated the Empire from the Assyrians, with whom it had continued thirteene hundred yeeres to the Medes. Diodorus Siculus s addeth in this conspiracie, vnto this Arbaces the Mede, Belesis, whom some call Phul Beloch the Babylonian, who shared the state betwixt them; the Babylonian possessing Babylonia and Assyria; and Arbaces, Media and Persia. Of this more is t said before.

u Diodor. Sic. lib. 3. 1. In the time of Ninus, Farnus (saith u Diodorus) was King of Media, who, encountring with Ninus in battell, was there taken, with his wife and seuen sonnes: all which the bloudie Conquerour commanded to be crucified. And thus remained Media hand-maid to the Assyrians, till the time of Sardanapalus; but not without some disquiet. For in Semiramis time the Medes rebelled, and destroyed Nineue. But Semiramis inuaded their Countrie with a mightie Armie: and comming to the Hill Bagistanus, sacred to Iupiter, there pitched her Tents; and x in the plaine fields made a garden, containing twelue furlongs. Beyond the garden, shee cut a Rocke seuenteene furlongs high, grauing therein her owne Image, and an hundred others, bringing her gifts. Some y tell this otherwise, that shee pourtrayed her owne Image in that huge quantitie, and appointed an hundred Priests continually to attend the same with offerings and diuine worship. At Chaona a Citie of Media, shee espying another huge Rocke in the Plaine, caused another Garden to bee made in the middest thereof, with sumptuous houses of pleasure therein, whence shee might behold all her Armie, and there gaue her selfe a long space to rest and voluptuousnesse, making choice of the likeliest Gallants in her Campe for her bed-fellowes, all whom she after did to death. Thence to Ecbatana she made the way shorter, and more passeable, casting downe Hills, and exalting the Valleyes into a plaine, still bearing her name. At Ecbatana z she built a Palace, and brought water thither from the Hill Orontes, by a laborious and costly channell. And thus did shee not onely subdue the rebellious Medes, but made a conquest of Nature in ostentation of her puissance. The same a Author telleth, that multitudes of Sparrowes which eate vp their seeds, forced the Inhabitants to leaue their soile; as did Mice cause some parts of Italy, and Frogs (rayned out of the clouds) the Attariotæ, and (as wee haue b obserued) the Fleas chased away the Inhabitants of Myus. How great is the Creator, that of the smallest of his creatures can muster Armies to the conquest of them, which swell in conceit of their owne greatnesse? Wee like Gyants by our wickednesse defie the Heauens, and defile the Earth, saying (by our workes) c Who is the Almightie, that wee should serue him? When as yet the Lord of Hosts need not tame vs with Legions of Angels (one could destroy Senacheribs Host) nor set the Heauens in their courses to fight his battells (as against the Canaanites) nor arrange the Elements with an ouer-whelming Chaos to confound vs, by a Sodomiticall fire, or ayrie pestilence, or deluge of waters, or deuouring of the earth: nor needes hee Lyons to challenge a part of his glorie to their strength and proweſſe: Frogs, and Lice, and Flies shall bee Pharaohs Challengers, Conquerors, Iaylers: And how many Nations in Africa haue the insulting triumphing Grasse-hoppers exiled from their natiue dwellings? Proud MAN, well may the baſest of thy baſest seruants thus make thee to see thy baſeneſse; and by rebelling against thee, argue thy rebellions against their and thy Creator.

Et quæ non prosunt singula, multa iuuant. Et quæ non possunt singula, multa nocent.

But that wee bee not too farre transported with this not vniust passion; let vs returne to our Prouince of Media; which Arbaces d deliuered from Assyrian seruitude, and subiected it together with the Easterne Empire to himselfe, vnder whose posteritie it continued three hundred and two and twentie yeeres. Astyages, the last, was by Cyrus his Nephew, conquered, according to two dreames, which had fore-signified this vnto him. In the first hee dreamed, that he saw so much vrine streaming from his daughter Mandane (his onely child) that all Asia was drowned therewith: in the other, a Vine grew from her, which shadowed all Asia. His Magi e told him, that hereby was fore-told his Nephewes greatnesse, with the losse of his Kingdome. To preuent this, hee wedded his daughter to Cambyses a Persian: and when shee was deliuered of a child, hee committed it to Harpagus (one of his trustie Councellers) to be made away. He fearing reuenge from the daughter, if shee should after succeed her father, deliuereth the Infant to Mitradates the Kings Heard-man, commanding him in Astyages name, to expose it on the Mountaine. Hee returning home, found his wife newly deliuered of a dead child, which, by her entreatie was laid forth in stead thereof. Her name was Spaco, which in the Median language signifieth a Bitch: whence the fable grew, that Cyrus being so exposed, was nourished by a Bitch. This Infant growing vp, and called by the Heard-mans name, after ten yeeres was knowne by this occasion. f A company of boyes playing together, chose this strippling for their King, whoused his childish Royaltie, with more then childish discipline. For he ordained diuers Officers, some of them to be his Guard, ſome Builders, Meſſengers, &c. as hee thought fit. Amongſt whom was a ſonne of one Artembares, a man of great eſtimation, who for neglecting his office, was by this young Kingling ſeuerely chaſtiſed. He complained thereof to his father, and the father brought the child to the King, accuſing the indignitie of the fact, that his Heard-mans ſonne ſhould deale ſo malapertly and cruelly, ſhewing his beaten ſhoulders to Aſtyages. The Heard-man and his ſuppoſed ſonne was ſent for, that Artembares might bee ſatisfied: where the young King gaue ſo good account of that his fact, that Aſtyages, much amazed, tooke the Heard-man aſide, and with buſie inquirie learned of him all the truth of this matter: wherewith enraged againſt Harpagus, who ought himſelfe to haue done that diſmall execution, but diſſembling the ſame, he told him that hee would doe ſacrifice for the childes ſafetie, and bade him ſend his child to beare Cyrus company, inuiting him alſo to ſup with him, where hee feaſted him with the fleſh of his owne ſonne, whoſe head, fingers, and toes, were ſet before him at the laſt ſeruice. Harpagus bare it as patiently as hee could, till fitter occaſion of reuenge offered it ſelfe, which thus fell out. The Magi told Aſtyages, that in this childiſh Kingdome of Cyrus, the danger of his dreame was alreadie paſſed, and that hee needed not to feare any further danger. Wherefore hee was ſent into Perſia to his Parents. After he was now a man, Harpagus, hauing ſecretly ſollicited the Medes to rebellion againſt their cruell Soueraigne, acquainted Cyrus with his proiect, to that end encloſing a letter in a Hares belly, which hee ſent to Cyrus by one of his Huntſmen: which was with ſuch induſtrie and ſucceſſe proſecuted, that Aſtyages luſt his Scepter, and Cyrus tranſlated the Empire to the Perſians. For Harpagus being made Generall of the Armie of the Medes, reuolted to Cyrus, with all ſuch as he had made acquainted with his treaſon. And when the Medes after rebelled in the time of Darius, they were forced againe to ſubiection. The Magi were by Aſtyages command, crucified: and he himſelfe re-enforcing his power, and bidding battell to Cyrus the ſecond time, was taken aliue, and by his Nephew ſet ouer the Hyrcans.

The Magi had large and fertill poſſeſſions (thus reporteth [g] Ammianus) aſſigned them in Media. Their Science, called Magia, is by Plato termed Machagiſtia, which myſticall word ſignifieth the pureſt worſhip of the gods: to which Science Zoroaſtres of Bactria in olde times added many things out of the myſteries of the Chaldees. But becauſe the Perſians had from hence their Empire, and this Religion, by whoſe Armes they were made knowne to the World: there ſhall bee fitter place to ſpeake of theſe Magi, when wee treat of the Perſian Rites. In this Region was made the oyle Medicum, wherein their Arrowes were ſteeped, which being ſhot out of a looſer Bow (for a ſwifter ſhot extinguiſhed it) did burne the fleſh in which it did ſticke, and if water were applyed to it, the fire thereof encreaſed. Nor could any remedie cure the ſame, but hurling duſt thereon. It was compoſed of Naphta. The Medes made league with this ceremonie. [h] They wounded the Souldiers of each partie, either licked others bloud. The North parts of Media were barren, and therefore they liued on Apples dryed and ſtamped together: of roſted Almons they made bread, and wine of the roots of herbs. This and veniſon was there food. In one plaine [i] of Media were paſtured fiftie thouſand Mares, belonging to the King: the herbe whereon they principally fed, is ſtil called Medica. The race of Horſes, called Niſæi, were here bred, and hence diſperſed allouer the Eaſt.

Among [k] the Medes, none might be King by the Law of the Countrey, except hee were in ſtature and ſtrength eminent. All the Medes (ſaith Bardeſanes [l] a famous Chaldæan) nouriſh Dogs with great care, to which they caſt men readie to die (whiles they are yet breathing) to be deuoured of them.

The Medes [m] worſhipped the fire, with barbarous honours done thereto. Their Kings held ſuch Maieſtie, that none might laugh or ſpit before them. They were ſeldome ſeene of their people: They had alway Muſitians attending them. Their wiues and children accompanied them in their battells.

The name of the Medes remained famous after the Perſian Conqueſt, as appeareth by the ſtile which the Scripture [n] giueth them: The Law of the Medes and Perſians which was vnchangeable, the King himſelfe not hauing power to reuoke his ſentence.

As for the Catalogue of the Kings which ſucceeded Arbaces, vntill the time of Aſtyages, and the times of their raigne, wee haue before ſhewed it out of Scaliger, [o] in our firſt Booke, Chap. 13. True it is that all agree not in that account. Reinerus [p] Reineccius leaueth out diuers of them, and numbreth the yeeres of the Median Dynaſtie but 261. whereas our former account hath 322. But I had rather referre the Reader to that Catalogue, then trouble him with new out of this or other Authors.

Media hath beene [q] diuided into Media Maior, and Atropatia: the former containeth Tauris, ſuppoſed by Ortelius to be the forenamed Ecbatana (yet now wanting walls altogether) containing in circuit ſixteene miles, and of people two hundred thouſand; ſubdued to the Turke 1585. and before by Selim and Soliman; but ſince recouered by the Perſian.

CHAP. III.

Of the Parthians and Hyrcanians.

§. I.

Of Parthia.

PArthia is placed by Plinie d in the rootes of the Hills: hauing on the Eaſt the Arians; on the Weſt, the Medes; on the South, Carmania; on the North, Hyrcania, rounded with deſarts. Hee affirmeth, that the Kingdomes of the Parthians were eighteene. Eleuen of them neere to the Caſpian Sea; and the other ſeuen neer the Red Sea. The word Parthian ſignifieth with the Scythians an exile. Their chiefe Citie was Hecatompylos, now (as ſome e affirme) Hiſpaham, for the excellencie thereof called of the Perſians, Halfe the world. Theſe Scythian exiles in the times of the Aſſyrians, Medes, Perſians, and Macedonians, were an obſcure people, the prey of euery Conquerour, which after ſeemed to diuide the world with the Romans. Their ſpeech was mixt of the Median and Scythian: their Armies conſiſted moſt part of ſeruants, which they held in great reſpect, inſtructing them in feats of Armes. In an Armie of fiftie thouſand wherewith they encoutred Antonie, there were onely eight hundred free-men. The Parthians f had no vſe of gold or ſiluer, but in their armour. They had many wiues, whereof they were ſo iealous, that they forbad them the ſight of other men. They performed all buſineſſe priuate and publike on horſe-backe; this being the diſtinction of free-men from ſeruants. Their buriall was in the bellies of birds, or dogs. Their naked bones were after couered with earth: they were exceedingly ſuperſtitious in the worſhip of their gods: a ſtout, vnquiet, ſeditious, vnfaithfull people. Arſaces, firſt a famous thiefe, after, the Founder of that Kingdome, left no leſſe memorie of himſelfe amonſt the Parthians, then Cy- rus among the Persians, or Alexander among the Macedonians. The day wherein hee ouerthrew Seleucus, was solemnly obserued euery yeere amongst them, as the beginning of their libertie. Of him they called all their Kings Arsaces, as the Roman Emperors are named Cæsars. They g called themselues the brethren of the Sunne and Moone, which are in those places worshipped. This Arsaces was worshipped after his death. They were no lesse bloudie to their brethren, when they came to the Crowne, then the Ottomans are at this day. Phrahartes h slew thirtie of his brethren; and before them his father; and after, his sonne; rather then he would endure a possibilitie of a Competitor. About i 224. yeeres after Christ, Artabanus the last Persian King, being slaine by Artaxeres, or Artaxares the Persian, the Empire returned to the Persians, who were thereof depriued by the Saracens; and they againe by the Tartars: and is now for the greatest part vnder the Sophi: they had their cup-quarrels, striuing who should draw deepest: which custome wee need not goe into Parthia to seeke. Strabo mentioneth among the Parthians, a Colledge or Senate of Magi and Wise-men. Their ancient religious Rites I finde not particularly related.

The Parthian affaires are thus by some k related. After Alexanders death, none of the Macedonians vouchsafing so meane a Prouince, Stragonor a forrainer obtained it: after which (the Macedonians contending in ciuill quarrels for the Soueraigntie) Parthia wauered in vncertaintie, till in the time of Seleucus the nephew of Antiochus, Theodotus, Deputie of Cachia, entituled himselfe King: so giuing example of rebellion to the Easterne Nations, which Arsaces among the Parthians easily followed. Hee combining himselfe with Theodotus, and after his death, with his sonne, strengthened himselfe in his new erected gouernment of two Cities. But Seleucus taking armes against him, was by him ouerthrowne in battell: which day first gaue light to the Parthian greatnesse, not vnworthily obserued therefore of their posteritie with solemnitie. For Seleucus being by more important affaires called home, the Parthians had leisure to establish their hopes. Athenæus reporteth that Arsaces tooke him prisoner, and after gentle vsage he sent him home.

After this first, came a second Arsaces, who encountered with Antiochus the sonne of Seleuchus, comming against him with an Army of an hundred thousand foot-men, & twentie thousand horse. The issue was, they parted friends in mutuall league. Priapatius, or Panpatius was their third King, to whom Phraates his sonne succeeded; and next, his brother Mithridates, who subdued the Medes and Helimæans, enlarging the Parthian Empire, from Mount Caucasus to Euphrates. Hee tooke Demetrius King of Syria prisoner: and died in his old age. His sonne Phraates was the fourth: on whom Antiochus warred, and the Parthian opposed against him his brother Demetrius, till then detained prisoner. But whiles he warred against the Scythians, by treason of his owne subiects hee was slaine; and Artabanus his Vncle placed in his roome. He also soone after died of a wound receiued in the field: and his sonne Mithridates succeeded, whom the Parthian Senate expelled and deposed. But others reckon betweene Artabanus and Mithridates, Pacorus, and his sonne Phraates. So vncertaine is the Parthian Historie; for which cause also l Scaliger blameth Onuphrius for being too peremptory in such vncertainties.

Next in orders reckoned Orodes or Herodes, who besieged his said brother Mithridates in Babylon, and tooke both it and him, and caused him to be slaine in his sight. Against him Crassus the Roman Consull (moued with couetousnesse, m hatefull to God and man, saith Florus) led the Roman Legions to win the Parthian gold: And by the way n passing through Iudæa, spoiled the sacred Treasury which Pompey spared, amounting to two thousand talents, and robbed the Temple of eight thousand talents besides. Hee also carried away a beame of solide gold, weighing three hundred Minæ (euery Mina is two pound and a halfe Roman) deliuered vnto him by Eleazarus the Treasurer, vpon condition to take nothing else. But Crassus violated the oath which he had giuen to Eleazarus, and carried all he liked. Many dismall o presages prohibited Crassus his expedition, as the curses of the Tribune, whom Dion, Plutarch, and Appian call Atteius Capito. Those curses were denounced with inuocation of some vnknowne gods. Also the Roman ensignes were drowned, with sudden tempests in Euphrates: and when p hee had sacrificed to Venus, his sonne stumbled and fell, and Crassus with him. He reiected the Legates of the Parthian, alledging the former league with Pompey. Thus posting to his destruction, one Mazarus (as Florus calls him; or as Plutarch, Ariamnes; Dion, and Appianus name him Augarus) encountred him, not with Armes, but with Arts and wiles, professing great hostilitie to the Parthians. Crassus following his aduice, led his Army into by-wayes and deserts, till being brought into the Parthian snares, his new guide forsooke him, and the couetous Consull, with his sonne were slaine, and eleuen Roman Legions taken or left in the place. His head and periured right hand were sent by Surinas the Parthian Generall (who was said to haue then in the field with him twelue hundred Concubines, and a thousand Camels laden with his own furniture) vnto King Orodes: who contumeliously, contumeliouſly, (if contumely and merite can ioyne ſocietie) vſed the ſame, powring into his jawes (ſometimes greedie of that metall) molten gold. Orodes enuying Surinas the glory of his victorie, ſlew him, and committed the remnants of that warre to be purſued by his ſonne Pacorus, adioyning to him in that exploit Oſaces. In the ciuill warres they tooke part with Pompey againſt Cæſar. Pacorus being receiued into ſocietie of the Kingdome with his father, inuaded Iudæa, and placing Antigonus in the Kingdome, captiued Hircanus. But whiles he aſpired to greater hopes, hee loſt himſelfe and his Armie, in which were twentie thouſand Horſe-men, in a battell with Ventidius; who by a wily Stratageme, counterfeiting flight and feare, and ſuffering the Parthians to come vp to their Tents, that they had now no ſpace for their Arrowes, effected this ouerthrow.

Pacorus his head reduced the Cities of Syria to the Roman ſubiection, without further warre. This newes made his father madde, who before boaſting of the conqueſt of Aſia by Pacorus, now in many dayes did neither ſpeake nor eate: but when hee once did open his mouth, all his ſpeech was Pacorus, who ſtill ſeemed preſent vnto him. In this extaticall mood, Phraates, one of his thirtie ſonnes, which he had by ſo many Concubines, ſlew him, and after them his brethren, with a ſonne alſo of his owne. This crueltie cauſed many Parthians to betake themſelues to voluntary exile, among which Monæſes prouoked [f] Antonius to warre vpon this Tyrant. Hee did ſo, but with bad ſucceſſe, of ſixteene Legions ſcarce bringing the third part backe againe. Phraates, impotent and vncapable of ſo glorious aduentures, grew into ſuch inſolencies, that the people exiled him, and placed Tiridates in his roome; who was ſoone after diſplaced by the Scythians, and Phraates reſtored to his place. Tiridates fled to Auguſtus (then warring in Spaine) for refuge and aide, carrying with him the ſonne of Phraates, whom Cæſar ſent backe againe to his father without any price, maintaining neither partie againſt the other, but allowing liberall prouiſion to Tiridates.

But after this, [g] Auguſtus going into the Eaſt, the Parthians fearing ill meaſure, redeliuered all the Roman captiues, and enſignes, and gaue hoſtages alſo, his two ſonnes, with their wiues and children, and reſigned Armenia to the Romans. Phraatax his ſonne ſlew him, with greateſt iniuſtice, repaying that which was moſt iuſt, and due to his former paricide. This Phraatax, vſing inceſtuous acquaintance with his mother, Thermuſa (an Italian, whom Auguſtus had beſtowed on Phraates, and by whoſe helpe hee was ſlaine) was killed in an vprore, leauing his ſonne Orodes his ſucceſſor. Hee alſo in a conſpiracie was killed: and Vonon [h] ſubſtituted, whom the Parthians not long enduring, forced to ſeeke helpe of the Romans, where he was perfidiouſly ſlaine.

[h] Sueton. in vit. Tiberij, cap. 49.

Artabanus obtained the Empire, [i] from whence hee was after chaſed by Vitellius, who placed Tiridates in the Throne, which hee had ſcarce warmed, when Artabanus recouered it, and after left it to his ſonne Bardanes; the Arſacian ſtocke being now diſpoſſeſſed. This Bardanes [k] whiles hee minded warres againſt the Romans, is killed of his owne. Gotarzes his brother ſucceeded to the Scepter: which he held, notwithſtanding the decree of the Roman Senate for Meherdates the ſonne of Vonon, whom hee tooke and cut off his eares: Vonones was his ſucceſſor, a little while, and preſently after Vologæſes his ſonne. The next was Artabanus, and after him Pacorus; and in the next place Coſdroes his brother: againſt whom Traian warred with good ſucceſſe, who extended the Roman Empire to the Indians. But Adrian renewed league with the Parthian, Parthanaſpates ſucceeded: and ſoon after Vologæſes, who left heire his ſonne of the ſame name, depriued by his brother Artabanus. He being vniuſtly dealt with by the Romans trecherie, draue them to ſue for peace: which, after that Antonius [l] the author of the breach was dead, was eaſily obtained by Macrinus his ſucceſſour. But Artaxares a Perſian preuailed better, in a third battell ouerthrowing him, and reducing the Kingdome after ſuch a world of yeeres to the Perſian name. Some reckon this 472. yeeres from Arſaces, and 228. after Chriſt. Scaliger [m] reckoneth the time of the Parthian Dynaſtie 479. yeeres. The number of their Kings after this computation is nine and twentie. They which liſt to ſee further of their warres with the Romans, may reade the Roman Authors, which haue written the ſame: the ſumme whereof is here preſented to your view.

Cornelius Tacitus [n] tells a merry tale (for I thinke theſe Tragedies haue wearied you) and pertinent to our purpoſe, of a good-fellow-like Hercules, whom the Parthians worſhipped. This kind-hearted god warneth his Prieſts in a dreame, that neere to his Temple they ſhould ſet his horſes readie furniſhed for hunting, which they doe, lading them with quiuers full of Arrowes. Theſe after much running vp and downe the Forreſt, returne home at night blowing and breathleſſe, their quiuers being emptied. And Hercules (no niggard of his veniſon) acquainteth the Prieſts at night by another viſion, with all his diſport, what woods hee hath ranged, and the places of his game. They ſearching the places, finde the ſlaine beaſts.

and, like dogs, feed on that which the King casteth to them. And many times vpon occasion of the Kings displeasure, they are haled thence and scourged, and yet they then prostrate on the ground, adore their striker. They [p] worshipped the Sunne at his rising. Bardesanes [q] in Eusebius, saith of them, that to kill his wife, or sonne, or daughter, or brother, or sister (yet vnmarried) was not prohibited by the Law to any Parthian, nor any way subiect to punishment. The Parthian [r] Ensigne was a Dragon; the Royall Ensigne a Bow: their stile was, King of Kings; they ware a double Crowne. They had an ointment made of a certaine composition, which no priuate man might vse. Nor might any else drinke of the waters of Choaspes and Eulæus. None might come to the King without a present. The Magi were in great authoritie with them. Their Rites were mixt of the Persian and Scythian. Nothing was more seuerely punished then adulterie. A seruant might not bee made free, nor might be suffered (except in the warres) to ride, or a free-man to goe on foot. Their fight was more dangerous in flying, then in standing or giuing the onset.

Of the Hircanians Tappyri and Caspians.

HYrcania (now called Straua or Diargument) hath on the West, Media; on the East Margiana; on the South, Parthia; on the North, the Sea, which hereof is called the Hyrcane, otherwise Caspian. Famous it hath beene, and is, for store of woods and Tygers. There are also other wilde beasts. Here in the Citie Nabarca was an Oracle, which gaue answeres by dreames.

Some Riuers in this Countrey haue so steepe a fall into the Sea, that vnder the waters the people resort to sacrifice or banquet; the streame shooting violently ouer their heads, without wetting them. Ionius writeth, That the ayre is vnwholsome by reason of the Fennes. Straua the chiefe Citie aboundeth in trafficke for Silke. But if nothing meddle therewith, it is accounted a miſerable and lamentable caſe. The Derbices account all faults (though neuer ſo ſmall) worthy of the vtmoſt puniſhment. Of Perſia, and the Perſian State, in the firſt and ſecond Perſian Dynaſties.

PErſia, if wee take it ſtrictly, is thus bounded by [a] Ptolomey: It hath on the North, Media; on the Eaſt, Carmania; on the South, part of the Perſian Gulfe. But this name is ſometimes ſtretched as farre as that wide and ſpacious Kingdome; all that Empire being often called in Authors, Perſia, and differing in the bounds and limits, according to the enlarging or contracting of that Monarchie. It is ſuppoſed, that the Perſians deſcended of Elam, the ſonne of [b] Shem; whoſe name remained vnto a Region called Elymais, mentioned by [c] Ptolomey, placed in the North parts of Media. Plinie mentioneth [d] the Elamitæ, on the South next to the Sea, which name Ierome [e] in his dayes gaue to one of that Nation, frater quidam Elamita, &c. Xenophon alſo nameth the Tribe of the Elamites. Moſes telleth of the raigne and power of Chederlaomer King of Elam, [f] in that morning of the world extended to the borders of Canaan. [g] Herodot. reports, that they were called of the Greekes Cephenes; of the neighbouring Nations, Artæi. Suidas [h] affirmes, that they were called of the Inhabitants Magog and Maguſæi. Other names are by Ortelius [i] added, Chorſori, Achæmenij, Panchaia, &c. It was called Perſia of Perſæus the ſonne of Danae, or of Perſes the ſonne of Andromeda; or (as others) of Perſes the ſonne of Medea.

§. I.

Of the beginning of the Perſian Monarchie by CYRVS.

FRom the time of Chedorlaomer, whom Abram with his houſhold-armie ouerthrew, vntill the time of Cyrus, little mention is made of them, hee freed them from the Median ſeruitude, and erected firſt that mightie Perſian Monarchie. Bizarus [k] (which hath written twelue bookes of the Perſian affaires) ſuppoſeth that in that time of their ſubiection to the Aſſyrians and Medes, they had Gouernours, and Lawes, of their owne: onely owing a tributary ſubiection to the other, as their ſupreme Lords. This hee collecteth out of Xenophon. Cyrus was by name foretold by Eſay [l], and the re-building of Ieruſalem and the Temple, by his authoritie, before that Babylonian Monarchie was erected which deſtroyed them. GOD after reuealed to Nebuchadnezzar and Daniel by dreames, this Perſian both riſing and fall. And by dreames did he make way vnto the effecting of his decree; as appeareth in Herodotus, Iuſtine and others. For Aſtyages [m] dreaming that hee ſaw a Vine growing on the wombe of his daughter Mandane, which couered all Aſia (interpreted by his Wizards, of the ſubuerſion of his Kingdome by his daughters future iſſue) married her, as before is ſaid, to Cambyſes, a Perſian, deſcended of the ſtocke of Perſæus ſonne of Iupiter, and Danae, and the ſonne of Achæmenes, [n] ſo that in that remote Region, meanes might faile vnto any aſpiring deſignes. The Chaldæans report, as Alphæus recordeth out of Megaſthenes, that Nabuchodonoſor hauing conquered all Libya, and Aſia, as farre as Armenia, at his returne rauiſhed with diuine fury, cryed out, That a Perſian Mule ſhould come and ſubdue the Babylonians. This agrees ſomewhat both with the dreame, and the madneſſe recorded of that King by Daniel, Chap. 2. and 4. The Oracle of Delphos made like anſwere to Cræſus, That the Lydians ſhould then flee, when a Mule ſhould gouerne the Medes. He was termed a Mule, [o] becauſe of his more noble parentage by the mother, then the the father, and their diuersitie of Nation. Strabo p thinkes he was called Cyrus of a Riuer in Persia, being before called Agradatus. Plutarch q saith, hee was called Cyrus of the Sunne, which with the Persians hath that name. Polyœnus r calleth his wife Nitetis, daughter of Apries King of Egypt. Suidas saith it was Bardane, and that shee was daughter of Cyaxares, otherwise called Darius Medus. Hee conquered the Median Empire first; and after added two other, the s Lydian and t Babylonian. Crœsus the Lydian consulting with the Oracle about the successe of his warre, receiued answere:

That is,

Crœsus passing Haile, great state shall make to fall.

This he interpreted of the ouerthrow of Cyrus, but proued it in himselfe; Crœsus his sonne had beene mute, till (now seeing the sword of his enemy readie to giue the fatall stroke vnto his father) violence of sudden passion brake open those barres, and stops which Nature had set before as impediments to his speech, and by his first most fortunate-vnfortunate language, cried to the bloudie Souldiers to spare his u father. After his many great exploits, hee warred vpon Thamyris the Scythian Queene, where he lost his life. I know not how, Diuine Prouidence seemeth to haue set those Scythian stints to the Persian proceedings; those great Monarches, both in the elder, and our later world, euer finding those Northerne windes crossing, and in some dismall successe prohibiting their ambition that way.

u Great were the Treasures which Cyrus gate in his warres; but his expenses in his daily diet (engrauen in a Pillar, which Alexander caused to be razed) seeme incredible: the particulars whereof, see in Polyæn. lib. 4. and Opmeerus pag. 105.

Cyrus was of so firme memory, that hee could call all the souldiers (some say, but all that had any place of command) by their proper names. He ordained, that his souldiers should in the first ioyning with the enemy sing certaine Hymnes to Castor and Pollux, that by this meanes they should not bee surprised with sudden feare. He gaue leaue to the Iewes to returne and re-people their Countrey, and to re-build the Temple. x A. M. 3419. Ezra calleth this the first yeere of Cyrus; not the first of his reigne, but of his Easterne Monarchie, as in his Edict himselfe proclaimeth; The Lord GOD of Heauen hath giuen mee all the Kingdomes of the Earth. For after he had ouercome Darius Medus (whom Berosus calleth Nabonnidus) in battell, and forced him to keepe himselfe in Borsippa: hee besieged and obtained Babylon; where spending some time for the setling of his affaires, he after that forced Darius to yeeld; and returning to Babylon, made a conquest of Susiana. All which atchieued, the ninth yeere after the taking of Babylon, the seuentieth of the Iewish Captiuitie, the nine and twentieth of his raigne, and the first of that his Babylonian Empire, hee made the decree aboue mentioned, and dyed the second yeere after. It is probable also, that the Persians who held Cyrus in such veneration, began their Æra, or new Computation, from this time of his setled Empire: an honour giuen after by the Easterne world to Alexander in like manner. The Babylonian Kingdome was thus diuided and giuen to the Medes and Persians; first to Darius, by bloud and descent a Mede, and after, by conquest to Cyrus a Persian.

x Scalig. Caluisius. Alij. A. M. 3421. Ezra 1. 2. Scal. Proleg. ad Em. T. ed. vlt. & in not. Frag. Dan. 5. 28.

We haue large Fragments of Ctesias (who was present in the battell betweene Artaxerxes and Cyrus, as was Xenophon also, who hath written the same at large) collected and reserued by Photius, who saith, hee had read foure and twentie Bookes of this Ctesias his Persica, in which hee much differeth from the reports of Herodotus; professing, that hee had either seene those things which hee writeth, or receiued them of the Persians themselues. He affirmeth that Astygas (so he calleth Astyages) was nothing of kinne to Cyrus, but being by him conquered, was first imprisoned, and after inlarged, and kindly intreated; Cyrus taking his daughter Amytis (her husband Spytama being slaine) to his wife. He subdued the Bactrians, and tooke Amorges King of the Sacæ prisoner. But his wife Sparethra with an Army of three hundred thousand men, and two hundred thousand women, came against Cyrus, and taking him and Parmyses the brother of Amytis prisoners, in exchange of them redeemed her husband Amorges, after this helped Cyrus in his warres against Crœsus, who (the Citie being taken, and his sonne, which had beene giuen in hostage, slaine before his face) fled vnto Apollos Temple, whence by Magicall illusions he made an escape; and being taken againe and bound faster, his bands with thunder and lightning were loosed, whereupon Cyrus freed him, and gaue him the Citie Barene, neere to Ecbatana. Cyrus after that warred against the Derbices, who by the helpe of the Indians and Elephants, ouerthrew Cyrus, who receiued there a wound by an Indian, whereof hee three dayes afterwards died. But by helpe of Amorges the Derbices were ouercome, and their King Amorœus slaine with his two sonnes. Cyrus before his death made Cambyses his eldest sonne his heire, and Tanyoxarces his younger, Lord of the Bactrians, Choramnians and Parthians, and set Spytades sonne of Spytama ouer the Derbices. He reigned thirtie yeeres.

§. II.

Of the ſucceſſion of CYRVS: and of CAMBYSES.

CAMBYSES (Cteſias addeth in his twelfth Booke) ſent his fathers bodie into Perſia. He warred vpon Egypt, and ſent Amyrtæus the King with ſixe thouſand Egyptians Captiues into Suſa, hauing ſlaine fiftie thouſand Egyptians, and loſt ſeuen thouſand and two Perſians. In the meane time Sphendadates one of the Magi, being corrected by Tanyoxarces for ſome offence, accuſed him to Cambyſes his brother, who caused him to die with a draught of Buls bloud, deceiuing his mother and his brothers followers, as if hee had put the Magus to death for that ſlander. And ſo neerely did they reſemble each other, that Sphendadates was ſent to the Bactrians, where fiue yeeres after, the myſterie of this iniquitie was detected by Tybetheus an Eunuch (by him chaſtened) vnto Amitis, who, when ſhee could not obtaine him of Cambyſes to puniſhment, poyſoned her ſelfe. Cambyſes after hee had reigned eighteene yeeres, died at Babylon of a wound which he had receiued in his thigh, by whittling a ſticke to paſſe away the time, hauing receiued before direfull preſages of this diſaſter, in his ſacrifice not bleeding, and Roxane bringing him forth a ſonne without a head. Bagapates, and Artaſyras his chiefe Eunuches procured the Kingdome to the Magus, reigning with the name of Tanyoxarces, till Ixabates detected him, who fleeing into a Temple was drawne thence and ſlaine. But ſeuen chiefe men, Onophas, Idernes, Norodabates, Mardonius, Bariſes, Ataphernes, and Darius ſonne of Hyſtaſpes, conſpired againſt the Magus, and by the helpe of Artaſyras and Bagapates, ſlew him in his bed-chamber, hauing reigned ſeuen moneths, ordaining the ſolemne feſtiuall Magaphonia in remembrance thereof. Darius being mounted to the Throne by the neighing of his Horſe (as theſe Princes had before agreed) built him a Sepulchre in his life time, in a Hill; which when hee would haue ſeene, the Chaldæans forbade him, and his parents curious of that ſight, were let downe by the Prieſts with ropes: but they terrified by the ſudden ſight of Serpents, let goe their hold, and Darius for that loſſe of his parents ſlaine in the fall, cut off the heads of the Prieſts, in number fortie. He marched with eight hundred thouſand men into Europe againſt the Scythians; but returning with loſſe, dyed after hee had reigned one and thirtie yeeres.

Plutarch in the life of Artaxerxes accuſeth Cteſias of abſurd fables, &c.

But before we follow Cteſias any further, let vs ſee what the common report by Herodotus and others hath deliuered of theſe proceedings: and let the iudicious Reader chuſe whom hee wil embrace. Scaliger and others, rather follow Herodotus, who relateth of Cambyſes, that ſucceeding his father, hee tooke, and after ſlew Pſammenitus King of Egypt. And when hee would haue added Æthiopia [a] to his new Conqueſts, with the ſpoiles of the Temple of Ammon, for which purpoſes he ſent two Armies; the one was almoſt conſumed with famine, the beaſts and prouiſions failing, and that barren deſart denying graſſe; the remainder by conſuming one another, were (a ſtrange remedie) preſerued from conſumption, euery tenth man being by lot tythed to the ſhambles, and more returning to their fellowes mawes, then on their owne legs. The other Armie was quite buryed in the ſands. At his returne, finding the Egyptians ſolemnizing the feaſt of their Idoll Apis, hee ſlew the ſame (it was a Bull which they worſhipped:) and after dreaming that Smerdis reigned, hee ſent, and ſlew his brother which was ſo called, in vaine ſeeking to fruſtrate this preſage, which was fulfilled in another of that name. He fell in loue with his ſiſter; and asking whether it were lawfull for him to marry her, the Iudges (whoſe authoritie with the Perſians laſted with their liues) anſwered, that they had no ſuch law, but they had another, that the King of Perſia might doe what him liked; whereupon hee marryed her. His crueltie appeared, in that Prexaſpes preſuming to admoniſh him of his too much inclination to drunkenneſſe, he anſwered, he ſhould ſee proofe of the contrary, and preſently ſending for Prexaſpes his ſonne, with an arrow ſhot him to the heart: the father not daring but to commend his ſteadie hand and Art in ſhooting. He dyed of his owne ſword, which falling out of his ſcabberd as hee mounted his horſe, killed him, not fearing in this Countrey of Syria any ſuch diſaduenture, becauſe the Oracle of Latona [b] in Egypt had told him he ſhould dye at Ecbatana; which he vnderſtood of Media, and was fulfilled at another Ecbatana (more obſcure) in Syria. Hee cauſed a Iudge, which had beene corrupted with money, to be flayed, and made of his skin a couering for the Tribunall. Polyænus tels, That againſt the Egyptians hee vſed this ſtratageme; to ſet the gods (dogs, cats, ſheepe, &c.) in the fore-front of his battell. He neither deſerued nor obtained that honourable funerall which Cyrus had, who was buryed at Paſargadæ, a Tower ſhadowed with trees, hauing in the vpper part a Chappell furniſhed with a bed of gold, a table, cups, and veſſells of the ſame metall, with ſtore of garments and furniture, ſet with iewells. Certain Magi were appointed to attend it, with daily allowance of a ſheepe,

§. III.

Of the ſucceeding Monarchs vntill ALEXANDERS Conqueſt.

NExt to [a] Cambyſes ſucceeded, for a ſmall time, one Smerdis, which was ſlaine as an Vſurper, by the ſeuen Princes; and [b] Darius, the ſonne of Hyſtaſpes, ſucceeded, deſigned to that greatneſſe by the firſt neighing of his horſe. For when no male iſſue Royall was left, theſe Princes agreed, That meeting in a place appointed, he whoſe horſe firſt neighed, ſhould be acknowledged Emperor. Darius his horſe-keeper, the night before, had ſuffered his horſe there to vſe his brutiſh luſt with a Mare; which the place preſently cauſing him to remember, he there (by his luſtfull neighing) aduanced his Maſter to the Scepter. Darius for his couetouſneſſe (firſt exacting tribute) was called a Merchant, Cambyſes a Lord, Cyrus a Father of his people. Babylon rebelled, and was [c] recouered by the coſtly ſtratagem of Zopyrus [d], who cut off his noſe and eares, and fleeing in that deformed plight to the Babylonians, accuſed Darius of that crueltie. (Cteſias telleth this of Megabyzus.) They beleeuing, entertained him, and knowing his Nobilitie and Proweſſe, committed their Citie to his fidelitie, which he vpon the next opportunitie betraied to his Maſter. Darius warred againſt the Scythians, but vnfortunately. His Army was of 700000. men. After Darius his death Xerxes [e] reigned (whom Scaliger proueth to bee Aſſuerus, the husband of Eſther. This Eſther is by ſome thought to be Ameſtris, whom the Ethnike writers blame for crueltie: moued haply thereto by the execution committed vpon Haman, and the Iewiſh enemies in the booke of Eſther related. They adde (perhaps in ſlander and hatred) that ſhee killed fourteene children in one bloudie vow, and other things which I will not rehearſe; but returne to Xerxes.

He made league with the Carthaginians, warred vpon the Grecians with an Armie (as Herodotus [f] numbreth) of 1700000. foot-men, 80000. horſe-men, 20000. Chariot-men: Others ſay, That there were 2317000. foot-men in land-forces, beſides 1208. ſhips. Cteſias hath only 800000. men, beſides Chariots, and 1000. ſayle of ſhips. Before the Army was drawne the ſacred Chariot of Iupiter, by eight white horſes; no mortall man might aſcend the Seat. Hee offered to Minerua at Troy 1000. oxen. He, taking view of his huge Army, wept, in thinking, that of all that number in a hundred yeeres none would be aliue. At the paſſing of the Helleſpontike ſtraits, he (beſides other deuotions performed) at the Sun-riſing took a golden Viall full of ſacred liquor, and caſt the ſame into the Sea, with a golden Bowle & a Perſian Sword; vncertaine whether in honour of the Sun, or in ſatisfaction to the angry Helleſpont, which a little before, in more then madde arrogance, he had cauſed to be whipped, and hurled fetters therein, with many menacing threats. Hee wrote letters with like threatnings to Mount Athos, and accordingly pierced his bowells, and made way by force thorow that high and huge Mountaine. This Expedition was in the yeere of the World 3470. Leonides, with his Spartans, enlarged his glory at the Thermopylæan ſtraits [g], or narrow paſſage, which a long time, with a handfull of men, hindred the Perſians from paſſing. Mardonius was ſlaine, and Xerxes fled out of Greece, after hee had taken Athens, and loſt great part of his Army, which in two yeeres ſpace receiued fiue ouerthrowes, at Thermopylæ, at Artemiſium, at Salamis, at Platææ, at Mycale. Xerxes being ſlaine of Artabanus his kinſman, A. M. 3485. Artaxerxes ſucceeded, in whoſe time Egypt rebelled, helped therein by Inarus and the Grecians.

g Xerxes ſent firſt 15000. after 20000. and laſtly 50000. choyce men againſt them, which all had the worſe: till a Traytor taught Xerxes another way where to paſſe and come vpon their backs: and then Leonides in the night entred the Perſian Campe, and ſlew 20000. with his 500. men, which were killed being wearie with killing.

Among other the mad parts of Xerxes, it is reported, That he fell in loue with a [h] Plane tree in Lydie, which hee adorned with chaines and coſtly furniture, and appointed a Guardian thereto. Artaxerxes writ to Hyſtanes, Gouernour of Helleſpontus, That hee ſhould giue Hippocrates Cous (who then liued, and whoſe writings ſtill remaine the Phyſicians Oracles) as much gold and other things as hee would, and ſend him vnto him. In his time the Egyptians rebelled, and created Inarus their King, to whom the Athenians ſent three hundred Gallies for defence; but by Artabazus and Megabyzus they were ſubdued. Artaxerxes dyed, An. M. 3525.

After this Artaxerxes, ſurnamed Long-hand, another Xerxes ſucceeded and reigned a ſmall time, as did alſo Sogdianus, or Ogdianus, or (ſo Cteſias calleth him) Secyndianus, whom Darius Nothus ſlew, and poſſeſſed the Throne. Cteſias nameth him Ochus, and ſaith that hee changed his name to Darius. In the time of this King was the Peloponnesian Warre, which Thucydides hath related. Artaxerxes Mnemon his sonne succeeded, An. M. 3545. He slew his brother Cyrus; Ctesias was there present with Artaxerxes, whom hee cured of a wound giuen him on the breft by Cyrus, with whom was then present and partaker, that great Philosopher, Captaine, and Historian hereof Xenophon. Artaxerxes was a name giuen (as some write) to all the Persian Kings: it signifieth a great Warrior, as Brisson and Drusius obserue. This Mnemon reigned fortie yeeres. After his death succeeded Ochus, and reigned three and twentie yeeres. Next to him was Arses, or Arsames; and last of all Darius, whom Alexander ouerthrew the second time at Arbela, An. M. 3619. & conquered that Persian Monarchy to the Macedonians. Of the Macedonian successors of Alexander (so much as concerneth this place) is before handled in our Syrian relation. They were depriued of these parts by Arsaces, of whom & all his Parthian followers, euen now ye haue read in the Chapters of Parthia.

§. IIII.

Of the Persian Chronologie.

CONcerning these Persian Kings, Chronologers (after their wont) differ not a little. Master [a] Liuely hath taken great paines in this Argument; besides the painefull labours of Scaliger, Iunius, and many others, both Rabbins, and Greekes, and Latines, in whose streames Elephants may swim, and the greatest Students may finde enough to busie their studious braines: for mee, it is sufficient to taste, or at least to enter so farre as a Lambe may safely wade, without perill of drowning. The Hebrewes, through ignorance of the Olympiades, and humane Authors (where they are destitute of their owne) are most absurd, some [b] reckoning but foure Persian Kings in all, till Alexanders time: some account [c] fiue: and some [d] three. Against these, Pererius and Temporarius [e] most sharpely (and not vnworthily) enueigh, as also against their [f] Chronicles, which ascribe to the Persians, from the first yeere of Darius the Mede, but two and fiftie yeeres. Iosephus better seene in Ethnike Authors disseenteth from them. As for Metasthenes of Annius, wee haue before shewed him to be counterfeit, and the rest of his brethren, to bee either the bastards of Annius, or Changelings, which hee hath nursed, and would father vpon those Authors, whose names they beare. Viues [g] calls them Portentosa, & vel solo auditu horrenda; monstrous reports, dregs, friuolous pamphlets of vncertaine Authors; which, if any bee in loue with, hee may enioy without him his corriuall. [h] Goropius bestowes much paines in the vncasing of them; and learned men [i] doe now generall distaste them. Iosephus [k] cites Megasthenes in quarto Indicorum, the fourth Booke of his Indian Historie; from whence Petrus Comestor alledgeth the same testimonie, with depraying the word Indicorum, and making it Iudiciorum. Annius addes, not onely the corrupting of the name Metasthenes for Megasthenes, but a Historie vnder his [l] name, de Iudicio Temporum & Annalium Persicorum, wherein no marueil if hee proceed in the Storie, as he began in the Title. Beroaldus [m] in the Persian Chronologie faineth diuers names to the Persian Kings; as Assuerus, Artaxerxes, Darius Assyrius, Artaxerxes Pius. Liuely, and other moderne Writers out of the Greeke Olympiads and Histories, haue giuen truer account of the Persian Times and Gouernment, beginning with the fiue and fiftieth Olympiad, and continuing the same to the third yeere of the hundred and twelfth.

Scaliger and Caluisius (as you haue seene before) doe a little differ from this account of Master Liuely, which he liuely proueth by conference of other Histories, both Humane and Ecclesiasticall, Clemens, Eusebius, Herodotus, Diodorus, Polybius, Xenophon, Thucydides, Dionysius, Halicarnassæus, Liuie, and others. As much adoe is made about the beginning and ending of Daniels weekes, and the time of the building and finishing the second Temple, both which are much illustrated by the right knowledge of the Persian Chronologie. [n] Iunius, Liuely [o], and some others begin the account of the threescore and ten weekes, and reckon the building of the second Temple, in the second yeere of Darius Nothus [p], to whose reasons I referre the Reader, and returne to our Persian affaires. How this Persian Empire agreed to the dreame of Nabuchodonosor, and the visions of Daniel; Broughton [q], Reusnerus, and others haue written; it were too tedious here to relate. Artaxerxes (others call him, perhaps more truely, Artaxares) recouered the Persian Name and Empire fiue hundred thirtie eight yeeres, as Bizarus, Lib. 4. reckoneth, after Alexander the Great had extinguished them, and in the yeere of our Lord 230. Others say it was in the yeere of Christ 233. and in the yeere of the World 4182. and 563. after Alexanders Conquest: others otherwise. The Catalogue of [r] the Persian Kings in that their second Dynastie, you may reade before, Lib. 1. c. 13. §. V.

Of the second Persian Dynastie.

ARTAXARES being a man of hautie spirit, fought three battells with Artabanus the Parthian, and at the third time depriued him of life and Scepter together. Hee proceeded to subdue the neighbouring Barbarians; and passing ouer Tygris, disturbed the Romane Prouince of Mesopotamia, deuouring in hope, and threatning in termes, all those Asian Prouinces, sometimes subiect to the Persians, before the Macedonian deluge. Alexander Seuerus (sonne of Mammea) the Emperour writ to him, to stay his course: But Pikes, not Pens, were like to preuaile with Artaxares, who brought into the field seuen hundred Elephants, and eighteene hundred Chariots, and many thousands of Horse-men, but with much bloud-shed was forced to leaue the honor of the day to the Romanes. Herodianus seemeth to write harder fortunes of the Romans in this warre. But Lampridius, Eutropius, Orosius, and Zosimus write, That Seuerus obtained the victory, and tooke Ctesiphon and Babylon, and subdued also Arabia. Agathias [a] affirmeth, That Artaxares was called Magus. Artaxares. [a] Agathias. l.2.

Valerianus was ouer-throwne by Sapores, the successor of Artaxares, in Mesopotamia, and there taken, & was made a foot-stoole for Sapores, on whose necke he vsed to tread, when he tooke horse; and at last was flayed aliue, and sprinkled with salt. Zosimus saith, That he was treacherously taken at a meeting for conference: and Trebellius Pollio ascribeth it to the treason of his guide. This cruell Tyrant afflicted the Roman Prouinces, to Cilicia and Cappadocia, filling with dead bodies the broken spaces betweene the Hils, feeding (as it were) those deformed gaping iawes with cruell banquets of mans flesh. Odenatus Palmirinus brought some light to the Romans in this darkened and dreadfull Eclipse of their Sun, and recouered the Roman Territories. His wife Zenobia after his death, like another Semiramis, proued a fortunate Generall & Warrior against the Persians, and also against the Romans, from whom she withheld Syria, til Valerius Aurelianus carried her to Rome, being by vnexpected accident surprised. As for Valerianus, it was the iust iudgement of God for his cruell persecution of the Christians, whom he had at first fauoured, till one of the Egyptian Priests had perswaded him to this, and other wickednesse, as humane sacrifices, and such like. Euseb. l. 7. c. 9. He was taken of Sapores, An. Dom. 260. after Caluisius computation. Buntingus hath two yeeres lesse. Sapores.

In the time of Probus the Persians sued for peace, and obtained it; he procuring such peace in the East (saith Vopiscus) that a rebellious Mouse was not heard to peepe. Carus his successor warred against the Persians, and hauing entred their Country as farre as Ctesiphon, was slain with a Thunder-bolt (no Roman Emperour, by, I know not what secret destinie, from the time of Crassus, passing those parts, without vnfortunate successe.) This was An. Dom. 283.

Diocletian sent Galerius against Narses the Persian, sonne to Varranes, or Varaaranes, the second: (for after Sapores, Hormisda his sonne had reigned a yeere; Varranes the first, three yeeres; Varranes the second, sixteene; and a third of that name onely foure moneths, as Agathias reckoneth.) But not farre from Carrhæ (fatall to the Romans) Galerius Cæsar lost [b] almost all his Armie, and therefore found homely welcome at his returne, Diocletian suffering him to lacquey (in his purple Robes) some miles after his Chariot. Indignation supplying his former defects, he recouered his credit with the ouer-throw of the Persians; Narses fled, leauing his wiues, sisters, and children to the Conqueror. A league was made, with returne of Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Assyria to the Romans. [b] Oros. & Pom. Latus, A.D. 296

Misdates the Persian, began his reigne An. Dom. 301. To him An. 309. succeeded his sonne Sapores, and reigned (which I think was neuer read of any) longer then he liued in view of the World, beginning his reigne before his birth, which he continued threescore and ten yeeres. For Misdates [c] dying without issue male, and leauing his wife great with child, the Princes consulted with the Magi, whether this future birth would bee male; which they affirmed, obseruing their predictions by a Mare, then ready to foale; and the Princes set on the Crowne, or Royall Ensigne, on the mothers belly, acknowledging him for their King. This Sapores, in a letter to Constantius the Emperour, intituled himselfe King of Kings, partaker of the Starres, brother of the Sunne and Moone: he demanded all that had before belonged to the Persians, to bee restored. Betwixt them grew a bloudie warre, as Ammianus relateth. Sapores tooke Singara and Bezabde, An. Dom. 359. but was repelled into Persia by Constantius. Iulian his successor seeking to subdue the Persian, lost himselfe. The best part of himselfe he had lost before in Apostasie, which plucked this destruction vpon him, An. 362. It is vncertain whether diuine or humane hand executed this iustice on him. Iouinian was presently saluted Emperor, but forced to agree on dishonourable conditions with the Persians, leauing the Rabdicens, Carduens, Rhesens, Zalens, and Nisibis to the Persian Dominion. And a Sapores 2. [c] Agathias. l.4.

little after, in the reigne of Valens, the league was broken by Sapores, who wonne Cteſiphon: Valens intending this war, was by the Gothes ouerthrowne, and burnt aliue, before he could effect any thing, An. 377. When Theodoſius reigned, the peace was renewed.

After Sapores ſucceeded Artaxerxes; and after him Sapores his ſonne, both which reigned nine yeeres. Then followed Varanes Cermaſat eleuen yeeres, to whom ſucceeded [d] Iſdigertes, who held peace with the Romans. Procopius writes, That Arcadius the Emperour on his death-bed, Ann. 407. ordained in his laſt Will, this Iſdigertes the Tutor and Protector to his ſonne and heire Theodoſius, which he faithfully performed. Agathias alſo acknowledgeth it a currant report. [e] Maruthas was in credit with this King. Hee was a Chriſtian Biſhop, and by his prayers had cured him of a grieuous ſickneſſe, which the Magi with their Fierie ſuperſtition, and all their labour, could not effect. The Magi conſpiring againſt Maruthas, watched opportunitie, that when the King ſhould come (after the Perſian wont) to worſhip the Fire, a man (whom they had hidden before within the earth for that purpoſe) cried aloud, That the King ſhould goe forth, as being accounted of their god impious, who ſo loued a Chriſtian Biſhop. Hereupon the King bethought him of ſending him away. But Maruthas ſuſpecting the knauerie, counſelled the King to cauſe the earth to be didded vp; for the Fire, ſaith hee, cannot ſpeake. The King going into the Chappell or Sanctuarie, and hearing this voyce againe, followed Maruthas his counſell, and found out their packing, and puniſhed the authors, allowing Maruthas to build a Church, whereſoeuer hee pleaſed in Perſia. And whiles the Magi yet added to their treacheries, he not onely puniſhed their perſons, but diſtaſted their Religion, and purpoſed to become a Chriſtian, but by death was preuented; which happened An. 421. Varanes or Vararanes his ſonne, followed not his ſteps, but both brake league with the Romans, and perſecuted the Chriſtians. Narſes his Generall, with his forces, were defeated, Azamæa waſted, Niſibis beſieged by the Imperialls: The Saracens, which ayded the Perſian, ſtricken with a ſtrange furie and amazement, drowned themſelues in Euphrates. It is ſaid, a hundred thouſand men periſhed. Theodoſius then Emperour, knew theſe things by Palladius [f], who in three dayes did ride from Conſtantinople hither, and backe againe in as many, vſing to flie in this manner to any the remoteſt parts of the Empire, with ſuch admirable, and almoſt miraculous expedition; with his celeritie making that ſpacious Empire ſeeme but narrow and ſtrait. Vararanes ſent an Armie of thoſe expert Souldiers which were among them, for their excellencie, called Immortall, but the Romans ſwords ſoone proued them mortall. Thus ſucceeded that Warre which he had begun, for deſpight to the Chriſtian Religion and profeſſion. He was forced to ſeeke peace, and ended or mitigated his perſecution. To him ſucceeded, Ann. 441. another Izdigerdes, who reigned ſeuenteene yeeres; and after him Perozes, who reigned foure and twentie yeeres: after him, his brother Obalas (Bizarus calls him Bleſes) ruled foure yeeres. Cabades his ſucceſſour renewed the Warres with the Romans: and no maruell, for hee was cruell to his owne people, and warred euen againſt Nature: for hee ordained (as ſome report) That women ſhould be common, any wedlock-bands notwithſtanding. Whereupon his Nobles conſpired againſt him, depriued and impriſoned him. Bleſes was enthronized (Scaliger hath Zamaſpes) who foure yeeres after reſigned the State vnto Cabades againe, who hauing before reigned eleuen yeeres, added thereto thirtie more. Necephorus [g] tells, That hee became friend to the Chriſtians, and permitted free libertie of that Religion vpon this occaſion. Betweene Perſia and India was a Caſtle, called Tzundadaer, wherein Cabades had heard, that much money and iewells were kept. Cabades vſed all meanes to obtaine it, but in vaine; ſo ſtrongly was it (as the Storie ſaith) garded with Deuills. Hee therefore vſed all the Perſian Exorciſmes to diſpoſſeſſe them; and when they preuailed not, he ſought to effect it by the Iewes, but with the former ſucceſſe. At laſt hee made vſe of the Chriſtians, who expelled the ſpirits, and deliuered the Caſtle vnto him.

It is reported, that he ſlew Zeliobes, King of the Hunnes, for playing on both hands, and comming to helpe him in his Warres againſt the Romans, hauing before ſworne to aſſiſt the Emperour. About theſe times were the Manichees [h] deſtroyed in Perſia, for corrupting his ſonne Phatuarſa with their infectious leauen. He therefore ſlew their chiefe Prelate Indagarus, and many thouſand Manichees, all in one day, hauing aſſembled them with a wile, profeſſing, that he would make that his ſonne King. He aſſembled alſo the chiefe of the Magi, Glonazēs; and Boazanes a Chriſtian Biſhop, for the greater ſolemnitie, with like deuotion as Iehu ſacrificed to Baal, with the preſence and aſſiſtance of Iehonadab, 2. Kings 10. Caluiſius ſaith this was done An. 523. Cabades dyed, An. 531.

His ſonne Coſroes the Great ſucceeded, and reigned eight and fortie yeeres. Hee about the thirteenth yeere of Iuſtinians Empire, An. 539. inuaded the Roman Dominions, tooke Surus, burnt Berræa, deſtroyed Antiochia, and with leſſe ſucceſſe beſieged Edeſſa. Agathias preferreth this Coſroes for his great exploits before Cyrus and Xerxes. Yet was his end ignoble, ignoble, and vnworthy his high ſpirit. For Mauritius in the time of Tiberius, entred into the Perſian Dominions, and burnt ſome Villages neere to the place where Coſroes then was for his recreation, and ſaw this burning ſpectacle: wherewith Indignation and Griefe muſtering greater multitudes of fearefull, vnquiet, enraged thoughts in his heart, then Mauritius had Souldiers in his Armie, vnable to beare ſuch vnwonted ſights of hoſtile flames in his Countries, and ſuch vnwonted fights of inward perturbations, euen greatneſſe of ſpirit made way to Puſillanimitie, and being weakned with colluctation of contrary paſſions, a feauer, taking that occaſion and aduantage, apprehends him, and ſoone after kills him.

Some ſay, his ſonne Ormiſda reigned ſeuen yeeres with his father. Hee ſucceeded and reigned eight yeeres. Hee was exceeding cruell, by reaſon of a prophecie that his ſubiects ſhould diſpoſſeſſe him, which cauſed him to diſpoſſeſſe thouſands of them of their liues: and made him ſo odious, that they eaſily after apprehended the occaſion to fulfill that ſubtill deuilliſh Oracle. Againſt him Mauritius performed worthy attempts, which made way vnto him for the Romane Empire. And then alſo hee had good ſucceſſe againſt the Perſians, by the valour of Philippicus his Generall: inſomuch, that the Perſians moued with theſe and other diſcontents, by incitement of Varamus, depoſed Ormiſda, killed his wife and ſonne before his eyes; which hauing remained to performe vnto him that their laſt, vncouth, vnnaturall ſeruice, were preſently after put out, with burning needles thruſt into them; himſelfe firſt impriſoned, and after beaten to death with clubs, by Coſroes his ſonne. That Varamus had, a little before, beene ſent as Generall againſt the Roman Armie: which his ſeruice being found vnſeruiceable, and the Romans preuayling, he was not onely depriued of his place; but, to his further diſgrace, was, by the Kings commandement, [f] clothed in womans attyre: which indignities he repayed, not in words alone (in his letters ſtiling Ormiſda, The Daughter of Coſroes) but with thoſe vnnaturall and diſloyall practiſes: which hee continued alſo againſt Coſroes, ſonne and heire of Ormiſda, forcing him to flee to Mauritius the Emperour for ſuccour. For Varamus did not approue his ſucceſſion, but writ vnto him to relinquiſh his royaltie, for feare of ſucceeding in his fathers fortunes. In that letter he ſtileth himſelfe, Friend of the Gods, Enemy of Tyrants, Wiſe, Religious, Vnblameable, Happy, Prouident, &c. CHOSROES giueth him an anſwere, wherein he thus writeth, CHOSROES King of Kings, Lord of Lords, Ruler of Nations, Prince of Peace, Saluation of men, amongſt the gods a man good and eternall, amongſt men a god moſt Illuſtrious, moſt glorious Conquerour, riſing with the Sunne, giuing eyes (Starres) to the night, Noble from his anceſtrie, &c. But for all theſe great Titles, he was compelled to flee, as is ſaid, and write in a lower ſtile to Mauritius.

Theophilactus Simocatta, ſpeaking of the Abares, a Scythian Nation dwelling neere Iſter, ſaith, that they were deſcended of the Hunnes, and that Bocolabras (which word ſignifieth one that is a Prieſt and Magus, for their Prieſts were their Diuiners) hauing offended Chagan, the Prince of theſe Abares, fled vnto their originall Nation, dwelling in the Eaſt, neere to the Perſians, commonly called Turkes. This I mention to ſhew the Turkiſh originall, and their common deſcent with the Hunnes (with whoſe poſteritie in Hungarie they now hold ſuch continuall diſſentions) by the teſtimonie of an Author, which writ his Hiſtorie a thouſand yeeres ſince. In his third Booke and ſixth Chapter, hee ſaith, the Hunnes which dwell in the North-Eaſt, whom the Perſians called Turkes, were ſubdued by King Hormiſdas; and whereas before the Perſians had vſed to pay them fortie thouſand pieces of gold to buy their peace, they now forced theſe Hunnes to pay ſo much for tribute to the Perſians. The Perſian Gold bred ſuch ſurquedrie and exceſſe amongſt the Turkes, that they had their Beds, Tables, Horſe-furniture and Armours of ſolide Gold: which prodigalitie made them couetous, and to demand larger contribution from the Perſians; hence aroſe thoſe warres and that thraldome of the Turkiſh Nation. This Author, firſt of all other to my knowledge, mentioneth the Turkiſh warres, which ſince haue yeelded matter for Authors more then enough.

Theſe Turkes are [g] ſaid to helpe Varamus in his rebellion; but both hee and they receiued diſcomfiture by Narſes the Roman Generall, and ſixe thouſand were taken and ſlaine. The Turkes being asked why they helped Varamus, anſwered, That they were forced thereto by famine: they were alſo marked with a Black Croſſe, which (they ſaid) they learned of the Chriſtians, thereby to expell hunger. Coſroes thus recouered the Kingdome by aide of the Empire, which Varamus had vſurped to himſelfe.

Hee [h] was deepely ſeene in the Chaldæan myſteries, and being by a Roman Gouernour reproued for ſome exceſſe, in thoſe times when he ſo much needed their helpe: he anſwered, That the times did aduantage him to thoſe reproofes: but know (ſaith hee) that calamities ſhall alſo befall the Romans, and the Babylonian Nation ſhall rule them three weekes of yeeres. After that, in the fifth weeke, the Romans ſhall ſubdue the Perſians: which being come to paſſe, a day ſhall come that ſhall haue no night, and the expected end of the Empire ſhall be at hand; in which time corruption ſhall be aboliſhed, and men ſhall liue according to Diuine Ordinance. This, either falſe or vncertaine prophecie (according to that Deepeneſſe of Satan) he vttered, but what effect anſwerable hath followed, I know not. [i] In his time the Saracens, confederate with the Romans, ſpoyled the Countries of Babylonia.

This Coſroes reigned nine and thirtie yeeres. He held peace with the Romans whiles Mauritius liued; but when Phocas cruelly and trecherouſly had ſlaine him, a world of euills at once aſſaulted the Empire. The Germans, Gaules, Italians, Hunnes, and Perſians, by their Armies afflicted the publike State; and the Roman Biſhop then began to aſpire to an vniuerſall Soueraigntie, which that Murtherer firſt entituled him vnto. That Armie which was yet red with the bloud of Mauritius, by the Perſians ſword was puniſhed, and died in their owne bloud: who hauing ouerthrowne the Romans in two battailes, made way for further conqueſts. Thus did God puniſh that Murtherer, and beſides (to pay him in his owne coyne) Priſcus, Heraclon, and Heraclius conſpired againſt this Conſpirer, and murthered the Murtherer, and hauing cut off his Priuities, and his Head, hurled him into the Sea, and deſtroied his Iſſue.

Heraclius ſucceeded in this troubled ſtate of the Empire: Choſroes preuailing by his victorious Armies entred Apamea, Edeſſa, Cæſarea, Cappadocie, and ſubdued Aſia, whiles the Auares, or Abares waſted and ſpoiled Europe: the Saracens alſo (as in preludes of their future fortunes) committed great ſpoyle in Syria. This in the third yeere of Heraclius: in the fourth, the Perſians tooke Damaſcus; in the fifth, Ieruſalem (carrying away [k] the Croſſe) and ſlew therein by inſtigation of the Iewes 90000. and ſubdued Palæſtina. In the ſeuenth, he inuaded Egypt and Africa, and conquered all, euen to Ethiopia. In the ninth, the Auares entred Thrace with an Armie, and Chagan chaſed Heraclius into the Citie, ſpoiling many Townes: but the next yeere compounded on peaceable conditions; the Perſians at the ſame time tooke Ancyra a Citie of Galatia. In the twelfth yeere of Heraclius, a certaine Aſtrologer, Stephanus Alexandrinus, prophecied, that the Saracens ſhould rule in power and dominion three hundred and nine yeeres, and then ſhould endure much diſquiet and trouble fiftie ſixe yeeres. What he ſaw in the Starres we know not: but their Fates were longer-liued. Saes at this time ſent with an Armie from Choſroes waſted all the Eaſt, and held fraudulent conference with Heraclius, who ſent with him ſeuentie chiefe men Embaſſadours to Choſroes. All theſe Saes treacherouſly lead captiues and bound into Perſia, which yet could not ſatisfie his tyrannicall Maſter, who (becauſe hee had ſeene Heraclius, and had not brought him aliue) cauſed him to bee flaied quicke: and ſent Sarbarus againſt the Romans. Heraclius beganne his expedition with penitent, and lowly ſeeking peace with GOD, who made his warres proſper againſt the Perſians. Some ſay he ſent Embaſſadours to Choſroes, who refuſed all conditions, except they would renounce their crucified GOD. This GOD preuailed againſt that preſumption, and deliuered Gazacum into the hands of Heraclius, in which Citie was the Temple of the Sunne, the treaſure of Cræſus, and impoſture of Coles. There he found the abominable image of Choſroes, in the Globe-faſhioned [l] roofe of the Palace, as it were ſitting in heauen. About this were the Sunne, Moone, and Starres, which hee worſhipped ſuperſtitiouſly, and certaine ſcepter-bearing Angels ſtanding about the ſame. There were certaine deuices to imitate ſhowers of raine, and the noiſe of thunder. Theſe all, together with the Temple of the Fire, and the Citie, Heraclius committed to the deuouring, not the deuotion of the fire. Hee after ouerthrew Sarbarazas, and Sarbarancas, and Sais, Perſian Generalls, with all their forces; and ſo preuailed, that Choſroes in impious reuenge, robbed all the Chriſtian Churches in his dominion of their gifts and treaſures, compelling all the Chriſtians (a worſe ſacriledge) to the Neſtorian hereſie. He alſo ſent Sais with a great Army againſt Heraclius, and Sarbarus with another againſt Conſtantinople, ſtirring vp the Slauins and Gepeds to helpe him, with the Weſterne Hunnes or Auares. Heraclius ſend one Army to the ſafeguard of the Citie, another againſt Sais, and with the third hee went to the Lazikes, ſeeking to winne the Eaſterne Turkes, called Chazari, to his partie. Theſe breaking through the Caſpian Straits vnder Zebeelus next in dignitie to Chagan, committed exceeding ſpoyles. Heraclius meane while ouerthrowing Sais, who dying with indignation of this loſſe and griefe for his Maſters diſpleaſure, could not thus appeaſe his fury, but his carkaſſe was deſpightfully intreated; although the Heauens fought for Heraclius, and with a ſudden ſhower of Haile cauſed that Perſian ouerthrow. Tenne dayes was Conſtantinople beſieged, but by diuine power preſerued, as Cedrenus and others write, by a miraculous Viſion. Choſroes makes Razaſtes his Generall, who encounters with Heraclius, not farre from Niniue, and loſt his life and the field. This victoriouſly he proceeded, chaſing Choſroes before him fiue and twentie miles in a day, which could not before go fiue. And when ſome had accuſed Sarbarus, as inclining to the Romans, he ſent to Cardarichas his Colleague to kill him; which letter being intercepted, cauſed Sarbarus to become ſuch indeed; who adulterating his Maſters

Masters letters, and putting in other foure hundred chiefe men, called an assembly, and publikely reading the letters, caused a rebellion. And in the yeere 626. Cosroes now at his wits end, or rather quite beyond them, appointed Medarses his sonne to bee his successour and heire apparent: wherewith Siroes, his elder sonne, being discontented, conspired to betray his father and brother to Heraclius: and soone after caused them both to bee slaine at Ctesiphon. Peace [m] was concluded with the Romans, and their Prouinces restored. Onely Arabia was by Mahumet holden, as a Seminary of a greater mischiefe, vnder which the world with griefe and amazement still groneth. Lope Obregon in a large Spanish booke, of the confutation of the Alcoran, which, hee saith, hee gathered out of the Moores writings, tells that Mahomet serued Heraclius in his warres against Cosroes, with more then ten thousand horse-men; Vbequar, Homar, Hozmen, and Hali, being chiefe Commanders vnder him, and being after the victorie denied pay, conquered a great part of Persia to himselfe. And when Siroes successour to Cosroes, withstood him; he gaue him the ouerthrow, and therefore the Persians chose a new King to represse these Arabians: and that after this, Heraclius sending for the Crosse which hee had recouered from the Persians, from Ierusalem to Constantinople, (this Palladium being gone) hee wanne Ierusalem, and the Countries about. Other prodigious miracles hee farseth into his storie, and describes a Throne which Cosroes had made a Tower of siluer garnished with precious stones, vnder the same on one side the Sunne, on the other the Moone, and iust with it the Crosse, which he had taken from Ierusalem, and that hee would be adored for King and Lord of the World. But I will not ingage my selfe farre for this Historian.

m In Chrō. Alex. you may reade the letter of Siroes to Heraclius.

Siroes, Adeser, Barazas, and Baram the daughter of Cosroes, in their order of succession in that disordered and turbulent estate, had scarse two yeeres allowed to them all: to whom succeeded Ormizda Iezdegird, who about the yeere 632. was ouerthrowne and slaine by the Saracens: and that Persian Kingdome (then weakened by ciuill dissentions) was subdued to Saracenicall seruitude; and that second Persian Dynastie (continued as Scaliger [n] reckoneth in eight and twentie successions, the space of foure hundred and two yeeres) had an end. From thence vnto this time their Religion is Saracenicall: their State gouerned by the Califas, [o] and such Commanders or Sultans as they had placed ouer them, till their Sultans warring with the Calif for Souereigntie, procured aide from the Turkes: who dispossessed them of their Kingdome presently, after they had disburthened them of their enemies: The Turkes were displaced and chased away by the Tartars. Of these both Saracens and Turks, you haue the historie in the former booke, and therefore needlesse here to be related: Of the Tartars shall follow in their order. Now let vs a little looke backe to the Greatnesse, and other things most remarkable in the Persian Kings.

CHAP. V.

Of the Persian Magnificence, and other their Antiquities.

THe time of the first Dynastie, howsoeuer Dionisius Halicarnass. contracteth it to two hundred yeeres, and Cedrenus to two hundred and fourteene: yet Q. Curtius (who writ the ouerthrow of the same by Alexander, in the time of Claudius, vnder whom, if Brissonius [a] hath gathered truly, he was Proconsull of Africa) and Herom. and Clemens Alexand. and others little disagree from that our former account reckoning two hundred thirtie one. In which space the greatnesse of their Kings appropriated the Title of the Great King vnto themselues, as Drusius in his Obseruations, and Brissonius out of Dio. Chrysostomus, Aristides, Isocrates, and others haue obserued: so Artaxerxes, Ezra. 7. 12. calleth himselfe King of Kings, which the Parthian after annexed to his Stile. The Kingdome was Hereditarie both in Persia and Parthia, the eldest Sonne begotten in Wedlocke, succeeding. In long Expeditions the Heire apparant was nominated. They vsed to be inaugurated or crowned (after our Phrase) at Pasargadæ, [b] by their Priests, which Plutarch thus describeth. The designed King goeth into a Chappell of the Goddesse of Warre (it may be thought Minerua) and there putting off his former Habit, puts on that which Cyrus ware before he was King: then doth he eate a lumpe of Figges, and Turpentine, and drinkes a cup of sowre Milke: their other Ceremonies are not knowne. On his head was set a Cidaris or Tiara; this was a kind of Cap or Turbant, not like a Felt of wooll, but of diuers pieces of cloth sewed together, Tritis pilea suta de lacernis; the Kings differing from the common sort, because his ascended streit with a sharp top not bowed any way; to the other Persians it was deadly to weare a Tiara, except the top bowed (in token of subiection) to their forehead. Only the posteritie of those, which with with Darius Histaspis slew the vsurping Magus, might weare them bending to the middle of their head, and not hanging downe to their browes, as the other. The Kings Tiara was properly called Cidaris, and was set on by the Surena, which was an hereditarie dignitie next to the King. About this Cidaris hee wore a Diadem, which some Authors [c] confound, and make to be the same; others otherwise: it was a purple band, or of blew colour, distinguished with white, which was wreathed about the Tiara. The right or strait Tiara, with that purple and white band, was the note of royaltie, as the Crowne in these parts. The Diadem in [d] other Countries, was a white band wreathed about the forehead. The new King was placed also in a golden Throne, and (if hee pleased) changed his former name, as Codomannus to Darius.

His subiects adored him as a god (so did the Greekes [e] interprete it, and Mordecai which refused this ceremonie to Haman) prostrating themselues on the ground with a kinde of veneration; turning their hands behind their backe, if they had any sute to the King. Sperchies and Bulis Lacedemonians, and Conon [f] the Athenian refused this Rite: Ismenias [g] the Theban dissembled it with taking vp his ring, which for that purpose hee let slip from his finger, when hee came before the King. Timagoras [h] was put to death by the Athenians for doing it. In the time of Apollonius [i], none might come to the presence of the King, which had not before done the like adoration to his Image. They also when they came into the presence of the King, held their hands within their sleeues; for default herein, Cyrus Iunior slew Antosaces and Mitræus, as Xenophon writeth. Likewise, for the greater Maiestie they seldome were seene of the people, and then neuer on foot: neither might any enter the Palace without licence of the King, signifying his attendance first by a messenger: this honour was reserued to the Princes which slew Smerdis, which might enter at all times, but when the King was in bed with his wife; which Intaphernes (one of the seuen) transgressing, therefore lost his head. Yea, the Scripture [k] noteth the danger hereof in Haman, the Kings greatest fauourite, and Ester the Queene, neither of which had libertie of entrance, without the Kings call or admission. It was a capitall offence to sit on the Kings Throne, to weare the Kings garment, or in hunting to strike any beast before the King had stricken. The King (as before is noted, of Cambyses) was not subiect to any law: the people were held in much slauery, if that may be so called which is voluntarie. In this affection, they which were [l] scourged at the Kings command, were thankefull to him, for that they were had in remembrance with him. Their obedience appeared, when Xerxes [m] being in a ship in danger, many at his word leaped into the Sea to lighten the ship. Yea, they would be their owne executioners when they had offended the [n] King. None might salute him without a present. His birth-day was obserued a sacred and solemne festiuall. His death was bewailed with a silence of lawes and sutes fiue daies, and with extinguishing [o] that Fire, which euery one obserued in his house, as his household deitie.

The Kings abode was according to the season: seuen moneths saith Zonaras [p] in Babylon, three in Susa, and two in Ecbatana. Ælian therefore compares them to Cranes, and Aristides to the Scythian Nomades: alway by this shifting, enioying a temperate season. Susa or Shushan, was so called of the abundance of Lillies, which in that language are so named, saith Stephanus: a Region so defended by high mountaines from the Northerne blasts, that in the Summer the vehement heat parched their [q] Barly (it is Straboes report, and therefore they couered the roofes of their houses with earth two cubits deepe) and it killed the snakes as they crossed the wayes. It was situate on Choaspes, and entertained the Kings Court in Winter, as Ecbatana in Summer the chiefe Citie of the Medes. Sometimes it also remoued to Pasargadæ; and sometimes to Persepolis, the richest Citie, if Diodorus [r] bee beleeued, vnder the Sunne, wherein was a Tower enuironed with a three-fold wall, the first of which was sixteene cubits high, and made with battlements, the second twice as much, the third square, and sixtie cubits in height of hard stone with brazen gates: on the East thereof was a Hill of foure acres, wherein were the Sepulchres of the Kings. Alexander in reuenge of the burning of Athens, and by instigation of wine, and Thais his Concubine (Mars, Bacchus, Venus, three heauy, vnruly, tyrannicall enemies, conspiring) burned this sometime Treasure-house of Persia.

The Persian Court or Palace had many Gates, and Guards which took turnes by lot: (you reade the words of Aristotle in his booke de Mundo, hereby manifested to bee his, or at least as ancient, in that he writeth of the Persian State flourishing before Alexander in his time had subuerted it) some, hee saith, were called the Kings eares, others his eyes, and others had other offices, by which the King learned whatsoeuer was any where done, and therefore holden as a God: And besides his Posts which brought newes, by Fires or Beacons, he might in one day learne the State of that huge Empire, extended from the Hellespont to India. The Palace-roofe admirably shined with the brightnesse of Iuorie, Siluer, Amber, and Gold. His Throne Throne was of Gold, borne vp with foure Pillars, beſet with gemmes. His bed was alſo of Gold, (which was propounded the reward to Zorobabel and his companions, Ezra 3.3.) yea, Herodotus tells of a Tabernacle of Gold, of a Plane tree, and a Vine of Gold giuen to Darius by Pithius the Bythinian. This Vine Athenæus [f] reporteth, was adorned with iewels, and hung ouer the Kings bed, the Grape-cluſters being all precious ſtones: in a Parlour at his beds feet were three thouſand Talents of Gold, in another at the head, called the Kings bolſter, were fiue thouſand Talents. Gardens were [t] adioyning, which they called Paradiſes: ſome very large, wherein were kept wild beaſts, as Lions, Beares, Bores, for the Kings game, with ſpacious Woods and Plaines, incloſed in wall. Tully out of Xenophon relateth the induſtrie of Cyrus, which with his owne hand had meaſured, planted, ordered, and husbanded, one of thoſe pleaſant Paradiſes. Alexander enriched them with Trees and Plants out of Greece. The Perſian Kings dranke the water of Choaſpes onely, which to that purpoſe was boyled, and carried with them in Siluer veſſells whereſoeuer they went. The Parthian Kings dranke of this [u] and of the Riuer Eulæus (a Riuer riſing in Media, which after it hath buried it ſelfe, againe recouering the light, compaſſeth the Tower of Suſa, and the religious Temple of Diana. Daniel calls it Vlay; it ſeemeth to be, or to become the ſame with Choaſpes; and ſo doth Ptolomey confound them) they dranke alſo onely Chalybonian wine, made at Damaſcus in Syria, and their bread was made of the wheat of Aſſos in Phrygia. Their ſumptuous feaſting [x] appeareth in the Scripture, beyond what is read in any ſtorie of any King: in which was ſomewhat of euery [y] Nation ſubiect to him, ſet before him: his Salt was brought out of Egypt. Amongſt the baggage and ſtuffe of Darius, which Parmenio tooke at Damaſcus, were found two hundred ſeuentie ſeuen Cookes, nine and twentie Scullians, thirteene which had charge of white-meates, ſeuenteene which were to miniſter water, ſeuentie which belonged to the wine-celler, fortie which looked to the oyntments, and ſixtie ſixe which made Crownes. How many may we thinke, were there in his ſetled Court? His dining-roome was full of muſicall women, whereof one began the ſong, the reſt followed: three hundred of theſe creatures ſinging, playing, dancing, ſpent the night in his bed-chamber. Hee [z] which could deuiſe any new pleaſure, was highly rewarded: for which purpoſe Xerxes promiſed largely to ſuch Epicurean-Maſters by an open Proclamation. The King vſually ſate alone, ſometimes his mother and wife were admitted: other gueſts ſate where hee might ſee, but not be ſeene of them: yea, they had ſlauiſh ſauce to their ſweet meates, being narrowly watched by the Eunuches, whether they caſt any liberall lookes towards any of the Kings women. Yet, the Parthian gueſts had more ſeruile entertainment, as euen now wee ſhewed. Concerning the multitudes of their women, and curioſitie of their luſts, the booke of Eſter yeelds ample teſtimonie. Cicero addeth, that they beſtowed for the maintenance of their wiues robes, and dreſſes; one Citie for their haire, another for their necke; yea, the reuenues of whole countries on ſuch exceſſe. Socrates in Platoes Alcibiades telleth of an Embaſſador into Perſia, which was almoſt a whole day in trauelling through a Region, called the Queenes Girdle, another called the Queenes Head-tire, and ſo for euery other part of her Wardrobe.

The Kings [a] children (eſpecially the eldeſt ſonne) were preſently after their birth committed to Eunuches, which beſide education did compoſe and order their lims: at ſeuen yeeres of age they learned to ride and hunt, hauing skilfull inſtructers for that purpoſe: at foureteene yeeres they were committed to the diſcipline of the Royall Maſters, which were foure choiſely learned; the firſt in Prudence, which taught the Magia of Zoroaſtres, and the inſtitution of a King: the ſecond, in Iuſtice; who taught to ſpeake and deale truly: the third, in Temperance, wherein hee inſtructed his new diſciple: as the fourth in Fortitude. The Perſian King had one, whoſe office was to ſalute the King with theſe words; Ariſe, O King, and thinke on ſuch things as Meſoromaſdes would haue thee. Almoſt euery day hee performed his holy Rites, for which cauſe were ſlaine [b] euery day one thouſand ſacrifices, amongſt which were Oxen, Aſſes, Harts, the Magi being preſent. Before their ſacrifices they diſcourſed of pietie: and when they went to this their deuotion, there were men on both ſides the way ſet in rankes, with officers called Maſtigophori, who ſuffered none but great perſonages to enter. Firſt, were led Bulls, foure and foure together, which were ſacrificed to Iupiter. After them, were led Horſes to bee offered to the Sunne. Then followed a Chariot drawne with white Horſes, hauing a golden beame, and crowned, ſacred to Iupiter: after that, the Chariot of the Sunne like the former. Then a third Chariot, the Horſes couered with Scarlet; after which followed men carrying fire, and next, the King in his Chariot; before which went foure thouſand Target men, and two thouſand Speare-men about it: There followed three hundred with Darts on horſe-backe: two hundred horſes with golden bridles: and after them three thouſand Perſians, and in the laſt place the Medes, Armenians, Hircans. Xenophon indeed, which writes this in his Inſtitution of Cyrus, intends rather the frame of a iuſt Empire, then the truth of Hiſtory, yet profeſſeth to relate no other Rites and Cuſtomes then which which the Perſians embraced: neither doth hee in theſe things diſagree from Herodotus and Curtius. The Kings Chariot was drawne with white horſes, the drowning of one of which was the cauſe of drying [c] the Riuer Gyndes. For Cyrus enraged for the loſſe of his white Palfrey, diuided the riuer by force of men into three hundred and twentie rills; ſo that it wilderd and loſt it ſelfe in thoſe many by-wayes: an argument what Diuiſion can doe. Theſe horſes were of the Niſæan race in Media. When the King deſcended from his Chariot, a golden ſtoole was ſet him to ſtep on: one alway attending his Chariot with ſuch a ſtoole. While hee rode in his Chariot, hee ſpent the time in whitling with a knife, not in reading, or any graue meditation, and therefore was vnlearned. When hee went on progreſſe into Media, [d] he enioyned the Countrey to ſpend three dayes before to hunt Scorpions, which there abounded; allowing rewards therefore. They vſed by themſelues or their Legats, to viſite their officers in the Prouinces, and to puniſh or preferre them according to their merits. In iudgements they not onely conſidered the crimes and accuſations, but the counterpoiſe alſo of their vertues: and the clemencie [e] of Artaxerxes (in their irreuocable law) appeared in cutting off the Tyara of condemned perſons, in ſtead of their heads.

As often as the King entred into Perſepolis, euery Matron was to haue a piece of gold giuen her: the men alſo were rewarded which multiplied children: but eſpeciall rewards were beſtowed on them which were called Oroſange, which had deſerued well of the King, whoſe names and facts were therefore recorded, as we reade of Mordecai, and his recompence. Themiſtocles receiued of the Kings bountie the Citie Magneſia, to finde him bread (which Region was worth fiftie Talents yeerely) Lampſacum for wine, Myus for cates. The chiefe gift giuen to any was a mill of gold. The Kings birth-day was a ſolemne feaſt called [f] Tycta, that is perfect, for the magnificence thereof: in which hee gaue gifts to the people; yea, hee might not denie any petition then made to him. The King nouriſhed ſo many Indian dogs for hunting, that foure great villages in the plaine of Babylon were aſſigned to their ſuſtenance. Artaxerxes cauſed Megabyzus (as Cteſias writeth) to bee beheaded for ſtriking a Lyon with his dart, which was readie to aſſault the King, becauſe he therein tranſgreſſed the Law, and preuented the Kings triall of his valour. The reuenues of the tributes were 14560. Euboike Talents: the ſiluer and gold were melted and kept in earthen veſſels, which were broken when they came to vſe the ſame. Beſides this, the ſubiect prouinces yeelded to the maintenance of the King other things: as Armenia, horſes; Babylonia, foure moneths victuals, and the reſt of Aſia the other eight; and other Regions their peculiar commodities. The Kings ordinarie guard, night and day guarded the Palace, the moſt of them Perſians: another band of 10000. choice horſe-men were wholly Perſian, and were called Immortall: one thouſand of the beſt of them, called Doryphori and Melophori, were choſen into the Kings guard. They receiue no money but allowance of victuall for their wages. Curtius mentioneth a guard next to the Kings perſon, called the Kings kinſemen, which were 15000. But it were too tedious to recite the Homotimi, Megiſtanes, and other his court-officers and attendants, the Surena which was the chiefe Magiſtrate and others, whereof Briſſonius hath written. As their liues were burthened with voluptuouſneſſe, ſo they prepared for their deaths (that they might deſcend ſuddenly into the graue, as Iob ſaith of the proſperitie of ſome wicked, without any bands, to vſe Dauids phraſe, of a lingring death) certaine poyſons, tempered of the excrements [g] of the Dircærus an Indian bird, which in ſhort time, without ſenſe of griefe depriued them of life. After the Kings death they extinguiſhed the SACRED FIRE, which rite Alexander obſerued [h] in Hephæſtions funerall. In Perſepolis were erected vnto them ſtately Monuments, with Titles and Epitaphs inſcribed. The Monuments of the Kings there, [i] with other Antiquities haue conquered Time and Alexanders Fires, yet remaining ſo freſh, as if they were new made, many ſtill ſhining like glaſſe. Among which a Iaſper Table is remarkable, inſcribed with letters which none can reade, all of a Pyramide or Delta forme in diuerſifyed poſtures. Twentie ſuch Pillars remaine of admirable greatneſſe, beautie, and likeneſſe, of a laſting Marble, with Images in long habits like the Venetian Senators, with wide ſleeues and long beards: others ſitting as in high arched ſeats, with footſtooles in great Maieſtie. There are alſo huge Coloſſean horſes, with giantly riders, of Marble. And although a goodly fertile Countrey doth inuite habitation, of ten leagues extent euery way, yet is there now but one poore village of foure hundred houſholders, called Margatean, in this plaine of Perſepolis. Our Author acknowledgeth Diodorus his relations iuſtly agreeing with his eyes: and eſteemeth theſe Monuments farre beyond all other the worlds miraculous Artifices.

Alexander, in ſtate entring Babylon, thus by Curtius related. Many came forth to meet him: the wayes were all ſtrowed with flowers and garlands, on both ſides were erected ſiluer Altars, laden with Frankincenſe and all kinde of odors. There followed him for preſents droues of Horſes and Cattell: Lions and Leopards in grates were carried before him. The Magi after their manner of Proceſſion ſinging, had the next place; after them the Chaldæans, and the Babylonians both Diuiners and Artificers, with muſicall Inſtruments. Then the Horſemen, furniſhed beyond magnificence in exceſſe of prodigalitie. The King with his Armie followed, and laſt of all the Townſ-men. Hee that will compare with theſe relations, that which in the bookes of the Romane Ceremonies is written of the Popes ſtrait Tiara, enuironed with a triple Crowne: the veneration performed to him by all, euen Emperours kiſſing his feet, holding his bridle and ſtirrop, putting their ſhoulders vnder his Chaire, when hee liſts to ride on mens ſhoulders, holding water to his hands, and bearing the firſt diſh to his Table: the change of his name at his election: his Palfrayes alwayes white, like the Niſæan, led before him, one of which carryeth his God vnder a Canopie: his Scala, Proceſſions, and other Rites; ſhall ſee ſome hence borrowed, moſt exceeding the Perſian Exceſſe. CHAP. VI.

Of the Perſian Magi.

THe name of Magi is ſometimes applied (ſay ſome) to all the Perſians, or elſe to a particular Nation amongſt them: ſometime it ſignifieth the moſt excellent in Philoſophie, and knowledge of nature, or in ſanctitie and holineſſe of life. Thus [a] Suidas calls the Perſian Magi, Philoſophi, and Philothei, ſtudious of knowledge, of nature, and of God. Sometimes it ſignified ſuch as wee now call Magicians, practiſers of wicked Arts. Among the Perſians this name was ancient and honourable, ſaith [b] Peucerus, applyed onely to the Prieſts, which liued in high reputation for dignitie and authoritie, being alſo Philoſophers, as the Chaldæans were. To theſe were committed the cuſtodie of Religion, of ancient Monuments, of later Hiſtories, of publike records, and the explanation of the Perſian wiſdome, whoſe account appeareth in that after Cambyſes death, one of them is reported to ſucceed in the Throne. Now, whereas the Ethnicks had a tradition of two [c] Genij, which attend euery man, one good, the other euill; proceeding (in likelihood) from Diuine Truth, concerning good and euill Angels, which are either miniſtring Spirits for mans good, or tempters vnto euill: curious men hence tooke occaſion to deuiſe new Arts, which were called μαγεία and γοητεία; by the one calling vpon the good Dæmon or Genius; by the other on the euill: which euill One could eaſily turne himſelfe into an Angel of light, to delude blind people, being indeed (as in our White and Blacke witches at this day) worſe when an Angel, then when a Deuill.

Hereof were diuers kindes; [d] Necromancie, which inuocated the ſpirits of the dead: of which ſmoaky Soot, the Heathens Diuine Poets, and our Poeticall Diuines in the tales of Hell and Purgatory, ſtriue who ſhall haue the blackeſt tincture. They had alſo their Lecanomanciæ, which was obſerued in a Baſon of water, wherein certaine plate of gold and ſiluer were put with Iewels, marked with their iugling Charactars, and thence after pronuntiation of their words were anſweres whiſpered; [e] Gaſtromancie procured anſwere by pictures, or repreſentations in glaſſe-veſſels of water, after the due Rites. Catoptromancie receiued theſe reſemblances in cleere glaſſes: Chryſtallomancie, in Cryſtall; Dactyliomancie, was a diuination with Rings (which perhaps Gyges vſed) conſecrated by certaine poſition of the heauens, and diuelliſh inchantments. Onymancie, with Oyle and Soote daubed on the Nayle of an vndefiled Childe, and held vp againſt the Sunne: Hydromancie, with water: Æromancie, with ayre. But what ſhould I adde the many more names of this Artleſſe Art, vnworthy the naming? Tibi nomina mille, Mille nocendi artes; Infinitely diuerſified are theſe blind by-wayes of darkneſſe and miſchiefe. Delrio hath other diuiſions of Magicke, which from the efficient hee diuideth into Naturall, Artificiall, and Diabollicall: from the end, into Good and Bad; and this bad (which is by explicite or implicite compact with Deuills) into Magia ſpecialis, Diuinatio, Maleficium, & Nugatoria. Zoroaſter is ſuppoſed Author both of the good and bad vnto the Perſians. Naturall Magicke is by Delrio diuided into that which worketh wonders (not miracles) and that which diuineth. But I am weary of this Magicall ſearch. compounded of three Arts, that exercise most imperious power ouer the mindes of men; Physicke, and that offering her selfe more sublimate and pure, in the sacred name and rites of Religion, beautified also with the addition of Mathematicall Sciences; (a threefold cord not easily broken, like a three-headed Cerberus, or trible crowned Prelate holding the world in feare, or loue thereof) Zoroastres (who liued at Eudoxus testifieth, fixe thousand yeeres before Plato) first inuented it in Persia. Hermippus affirmeth, that Agonax taught him. Apusorus and Zarates among the Medes, Marmaridius the Babylonian, Hippocus the Arabian, and Zarmocenidas the Assyrian, haue been famous for their practise and writings of this Art. Pythagoras, Empedocles, Democritus, Plato sailed farre to learne it, vndertaking long exiles (rather the pilgrimages or peregrinations) to that end. He impiously addeth Moses and Iochabel (it may be he meaneth Ioshua) to this impious number. The Scripture tells of Iannes and Iambres, and Simon Magus famous in this infamie. Hierom saith, they were the Philosophers of the Chaldæans, and that the Kings did all things after the direction of their Art; which (they are Plinies words) in the East ruleth the King of Kings. Porphirius affirmeth, that they which were wise in diuine mysteries, and performed them, were called of the Persians Magi: the same, saith Picus, that Philosophers were amongst the Greekes. The like hath Philo, and Proclus, and Arnobius of Hosthanes Magus. They were studious in prayers, instituted sacrifices, and mysteries, as the Indian Brachmanes, and Græcian Theologie; acknowledged Angels, Paradise, the soules immortalitie. Patricius also addeth to this their Philosophie and Theologie, Astronomie and Physicke, and all knowledge of Nature. It is like that in the Persian Magi concurred both a certaine stocke or kindred, which were also so called (as is said) and the Philosophicall Inquisition of Nature, and the Priestly function, and also some either implicite or explicite societie with Deuills. The same they were, at least in profession and reputation, that the Philosophers with the Greekes, the Priests in Egypt, Gymnosophistes in India, Chaldæans in Babylon, Druydes in Gallia and in this our Ile, the Italian Aruspices, and other religious persons (the Treasurers of their Theologie and Philosophie) in other places. As for those Magi mentioned in the g Gospell, some suppose them to come from Æthiopia; some from Arabia; some from Mesopotamie; some from Chaldæa; and some from Persia; and some from diuers of those Regions. Whencesoeuer they came, they had a brighter Starre to guide them with diuiner light, then those Magicall brans of hellish fire could yeeld.

Plato h commends this Magia, and calls it Machagistia, and θεῶν θεραπεία the worship of the Gods; and saith, that the Kings of Persia learned it, as a knowledge of Diuine Mysteries, wherein by the worlds Common-wealth, they were instructed to gouerne their owne. Others, as they were led by differing affection, doe as much discommend them. And truely (as in the Chaldæan, and Ægyptian Priests) their searching out the mysteries of Nature cannot but deserue commendation, but their abusing this naturall Philosophie to vnnaturall conspiracie with deuils, cannot but be detested of those which are not themselues detested of GOD. And either from this deuillish conspiracie, or ouer-curious vanitie, did arise their predictions of future euents: in which respect the Ethnikes had them in high reputation. Ammianus Marcellinus i saith, that Zoroastres added much to this Art from the Chaldæan mysteries, and Hystaspes, the Father of Darius, from the Brahmanes, which hee in his Indian trauels had found in a woodie solitarinesse, and learned of them the motions of the Starres, and pure rites of sacrifices: which he taught the Magi, and they, together with the skill of diuination, deliuered to their posteritie by Tradition: and that progenie is alway consecrated to Diuine Seruices, and keepe continually burning certaine fire which first came from heauen; a small portion whereof was wont to bee carried before the King of Asia. There were but a few of them at the first: and it was vnlawfull to touch the sacrifice, or approch to the Altar, before the Magus, with a certaine set speech had powred on his sacred preparatiue liquors. Afterwards being increased in number they grew into an entire Nation, and inhabited vnwalled Townes, being gouerned by their owne lawes, and honoured for Religion. Cicero writeth, that the Magi did assemble together in Fana, into certaine Temples or consecrated places, to consult about their diuinations. They presaged to Cyrus thirtie yeeres reigne. They dranke the herbe Theangelis, and vsed also the herbe Aglaophon or Marmaritis when they would diuine. They diuined by the notes and markes of the bodie: they foretold the euents of prodigies. They might not teach any but Persians the mysteries of their science, without the Kings leaue. And yet Plinie saith, that Plato, Democritus, Empedocles, and Pythagoras, vndertooke exiles (as is said before) rather then trauels, to learne the same, which after their returne they taught. Apollonius also for the same cause went into Persia and India: whose Philosophie plainly appeareth by the history of his life to bee soyled with Magicall impuritie. And although some commend one sort of Magia, as being their Theologie and Philosophie, yet seeing their Philosophie was corrupted with curiositie, end their Theologie with superstitious Idolatrie, it could not be free from some kinde of (at least implicite) sorcerie, as the examples of those [c] which were most eminent herein, do shew. Such as one Pases was, who by enchantments would make shewes and resemblances of sumptuous feasts, with many attendants: and had a Magicall [d] or enchanted halfe-peny, which would returne to him againe, when he had bought any thing therewith. Yea, howsoeuer, Patricius would not excuse only, but highly commend the Oracles (as he termeth them) of Zoroaster, yet doth he cite out of him, that Barbarous names must not bee changed. For all things haue their names of God, which haue an vnspeakeable power in holy things: which words seeme to incline to Charmes; which are commonly in barbarous vnsignificant termes. Other things which he with great paines hath gathered out of the Platonikes, stamped with Zoroasters name, are many of them diuine, being interpreted in the best sense. For they are for the most part obscure, and many exceeding the sense of such weake Readers, as I confesse my selfe. Some I haue here expressed.

c Apollonius, Hostbanes, Charendas, Democritus, & Pythagorici & Platonici.

d Suidas, hence came the Prouerbe, τὸ Πάσητος ἡμιωβόλιον.

In all the world shineth the Trinitie; of which the beginning is Vnitie. The Father perfected all things, and deliuered them to the second Minde, which all mankinde calleth the First: He remaineth in the paternall profunditie. It is the minde of the Minde which is framer of the fierie world. All the world is of fire and water; and earth, and ayre. Hee fastned a great company of not-wandring Starres, and seuen wandring creatures, ioyning fire to fire, the earth in the midst, and the water in the receptacles of the earth, and the ayre aboue them. Let the immortall soule lift her eyes vpwards, not downewards into this darke world, which is vnstable, mad, heady, crooked, alway encompassing a blind depth, hating the light, of which the vulgar is carried. Seeke Paradise. The soule of man will after some sort bring God into it selfe: hauing nothing mortall, it is wholly rauished of God. It resoundeth the harmony, vnder which is the mortall body, extending the fiery minde to the worke of pietie. I desire not sacrifices and inwards, these are playes, flee these things if thou wilt open the sacred Paradise of piety, where vertue and wisdome, and the good law, are gathered together. If these things are harsh, what would these obscurities be in his Theologie, wherein he first placeth One beginning, then a paternall profunditie of three Trinities, euery of which hath the Father, the Power, the Minde. Next in order is the Intelligible Iynx, and after it Synocheus, Empyræus, and Æthereal is, and Materialis; and after these the Teletarchæ: after which the Fontani Patres, Hecate: and such a rabble of names follow, that the recitall would seeme to coniure the Reader into some Magicall maze or circle. They which are curious of those inextricable labyrinths, may resort to Psellus, Patricius, and the Platonikes, which ascribe these things to the Assyrians and Chaldeans, as they doe to Zoroaster also. Delrio and Patricius finde sixe of the Zoroasters mentioned in Authors, (Goropius after his wont, paradoxicall, none at all) the first of which was inuentor of this Magike, a Chaldæan, supposed to liue in the time of Abraham. Berosus first, and after [e] Iulianus a Magician, both Chaldæans, communicated these mysteries to the Greeks: and diuers of those Heretikes [f] in the prime age of the Christian Church, were not a little sowred with this Magicall leauen, as appeareth by Irænæus, Epiphanius, Augustine, and others that write against them. Basilides his Abraxas (the mysticall Characters of which name make three hundred sixtie fiue, the number of dayes in the yeere, and of heauens after his opinion) is supposed the same with Mithra the Persian Deitie, and hence to haue deriued his Magicall descent: which wee may note of others, if this belonged not to another labour.

Nothing seemed to them more vnlucky, & signe of former lewdnesse, then that no bird or beast would prey on their dead. And the souldiers which sickned in their Armies, were laid forth yet breathing, with bread, water, and a staffe to driue away the beasts and fowles, which yet when their strength failed them, easily deuoured both the meat and keepers. If any recouered, and returned home, the people shunned him as a ghost, nor would suffer him to follow his former trade of life, till he were expiated by the Magi, & as it were restored again to life. The Romans in pittie, passing thorow some part of Persia, where they found a carkasse in the field, buried it; but the night following, in a vision, a graueold man in habit of a Philosopher, reproued that fact, willing them to leaue the naked bodie to the dogs and birds, and the mother Earth (saith hee) will not receiue those which haue polluted their mothers. Authors of all things, calling r Orimazes a God; and Arimanius; the fountaine of euill, a deuill; the one cause of light: the other of darkenesse. Betwixt these two they placed Mithres as Mediator or Intercessor. Zoroastres was author of this opinion. To the first of these was praise and vowes offered: to the later mournfull deuotions. For, rubbing a certaine hearbe called Omomi, they call on Dis Pater & Orcus, then they wash it with the bloud of a 40 slaine Wolfe, and carry it into a shadowie place, where they powre it out. They assigne plants partly to the good, partly to the bad God: as they doe also quicke creatures; the earthly creatures to the good, the watery to the bad, and therfore esteem him happy that hath killed most of them. Oromazes, say they, begotten of pure light, and Arimanius the childe of darknesse, warre one against another. The first created six Gods, Benevolence, Truth, Politie, Wisdome, Riches, Honest delight: the later as many contrarie. When Oromazes had thrice enlarged himselfe, he was as farre beyond the Sunne, as the Sunne is from the Earth, and formed the Starres: Of which, one he fixed as a Gardian and Watch-man, the Dogge-starre: hee made other twentie foure Gods, which hee closed in an Egge. Arimanius did as much, but his twentie foure brake their shell; and so became good things and euill mingled. But a 50 fatall time shall come, when Arimanius the Author of plague and famine shall perish, and then shall bee one societie of all mankinde in happinesse, vsing but one language. Theopompus saith, according to their opinion, that one of these Gods shall raigne three thousand yeeres, the other being discomfited; and other three thousand they shall fight and labour to destroy one another: at last Dis Pater shall be destroyed, and men shall bee happy. This opinion of the Magi, the Chaldeans haue applied to their Astronomy; in the seuen Planets, making two good, two bad, three indifferent: The Grecians to their Iupiter, Dis Pater, and Harmonia: Empedocles to his Friendship and Discord: Aristotle to his Forma & Priuatio: Pythagoras to his One and Two: Plato to his Idem & Alterum Manes to his deuilish heresie, as before is said. The Persians in this respect, as some expound their mysteries, called Mithra triplex, as a third person and reconciler of the other two. And there haue not wanted, which 60 ascribe this threefold Mithra to that threefold day, as they interprete that Signe of the Sunnes going backe ten degrees, in the dayes of Hezekiah, which if there were houres made, made, the day twice ten beside the ordinarie twelue houres. But (as in Hercules his generation) a threefold night attends these mistie mysteries, which I could as willingly construe of some misconstrudd notice of the blessed Trinitie. Dio Chrysostomus telleth of Zoroaster the Author of this science, that enflamed with the loue of vertue, hee forsooke the world, and went apart into a mountaine. And afterwards leauing that habitation, he seemed (to those to whom hee would shew himselfe, which was onely to the Magi) to shine with a fire which came downe from heauen vpon him. This perhaps was borrowed and peruerted from the shining face of Moses. Ap. Briss.

Onely Persians, saith [f] Gramay, were chosen into their number. The name Magi is among Authors applied also to the Chaldeans, which in Babylon professed the same Arts and superstitions; the Disciples (saith [t] Lucian) of Zoroastres, of whose cunning in charmes you may reade in his Necromantia, a pleasant discourse: Mithrobarzanes, a Chaldean Magus and Menippus, whom hee washed twentie nine dayes in Euphrates by the Moone, and in the morning sets him against the rising Sunne, with long charmes: after that spitting three times in his face, hee brings him backe againe, not once looking aside. Their meate was Acornes, their drinke Milke, Mulse, and the water of Choaspi, their lodging on the wide field on the grasse. After all this, he brought him about midnight to Tygris, where washing him, hee purifieth him with a Torch, and the herbe Squilla, and other things, &c. which howsoeuer Lucian suteth to his scoffing humour, yet I haue inserted, as somewhat expressing their superstitions, obserued in charming and diuinations. Of the religious, and other rites of the ancient Persians.

§. I.

Of their Gods and superstitions out of HERODOTVS.

LEauing these Magi, let vs take a view of the Persian religious rites which [u] Herodotus thus describeth. The Persians neither erect Images, nor Altars, nor Temples, and impute it to madnesse in such as doe: therefore, as I thinke, because they are not of the Greekes opinion, that the Gods haue risen from men: Their custome is ascending vp the highest Hils, to offer sacrifice to Iupiter, calling the whole circle of heauen Iupiter. They sacrifice to the Sunne and Moone, and Earth, to the Fire, and Water, and Winds; to these onely they haue accustomed to sacrifice from the beginning. They sacrifice also to Vrania, which they haue learned of the Assyrians and Arabians. The Assyrians call Venus, Militta; the Arabians, Alitta, the Persians, Metra. [u] Herodotus lib. 1.

Their rites in sacrificing are these. Being to sacrifice, they neither set vp Altar, nor kindle fire, nor vse vestments, pipes, cakes, or libaments; but he which intendeth to sacrifice, placing the sacrifice in a cleane place, calleth vpon that God, wearing their Tiara, [x] girded about with myrtle. The sacrificer prayeth not for himselfe alone, but generally for all Persians, and especially for the King. And after that the sacrifice is cut into small pieces, he streweth vnder the sodden flesh, small herbes, chiefly Trifoly; and setting the flesh in order thereon, the Magus standing by, singeth [y] some hymnes (of the generation of the Gods) which they hold to be a most effectuall inchantment. Without one of their Magi no sacrifice is accounted lawfull. After all this, the sacrificer vseth the flesh at his pleasure. [x] See sup. c. 5. [y] Theogonias

Of all daies, euery man accounteth his owne birth-day to be most solemnly obserued: and then maketh greatest cheare. The richer sort then set whole Beeues, Camels, Horses, Asses, baked in an ouen or furnace, on the Table the poorer, smaller beasts. The Persians are small eaters: but in their drinking, consult of the weightiest affaires. Of which they deliberate fasting, but pronounce sentence after they are well in drinke. To vomit or make water openly, is vnlawfull to them. Those that are equall, salute when they meete each other with a mutuall kisse; which is fastened on the cheeke only, if they be of vnequall degree. They hold themselues the best of all men, their neighbors so much better, how much neerer them they dwell. They are much addicted to Venerie with both sexes. Next vnto Martiall valour, they repute excellent the procreation of many Children; the King allowing annuall presents to him who hath begotten most Children, and therefore they vse many women. The childe commeth not in his fathers sight till hee be fiue yeeres old, but liueth with the women, that if hee die before, his father should thence conceiue no griefe. From that time till hee bee twentie, hee learneth three things; to ride, to shoot, to speake truth. For to lie is with them the most shamefull thing; the second, to be in debt. For one fault onely no man ought to bee punished. Whatsoeuer is not meet to be done, ought not to be spoken. A Leprous person, if hee bee a Citizen, may not enter into the Citie, nor haue any societie with men: for this disease is sent (say they) for some offence against the Sunne: if hee bee a forrenner, they banish him out of their Region, and for the same cause carry into that Region white Pigeons. In a River they neither spit, nor make water, nor wash, but haue them in very religious veneration. They might not cast any carkasse or pollution therein. These things, saith Herodotus, I affirme of the Persians out of mine owne knowledge: that which followeth I doe not so well know; that they burie not their dead bodies before they bee torne of some Fowle or Dogge: but I well know that their Magi doe wrap them vp in Waxe, and then bury them. These Magi differ both from other men, and from the Egyptian Priests in this, that these pollute themselues with the death of nothing but their sacrifices, but the Magi with their owne hands kill any thing: except a man and a dogge: yea, they esteeme it some great exploit, if they haue killed very many Ants or Serpents, or other things which creepe or flye. Thus farre Herodotus.

§. II.

Of the same and other Rites out of STRABO.

STRABO [a] nameth Anaitis, Amanus, and Anandatus, Gods of the Persians: When the Persian Emperors had ouerthrowne the [b] Sacæ, they encompassed with a wall a certaine rocke situate in a field, and erecting a Temple of the aforesaid Gods, there instituted yeerely solemnities, named Sacæ, which of the inhabitants of Zela are yet celebrated (so they call the place.) That Towne in great part belongs to them which are called Sacred Seruants, to which Pompey added a great Country. Some report that Cyrus, hauing ouercome the Sacæ, attributing this victory to diuine power, consecrated that day to his Country-Goddesse, naming it Sacæa, and whersoeuer the Temple of that Goddesse is, there also are celebrated those Sacæan feasts in manner of the Bacchanals, day and night, the men and women drinking themselues drunken. Strabo in the end of the same eleuenth Booke mentioneth their Temples, and amongst others the Temples of Tanais, which before in Herodotus is denied to be the vse of the Persians: [c] Cicero blameth the Magi, for procuring Xerxes to burne all the Temples of Greece, because they included their Gods in walls, and to whom the whole world was a Temple and house. Their deuotion to the Sun and Moon, made them spare Delus, sacred to Apollo or the Sun, and the Temple of Diana, or the Moone at Ephesus, as an Interpreter of Aristophanes hath glossed. Some hold that Xerxes burnt the Græcian Temples for reuenge of the burning of Sardis, and the Temple of Cybele by the Athenians, and not for hatred of all Temples. The Greekes would not permit the Temples so burned to bee re-edified, that those ruinous places might be places of argument for reuenge to all posteritie. The Ionians, as Isocrates testifieth, cursed them which should repaire them. [d] Strabo thus also reporteth of the Persians: They haue neither Images nor Altars: they sacrifice in an high place, they thinke heauen to be Iupiter: they worship the Sunne, whom they call Mithra, the Moone also and Venus, and the Fire, and the Earth, and the Windes, and the water: they sacrifice in a cleane place, and present their sacrifice crowned: and when as the Magas, ruler of this businesse, hath diuided the flesh in pieces to euery one, they goe their wayes, leauing no part thereof to the Gods, who (say they) are satisfied with the soule of their sacrifice. Some, as it is reported, lay a part of the Numbles on the fire. They sacrifice especially to the Fire and to the Water, laying on the fire drie stickes, the barkes pulled off, and laying thereon fat Tallow, and powring on the same, Oyle, they kindle the same, not blowing with their breath, but fanning, or otherwise enforcing the winde thereto: If any bloweth the fire, or cast any dead thing or durt therein, he is punished with death. They performe their Water-ceremonies in this sort: Comming to a Lake, Riuer, or Fountaine, they make a Ditch, and there slay a sacrifice, with great heed that none of the next water be touched with the bloud: after laying the flesh on Myrtle and Lawrell, the Magi burne the same with small twigs, and making certaine prayers, sprinkle oyle mixed with milke and honey, not in the fire or water, but on the earth. They are a long while muttering their prayers, holding a bundle of small Tameriske-twigs. That which in one place Strabo saith they worshipped Mars onely, is a fault of the negligent Writers, as [e] Casaubon hath obserued in his Notes.

In Cappadocia, where is very great store of the Magi, which (of the Fire) are called Pyrethi, and many Temples of the Persian gods, they slay not the sacrifice with a knife, but a club club or mallet, wherewith they beat it. The Pyreitheia are great incloſed places, in the midſt, whereof there is an Altar: thereon the Magi keepe much aſhes, and a fire continually burning, whither they euery day reſort, and make their prayers about an houres ſpace, holding a bundle of twigges before the fire, hauing their heads couered with a kind of labelled Mitre, hanging downe on both ſides, that the ſtrings couer their lips. Theſe things are done in the Temples of Anaitis and Amanus. For there are their Temples, and their Image of Amanus is carried in proceſſion. Theſe things we haue ſeene.

It ſeemeth, that whereas Herodotus reporteth they had no Temples, Altars, nor Images: and Strabo ſo often mentioneth their Temples, and here the Altar and Image of Amanus; that in Herodotus dayes they had none: which grew afterwards in vſe, as a forraine rite brought in among the Perſians after the Macedonians had conquered them: or elſe that there were differing Sects among their Magi, ſome (as theſe in Cappadocia) embracing Altars, Images, and Temples, ſome refuſing ſome or all theſe. For otherwiſe Strabo diſagreeth not onely from Herodotus, but from himſelfe, before denying them the vſe of Altars and Images, and here affirming it of the Cappadocian Magi (in other things) of the Perſian Religion. Perhaps the burning of the Græcian Temples purchaſed to them that conceit with the vulgar: we know they honoured the Temple and Altar at Ieruſalem. And leſſe matters ſet on the Friers laſts, make ſeely Papiſts beleeue now, that Proteſtants haue no Churches nor Religion, nor ſcarcely the ſhape of men.

Iulius Firmicus [f] in his Treatiſe of the myſteries and errors of prophane Religions to Conſtantine and Conſtans Emperours, ſpeaketh of the Aſſyrians and Perſians: that the Aſſyrians aſcribed the principalitie of the elements to the ayre, the Image whereof they worſhipped, ſtiling it with the name of Iuno, or Venus the Virgin, whom the Quires of their Prieſts worſhipped with effeminate voyces and geſtures, their skin poliſhed, and attire faſhioned like women. Yea their Prieſts became impure Ganymedes, and ſuſtained the Sodomiticall luſts of others in the Temples, not ſhaming, but glorying of ſuch deuotions, and compoſing themſelues to all delicate, laſciuious, filthy behauiour: and thus wantonly dreſſed, with much minſtrelſie call vpon the Goddeſſe to infuſe into them a diuining and propheticall ſpirit. Eaſily may that Impure ſpirit finde acceſſe and entertainment in ſuch impure bodies. But the Perſians and all the Magi preferre the fire. Theſe diuide Iupiter into two powers, metamorphoſing his nature into both ſexes. They make the woman with a three formed countenance, wound about with monſtrous Serpents (fit enſignes for the Deuils worſhip:) and worſhip a man which had driuen away kine, applying his holies to the power of the Fire: him they call Mithra, whoſe blinde deuotions were done in places anſwerable, namely in hidden Caues.

§. III.

Of the ſame out of Chriſtian and other Authors.

HESYCHIVS ſaith, that Mithras, or the Sun was chiefe god with the Perſians: and therefore the moſt religious and inuiolable oath of the King was by Mithra. And this is confirmed by [g] Firmicus alſo, who ſaith, that the Perſians preferre the Fire before all the other Elements, and that they call the ſame Mithra. (The reaſon is, becauſe they held, as in the beginning of this worke we noted out of Zoroaſter, that the Sun and all the Stars are celeſtiall fires.) They performed their deuotions to the ſame in dark Caues, where they could not ſee the brightneſſe of that light. This Hierome calls Mithras Den: and Tertullian affirmeth that Mithras Knights or Souldiers were initiated in the ſame. To whatſoeuer god they ſacrificed, they firſt called vpon the Fire, and poured out their praiers thereto. To this Fire they dedicated certaine Chappels or Oratories, wherein to keepe it alway burning; theſe were called Pyreia: of which Claudian: penetralibus Ignem Sacratum rapuere aditis. They ſuppoſed that it came downe from heauen. They worſhipped all πυροειδῆ whatſoeuer [h] had any reſemblance of fire, as the Carbuncle ſtone. They obſerued differing ceremonies in their Fire and Water-deuotions. To the Fire [i] they vſed theſe ſet words when they added fewell thereto, Lord Fire eat. They offered wine in a cup, which they called Condy. The coſtly ſacrifices of their Kings wee haue alreadie mentioned. Plutarch [k] tels that Artaxerxes married his owne daughter Atoſſa, (Heraclides addeth his other daughter Ameſtris.) And when Atoſſa was leprous, his loue notwithſtanding continued, and he beſought Iuno for her, touching the ground with his hands, repleniſhing the way between the Temple and Palace (which was ſixteene furlongs) with offering of gold, ſiluer, purple, horſes. Plutarch [l] writeth that Ameſtris the wife of Xerxes, in ſacrifice to Pluto for her health, buried twelue men quicke in the earth. To Mithra, ſaith Photius, they offered men, women, and children. And as they

We may further adde (from Gramay [e] his Collections out of diuers Authors, and from others, concerning the Perſian Religion) that they ſometimes obſerued the Græcians Deities, calling Iupiter, Bel; Hercules, Sandes; Venus, Anaitis. To Iupiter was ſacred a Chariot with a beame of gold. They Sunne the worſhipped (by the name of Mithra, and Elductus) at Sun-riſing: and adored alſo the painted Image thereof. They accounted the Horſe the Suns peculiar beaſt, and offered vnto him white Horſes. Ouer Darius his Tabernacle, the Image of the Sunne, encloſed in the Chriſtall, ſhone forth ſo that it might bee ſeene of all. The order alſo of Darius his march, when he warred againſt Alexander, had in their firſt place their Fire, which they called Sacred and Eternall, carried on ſiluer Altars. Next hereunto the Magi ſinging their country-Hymnes, followed by three hundred ſixtie fiue young men, (ſo many as their yeere had dayes) clothed in bright red, then came Iupiters Chariot, drawne by white Horſes: after whom followed a horſe of exceeding greatneſſe, conſecrated to the Sun. Their riders had white garments and golden rods. Likewiſe both ſides of the Kings Chariot were adorned with Images of gold and ſiluer: two being moſt eminent among them; the one of Peace, the other of Warre.

That Souldier, which was initiated in Mithraes hollowed orders, was firſt proued by eightie ſeuerall kindes of puniſhment: and if he continued ſtedfaſt, he was waſhed, putting on his head a [f] crowne with a ſword interpoſed. Chaſte Virgins were hollowed the Sunnes Prieſts or Nuns. They worſhipped Diana, whom they called Nannea (as ſome will haue it) in that Hiſtory of [g] Antiochus. They ſolemnized certaine Feaſts, the chiefe whereof was that of Mithra. Another holy day they called the Deſtruction [h] of vices, in which the Magi killed venemous things, and offered; and the ſeruants lorded it fiue dayes together, ruling both the Family and their Maſters. Magophonia they celebrated in memory of the Magi ſlaine by Darius Hiſtaſpis, and his Colleagues. Of their holy-day Sacea before is ſpoken: in which (ſome report, that) the ſeruants changed offices and garments with the maſters. Minutius Fœlix [i] obiecteth againſt them their inceſtuous copulation with their mothers. Arnobius derideth their worſhipping of Riuers. The Chriſtian Fathers, and Heathen Authors are plentifull in the narration of the Perſian vanities. Euſebius [k] citeth a ſaying of Bardeſanes Syrus; Among the Perſians there was a law to marry their ſiſters, daughters, and mothers: which cuſtome the Perſians obſerued alſo in other Countries, and therefore other Nations hating them, called them Maguſſai; of which are many in Egypt, Phrygia, and Galatia, whoſe poſteritie ſucceedeth them in the ſame wickednes. This name Maguſſai is deriued of Magi.

§. IIII.

Of the Perſian Education and Schooles.

BVt of all other things this is moſt commendable and admirable, which the Perſians obſerued for learning and practiſe of vertue, if we giue like credite to [l] Xenophon herein, as [m] others haue done. They had a kinde of publike Schoole, called the Free or liberall Market, not for the ſale of merchandize (which kinde of Markets the ancient Perſians [n] wanted) but the learning of ingenuous, liberall, and vertuous conditions. This was diuided into foure parts, one for children till ſeuenteene yeeres of age, the ſecond for youths to ſeuen and twentie, the third for men till fiftie, the fourth for old men. In this liberall Market or Colledge was a Palace, and Iudgement-place. Early in the morning the children reſort hither: here alſo were the ſtriplings, and the riper-aged men, daily: the old men often. The ſtriplings boarded and lodged there (except they were married) and preſented themſelues to the Magiſtrates in Armour. Each Court had twelue Prefects, according to the number of the Perſian Tribes. To the children are old graue men appointed, likewiſe to the youths men of riper age, as maſters of Manners. The children come not in the Fathers ſight till fiue yeeres of age, or as Valerius Maximus [o] hath, till ſeuen, and eſpecially learne truth: they were taught by theſe Prefects the rules of Iuſtice, not by bare rules, but by examples (for which cauſe alſo, Auguſtus [p] would haue the Senators children preſent in the Court.) Yea a good part of the day was to this end ſpent by thoſe Prefects, in hearing and deciding ſuch caſes as fell out amongſt theſe their ſchollers, about thefts, reproaches, or other wrongs. Next to Truth and Iuſtice, they learned Sobrietie, Abſtinence, Continence, and Temperance, wherein they were well furthered by the examples of their Maſters: neither might they [q] eat but in their preſence and with their leaue, and that not of the choiſeſt fare, but bread and creſſes, whereto they added drinke from the next riuer. They planted in them a hatred of vices, vices, especially of lying, and in the next place of debt, which cannot but bee attended with much disquiet: and therefore wisely did Augustus command to buy him the pillow of a Roman Gentleman, that died incredibly indebted, as if there had therein rested some sleeping power, whereon, one so much indebted could take any rest. Ingratitude was as little gratefull as the former, and by the Persian lawes, ingratefull persons were subiect to accusation and punishment, as not Xenophon onely, but [r] Marcellinus also hath marked, howsoeuer Seneca [t] findes such a law onely amongst the Macedonians, which perhaps was hence borrowed. They hated such as forsooke their friends and country-men in need. Their awfull respect to their parents was such, that they might not sit in the mothers presence without her leaue: the father had tyrannicall power ouer his children, for life and death. That which was vnto them vnlawfull in deed, was not permitted in obscene and filthy words to bee spoken. Thus were the Noble-mens children brought vp neere the Palace gates; and in the Prouinces neere the gates of the Deputies or Gouernours.

For bodily exercise, they learned to shoot, to cast darts, to ride and manage vnruly horses, and to fight on horse-backe. And this was their education till seuenteene yeeres of age: at which time they were of the second ranke of Springals and youths, and for ten yeeres after did not repaire home at nights, but lay and abode in this Court or Colledge. When the King went on hunting, halfe of them attended him in armour. Their dyet was the same, but somewhat larger, as is before related of the children: and in hunting, if it continued two dayes, had but one dayes allowance. They vsed to run long races, of thirtie or fortie furlongs: they exercised the sling, leaping and wrestling, the King propounding rewards to the Victor. The helpe of these were vsed by the Magistrates against robbers, murtherers, and the like wicked persons: as also of the Men, which was the third order, the Seminary of Magistrates and Souldierie of the Persians, till they were fiftie yeeres old or somewhat more, at which age they were freed from musters and forraine employments, but at home were employed in publike and priuate iudgements. None might attaine this honour in Age, but by those degrees before expressed: nor might any haue that education but the children of the rich, which were able to beare the charge. It was vnlawfull amongst the Persians [t] to laugh in loud manner openly, or openly, or by the way to doe the easements of nature by siege, vrine, or vomit: or to make water standing.

§. V.

Of the Persian Luxurie, and Marriages, Funerals, &c.

BVt this ancient Persian discipline and sobrietie, with wealth and looseneſſe were afterwards corrupted, especially in drinking; to represse which, the Kings made an order, Est. 1. that none should bee compelled to forget their health, in remembring of healths, or other Bacchanal deuices, whereof would G o d wee had lesse cause to complaine. The vse of Harlots [u] were also added to their drinkings, which when the Embassadors sent to Amyntas King of Macedon, to demand Earth and Water (which was the Persian custome when they exacted full subiection and possession) extended to Matrons. Alexander his sonne [x] sent young men armed in womens habite amongst them, which quenched their hot flames of lust with their bloud. Hence haply it was, that Assuerus would needes make shew of Vashti the Queene in his magnificent Feast, which occasioned her depriuation, and Esters succession. Amidst their cups they consulted of warre and weightie affaires; but some say, they decreed not till afterwards. The Persians vsed banquettings vnder Arras hangings, before the time of Attalus, from whom the Romans first borrowed the vse of them, of his aula or hall hanged therewith, calling them aulæa. But the wals of the richer Persians were hanged with them, the floures spread with costly carpets, their cupboards furnished with rich plate, their bodies shining with curious & costly ointments, their kitchin stored with garlick, as a preseruatiue against serpents and venemous creatures, their chambers swarming with Concubines; yea, mothers, daughters, and sisters wedded and bedded with them: their second seruices celled in Scripture, The banquet of wine, when after the belly full farced with meats, with which they dranke water, they had other tables set with wine, on which they gaue a new onset, as a fresh enemy: these and the like excesses would glut our Reader. Loth were I to bring him to their mourning [y] rites, in which they shaued themselues, their Horses, and Mules; they vsed sackcloth, and entred not the Court: they couered the face of such as incurred the Kings anger, as we reade of Haman. Their executions were flaying, crucifying, burning, burying aliue, stoning, cutting asunder, &c. This pertaineth to their religion, their diuination by lots, as before Haman, they perhaps haps the Magi, cast Phur, that is, a lot, from day to day, and from month to month, to see which would be the most lucky and fatall time for his mischieuous plot against the Iewes. Their mariages they celebrated in the Spring: and on their mariage day the husbands eate nothing but an Apple, or the marrow of a Camel. The Persians are accounted authors of making Eunuches [z], which [a] Petronius Arbiter and M. Seneca impute to the curiositie of their lust, which might thus be longer serued of them. They vsed in salutation to vncouer [b] or put off the Tiara. Here I might lade you with the Persian wardrobe, the length and varietie of their garments; and I might tell you of their earings and Iewels, painting of their faces, long haire: of their kissing salutations, if they were equall, and of the knee of the superiour by the inferiour, and adoration of the chiefe: of their womans womanly detestation in the eagerest degree of hatred and indignation, the fingering of wooll: of their inhumane cruelties to the kindred of those which had committed some grieuous crime, to punish all for the offence of one. The Persians made banquets to their gods, and gaue them the first fruits thereof. But it is time to leaue their gods and them; and let mee obtaine pardon, that this great Monarchie, sometime stretching from India to Ethiopia in one hundred twentie seuen Prouinces, hath stretched so farre, and commanded mee so long attendance in this Discourse. Let mee now looke vpon the Mahumetan face thereof.

Of the alterations of the State and Religion in Persia, vnder the Saracens.

§. I.

Of the Saracenicall Conqueste and Schisme in Persia: the third Dynastie.

THe Saracens (as is alreadie shewed) a people bred, as it were of putrifaction in that corrupt estate of the world, dispossessed of his state and life Ormisdas the last Persian King. Their Religion had sustained small alteration in Persia before this time, for ought I finde, sauing what the Christian had in these parts preuailed, (which belongeth to another taske.) But from that time that the Saracens were Conquerours, the soules of the Persians haue no lesse been subiect to those fooliish Mahumetan superstitions, then their bodies too cruell slauerie: yea, the [c] name of Persian was drowned in the title of Saracens. Homar was then Caliph. But when Iezid the sonne of Muaui was Priest and King (such are the Caliphs) of the Saracens; Mutar, the Deputie or Gouernour of Persia, proclaimed himselfe a Prophet, and seized on the State: from him the Persian Sophi deriueth his originall. When Iezid was dead, the Inhabitants of Cusa in Arabia proclaimed Hocem the sonne of Ali Caliph: but Abdalam the sonne of Iezid intrapped and slew him; and at his Sepulchre was after erected the Citie Carbala. This Hocem had twelue sonnes, Zeinal, Abadin, Zeinal, Muamed, Bagner Muamed, Giafar Cadened, Ciafar Musa, Cazin Musa, Holi Macerat, Alle Muamed Taquin, Muamed Halmaquin, Alle Hacem Asquerin, Hacem Muamed Mahadin: This last, [d] the Persians say that hee is not yet dead, but that he shall come sitting on a Horse, to preach their Law to all Nations: beginning in Massadalle, where Ali his grandfather lieth buried. And therefore they haue there alway a Horse prepared ready, which in time of Diuine Seruice, on a certaine festiuall day, they bring with Lights burning to the Temple, in which Ali is buried, praying him to send his nephew quickly. That day is solemnly celebrated, with so great concourse of people, as a Portugal there present, said, he had neuer seen the like. The other eleuen brethren were buried in diuers places. To returne to Mutar; Abdimelec one of the following Calipha's, sent Ciafa against him, by whose ouerthrow that new Prophet wan new and greater estimation then before. But another Tyrant Abdala Zubir, arising amongst the Saracens, sent his brother Musub against Mutar, who slew Mutar, and was soone after slaine himselfe of Abdimelec, who recouered againe the Prouince of Persia. Abdimelec being dead, in the yeere seuen hundred and two and twenty, Gizid his sonne [e] succeeded, and another Gizid vsurped the Scepter in Persia, but was ouerthrowne by Masabner the Captaine of Abdimelecs sonne.

In the raigne of Maruan, Asmulin tooke on him the protection of Mutars Sect, affirming Ali to bee greater then Mahumet: hee was Prince of the Corasens in Persia, and by one Catabanus his counsaile incited the seruants, by force or treacherie to kill their Masters; and these being growne great by their Masters wealth, were diuided into two factions; the Caiſmi, and the Lamonites. Aſmulin Captayne of the Lamonites, deſtroyed the Caiſmi: and with his Lamonites, and Catabanus inuaded Perſia, and were there encountred by Iblinus the Lieutenant, with an Army of an hundred thouſand men; but the Lamonites, by the incouragement of Aſmuline and Catabanus, (whom they reckoned Holy men) diſcomfited him and his; and afterward encountred Maruan himſelfe with three hundred thouſand men, and made him to flee with foure thouſand into Egypt, where Salin the ſonne of Aſmulin ouerthrew him. Thus the Maruanian race being expelled (the reliques whereof ſettled themſelues in Feſſe and Spayne) Aſmulin, from whom the family of the Sophi deſcendeth, with Catabanus, reigned ouer the Saracens. But let the Reader obſerue what in the former Booke and ſecond Chapter we haue written of the diuiſions and ſchiſmes often happening in Perſia, following the relations of Mirkond a Perſian Authour; and therefore more to be obſerued then the more vncertayne relations of Chriſtian Authors.

By all which hath beene ſaid, appeareth a continuall difference betwixt the Perſians and other Saracens about their Religion; either (as ſome affirme) for that the Perſians preferred Ali before Mahumet, or for that (which is more likely) they accounted Ali, and not any of the other three (Eubocar, Oſmen, or Homar) to be the true ſucceſſor of Mahumet. The Sultans or Deputies of Perſia, which gouerned there vnder the Caliph, vſed that their Schiſmaticall fancy, as they ſaw occaſion to their owne ambitious deſignes, vnder colour of Religion. Some ſay that the Turkes obtayning Perſia, ſtripped the Chalifa of Bagadet of his temporalty, which (the ſword being decider of controuerſies in their Religion) was no new thing. Nor did it become old or continue long. For by the relations of Benian in Tudelenſis, and others, it appeareth that the Caliphas of Bagdet recouered their ſtate, till the Tartar diſpoſſeſſed both the Turke and them, as we haue already ſhewed out of Zachuthi, and Mirkond in our Hiſtory of the Saracens.

§. II.

Of the Tartars ruling in Perſia, which was the Fourth Dynaſtie.

WE are to ſpeake more fully of the Tartars afterwards: heere yet we are enforced by neceſſity of the Perſian ſtory to mention them. Mirkond writes, that Chingius Kan great founder of the greateſt Empire the Sunne hath ſeene, in the yeare 1219. inuaded Maurenahar (which is to the North of Perſia) and chaſed Mahomet Koarrazmcha into Karaſon. The Tartar put all he found to the ſword: the like he did at Balk; and thence ſent 30000. men after Mahomet, which ouer-tooke and ſlew him in Gueylon, and put the Countrey to fire and ſword. In Rey and the Countrey about, the Tartars are ſaid to haue ſlaine 600000. perſons (ſome ſay 1600000.) and in the Prouince of Nichabur 1150000. men, beſides women and children, committing the like ſpoyles during a whole yeare throughout all the Prouinces of Perſia. Almoſtancher Byla the Chalife forced them to retyre into Maurenahar. But Oktaykahon or Occoda Can his ſucceſſour both ſubdued Perſia, and rooted out the whole Family of Mahomet Koarrazmcha, Gelaladin his ſonne being vanquiſhed neere Multon in India, whither had retyred himſelfe. Mango Chan gaue Perſia to Vlah Kukhan or Halaon, who ouerthrew the Saracens, tooke Bagdet, ſtaying there in and in the Countries about 1600030. perſons. In the yeare 1261: he ſubdued Alep and Damas. Hee dyed in Perſia and gaue his Countries to his three ſonnes; to Habkaikahon (Haithon calls him Abaga) Hierak, Mazandaron and Karaſon: to Hyachemet, Aron or Armeni, and Aderbaion: to Taudon, Diarbek and Rabyah. To others other parts, as Bagadet to Atalmok Iauuny to repayre it, which he did. Habkaikahon the eldeſt raigned in Perſia ſeuenteene yeares, and then his fourth brother Nicudar Oglan (Haithon calls him Tangador) ſucceeded him, who made himſelfe a Mahumetan and called himſelfe Hamed. After whoſe ſhort raigne Argonkhon, Geniotukhon, Badukhan, Gazun a (he made Casbin his Imperiall Citie) Alyaptu, ſucceeded in order. This laſt made himſelfe Mahumetan, kept his Court at Tauris, and firſt brought in the cuſtome of tribute children, which he tooke from their parents (Chriſtians and Iewes) to frame to his ſeruice. Hee built Sultania. His ſonne and ſucceſſour Abuzayd ſpent his ſummer at Sultania, and his winter at Bagadet: after whoſe death, which happened A. H. 736. the Tartarians were diuided into Perſia, euery one making himſelfe King of that which he held, which continued till the time of Tamerlane: Thus haue I out of Mirkond related theſe Tartar-Perſian affaires. But if I adde ſomewhat out of Haithon, which liued in the middeſt of theſe times, let it not ſeeme tedious: firſt of a Paradiſe deſtroyed by the Tartar Haalon: and then of the ſucceſſors till his time, not mentioning ſome which ruled but a little while in Perſia.

In

In the North-East parts of Persia (which of this new Heresie they called Mulchet) there was an old man, named Aloadin, a Mahumetan (as all those parts then were) which had inclosed a goodly [b] Valley, situate betweene two Hills, and furnished it with all variety, which Nature and Art could yeeld, as Fruits, Pictures, rills of Milke, Wine, Honny, Water, Palaces, and beautifull Damosells richly attyred, and called it Paradise; to which was no passage, but by an impregnable Castell. And daily preaching the pleasures of this Paradise to the youths which he kept in his Court, sometimes he would minister a sleepie drinke to some of them, and then conueigh them thither; where being entertained with these pleasures foure or fiue dayes, they supposed [c] themselues rapt into Paradise. And then being againe cast into a trance by the said drinke, hee caused them to be carryed forth; and after would examine them of what they had scne, and by this delusion would make them resolute for any enterprise, which he should appoint them; as to murther any Prince his enemie. For they feared not death, in hope of their Mahumeticall Paradise. But this [d] Haolon or Vlan, after three yerees siege, destroyed him, and this his Fooles Paradise. Some tell [e] this of Aladeules, in the time of Zelim the first. Abaga succeeded him in the gouernement of these parts, Anno 1264. but not in the Christian Religion: Tangodor the next, became a Saracen, and called himselfe Mahomet, and at Tauris and other places destroyed the Churches of the Christians, as Haolon had done of the Saracens: he banished the Christians: and peruerted as many Tartars as he could to Mahumetisme. But Argonus the sonne of Abaga rebelled, and taking him, cut him asunder in the middle, succeeding in his place, Anno 1285. After him Regayto, whom the Tartars slew, placing in his stead Baydo a Christian, who forbad the preaching of Mahumetisme among the Tartars, and reedified the Churches of the Christians: Casan succeeded in his Dominion and Deuotion: and after his death Carbaganda, who in his childhood had beene baptized, and named Nicholas, but when his Christian Mother was dead, he became a Saracen.

Thus farre out of Haithonus; in which History appeareth the vicissitude of diuers Religions, sometime Tartarian, sometime Christian, sometime Mahumetan, as in the Princes who gouerned these Countries vnder the great Cham or Can of the Tartars: so also no doubt in a great part of the Countries themselues, which vsually are of the Kings Religion. This Carbaganda reigning about 1305. is the last Tartar Prince which ruled in the parts of Sytia: and in Persia the state was soone after diuided into many Soueraignties. For as their Religion, so also their Empire fayled; the Egyptian Soldans preuayling in Syria; the Ottoman Tukes, in Asia; and Gempsas, in Persia. This Gempsas was Soldan of the Parthians [f]: and about the yeere 1350. restored that Persian Kingdome to the Parthians [g]. Thus our Christian [h] Historiographers. Mirkond mentions him not. Likely it is, when all fell to sharing, he got his part. Of Tamerlan, Mirkond relates, that when Chingius sent Occoda into Maurenahar, Carachar Nuyon was made his first Visier, in which dignity hee and his posterity continued there, till Teymur or Tamurlan the fifth from him, with other great gouernments. Teymur being Visier and Captayne Generall to Sciorgat Meckhom, which raigned in Chagaty, and dyed A. 1370. was proclaymed King in his steed. He by his prosperous armes subdued Maurenahar, Turqueſtan, Koarrazm, Karason, Sistom, Industan, Hyerakhen, Parc, Kermon, Mazandaron, Aderbaion and Kusistam, Bagadet, Alep, Damasco: defeated Sultan Farache King of Egypt, and after tooke Baiazet the great Turke prisoner. He dyed, Anno 1405. His victories are by [i] others enlarged to Russia and China: and the great Chams state settled on him. Mirzab-Charok his fourth sonne succeeded him in the Empire: and after him, Anno 1447. his sonne Mirzah Oleghbek: but as after Alexander, so after Tamerlan, their hastie gotten Empire was much distracted among the great Souldiers his followers, which held great shares to themselues, making warre on their Masters sonnes. And one of the descendants of them. Abtelatife slew Oleghbek in the field, Anno 1450. and was slaine of his Souldiers fixe moneths after. Sultan Abusayd, grand-child to Miromcha, the third sonne of Tamerlan succeeded, slaying Abdula the brother of Abdelatife. But he also was slaine by Mirzah Tadigar Mahamed, one of Acembec or Vsuncassans partakers, who had before slaine Iooncha (Contarini and Barbaro, which were in Persia with Vsuncasan, call him Iausa, others, I know not why, Malaonchres, others Demir) after whose death Abusayd was called to the gouernment of Kermon, Hierak and Aderbaion, and being sollicited for peace by Asembeius, Acembec or Vsuncassan aforesaid, reiected it, and so lost himselfe, and left those parts of the Persian Empire to the Conqueror. But in Maurenahar Sultan Hamed his sonne succeeded 28. yeeres: and after him his nephew Babor, the last of Tamberlans bloud there raigning, Ichaybekan comming from Vsbek, Anno 1500. and dispossessing him. Yet did Babor possesse Gaznehen, and some part of India, till his death 1532: where his sonne Homayon succeeded him, and to him his sonne Gelaladin Akbar, commonly called Melabdim Echbar the Great Mogol, Father of him which now raigneth, of whom in the next booke. Tadigar that slew Abusayd was also of Tamerlans race, race, the ſonne of Mahamed, ſonne of Bayſangor, ſonne of Mirzah Charok. He by Acembecs helpe chaſed Ocem, another of Tamerlans poſterity, by Hamar Cheque his third ſonne, King in Karaſon and Strabat, out of thoſe parts into Faryab and Mayman neere Balk, whence hee ſuddenly returning with a ſmall force, by aduantage of Yadigar or Hiadigar his negligence, ſlew him, and recouered his Realme. He dyed, Anno 1506. Two of his ſonnes ſucceeded him, Bahady and Muſafar, whom Chaybec Vsbek chaſed out of their Kingdome. Bahady fled to Iſmael Sophy who gaue him the lands of Chambe Gazon in Tauris, and tenne Serafs [i] of gold by the day; thence he was after carryed priſoner by the Turke to Conſtantinople, where hee dyed.

[i] A Seraf is eight ſhillings.

Beſides theſe of the poſterity of Tamerlan there were other Princes in Perſia, and the parts adioyning, as thoſe of the factions of Blacke Sheepe, and White Sheepe. Of the former was Kara Iſſuf, which conquered Tauris, Sultania, Casbin, and the countries of Seruan and Diarbech: but dying was ſpoyled to his ſhirt of his Souldiers: yea, they cut off his eares for his iewells, and left him in the open field. Charrok held long warres with Scander, and Iooncha his ſonnes, the latter of which after many conqueſts was ſlaine by Acembec, and Acen Aly his ſonne and ſucceſſour: and thus the White Sheepe faction preuayled, Ozun Acembec or Vſun-Caſan the head thereof, of the Tarcoman Nation, heire of Diarbech, and Lord of many Prouinces which hee conquered (as before is noted) but defeated by Mahumet the great Turke, He dyed Anno, 1471. His ſonne Calil ſucceeded, who was ſlaine by his brother Iacob or Yacub, whoſe wife bearing diſhoneſt affection to one of the Court, ſought by the murther of her husband to aduance this Courtier to her husbands bed and Empire. And [k] hauing conueyed venome into a golden cup, preſents her husband the ſame to drinke, who ſomewhat ſuſpecting her, cauſed her to begin; himſelfe and his ſonne following her both in dinking and dying. And thus was Perſia, by the wickedneſſe of one woman, made the Stage of ciuill warres, whiles the chiefe Nobles ſought each to poſſeſſe himſelfe of the State, which at laſt after fiue or ſixe yeeres war, befell to [l] Alumut or Elnan-beg, then being but fourteene yeere old, who was ſlaine by Iſmael in the yeere 1499.

[k] Viaggio di mercante apud Ramuſ.

[l] Mirkond reckons of this family Kings after Iacob, Bayſangor, Roſtan, Hagmet, Aluuan and Morat.

And thus yee haue had the ſucceſſion of the Perſian Kings in the firſt and ſecond Dynaſtie: of the Saracens you heard in the former Booke: next after whom, the Tartars and theſe here mentioned, till Iſmael obtayned the ſtate, whoſe poſterity ſtill hold it.

Beniamin Tudelenſis telleth that Senigar then King of Perſia, had two and fortie Kingdomes ſubiect to him, and that his Dominion extended foure moneths iourney, and ſpeaketh as though hee were not ſubiect to the Caliph in his temporalities: Maſter Polo reckons eight Kingdomes of Perſia, Caſibin, Curdiſtan, Lor, Suoliſtan, Spaan, Siras, Soncaia, Timocaim; [m] not reckoning Hirak, the chiefe Citie wherof was Tauris, and diuers other Countries, now, and before his time ſubiect to the Perſian. And by moſt Hiſtorians it appeareth that Perſia had before the dayes of Tangrolopix, and till the Tartars conqueſt, Sultans, which yeelded ſmall ſubiection to the Chaliphs.

[m] In this diſcourſe wee haue reckoned many other Regions, in regard of ſubiection, Perſian.

§. III.

Of Iſmael Sofi, firſt founder of the preſent Perſian Empire, or fifth Dynaſtie.

THe Hiſtorie of Iſmael, becauſe it giueth much light both into the State and Religion of Perſia, is more fully to be reported. After that Muſtacen Mumbila, or Almuſtacenbila Abdula, the Caliph of Bagdet, had bin by the Tartars done to death in the yeere after Haithonus account 1258. about the yeere 1369. there aroſe in Perſia [n] a Nobleman called Sophi, Lord of the Citie Ardouil, reporting himſelfe to be of the bloud of Alle or Hali, deſcended from Muſa Cazin, or Cerſin, one of the twelue ſonnes (as is ſaid) of Hocem, thirteene deſcents diſtant. This Sophi, or (as our Tarik Mirkond aforeſaid calls him Cheque Safy) had iſſue Cheque Mucha, the father of Cheque Ali, who begate Cheque Ebrahem, and he Sultan Iuneyd, father of Cheque Aydar, who begate Iſmael. Theſe continued their Hali-holies. Our Authors mention none from Sophi to Iuneyd, whom they make his ſonne, calling him Guinne, otherwiſe written, Guini, Guine, and Giunet. [o] Minadoi ſaith, That Sexchiuni, or more diſtinctly, Siec Giunet, was Authour of the Perſian ſect, who vnder the name of [p] So, and of Siec (that is, of a wiſe man, and an Author of Religion) or rather vnder the pretence of holineſſe, began to perſwade the people, that the three firſt ſucceſſors of Mahomet were vſurpers, onely Ali ought to be named lawfull ſucceſſor, and ought to be called vpon in their prayers, and by all meanes to be honoured. From this time forward the Sepulchre of Ali and his ſonnes in Caſe grew in great credit, and was viſited euery yeere after the ſame ſame ſort that the Turks viſit the Sepulchre of the other three: and the Kings of Perſia vſed there to bee crowned, and girt with their ſword, and their great Calife there kept his reſidence. Becauſe this Cafe was neere Babylon, hence grew the common error, that theſe things were done at Babylon or Bagdet. Iouius alſo is deceiued, where he maketh Arduelle or Aidere, author of the Perſian faction. Soſi is by Minadoi deriued of Soſiti, a people ſubdued by Alexander: but Scaliger more fitly Tzophi, which in Arabike ſignifieth a man of pure Religion. In this reſpect there is no leſſe contention betweene theſe & other Muhammedans, then betweene the Samaritans and the Iewes: ſo that the Perſians are a kinde of Catharists or Puritans in their impure Muhammedrie. Claudet Duret mentioneth another Etymologie, that Sophi ſignifieth Wooll, and that this profeſſion in token of humilitie, wearing nothing on their heads more precious then wooll, were ſo called. But the former deriuation is more probable. Nic. Nicolai in his third Booke hath alſo that woollen deriuation: and Geffrey Ducket ſaith, that Sophi ſignifieth a Begger, and that the King is not there in Perſia ſo called, but Shaugh; which agreeth with their report, which ſay that Iſmael renewed or continued the name Soſi or Soſiti: but his ſucceſſors leauing that, and the name of Siec, haue retayned onely the Title of Saha, which ſome write Shaugh, ſome Xa, a Royall title communicated by the head of this ſuperſtition to thoſe Kings which participate with them therein. Ioſeph Scaliger [p] ſaith, that Sa or Scha is the ſame with Monſieur among the French, and Don among the Spaniards. The Iewes and Arabians write it שאה and the Grecians σῶχ. It is ſometimes ſet before the name, as in the preſent King Scha Habas; ſometime comes after, as Melixa for Melic-ſcha. Barrius [q] begins this pedigree at the father of Giunet, or Guine (ſo he calls him) and not as Minadoi, with Guinet himſelfe. He addeth, That for the Enſigne, Character, or Cogniſance of his Sect, he ordayned, that in the midſt of their Turbant (which they weare with many folds) there ſhould ariſe a ſharpe top, in manner of a Pyramis, diuided into twelue parts (in remembrance of Ali his twelue ſonnes) from the top to the bottome. They vſed the colour Red on their heads (ſaith Minadoi) by ordinance of Arduelle, and therefore were called Cheſelbas, that is, Red-heads; ſome write it Cuſelbas. Sophi, as Mirkond affirmeth, was holden in ſuch reputation of holineſſe by Tamerlane, that he came to viſit him as a Saint; and at his requeſt, ſet free 30000. ſlaues, which he had taken in the warres againſt Baiazet, to whom Cheque Sophi gaue apparell and other neceſſaries, and ſent them home to their houſes: whereby hee wan great fame and affection. Barrius and others attribute this to Guine, and ſay that theſe ſlaues became his diſciples firſt, and after Souldiers to his ſonne Aidar againſt the Chriſtian Georgians.

This [r] Aider Erdebil (or after Iouius, Harduelles) forſaking (as ſome ſay) the world, led a ſtreight life in continency and auſterity, and was therefore admired as a Prophet, and reſorted to, out of all parts of Armenia and Perſia, comming to Tauris to ſee him: Hee inueighed againſt the common opinion concerning Mahomets ſucceſſors, as Guine and Sophi had done, ſhutting vp heauen to all, ſauing Hali his followers. For ſo the Perſians vſe to ſay in their prayers; Curſed be Ebubeker, Omar, and Oſman: GOD be fauourable to Hali, and well pleaſed with him. Vſuncaſſan moued with his fame, gaue him in mariage his daughter Martha begot of the Chriſtian Lady Deſpina, daughter of Calo Ioannes Emperour of Trapezond; both of them by this alliance ſtrengthning themſelues againſt the Turke. Aidar had by this Martha, Iſmael, whom ſhe trayned vp in the principles of Chriſtian Religion. Iacob ſucceſſor of Vſuncaſſan, iealous of the multitude of Aidars diſciples, and the greatneſſe of his fame, cauſed him to be ſecretly murthered; perſecuting all his profeſſed followers with fire and ſword. Iſmael then a child, fled into Hyrcania to one Pyrchales, a friend of his fathers, who afterwards ayded him to the recouering of his patrimonie. Boterus ſaith, that Iacob, after the murther of Aidar, committed his two ſonnes, Iſmael and Solyman, to Amanzar (a Captayne of his) to be conueyed to Zalga, a ſtrong mountaynie place: but he brought them vp liberally with his owne children, and in his laſt ſickneſſe, gaue them horſe and two hundred Ducats, with aduice to repaire to their mother; where taking vpon him the protection of the ſect of Hali, and the reuenge of his fathers death, his enterpriſes ſucceeded proſperouſly. [f] Giouan Maria Angiolelio ſaith, that Iacob being poyſoned 1485. the Signiorie was poſſeſſed by a kinſeman of Iacobs called Iulauer, after whoſe three yeeres raigne ſucceeded Bayſingir two yeeres; after Ruſtan ſeuen yeares, who ſent Solimanbec [t] againſt Sechaidar the father of Iſmael, who made challenge to the State in right of his wife the daughter of Vſuncaſſan, who ſlew him in the field. Ruſtan would alſo haue killed the mother and her ſonnes, had not entreatie of his Nobles preuented it. He committed them to ward in the Iland of the Armenians in the Lake Aſtumar; whither he ſent for them againe after three yeeres, but they for feare fled to Ardouil, & there liued cloſely for a time. Ruſtan was ſlaine by Agmat through his mothers procurement, who loued that Agmat, who abode Sultan fiue months, & was ſlaine by Ruſtans Souldiers. A certaine x Merchant (who abode a long time in Tauris, and trauelled thorow the most part of Persia, skilfull of the Turkish, Persian, and Arabian languages, either seeing himselfe, or learning of them which did see, in the time of Ismael) relates this history somewhat otherwise, whom, as learning of the Persians themselues the Persian affaires, we may reckon worthy to be followed. Hee saith, that this Sechaidar in Ardouil was this head of thy Sophian Sect, and had three sonnes and three daughters by the daughter of Vsuncassan. He was a zealous enemie against the Christians, oftentimes with his followers repayring into Circassia, doing the people much damage, which when in the daies of Sultan Alumut hee attempted as before times, he was by Alumuts order forbidden at Darbent further passage: but seeking to make way by force, he was by the forces of Alumut taken, and his head, on the top of a Lance, presented to Alumut, and by his command, giuen to the Dogges to bee eaten; the cause why the Sophians are such enemies vnto Dogs, killing all they finde. This newes comming to Ardouil, his three sonnes fled, one into Natolia, another to Aleppo, Ismael the third to an Iland in the Lake of Van, in which is a Citie of Christian Armenians, where he abode foure yeeres in the house of an Armenian Priest, being then about thirteene yeeres old, who vsed him courteously, and instructed him in the rudiments of Christian Religion. A yeere after he went from Arminig to Chillan, where he kept with a Gold-smith his fathers friend. In this time hee had intelligence, by mutuall writing, with his friends at Ardouil: and with this Gold-smith hauing gathered together eighteene or twentie men of their Sect secretly to take a strong Castle, called Maumutaga, and hidden in ambush two hundred horse-men of his friends in Ardouill, suddenly slaying the Guard, and possessing himselfe of the Castle, he entred a Towne not farre from the Castle, killing the Inhabitants, and carrying the spoile to the Castle. This Castle was verie rich, because it was a principall Hauen of the Caspian Sea; and so strong, that when Alumut had newes hereof, hee was disswaded from sending any power thither to besiege him. Two daies iourney from hence is Sumachi: which with his power, now encreased, he also took, and diuided the spoiles euery where to his Souldiers, which with fame of this liberalitie came from all parts vnto him. He sent also into Hiberia, three or four daies iourny from thence, which was then gouerned by seuen great Lords, three of which, Alexander Sbec, Gorgurambec, and Mirzambec, with many promises of present spoiles and future exemptions from tribute, hee won to his side, receiuing from each of them three thousand horse, so that he was now growne fifteene or sixteene thousand strong. Alumut with thirtie thousand valiant Souldiers went to meet him between Tauris & Sumachia, and hauing passed a great Riuer, ouer which were two Bridges, he presently caused them to be broken: Ismael arriuing there the next day, with great diligence found a passage thorow the streame, and with his whole forces, in front, in the breake of the day, assailed Alumut his armie, little suspecting such a good morrow, that Alumut with a few companions hardly escaped. The pauilions, horses, and other bootie, Ismael bestowed on his Souldiers: and then hasted to Tauris, where entring without resistance, hee made great slaughter, killing all the race of Iacob, opening his Sepulchre, and the Graues of other Noble-men, which had been at the battaile of Darbent against his father, and burning their bones; three hundred harlots he caused to be cut asunder in the middle: hee killed all the Dogs in Tauris, and because his mother had married to one of those Nobles, which were in the battaile of Darbent, he caused her head to bee stricken off in his presence. In this while many Townes, Cities, Castles, and Lords submitted themselues to him, and weare his red-coloured Turbant: but the Castle Alangiachana (whereto were subiect eighteene Villages of Christians, which vsed yeerely to send to Rome two men from the Patriarch to the Pope, of whose faith they were, speaking Armenian, hauing some bookes, but quite lost the vse of the Italian language) this Castle (I say) held out for Alumut vntill his death.

While Ismael was Sultan in Tauris, the Sultan in Bagadet Murat Can son of Iacob, with an army of 30000. marched against him, and in a plaine, meeting with Ismael was there ouerthrown not seuentie persons escaping to Bagadet with Murat Can: the place bearing witnes of the slaughter, buried vnder many new hils of bones. All these things were done An. 1499. And while I was in Tauris, many came from Natolia, Caramania, and Turkie to serue him; of whom they were graciously entertained. An. 1507. our Author being then in Malacia, saw with his eyes, the Sultan Alumut conueyed prisoner by Amirbec, who with foure thousand men going from Mosull (neere to the sometime-Niniue) to Amit, where the Sultan kept, with promise and profession of his succour, being admitted the Citie, tooke him, and cast a chaine about his necke, whose head Ismael smote off with his owne hands. He was presented to him by Amirbec in the Country of Aladuli against whom Ismael was now warring: where taking the Citie Cartibirt, he cut off the head of Becarbec sonne of Aladuli, Lord thereof, with his owne hands. From thence returning to Tauris, hee had almost done as much to his two brethren, whom hee had left Gouernours in his absence, for transgressing their Commission: but with much intreatie of his Lords, spared their liues, yet confined them to Ardouill, not to depart from thence. The next yeere hee pursued Murat Can, who was come to Syras, a Citie not inferiour to Cairo in Egypt, with thirtie sixe thousand men, but male-content, and therefore many of them flying vnto Ismael. Whereupon Murat Can sent two Embassadours with fiue hundred followers, with offer of Vassallage vnto him. Ismael cut them all in pieces, saying, That if Murat Can would be his Vassall, hee should come in person, not by Embassage. Murat Can had closely sent Spies to obserue the sequell of his businesse, and being hereof by them aduertised, fled: For many of his Nobles had alreadie put on the red Turbant, of whom he feared to bee taken, as Alumut had beene; and therefore with three thousand of his most faithful he fled vnto Aleppo: but the Soldan of Cairo not admitting him, he went to Aladule, who entertained him honourably, and gaue him his daughter to wife.

q Ispahan. Ismael, after great slaughter in Siras and Bagadet, was forced to returne to q Spaan with his Armie. For Ieselbas the Tartar had taken all the Countrie of Corasan, and the great Citie of Eri, which is in compasse betwixt fortie and fiftie miles, well peopled, and full of Merchandize; He had taken also Straua, Amixandaran, and Sari, on the Caspian shoare; and with intent to beguile Ismael, desired leaue to passe thorow his Countrey to Mecca on Pilgrimage. Ismael with deniall, and other sharpe words repelled his suit, and abode a yeere in Spaan, to withstand his enterprises. After he returned to Tauris, where were great triumphs solemnized in his honour. This Sophi is so loued and feared (saith this Merchant) that they hold him as a God, especially his Souldiers: of which some goe into the warres without Armour, holding it sufficient, that Ismael will succour them: others, because they content themselues to die for Ismael, goe into battaile with naked breast, crying, Schiak, Schiak, that is, God, God. And they forget the name of God, alway naming Ismael: they hold, That hee shall not die, but liue euer. And where other Mosulmans say, La ylla yllala, Mahamet resullalla, the Persians say, La ylla yllala, Ismael vellilalla, reputing him a God and a Prophet. I haue learned, that Ismael is not contented to be called or worshipped as god. Their custome is to weare red Bonnets, with a certaine thing like a girdle, large below, and straighter vpwards, made with twelue folds, a finger thick, signifying the twelue Sacraments of their sect, or those twelue brethren, nephewes of Ali. Ismael was of faire countenance, of reasonable stature, thicke and large in the shoulders, shauen all but the mustachees; left-handed, stronger then any of his Nobles, but giuen to Sodomie. At his second comming to Tauris, hee caused to take twelue of the fairest boyes in the City to serue his lust, and after gaue to each of his Nobles one for the like purpose; & before tooke ten of the best mens sonnes for the same intent.

Osorius de Reb. Emman. lib. 10. 1. Bot. Ben. Thus farre haue wee had commerce with this nameless Persian Merchant in Ramusius his shop, who sometime attended on his Court and Campe. Others adde hereunto, that he sent Embassadours to all the Mahumetan Princes of the East, to receiue that Red-hat Ensigne, together with his Sect; as did his sonne Tammas after him, when Nizzamulucco onely accepted thereof. But it is the common opinion, that the greatest part of the Mahumetans in Soria and of Asia Minor are secretly of that Sect. Ismael after this warred, and wonne, vpon the Zagatai Tartars, and other adiacent Nations, that hee left vnto his successours a verie great estate, reaching from the Caspian Sea to the Persian, and betweene the Lake Iocco and Tygris, the Riuer Abbiam, and the Kingdome of Cambaya, more then twentie Degrees from East to West, and eighteene from North to South. Hee ordained a new Lyturgie, and forme of Praier differing from the ancient. Such was his authoritie, that they would sweare, By the Head of Ismael, and blesse his name, saying, Ismael grant thee thy desire. Vpon his Coyne, on the one side, was written, La illahe illalahu Muhamedun resulalallahe: And on the other, Ismaill halife lullahe, that is, Ismael the Vicar of GOD. The Iewes, at the first, had this Ismael in such admiration, that they foolishly reckoned Ismael to be their promised Messias, gratulating themselues in this conceit, thorowout the most part of Europe, celebrating festiuall Solemnities, with mutuall Presents, in testimonie of their ioy; which yet was soone dashed, none hating the Iewes more then Ismael. He lieth buried at Ardouil, in a faire Meskit, with a sumptuous Sepulchre made by himselfe in his life time; where is a faire Stone Hospitall erected by him for strangers, allowing to all trauellers three daies reliefe for horse and man freely. Ardouil is in latitude thirtie eight degrees.

The life of Ismael had beene answerable to the bloudie presages in his ominous birth; for he came forth of his mothers wombe with both his hands shut, and full of bloud: for which cause his father would not haue brought him vp, but commanded him to be slaine: but they which carried him away, moued with compassion, secretly nourished him three yeeres, and after presented him to his father, who then acknowledged and receiued him with loue and kindnesse: for this his bloudie and warre-like spirit dwelt in a louely and amiable bodie, adorned with all the Ensignes of beautie. Hee died Anno 1524.

Of SHAVGH TAMAS the Persian troubles after his death.

SHIACH THECMES, or Shaugh Tamas, succeeded, and reigned aboue fiftie yeeres. Hee liued deuoutly, and yet (for their Law reconcileth both) verie voluptuously, inheriting his fathers Throne, but a not his valour, and spending the greatest part of his time amongst his women. So zealous hee was of their superstition, that when M. Ienkinson came to his Court with the Queenes Letters, to treat with him of Traffique and Commerce for our English Merchants, before his feet touched the ground, a paire of the Sophies owne Shooes or Basmackes (such as himselfe vsed to weare, when he arose in the night to pray) were put vpon his feet, lest their holy ground should be polluted with Christian steps. And being admitted into his presence, and asked of his Religion, whether he were a Gower, that is, an Vnbeleeuer, or a Muselman, (so they call them of their owne profession) hauing answered, that he was a Christian, beleeuing Christ to be the greatest Prophet: Oh thou vnbeleeuer (said hee) wee haue no need to haue friendship with the vnbeleeuers, and so willed him to depart: which he did, and after him followed a man with a Basanet of Sand: sifting all the the way that he had gone within the said Palace, euen from the Sophies sight vnto the Court-gate.

In his time Solyman (as our Turkish Relations before is shewed) much endamaged the Persians, and tooke Babylonia, Tauris, and other parts of their dominions: yet did Tamas recouer some part thereof againe, and draue Solyman out of Tauris, (or Ecbatana, as Minadoi interpreteth, and by a composition, caused him to raze the Fort of Chars, erected by the Turkes in his frontiers. Hee dyed the eleuenth of May, 1576. leauing behind him eleuen children: Mahamet the eldest, who had liued a while in Heri (sometime called Aria) and after in Siras (anciently named Persepolis) his second sonne was Ismahel, whom for his fierceneſſe his father had confined to the Caſtle Cahaca: the third, Aidere; the reſt, Mamut, Solimana, Muſtaffa, Emanguli, Alichan, Amet, Abrahim, and Iſmahel the younger. Hee appointed his ſecond ſonne Iſmahel his ſucceſſour, eſteeming him more worthy then Mahomet Codabanda (this ſurname was giuen him for his diſeaſed eyes [b]) as being giuen to a ſtudious and quiet life, and contenting himſelfe, that Abas Mirize (which now reigneth) was confirmed in the Citie of Heri, and honoured with the title of the Viſier of that Countrey.

Periaconcona, the daughter of Tamas, and elder then any of the brethren, being in Commiſſion with other Counſellors of State to ſee her fathers Will executed, whiles the Poſts ranne with aduertiſements to Iſmahel, was attempted by Aidere with earneſt ſolicitation for the Crowne: whoſe ambitious deſire ſhe ſo farre ſatisfied, as that ſhee cauſed him to bee inueſted in Regall apparell, and ſettled in the great Gallerie, attending the acclamation of the people; being publikely inſtalled, as though hee were elected King. But meane while ſhee ſet ſure guards of men, deuoted to Iſmahel, at the gates of the Palace; thus purpoſing to entertaine him (with dreames of dangerous honours) till Iſmahel arriued at Casbin. But whiles hee (ſuſpecting the deceit) ſought to flee, hee left his head behinde in the hand of Sahamal his vncle, which he caſt, all-bloudie, in the middeſt of his conſpiring partakers. Iſmael ſoone after came, and receiued with publike applauſe the deſired Soueraigntie: and as he had before addicted himſelfe to the ſtudie of the Turkiſh Law; (enough, if it had beene knowne, to haue barred his ſucceſſion) ſo now, after the Turkiſh manner, he founded his Throne (a foundation to ſlipperie to ſtand) in bloud, cauſing the heads of his eight younger brethren to be cut off, together with all ſuch as were neere them in bloud or affinitie, and all the fauourites of the late ſlaine Aidere. Thus is Casbin dyed in the bloud of her hopefull Gallants, and entertaines her beholders eyes with ſtreames of bloud running from the ſlaine, which cauſe another ſtreame of teares to iſſue from their liuing friends; who filling the ayre with mournefull complaints (which returning anſwere by ecchoes, ſeemed to ſympathize their griefe) and in compaſſion of thoſe dying bodies, then gaſping their fatall breaths, imitating (with true affection, and not affected imitation) the ſame in deepe and broken ſighes: viewing alſo their owne dangers in the preſent ruine of their neereſt and deereſt, ſome-time allies & acquaintance: toſſed with this variety of turbulent paſſions, conceiue, in this confuſion of thoughts (that which is truely the daughter and mother alſo of confuſion) Trecherous Diſloyaltie to the Author of theſe their ſorrowes. Iſmael poſting on to his owne deſtruction, had now forbidden the douotions of Aly the Perſian Prophet, and enioyned the Turkiſh Rites of Abubachar, and other the followers of Mahomet, by impriſoning, rayling, pulling out the eyes, and killing Ali his obſeruants, eſtabliſhing his Decree, not ſparing, in this perſecution, to torment the tender Ladies (ſome of them of his owne bloud) nor reuerencing age or profeſſion, depriuing euen the Califfe of Casbin (the eye of their blindneſſe) of both his eyes, becauſe he would not ſee equitie in this noueltie; and purpoſing (as the Fame went) to goe to Bagdat, there to receiue the Crowne from him whomſoeuer hee ſhould find the ſucceſſour of the great Califfe. In the middeſt of his cruelties hee was (with like crueltie) murthered by Perſaconcona. The Executor of her fathers Will is thus made an Executioner of her fathers ſonne, hauing brought in the conſpirators, apparelled in womens weeds, to ſtrangle him among his Paramours. This was done the twentie foure of Nouember, 1577. after he had reigned one yeere, ſeuen moneths, and ſixe dayes.

Of MAHOMET CODABANDA, and his ſonnes ABAS.

MAHAMET CODABANDA thought it now time for him to looke to his right, which by meanes of Mirize Salmas, the chiefe of the Sultans, hee obtained. This Sultan preſented him with the head of that Virago Periaconcona, vpon the top of a Launce, with the diſheuelled haire, gaſtly lookes, and bloudy impreſſions, yeelding an vncouth (though not vndeſerued) ſpectacle to the beholders: which (if like the Snakie ſcalpe of Meduſa it did not transforme them into ſtones; yet, as if it had been the Banner of Megera) ſeemed to diſplay new quarrels, kindling inward hatreds, tumultuous ſeditions, and ciuill broyles, which expoſed them to Amuraths forces, who thought it fit time for him to fiſh with his Turkiſh nets in this troubled Perſian ſtreame. Of theſe warres is alreadie ſpoken. [c] Much loſſe did the Perſians by this meanes ſuſtaine, and much more had followed, had not Emir Hamze, Mahomets eldeſt ſonne, with his valorous attempts, ſtopped the Turkiſh proceedings, and like the Easterne Sun, with his greater brightnesse dispersed those weaker beames of The Moone Standards of proud OTTOMAN.

But soone was this Sunne eclipsed, not by the Moones interposition (for that is naturall, if wee vnderstand it of the heauenly; and ordinary, if of the earthly and Turkish) but by extraordinarie and vnnaturall procurement (as was thought) of his ambitious brother Abas, or (of others suspected) of his father; effected by a treacherous Eunuch that guarded him, which suddenly strucke him thorow the bodie and slew him. Abas his brother, by solemne oath cleared himselfe of this odious imputation. And yet hee is no lesse suspected of a more monstrous and vnnaturall treacherie against his owne father, who is thought [d] to bee poysoned by his meanes, that by these bloudie steps hee might ascend to that Throne, which now he enioyeth. But (all this notwithstanding) he hath since so subtilly handled the matter, that hee is both beloued of his owne, and feared of his enemie: his subiects sweare and blesse in his name. [e] He hath recouered from the Turke both Tauris, and other Regions of Seruania and Georgia, which the Turke had before taken from the Persians. Hee was reported also to haue taken Bagdat, but (it seemeth) not truly. Ianſonius [f] in his Newes 1610. reporteth of diuers victories obtained by him against the Turke (which caused publike Fasts and supplications to be appointed at Constantinople:) and of the Persian Embassage, with rich Presents and holy Reliques to the Emperour at Prage. Gotardus Arthus likewise in his [g] Gallobelgicus, relateth of Abas his Embassage to Constantinople about a Peace: but when his Embassadour returned with Articles, whereby the Persian was bound, vnder shew of gifts, to pay an annuall tribute to the Sultan, he therefore put him to death; putting out the eyes also, and cutting off the hands of the Turkish Embassador which was sent with him. Of Bagdat and old Babylon wee haue spoken elsewhere: let this be here added out of Balbi, [h] that trauelling from Felugia to Bagdat, which hee reckoneth a dayes iourney and a halfe, one whole dayes iourney thereof, was by one side of the ruines of Babylon, which hee left on the left hand.

As for Tauris, in the yeere 1514. Selim tooke it (as some say) on composition, which hee brake, and carried thence three thousand of the best Artificers to Constantinople. Anno 1535. Solyman gaue it for a prey to his souldiers; Anno 1515. Osman spoiled it with vncouth and inhumane cruelties; whatsoeuer the insulting Conqueror, in the vtmost extent of lawlesse lust, could inflict, or the afflicted condition of the conquered could in the most deiected state of miserie sustaine, was there executed. Abas in recouerie hereof vsed the Canon, an Instrument which before they had, to their owne losse, scorned. The Prince is (saith our [i] Author) excellent both of composition of bodie, and disposition of minde, of indifferent stature, sterne countenance, piercing eyes, swart colour, his mustachees on the vpper lip long, his beard cut close to the chin. Hee delights in Hunting and Hawking, Running, Leaping, and trying of Masteries; He is an excellent Horse-man and Archer. In the morning he vseth to visit his stables of great Horses, and hauing there spent most of the forenoone, he returnes to his Palace: About three of the clocke in the after-noone, he goeth to the At-Maiden, which is the high street of Hispaan, the Citie of his residence, round about which are scaffolds for the people, to sit and behold the King and his Nobles at their Exercises of Shooting, Running, Playing at Tennis, &c. all on horse-backe. In this place very often, in his owne person, he heareth causes, and pronounceth sentence, executing Iustice seuerely.

Now that we may mention some of the chiefe Cities of Persia (vnder which name I here comprehend, as vsually in this Historie, their [k] Dominion, not as it is measured by the Pens of Geographers, but by the Swords of their Princes.) In Sumachia, Master Cartwright saith, They saw the ruines of a cruell spectacle, which was a Turret erected with Free-stone and Flints, in the midst whereof were placed the heads of all the Nobilitie and Gentrie of the Countrie. A mile from this Towne was a Nunnerie, wherein was buried the bodie of Amaleke Canna, the Kings daughter, who slew her selfe with a knife, for that her father would haue forced her to marrie a Tartarian Prince: the Virgins of the Countrey resort hither once a yeere to lament her death. Sechi is foure dayes iourney thence, not farre from which is Eres, which, because they yeelded to the Turke, were by Emir-Hamze vtterly destroyed, man, woman, and child. Arasse is the chiefe Citie of Merchandize in all Seruania, especially for raw Silks. Tauris hath out-liued many deaths, and is very rich by reason of continuall Trade, nourishing almost two hundred thousand people within her compasse; for wals, it hath [l] not. This was sometime the Seat-Royall, and after that, Casbin, which is situate in a fertile Plaine, foure dayes iourney in length, wherein are two thousand Villages. The buildings are of Bricke dried in the Sunne, as in Persia is most vsuall: The At-Maidan, or chiefe street, is foure square, almost a mile in circuit. Neere to it is Ardouil, of chiefe note for beginning of the Sophian Superstition. Geilan is foure dayes iourney from Casbin, and stands neere to the Caspian Sea. Neere to Bachu is a Fountaine of black oyle; which serueth all the Countrey to burne in their houſes. Caſſan is well ſeated, and rich in Marchandize, but ſubiect to heat more then other parts of Perſia. No perſon is there permitted to be idle. Hiſpaan is thought by ſome to be Hecatompolis: the walls are a dayes iourney about on horſe-backe; before the greateſt, now the Royall Citie of the Perſians. It hath a ſtrong Fort, two Seraglio's, the walls whereof gliſter with red Marble and Parget of diuers colours, paued all with Moſaique worke, all things elſe combining Maieſtie and Louelineſſe, Magnificence and Beautie. The inhabitants, as did the ancient Parthians (whoſe chiefe Citie it ſometime hath beene) buy, ſell, talke, and performe all their publike and priuate affaires on horſe-backe: the Gentlemen neuer goe on foot. An Appendix touching the preſent Perſian King, out of Sir ANTHONY SHERLEY.

HAuing thus followed the currant of Authors in theſe Relations of Perſia: there hath ſince the firſt Edition been publiſhed the Trauels of Sir Anthony Sherley into theſe parts (with Sir Robert Sherley his brother) penned by himſelfe: with ſome extracts whereof to furniſh this Chapter (alreadie tedious) as with a ſecond ſeruice after a full ſtomacke, will (I hope) renue appetite, with the varietie (ſo farre fetched and ſo deare bought) howſoeuer before cloyed with fulnes: To let paſſe therefore thoſe worthy Brethren (Worthies indeed in this kinde, beyond the reach & worth of my blurring praiſe, and eclipſing commendations) and to come to their Trauell and obſeruation. Hauing paſſed not without manifold dangers to Aleppo: and thence to Birr, and ſo downe Euphrates: by the way they aduentured to ſee the Campe of Aboriſci King of the Arabs, inhabiting the deſarts of Meſopotamia, a poore [n] King with ten or twelue thouſand beggerly ſubiects, liuing in tents of blacke haire-cloth, well gouerned. They came to Bagdat, which is wholly on the other ſide of Tygris, except one Suburb in the Peninſula, to which men paſſe by a bridge of boats, euery night diſſolued for feare of the Arabs, or ſtormes: whence, through the bountie of an Italian Merchant, Sir Victorio Speciero, they eſcaped (for they were not vnſuſpected) with a Carauan of Perſian Pilgrims wich came from Mecca. Thirtie dayes they were on the way to the Confines: and fifteene from thence to Casbin, where they ſtaied a moneth attending the Kings arriuall; being in the meane time well vſed, vpon conceit that the King would like well of their comming: the people otherwiſe are ill in themſelues, and onely good by example of their King, and ſtrict obedience to him. For of the ancient Perſians there are few, theſe being the poſteritie of thoſe which haue been here ſeated by the tranſplantations of Tamerlane and Iſmael (not to mention any, more ancient) out of [o] other Countries.

n This King was a Saniack of the Turke, whereas they on the Weſt-ſide of the Riuer in an huge extent, and infinite numbers roue, and rob all: the Turke keeping a-againſt them fifteene hundred Ianizaries at Damaſco, and twelue thouſand at Cairo. Old Babylon is North from Bagdat about fiue and awentie miles. Io. Newbury.

o Courdics, Tartars, Turkmans, &c.

The King himſelfe, by our Authors Relation, in his vertues and gouernment, is, as if ſome Philoſopher ſhould diſcourſe of what ſhould be, rather then an Hiſtorian declare what is: as did Xenophon [p] ſometimes in his Cyrus: Of thoſe imputations of Paricide and ambition, not a word. His order of attaining the Crowne, is thus reported.

The Perſian cuſtome, being that onely the elder brother ruleth, the reſt are made blinde by burning baſons, hauing otherwiſe all contentments fit for Princes children: when Xa-Tamas was dead without iſſue, his brother (ſo hee calleth him, contrary to our former relations, and to that of Mirkond the Perſian, which I more maruell at) Xa-Codabent, was called, Blind to the Kingdome. He had iſſue Sultan Hamzire Mirza the eldeſt, who ſucceeded him, and this preſent King called Abas. The eldeſt in his fathers life time adminiſtred all things, which blindneſſe made the other vnfit for: but Abas at twelue yeeres of age, vnder the gouernment of Tutors held the Prouince of Yaſde, where the loue of the people made him ſuſpected to his Father, who ſecretly reſolued his death. Abas by his friends hearing it, fled to Coraſan a Tartar people on the Eaſt of Perſia, both by their religion and dependance, Turkiſh, and of themſelues otherwiſe vnquiet, and addicted to ſpoyle. This King honoured Abas as his ſonne. His father ſoone after dying, Sultan Hamzire ſucceeded, who was forced to renew his truce with the Turk, by reaſon of the rebellion of the Turcomans, whom by force he ſubdued, beheaded their Princes, & for his ſecuritie ſlew twentie thouſand of the ableſt amongſt them for the wars. And then wholly bending his thoughts againſt the Turk, was by treaſon ſlaine by his Barber. His Princes, Authors of this fact, ſhared his State amongſt them, euery one making himſelfe Lord of that Prouince which he gouerned: vniting their reſolutions againſt Abas, whom alſo the Turke (which had his hand in the buſineſſe) had had vndertaken ſhould bee kept ſtill in Corazan. Abas neuertheleſſe ſo wrought, that the King of Corazan diſmiſſed him, with three thouſand horſemen, to winne poſſeſſion of that State, which ſince hath deuoured the Tartars, and is growne terrible to the Turke, being no leſſe in Extent then the Turke hath in Aſia, and better both peopled, gouerned, and deuoted to their Soueraigne. But it was not eaſily atchieued. In Siſtane one of the neereſt Prouinces, hee was encountred with twenty thouſand, his troupes cut in pieces, himſelfe forced to flee to the mountaines, where he liued three moneths vnknowen amongſt the heardmen, flitting vp and downe with tenne or twelue followers. Wearie of this life, hee determined to ſhew himſelfe in Yaſd, his quondam Prouince, which ſo well ſucceeded, that numbers come flocking to him, and Ferrat Can alſo a great Prince (diſcontent with the preſent State, no part of which had falne to him, hauing at that time no Prouince in his gouernement, when the King was ſlaine) reſorted to him with his brother, and tenne thouſand followers. They were welcome, but hee much more, as a great Souldier and a wiſe Prince. With theſe forces hee ouerthrew his neereſt enemies, which cauſed thoſe of Shyras, Aſphaan, Caſſan, aſſiſted by the Kings of Gheylan and Mazandran, to gather mighty forces. In the meane time, the Turkes armed at Tauris, and the Prince of Hamadan, hauing called in a ſtrength of the Courdines, was marching towards Casbin. Thus beſet with Armies, hee leaueth Ferrat Can with Zulpher his brother and fiue thouſand men in Casbin: & himſelfe with the reſt of his power, marched towards the Can of Hamadan. Now did Ferrat Can (according to former agreement betweene the King and him) profeſſe himſelfe altered from the Kings part, and writeth to the Rebells, offering to ioyne his ſtrength with theirs, and to mutinie the Kings Armie alſo, which was lodged in the Mountaynes, in ſhew to keepe the ſtraits, indeede to expect the euent. Thus the Cans aſſembled at Casbin, and after long deliberation, concluded, that it was needeleſſe and not ſafe to call in the Turkes forces, and diſpatched a meſſenger and preſent to the Baſſa of Tauris, to reſerue his fauour till a time more needfull. Hereof Ferrat ſent word cloſely to the King, and of a banquet which ſhould bee at his houſe a few nights after, where the Principalls of the Army ſhould meet. Hither Abas bid himſelfe a gueſt, poſting thither with fiue thouſand of his beſt horſe, which he diſpoſed in the mountaine, couered with Ferrats troupe, expecting the appointed ſigne: which being giuen late in the night when the whole company was heauie with wine and ſleepe, the King was receiued into the houſe with three hundred men, where without any vprore he ſlew ſeuentie. And at the breake of the day the Kings people made as great ſhouts & noyſe, as if all the Army had bin there, whereat the Alarme being giuen, all betooke them to their armes, repairing to Ferrats lodging to their Princes; whoſe heads laced vpon a ſtring, were there preſented to them out of a Tarras, vpon which the King preſently ſhewed himſelfe with Ferrat Can; Zulpher hauing his fiue thouſand men ready in a troupe in the great place. All theſe things together ſo amazed them, that they thought the Kings pardon a high preferment, which he freely granted both them, and the ſuccours ſent thither by the Kings of Cheylan and Mazandran. The reports hereof made Hamadans Armie to vaniſh, and the King tooke order preſently by new Cans for the gouernment of thoſe parts. Hee led his ſouldiers to Hiſphaan, giuing out that the treaſures of the Kingdome were there layd vp by the Rebels; a good policie to winne it, which with as much pretended indignation he raſed, for fayling of his ſeeming hopes. To ſatisfie his Souldiers better, he led them againſt the Kings of Gheylan and Mazandran, where the entrances by Nature difficult, thorow the vnpaſſable woods and hilles, were made eaſie by the reuolt of thoſe to whom the charge of keeping the Straits was giuen, whoſe liues Abas had before ſpared at Casbin. The ſucceſſe was, the two Kings were ſlaine, and the ſouldiers enriched with the ſpoyle of a Countrey exceeding fertile, thus ſubdued to his Scepter. The people he remoued into other parts of his Dominion, ſending the former inhabitants into Cheylan and Mazandran.

Not long after the brother of that King of Coraſſan, which had beene Tutor to Abas, rebelled againſt his brother, and ſlew him and all his children, except one with whom his Tutors fled into the Mountaines. This occaſion Abas apprehended for the ſubduing of that Countrey in the Infants right, which (notwithſtanding the treaſons of Ferrat, now weary of his former loyalty, and conſpiring with the Turke and Tartar to betray his Maſter to them) hee effected. Theſe things with larger circumſtances Abas himſelfe related to Sir Anthonie and Sir Robert. As for his gouernment, the ſame is there alſo deſcribed, but I haue beene too long in the former. Hee hath Poſts once a weeke from all parts. The Viſire ſitteth in counſell with the Kings counſell euery morning, and the King himſelfe euery Wedneſday. The pooreſt may offer him any ſupplication, which he readeth, regiſtreth, ordereth. One example of Iuſtice is admirable, which he ſentenced on the Gouernour of Casbin, conuict of many extortions, briberies, and other crimes: That all his goods and lands ſhould be ſold for ſatisfaction to thoſe whom hee had ſpoyled; and if any thing wanted, ſince the King by giuing him that authoritie, was partly the cause of those excesses, hee condemned himselfe to pay the residue out of his treasurie. If any thing aduanced, it should bee giuen to his children, with a grieuous Edict, that no succour should be ministred to himselfe. Neither should hee at once end his punishment by death, but during his life weare a Yoke like a Hogs-yoke, and haue his eares and nose cut off: nor might any relieue him; but hee should get his liuing with his owne hands, that hee might feele in himselfe the miserie of pouertie. This made the Turks Embassador there present sweare, that such fortune & such vertue must needs be his Masters ruine. His bountie to our Author, his magnificence otherwise, let the Reader there learne, as likewise his priuate disports and exercises. At his entrance into Hisphaan, the wayes were couered two English miles with Veluet, Satin, and Cloth of Gold, where his horse should passe. He feasted Sir Anthony, before his employment in that honorable Embassage to the Princes Christian (after the maner [m] of the ancient feasting vsed by the Persians) thirty dayes together, in a Garden of two miles compasse, vnder Tents pitched by small rils of water; where euery man that would come, was placed according to his degree, vnder one or other Tent, prouided abundantly with meate, fruit, and wine, drinking as they would without compulsion. The ioy of which feast was augmented by the Tartars of [n] Buckhawrd, yeelding themselues to his subiection, and by the great Mogors great offer with his eldest sonnes daughter, to the young sonne of King Abas in marriage. But I referre the more desirous to Sir Anthonies owne booke; hauing thence gathered this, because it differeth so much in some things from others; then whom, he had farre better meanes of intelligence.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Sophian Sect, or Persian Religion, as it is at this present.

§. I.

The differences betwixt the Turke and Persian, with the zeale of both parts.

IT hath beene already shewed, how the Saracens had one Calyfa, or Caliph, whom they esteemed the Head of their Religion and Empire, in right vnto both succeeding their grand Seducer, Mahomet: and how the foure Captaines or Doctors, each ayming, vnder colour of Religion, to further his ambitious Proiects, made way to difference of Sects in the beginning, and in succeeding Ages the Sword decided, who was rghtfull succesſor, the posterity of each challenging to himselfe that right, according as they were able in the Fielde to maintaine it. These Persians affected Hali, as truest interpreter of their Law, and Lord of the State, to whom Mahomet gaue his daughter in his life time, and his Alcoran at his death, being his kinsman also by birth; and although, by the violence of the contradicting Caliphes, they did not alway make hereof open profession, yet euer and anone, as occasion was offered, this fire brake out, yet neuer into so great a flame, as after the yeere 1369. by Sophi, Guine, Aidar, Ismael, and their succesſors, vnto this day: their Sect being that onely, of the seuenty two Saracenicall (so many some [a] account) which shall in the Persian estimation haue admission into Paradise, all the rest (and why not this also?) leading to hell.

From that diuision betwixt the Persians and Arabians, about the succesſor of Mahomet (it is Barrius his Relation, in which the Persians call themselues Sia, which signifieth the vnion of one body, but the Arabians call them Raffadin, that is, vnreasonable, and themselues Cunin) proceeded other Sects amongst the Mahumetans; and amongst the Persians, two called Camarata and Mutazeli, which follow little the saying of the Prophets, but would haue all proued to them by naturall reason, not allowing Moses or Mahomet any further. There is one Sect amongst them called Malaheda, which subiecteth all things to Chance, and to the Stars, not to Diuine Prouidence. There are other called Emozaidi, which reiect many things in the Alcoran, and follow the doctrine of Zaidi, the Nephew of Hocem, second sonne of Ali, these inhabite on the confines of Prester Iohn, and in Melinde.

But to come to the common Persians, and to obserue out of Barrius the diuersity of opinion betwixt them and the Arabians; their Doctors reduce these differences into seuenteene conclusions. The Persians say, That GOD is the Author and worker of euery good, and that euill commeth from the Deuill: The Arabians say, That would bring in two Gods, one a Theodorus Cantacuzen. ap. Cras. Io di Bar. Asi. dec. 2. l. 10. c. 6.

Deuill, quasi doe-euill: or Deuill, of Διάβολος, an Accuser or Cauiller.

one of good, the other of euill: the Persians say, that God is eternall, and that the law and creation of men had a beginning: the Arabians answere, That all the words of the law are prayses of the works of God, and therefore eternall, like himselfe: the Persians say, That the soules of the blessed in the other world cannot see the essence of God, because he is a Spirit of Diuinity; onely they shall see his greatnesse, mercy, pitty, & all other good things which he works in the creatures: the Arabians answere, That they shall see him with their eyes, euen as hee is; the Persians say, That when Mahomet receiued the Law, his soule was carried by the Angel Gabriel into the presence of God: the Arabians affirme it of his body also: the Persians say, That the children of Ali, or Alie, and Fatyma: and their twelue Nephewes, haue preheminence aboue all Prophets: the Arabians grant it aboue all other men, but not aboue the Prophets: the Persians say, that it is sufficient to pray thrice a day vnto God; in the morning when the Sunne riseth, which is called Sob; the second (Dor) at noone: the third (Magareb) before Sunne-set, because these three containe all the parts of the day: the Arabians require twice besides, according to their law, called Hacer, and Assa. The rest of their seuenteene Articles of difference, mine Author hath not expressed. These are sufficient, to shew that they not onely differ about the successors of Mahomet, as Minodoi affirmeth, but about Dogmatical points also in their ridiculous Theologie, and interpretation of their law.

These differences haue continued of old and long continuance; what hath in latter times accrewed hereunto by the Sophian additions of Guine and his followers, is in part touched in the former Chapter. Let vs now take view thereof, as the same at this present hath infected Persia and the neighbouring Regions.

There is resident in [b] Casbin their profane Priest, called Mustaed-Dini, that is to say, the chiefe of the law, who is as the Mufti among the Turkes; and in the other subiect Cities are certaine peculiar heads obedient to this chiefe Priest, who notwithstanding are not chosen or displaced at his pleasure, but by the King himselfe, who should not onely be a King, but a Priest, as Ali and Mahomet were; from whom hee challengeth succession. And we haue shewed before that Ismael was called Halife, or Chalife, that is, the Vicar of God. Howbeit, for auoyding of greater trouble, he granteth that fauour, and putteth ouer that burthen from himselfe vnto others; to whose iudgements he also referreth himselfe, whensoeuer there is any Consultation or Treatie touching their law and religion. Vnder the Mustaed-Dini are the Califs (sayth Minadoi) and these are they that execute their dayly Seruice in their Mosches or Temples. The chiefe of these Califs is hee that putteth the Horn vpon the Kings head, when he is first enthronized: a ceremonie now performed in Casbin, because the Turkes forbad it to bee performed in Cafe, neere vnto Babylon, according to the ancient wont. Other Cities also haue a Mustaed-Dini and Calif, although inferiour to them of Casbin. These inferiour Califs seeme to be Vicars (so the word signifieth) of the Mustaed-Dini.

b Minadoi lib. 2 The chiefe is now at Hispaan. Cartw.

The difference betweene the Turke and Persian (as commonly it happeneth in case of Religion) is so hotly pursued on both sides betwixt them, that they neither vse mutuall marriage, nor Merchandize, as some affirme: there can be no certaine Peace, or continuing Truce. And if one altar his Religion and turnes to the other side, hee is not receiued without a new [c] Circumcision. Baiazet the great Turke burnt two hundred Houses in Constantinople, infected with this Sect, together with the inhabitants, and set forth a publike Edict against it. Ismael is sayd, in like hatred of the Turkes to haue caused a Swine to be nourished, which, in despight of the Ottoman he named Baiazet. Solyman returning from Amasia, was entertained in the house of one of this Sect, who therefore, after the departure of his Prince, purified his house with washings, perfumes and other ceremonies; as if it had beene polluted with a Turkish guest; for which cause himselfe was slaine, and his house rased. But let vs take a further view of this Sect in other Countries.

§. II.

Of the spreading of the Persian Opinion.

NEither could it containe it selfe in the limits of the Persian Kingdome, but was spread further, and receiued euen in the heart of Turkie, and skirts of India. For amongst other the Disciples of Aidar, Chasan Shelise, and Schach Culi, afterwards surnamed Cuselbas, fleeing the fury of the Persian King, who had slaine their Master, and persecuted his followers, came into Armenia Minor, and there tooke vp their dwelling at the great Mountaine Antitaurus, at the foot whereof the broken Rocks haue many darke Caues, the worke of Art partly, partly of Nature; which place of the inhabitants is called Teke-ili, whereof Schach Culi was after called Techellis. Here these two giuing themselues selues wholly to a contemplatiue life, in a strict austerity contenting themselues with such things as the earth voluntarily affoorded, began to grow in knowledge, first of the Heardsmen and Shepheards; after, of the Husbandmen and Countrey people, admiring their new holinesse. Yea, Baiazet himselfe, then Emperor of the Turkes, moued with zeale of their deuotion, sent them yeerely fixe or seuen thousand Aspers. Afterwards becomming Fortune-tellers, and prognosticating things to come, they were by the superstitious people drawne into Villages and Cities, where they preached Hali, according to Aidars doctrine, enioyning their Disciples the red Band on their Turbants; of which the Turkes tearme them Cuselbas, that is, Red-heads, with which, in short time, the Cities and Townes were filled.

When they were thus multiplied, there met ten thousand of them at a Fayre at Tascia, or Attalia, where they executed the chiefe Magistrate; and being perswaded by these new Masters, they sware neuer to forsake their Captaines, or refuse any labour for their most holy Religion, vowing their soules and bodies in defence thereof. These Captaines not hauing otherwise to maintaine their followers, gaue them leaue to forrage the Countrey adioyning, and to liue vpon the spoyle of them that would not receiue their new doctrine, which they in many troupes, and with many preyes accordingly performed. They entred into Lycaonia, and the people fled out of the Countrey into Iconium. There two Prophets set vp Proclamations of blessings to all such as would receiue their Sect, and of destructions to the gainesayers. Ismael also, to encrease their strength, had sent them some troupes of horsemen. In the Politike Historie which Crusius hath giuen vs, in the first booke of his Turcogracia, it is sayd, that two hundred thousand followed Sach Cules: In this war Baiazets two Nephewes, with the forces of the Countrey, encountring them in battell, receiued the ouerthrow: Corcutas, the sonne of Baiazet, with his Armie durst not assayle them. Thus marched they into Bithynia, where neere vnto the Riuer Sangarius, Caragoses Bassa, Viceroy of Asia, affronted them, hauing before commanded Achmetes, the eldest sonne of Baiazet, to leuie forces in his gouernment of Cappadocia and Pontus, to shut them in at their back. But Techellis, after the losse of seuen thousand men, and all his Ensignes, chased him out of the field into Cutaie the seat of the Viceroy, where he besieged and tooke him with his wiues and children: and after being pursued by Alis Bassa, with forces out of Europe, hee impaled this Caragoses in the way on a sharpe stake fastened in the ground. Here was hee forced to fight, and his fellow Chusan Shelife slaine; but Techellis recouering the battell almost lost, left Alis Bassa slaine in the place; the Turkes fleeing before him. Ionuses Bassa was sent against him, when hauing lost a great part of his strength, hee had retired his weakened forces into Antitaurus, out of the Woods and Mountaines, often assayling the Turkes: whence at last he fled into Persia. Ionuses caused strait inquisition to be made for these new Sectaries, doing such to death with exquisite torments, as had borne armes in the late rebellion, and burned the rest in the forehead with an hot yron: and after transported them, together with the friends and kinsemen of such as had beene executed, into Europe, there to bee dispersed through Macedonia, Epirus, and Peloponnesus, for feare of a second returne of Techellis. The remainder of Techellis his power, as they fled into Persia, robbed a Carauan of Merchants; for which outrage, comming to Tauris, their Captaines were by Ismaels command executed, and Techellis himselfe burnt aliue; but yet is this Sect closely fauoured in Asia.

§. III.

Of their Rites, Persons, Places, and Opinions, Religious.

Gef. Duck. Hakton. 1.

WE haue now seene the Proceedings of this Sophian Sect, both in Persia and Turkie, both here kept downe, and there established by force. To weare red on the lower parts of their body, were to these Red-heads scarsely piacular. Touching Hali, they haue diuers dreames: as that when they doubted of Mahomets successor, a little Lizard came into a Councell assembled to decide the controuersie, and declared that it was Mahomets pleasure, that Mortus Ali (or Morts Ali) should be the man. He had a sword wherewith hee killed as many as he stroke. At his death he told them that a white Camell would come for his body, which accordingly came, and carried his dead body and the sword, and was therewith taken vp into heauen; for whose returne they haue long looked in Persia. For this cause the King kept a horse ready sadled, and kept for him also a daughter of his to be his wife; but she died in the yeere, 1573. And they say further, that if he come not shortly, they shall be of our beleefe.

Some say it is for one of his Nephewes.

They haue few bookes, and lesse learning. There is often great contention and mutinie in great Townes, which of Mortus Ali his sonnes was greatest: sometime two or three thousand ſand people being together by the eares about the ſame; as I haue ſeene (ſayth Maſter Ducket) in Shamaky, and Ardouill, and Tauris, where I haue ſeene a man comming from fighting, and in a brauery bringing in his hand foure or fiue mens heads, carrying them by the hayre of the crowne. For although they ſhaue their heads commonly twice a weeke, yet leaue they a tuft of hayre vpon their heads about two foot long, whereof, when I enquired the cauſe, They anſwered that thereby they may bee the eaſier carried vp into heauen when they are dead. In praying they turne to the South, becauſe Mecca lyeth that way from them. When they be on trauell in the way, many of them will as ſoone as the Sunne riſeth, light from their horſes, turning themſelues to the South, and will lay their gownes before them, with their ſwords and beads, and ſo ſtanding vpright doe their holy things, many times in their prayers kneeling downe, and kiſſing their beades, or ſomewhat elſe that lieth before them.

When they earneſtly affirme a matter, they ſweare by God, Mahomet, and Mortus Ali, and ſometime by all at once, ſaying, Olla Mahumet Ali, and ſometime Shaugham boſſhe, that is, by the Shaughes head. Abas the young Prince of Perſia charged with imputation of treaſon, after other Purgatorie ſpeeches, ſware by the Creator that ſpread out the ayre; that founded the earth vpon the deepes; that adorned the heauen with Starres; that powred abroad the water; that made the fire; and briefly of nothing brought forth all things: by the head of Ali, and by the Religion of their Prophet Mahomet, that hee was cleare. If any Chriſtian will become a Boſarman, or one of their ſuperſtition, they giue him many gifts: the Gouernor of the Towne appointeth him a horſe, and one to ride before him on another horſe, bearing a ſword in his hand, and the Boſarman bearing an arrow in his hand, rideth in the City curſing his father and mother. The ſword ſignifieth death, if hee reuolt againe. Before the Shaugh ſeemed to fauour our Nation, the people abuſed them very much, and ſo hated them that they would not touch them, reuiling them by the names of Cafars and Gawars, that is, Infidels or Miſ-beleeuers. Afterwards they would kiſſe their hands, and vſe them gently and reuerently. Drunkards and riotous perſons they hate; for which cauſe Richard Iohnſon cauſed the Engliſh, by his vicious liuing, to be worſe accounted of then the Ruſſes.

Their opinions and rites moſt-what agree with the Turkiſh and Saracenicall. Their Prieſts are apparelled like other men: they vſe euery morning and afternoone to goe vp to the toppes of their Churches, and tell there a great tale of Mahomet and Mortus Ali. They haue alſo among them certaine holy-men called Setes; accounted therefore holy, becauſe they, or ſome of their anceſtors, haue beene on pilgrimage at Mecca; theſe muſt be beleeued for this Saint-ſhip, although they lie neuer ſo ſhamefully. Theſe Setes vſe to ſhaue their heads all ouer, ſauing on the ſides a little aboue the Temples, which they leaue vnſhauen, and vſe to braide the ſame as women doe their hayre, and weare it as long as it will grow. Ioſafa Barbaro at Sammachi lodged in an Hoſpitall, wherein was a graue vnder a vault of ſtone, and neere vnto that a man, with his beard and hayre long; naked, ſauing that a little before and behind, he was couered with a skinne, ſitting on a peece of a matte on the ground; I, (ſayth hee) ſaluted him, and demanded what hee did: he told mee hee watched his father: I asked who was his father; He, quoth he, that doth good to his neighbour; with this man in this Sepulchre I haue liued thirty yeeres: and will now accompany him after death; and being dead, be buried with him: I haue ſeene of the world ſufficient, and now haue determined to abide thus till death.

Ioſ. Barb. apud Ramuſ.

Another I found at Tauris on all-Soules day, in the which they alſo vſed a commemoration of Soules departed, neere to the Sepulchre in a Church-yard; hauing about him many birds, eſpecially Rauens and Crowes: I thought it had beene a dead corpſe, but was told it was a liuing Saint, at whoſe call the birds reſorted to him, and he gaue them meat.

Another I ſaw, when Aſſambei was in Armenia, marching into Perſia againſt Signior Iauſa, Lord of Perſia and Zagatai, vnto the City of Herem; who drew his ſtaffe in the diſhes wherein they are, and ſayd certaine words, and brake them all: the Sultan demanded what he had ſayd: they which heard him anſwered, that he ſaid hee ſhould be victorious, and breake his enemies forces, as hee had done thoſe diſhes: whereupon he commanded him to be kept till his returne; and finding the euent according, he vſed him honourably. When the Sultan rode thorow the fields, he was ſet on a Mule and his hands bound before him, becauſe he was ſometime accuſtomed to doe ſome dangerous folly: at his feet there attended on him many of their religious perſons, called Daruiſe. Theſe mad trickes he vſed according to the courſe of the Moone, ſometimes in two or three dayes not eating any thing, buſied in ſuch fooleries, that they were faine to bind him: Hee had great allowance for his expences.

One of thoſe holy men there was, which went naked like to the beaſts, preaching their faith: and hauing obtained great reputation; hee cauſed himſelfe to bee immured in a wall forty dayes, there to abide without any ſuſtenance: but when this time was expired, and some wondered, one more nose-wise then the rest, smelled the sent of flesh: the Sultan hearing it, committed him and his disciple to the Cadilasher, who by torments caused them to confesse the coozenage; for, thorow a hole which was made in the wall by a caue, he had broth conueyed to him, and therefore they were both put to death: In the yeere 1478. Chozamirech an Armenian, being in his shop in Tauris, an Azi or Saint of theirs came to him, and willed him to deny his Christian faith: he answered him courteously, and prayed him not to trouble him: but when he persisted, hee offered him money; the Saint would not haue the money, but importuned his first sute: Chozomirech sayd hee would not deny his Christian faith: whereupon the other plucked a sword out of a mans scabard which stood by, and with a wound which hee gaue the Armenian in the head, killed him, and ranne away. But the Armenians sonne complayning to the Sultan, procured his apprehension at Merin, two dayes iourney from Tauris: and, being brought before him, he with a knife killed him with his owne hands, and caused him to be cast on a dung-hill for the dogges to eate; saying, Is this the way to encrease the faith of Mahomet? But when some of the more zealous people went to one Daruiscassan, which was in guarding of the sepulchre of Assambei the former Sultan, and (as it were) Prior of the Hospitall, and requesting of him, obtayned the body to burie it: the Sultan hearing it, sent for him, and sayde to him, Darest thou countermand my commands? Away and kill him; which was suddenly dispatched. Hee further to be reuenged of the people, committed the Towne to the sack, which for the space of three or foure houres was done. And then he forbad further spoyle, and fined the Towne in a great summe of gold. Lastly, hee caused the Armenians sonne to come before him, and with many kind words comforted him. This long history I haue inserted, to shew the extremity of blind zeale, and religious fury in the seculars and votaries of these Persians, if iustice should not withstand their rage.

Before is mentioned the commemoration of their dead, which is thus performed ouer their Sepulchres. Thither resort great multitudes of men and women, olde and yong, which sit on heapes with their Priests, and with their candles lighted: the Priests eyther reade or pray in their language; and after cause to bee brought somewhat to eate in the place; the place containeth betweene foure and fiue miles; the pathes which leade thither are full of poore people, which beg almes, some of whom offer to say some prayer for their benefactors. The sepulchres haue stones vpon them engraven with the names of the buried parties: and some haue a Chappell of stone thereon.

Ios. Barb. At Merdin he saw a naked man, which came and sate by him, and pulling forth a booke, read thereon, and after drew neere and asked him, whence he was; hee answered, a stranger: I also am a stranger, saith he, of this world, and so are we all; and therefore I haue left it, with purpose to goe thus vnto mine end; with many words besides touching meekenesse, and the denial of the world. He said, I haue seene a great part thereof, and finde nothing therein that contents me, and therefore haue determined to abandon it altogether. To this Merdin a man cannot passe, but by a way made of stone, continuing a mile: at the head therof is a gate and way to the Towne; and within the Towne is another hill with a like way of fiue hundred paces in height. There is an Hospitall for entertainment of all strangers, made by Ziangirboi, the brother of Vsuncassan: and if they be of better sort, they are entertained with carpets spread for them, worth an hundred ducats a peece: and victuals for all commers.

We might heere take further view of their stately Temples, their great and populous Cities, and other things worthy obseruation, if that our Turkish History had not related the like also among them, especially touching the persons and places religious. For the rest I referre the Reader to other Authors.

Sir Ant. Sher. The present King Abas (more, as it seemeth, in policie, to secure himselfe of factions, and against the Turke, then conscience) is a great persecutor of that sect of Mahomet which followeth the interpretation of Vssen and Omar. This hee labours to extirpate and make odious: hauing in vse, once a yeere with great solemnitie to burne publikely (as maine heretikes) the images of Vssen and Omar. Then doth he cause his great men publikely, in scorne of their institution, to goe with a flagon of wine, carried by a footman, and at euery village, or where they see any assembly of people, to drinke: which himselfe also vseth, not for loue of the wine, but to scandalize the contrarie religion. Yet are there of the greatest, exceeding precise Turkes, if they durst shew it.

I. Ward to M. Haywood. In a Letter of Iohn Ward, written in Tauris, May 14. 1605. this King is blamed for making slaues of poore Armenians, and forcing many to Mahumetisme, pulling downe Churches, and vsing more rigour then the Turke.

§. IIII.

Of Natures wonders, and the Iesuits lyes of Persia.

THE [f] wonders of Nature in these parts are: neere Bachu, a fountaine of oyle continually running, and fetched into the farthest parts of Persia: and another neere Shamakie, of Tarre, whereof we had good vse and proofe in our ship. Hereabouts you shall haue in the fields, neere to any Village in the night, two or three hundred Foxes howling. Kine they haue like ours, and another sort great boned and leane, as hard fauoured as those which Pharaoh dreamed of. In Persia groweth great abundance of Bombasin cotton: this groweth on a certaine tree or brier, not past the height of a mans waste, with a slender stalk like to a brier or carnation Iuly-flower, with very many branches, bearing on euery branch a fruit or cod round, which when it commeth to the bignesse of a Wall-nut, openeth and sheweth forth the cotton, which groweth still like a fleece of wooll, to the bignesse of a mans fist, and then being loose is gathered: the seeds are flat, and blacke, as big as pease, which they sow in their fields, and plowed ground in great abundance.

I had thought I had ended this Chapter, and our Persian Expedition; but our good friends the Iesuites would needs entertaine your wearie eyes, with reading an exploit of theirs, related by [g] one, sometimes their fellow Catholike, now (I hope) our fellow Christian. For the credit of this honest and loyall (of their honest returne not with a non est, and loyall with a lie-all) societie, was a French pamphlet by them dispersed (a little before the Powder-treason) amongst their Catholike friends in England, reporting the miraculous conuersion of the King of Persia, by one Campian a Iesuite, an English-man, that had expelled a Deuill out of a possessed partie; and commanded the Deuill at his departure to giue a signe thereof, by striking downe the top of a steeple. Which being effected, the Kings conuersion followed, together with many of the Nobilitie, to the Roman faith; libertie also being granted to preach it openly, and to build Churches and Monasteries thorowout the Kingdome. This was beleeued in England, especially by a friend of our Authors, vnto whom that Pamphlet was sent, who requested him to say Masse in thanks-giuing to GOD for so great a benefit. But in the end, that Iesuite who sent the Pamphlet gaue out, that it was but a thing deuised by French Hugonets, to disgrace their societie. Gracious societie! that can sometime cure their lies with a distinction of piafraudes, [h] sometime couer them with a robe of the new fashion, Æquiuocation: sometimes can expose their bastards at other mens doores, to shield themselues from shame, with laying the blame on others; and haue a mint in their pragmaticall heads of such supersubtle inuentions: what are they now disgraced? and that by Hugonets? Euen as truly as the Parliament-house should haue beene blowne vp by Puritans [i] (this also was the Ignatians deuice) or like to that newes of the late Queene [k] whose Ambassadours were at Rome for the Popes Absolution: or that of Bezaes recantation, and Geneuaes submission to the Pope. Blessed Ignatius (let mee also inuocate, or let him deigne to reade in that all-seeing glasse [l] this poore supplication) infuse some better spirit, or some cleanlier and more wittie conueyance at least, into thy new progenie, lest the Protestants grosser wits sent, see, feele the palpablenesse, and impute the Iesuitical courses to that Author which said, he [m] would go out and be a lying spirit in the mouth of all ACHABS Prophets, which, [n] when he speaketh a lie, speaketh of his owne, because he is a lier, and the father thereof. Hitherto wee tooke Ignatius for their father, but now we find a New, of whom they borrow Bankruptly shifts, beseeming onely the Merchants of Babylon, disgracing humanitie, defacing diuinitie, worthily [o] raunged amongst the poore policies of the Hospitall of the desperate. Since also, Ianſonius in his Mercurius Gallobelgicus hath told vs newes of the Kings graunt to build a Temple and Monasterie for Christians, himselfe, as hee saith, much enclining to that religion: whereupon many haue been baptized, and not a few through the power of holy-water, [p] haue beene cured. The King hath further sent to the Georgians to vnite them to the Romish Church: and the Armenians also, by an embassage to Rome haue protested all obedience to that See, as they before had done in the Couent of Saint Augustine, which is in the chiefe Citie of Persia. He setteth downe the copie of King Abas his Letter to the Pope, wherein he requested him to send a Prelate to gouerne at Tres Ecclesiæ, where the chiefe of the Armenian Christians vsed to reside. The like he writeth in another letter to the King of Spaine: which, if it be so, argueth rather his policie, to obtaine good will and helpe of the Christians against the Turk, then any loue to Christian Religion.

CHAP. X.

Of the Scythians, Sarmatians, and Seres, and of their Religion.

§. I.

Of the Scythian Name, People, Region, Language, and manner of life.

VNder the name Scythia, is contained a verie great part of the world: It was diuided into Scythia, Europæa, and Asiatica. Pliny [a] saith, That this name reacheth vnto the Sarmatians and Germans, and to those fartheſt Nations, which were vnknowne to other men. And Strabo in his firſt booke ſaith, That all knowne Regions towards the North were called Scythians or Nomades: and in his eleuenth booke he affirmeth, that the Greekes called all thoſe Northerne Nations, Scythians, and Celtoſcythians. Thoſe beyond the Adriatike and Pontike Seas, and the Riuer Iſter or Danubius, were called Hyperborei, Sauromatæ, and Arimaſpi: thoſe beyond the Caſpian Sea, Sacæ and Maſſagetæ. Some [b] will haue this name to be giuen them ἀπὸ τῆς σκύζεσθαι, which ſignifieth to be angrie: Others of their Shooting, [c] called ſtill of ſome of thoſe Nations, and in ſome other languages. Schieten, of which our word Shoot is deriued: Mela in his third Booke and fifth Chapter, calleth them all Sagæ: and in the fragment which beareth the name of [d] Cato de Originibus, is mentioned Scythia Saga: this word Saga, Beroſus [e] interpreteth a Prieſt: ſaying, that Noah left the Scythian Armenians his rituall bookes, which onely Prieſts, and that onely among Prieſts, might reade, who were therefore called Saga, as Noah himſelfe had been. Theſe peopled the Countries from Armenia to the Bactrians, all which place was called Scythia Saga: ouer which Sabatius reigning in the time of Iupiter Belus; Araxa with his ſonne Scythia poſſeſſed all from Armenia Weſtward, to Samatia in Europe. The Grecians fable, Hercules to be the father of theſe Nations, begetting Scythes [f] on a monſter, whoſe vpper halfe reſembled a Woman, the nether part a Viper. It were an endleſſe and boundleſſe worke, to ſeeke and ſet out the true and proper beginnings and bounds of this ſo large a Tract of the world, called Scythia: the particular Nations of them would be but harſh to recite out of Pliny, Mela, Strabo, and others: the multitude whereof he that will may find in [g] Ortelius his Theſaurus collected together. The Sarmatæ, or Sauromatæ, are ſometime made one peculiar people of the Scythians: and ſometimes the names are confounded, Sarmatia alſo being diuided into Europæa and Aſiatica, whereof the one is interpreted by [h] Oliuerus, Polonia, by Ortelius, Ruſſia, and the other Tartaria.

Goropius [i] in his Becceſelana admiring his owne language, coniectureth that while Nimrod and his company fell to babel, or after our pronuntiation, babble at Babel, others, namely, the Cymbrians, or poſteritie of Gomer ſtaied ſtill in Margiana, a Countrie fruitfull of Vines; whither hee imagineth Noah deſcended out of the Arke, and there abode after the Floud. Theſe he ſuppoſeth, being not at Babel, retained their old and firſt vniuerſall language. But Margiana growing too little for their multiplied numbers, they were forced to ſend out Colonies. And thus the Saxons, Tectoſages, Sauromatæ, Getes or Gothes, the Danes, Galles, and other Scythian Nations, the true poſteritie of Gomer, and keepers of the firſt language, as he by Dutch Etymologies gathereth, peopled both Scythia and Sarmatia in Aſia, and Europe, together with all Germanie, France, England, Norway, Denmarke, and ſome parts of Aſia Minor. Hee that will bee further informed of his Reaſons, let him reade his Saxonica, Gotodanica, and other Treatiſes of his Becceſelanian Antiquities.

Ptolomey [k] diſtinguiſheth Scythia from Samatia: hee confineth Sarmatia Europæa, with the Sarmatian Ocean, and the land vnknowne on the North: with Viſtula on the Weſt: the Eaſterne border is Tanais: from whence vnto the Hircanian Sea Eaſtward, is Sarmatia Aſiatica, on the North abutting on the vnknown parts of the earth, on the South with the Euxine Sea, and a line drawne right from thence to the Caſpian Sea. Scythia is by [l] him placed to the Eaſt of Sarmatia, diuided by the hill Imaus, extending vnto the Region called Serica, hauing on the North vnknowne places: on the South, the Sacæ, Sogdiana, Margiana and India. But our purpoſe is to take them here in their more generall ſenſe, vnderſtanding all the North pars of Aſia, now Tartaria Aſiatica (for of Europe, ſauing wherein the Europæan Scythians agree with the Aſian we are not now to ſpeake:) And of theſe, firſt to conſider their ancient Scythian Rites, and in the next place their later Tartarian appellation and Religion.

seeking to challenge to themselues, to bee the ancienteſt of Nations: in which quarrell the Scythians preuailed. Their manners and cuſtomes hee thus reporteth. They haue no limitation of lands, nor tillage, nor houſe, but alwaies wander thorow places not inhabited, feeding their Heards & Flocks. They carrie their wiues and children with them on Carts, which alſo being couered with hides, they vſe for houſes. No offence is more hainous amongſt them then theft: gold and ſiluer they as much contemne, as others deſire. Milke and hony is their food; their clothes, skinnes of beaſts, for the vſe of wooll they know not. They haue three times ſought the Empire of Aſia, neuer conquered of others. They chaced Darius the Perſian King out of their coaſts: they ſlew Cyrus with all his armie: they ouerthrew Zopyron a Captaine of Alexander the Great, with all his forces. They onely heard of, neuer felt the Roman armes, and themſelues founded the Parthian Empire.

That which credulous and fabulous antiquitie hath reported, of the monſtrous peoples inhabiting the Northerly and vnknowne parts of Scythia, is not here to be recited, the Countries being at this time diſcouered, and knowne to haue no ſuch men, as either by nature are bald and flat noſed, with huge chins; or haue but one eye, where there are alſo Gryphons, keepers of their treaſures; or men with Goats feet: or other monſters of men, which [n] Pliny, Herodotus, and others, haue rather mentioned then beleeued; Mandauil and Munſter following them in like Relations. Next to theſe both in place and credit, wee may reckon the Hyperboreans, of whom the Delians [o] report that they ſent to Delos Virgins, with ſacrifice to Lucina, bound vp in wheat-ſtraw: through ſo many Nations inhabiting betweene. Of the Iſſedones is reported, that when one dieth, his kindred bring thither beaſts, which they kill, and cut, and dreſſe, and eat together with the fleſh of the dead man, whoſe skull alſo they keepe and gilde, vſing it as an Idoll, to which they performe yeerely ceremonies: theſe exequies doth the ſonne there performe to his dead father.

§. II.

Of the Religion, Diuination, and other Scythian Rites.

GEnerally of the Scythian Religion thus. Of the gods, they worſhip firſt Veſta, whom they call in their language Tabiti: next of all Iupiter, in their ſpeech Papæus, and the Earth, ſuppoſing her to bee the wife of Iupiter, and call her Apia. In the next place they worſhip Apollo and Venus, by the names of Oetoſyrus, and Artimpaſa, and Mars, and Hercules. Some of them ſacrifice alſo to Neptune, or Thamimaſades. Images, Altars, and Temples, they thinke ought not to bee made, except to Mars. Their manner of ſacrificing is generally this: The ſacrifice is preſented with the fore-feet bound, the Sacrificer at his back hauing laid aſide his holy veſtment, woundeth the ſame, and while it falleth, calls vpon that god to whom he ſacrificeth; and then putteth a halter about the necke, and ſtrangleth it, without kindling any fire, or vowing, or other ceremonie, and flayeth it: the fleſh plucked from the bones, hee caſteth into a great Caldron, the bones hee vſeth for fewell to ſeeth the ſame (for wood the Countrie doth not yeeld:) And if they haue not any ſuch veſſell, they put all the fleſh with water into the paunch, and ſo the beaſt doth ſeeth it ſelfe. After it is boyled, he which ſacrificed offereth the libaments, or offerings of the fleſh and inwards: their ſacrifices are, beſides other beaſts, eſpecially of horſes.

Their Temples to Mars they build on this manner. They heape together bundles of twigges, three furlongs in length and breadth, and aboue on them is made a ſquare plaine, three ſides thereof are vpright, the fourth is made ſlope, and the bending-wiſe, thereby to get vp: thither they bring euerie yeere an hundred and fiftie Waines of twigges to ſupply the waſte of them. Vnderneath this worke is erected an old iron ſword, and this is their Image of Mars, to which they offer yeerely ſacrifices, both of other cattell and of horſes: and more to this blade then to other gods. Of their captiues they offer one of an hundred, but after another manner. For after they haue offered wine on their heads, they kill them by a certaine veſſell, and after lifting them vpon that their heape or Temple, they embrew the Sword-god with the bloud. This they doe aboue: beneath in the Temple they cut off all the right ſhoulders of the ſlaine men, and hurle them vp in the aire together with the hands; whereſoeuer the hand ſhall fall, there it lieth, and the dead bodie apart. When they haue performed all their ſolemnities, they depart. Swine are ſo odious to them, that they will haue none of them nouriſhed in their Countrie.

Scythian Temples.

There are among them Diuiners, whoſe Rites are theſe. They bring great bundles of willow twigs, which they lay on the ground, and vntie, and laying them aſunder one by one, diuine. Some of them practiſe diuination with the leaues of the Teil-tree, which they fold, and vnfold in their hands. The King, when at any time hee falleth ſicke, ſendeth for three choice men of thoſe Diuiners; who for the moſt part name ſome man vnto him, which hath forſworne himſelfe, hauing ſworne by the Kings Throne, an oath vſed of the Scythians: preſently the man is brought forth, who, if he denieth what their art hath accuſed him of, the King ſendeth for twice the number of Diuiners: and if they by new practiſe of their art find him guiltie, his head is cut off, and the firſt Diuiners ſhare his goods: but if they ſhall abſolue him, more Diuiners are ſent for; and if the moſt of them doe abſolue him, then thoſe three firſt are thus done to death. They lade a waine with twigs, and binding the Diuiners hand and foot, and ſtopping their mouthes, caſt them into the waines, and ſet all on fire, burning Oxen; waine, and men together, vnleſſe ſome of the Oxen by the burning of their harnes eſcape. This puniſhment inflict they on their falſe prophets. They make their leagues with other Nations in this ſort. They powre wine into a great bowle, mixing therewith the bloud of them which ioine in league, cutting ſome part of the body with a knife or ſword; and then dip in that bowle or mazer a ſword, arrowes, an axe, a dart, and after curſe themſelues with many words, laſt of all drinking the wine. Nicephorus p Gregoras relateth the Scythian Cuſtomes and Expeditions, and their contempt of gold and ignorance of the vſe of it. Theſe on the one ſide, and the Chriſtians on the other, forced the Turkes, which were alſo a kind of Scythians, to ſettle themſelues as they could, in the parts of Meſopotamia, Chaldæa, and Aſſyria, where they left there owne, and learned the Rites and Cuſtomes of the Mahumetans. The Kings are buried amongſt the Gerrhi, with many ceremonies, carrying the dead bodie through all the Countries ouer which hee reigned, which cut and ſhaue themſelues; and with him is buried his beſt beloued Paramour, his Cup-bearer, Cooke, Maſter of his horſe, Waiter, Meſſenger, Horſes, and the firſt fruits of all oher things, and alſo golden Cups: and then they caſt on earth, making a verie great hill.

p Nic. Greg. hiſt. Rom. lib. 2.

When the yeere is gone about, they take fiftie of his principall attendants, which are not ſlaues, but freeborne Scythians, and ſtrangle them with ſo many horſes of the beſt, and faſten the dead men on the dead horſes with much ſolemnitie. But to relate all the particulars hereof, and their burials alſo of priuate men (whoſe dead bodies are carryed about fortie daies, from one friend to another, entertained euerie where with feaſts, &c.) would be too tedious. He that would haue a ſight of theſe things, let him reſort to Thomaſo Porcacchi his Funerali Antichi, where theſe things are not onely diſcourſed in words, but deſcribed in artificiall pictures.

The Scythians ſo farre hate forraine Rites and Religions, that Anacharſis, a Scythian Philoſopher, hauing trauelled through a great part of the world, and vowed to the mother of the gods, if he returned home in ſafetie, that he would ſacrifice to her, with ſuch Rites as hee had ſeene obſerued in Cyzicus: in the performance of his vow, was ſlaine by King Saulius.

Scyles q alſo being King of the Scythians, when he brought in forraine Rites, and obſerued the mad Bacchanal ſolemnities, which hee had ſeene among the Greekes, loſt both his Kingdome and life. r They cut off the noſes of men, and imprinted pictures in the fleſh of women, whom they ouercame: and generally their Cuſtomes of f war were bloudie: what man ſoeuer the Scythian firſt taketh, he drinketh his bloud: hee offereth to the King all the heads of the men he hath ſlain in battaile: otherwiſe he may not ſhare in the ſpoile: the skins of their crownes flayed off, they hang at their horſe-bridles: t their skins they vſe to flay for napkins and other vſes, and ſome, for cloathing. Once a yeere the chiefe men haue a ſolemnitie amongſt them, in which they powre wine into a Mazor, of which none may drinke, which hath not ſlaine an enemy.

Iland, and the deuotions therein performed to Achilles and Patroclus: that certaine birds keepe the Temple, watering and ſweeping the ſame with their wings, and the Goates which feed in the Ile there preſent themſelues for ſacrifice, when the price is firſt paid at the Altar to the contentment of that Deitie, or Diuell, whoſe illuſion (if not others colluſion) it muſt needs bee: But becauſe this Iland adioyneth to Europe, I muſt forbeare theſe things till another time. He alſo deſcribeth the Nations, both in Aſia and Europe, which abutt round about that Sea. Iornandes [z] bringeth theſe Scythians bordring from Scanzia (ſo hee calleth that Peninſula, which others name, Baſilia, Scandia, Scandinauia, &c. Wherein are the Kingdomes of Sweden, Gothland and Norway) and attributeth to the Goths thoſe warres, which the Egyptians and Perſians are ſaid to haue made againſt the Scythians. Neere to Mæotis King Filimer planted himſelfe and his followers; in Dacia, Thracia and Mæſia Zamolxes, who was alſo a great Philoſopher. Theſe and the reſt were not onely a terrour to the skirts of Aſia, but to the heart of Africa and Europa, in proceſſe of time ſacking Rome, and ſhaking that Roman Monarchy almoſt to the ground. Simocatta [a] in his Mauritian Hiſtory giueth the preeminence of Martiall valour, amongſt the many many Scythian Nations to the ABARES. Chaganus the Scythian King, ſent Embaſſadors to Mauritius, with an Epiſtle, wherein he ſtileth himſelfe Gouernour of ſeuen Nations, and Lord of the ſeuen Climats of the world. He comquered the Abdelæ or Nephthalites, the Abares (ſome of which fled to Tangaſt to the Turkes) and the [b] Ogor-Nation which dwell by the Riuer Til (or Volga) whoſe ancient Princes were called War, and Chunnai. He conquered alſo the Prince of Colch, in which war hee ſlew three hundred thouſand people, their carkaſſes lying ſcattered foure daies iourney. Hee ſubdued alſo the Turkes at the hill Icar, which is foure hundred miles diſtant from the golden Mountaine: ſo they call a mountaine in the Eaſt, becauſe of the fertilitie and ſtore of cattell therein: which alwayes the greateſt Chagan amongſt the Turkes poſſeſſeth. For Chagan is not a proper name, but a Princely title, which in thoſe parts, and the Countries adioyning is ſtill continued: the Tartars calling their Princes Chan (which [c] ſome perhaps falſly, write Cham) and the Perſians and Turkes ſtill vſing that title. Theſe Turkes vaunted themſelues neuer ſubiect to Earth-quakes or Peſtilence. They cal their Prieſt Taiſan, that is, the Sonne of GOD. Their Religion I haue before mentioned. They haue a cuſtome that the males neuer weare gold. This Citie was diuided by a ſtreame, which ſometimes ſeparated two diſagreeing Nations, no leſſe diſtinguiſhed by their diſioyned mindes and differing habites, the one wearing blacke, the other red. This Citie, they ſay, was built by Alexander, when hee had ouercome the Sogdians and Bactrians. The Kings wiues ſhining with Iewels, are carryed in golden Chariots, each drawne with one Bull, the bridles embоſſed with gold. The Prince (as is ſaid elſewhere) ſpent the night with ſeuen hundred women. Fame attributeth another Citie, not farre hence, to Alexander, called Chubdan. The Prince thereof being dead, his wiues in blacke, with ſhauen heads, continually mourne, and may neuer forſake the Sepulchre. Theſe haue many Elephants, and traffique with the Indians which dwell Northwards, and make Silke. Thus much I thought worth the adding out of Simocatta, for better knowledge both of the Turkiſh and of the Tartarian Hiſtorie, as well as of the Scythian.

The MASSAGETAE, [d] famous for the ouerthrow of Cyrus, eſteeme the Sunne alone for God, and offer vnto him a horſe. They haue one wife to each man, and yet euery one vſeth alſo his Neighbors wife openly, hanging meane while his quiuer on the Waine or Cart: The beſt death, and moſt happy amongſt them, is, when they are become old, to bee cut in pieces, and to be eaten together with ſheeps fleſh: if hee dye naturally, they burie him in the earth, as dying a baſe and beaſtly [e] death. Their weapons are of braſſe, their furniture of gold, of both which they haue much ſtore, little of yron and ſiluer. [f] The BACTRIANS, when they were old or worne with ſickneſſe, caſt their Parents to Dogs, which they kept for this purpoſe, and called Buryall Dogs. The Bactrian women are pompous, [g] riding in great ſtate, and lye with their ſeruants, and with ſtrangers. They haue among them Brachmanes; Zoroaſtres the Bactrian is accounted firſt author of the Magi, and of liberall Arts: he liued twenty yeeres in a wilderneſſe with cheeſe: but others account this another Zoroaſtres.

The SACAE ſometimes made neerer, ſometimes further inuaſions: they poſſeſſed Bactria, and a great part of Armenia, which after of them was called Sacaſena, and proceeded vnto Cappadocia, where, in the midſt of their feaſtings, being in the night ſurpriſed by the Perſians, and ſlaine, they left their name Saca or Sacea, to a yeerely ſolemnitie among the Perſians, in memory of this victory. Of the Saca, ſome hold [h] our Saxons to be deſcended. Dionyſius in his Greeke verſes giueth them the higheſt praiſe for ſhooting of all others.

The AMAZONS, of whom is before related, are ſaid [i] to be deſcended of the Scythians, who vnder the conduct of Plinos and Scolpythus, ſettled themſelues by the Riuer Thermodon, and poſſeſſed the field of Themiſcyra: But when they continued to ſpoile the adioyning

Countries, they were by secret conspiracie of those people destroyed. Their wiues [k] became Warriours both in defence and offence, and did great acts vnder their two Queenes, Marthesia and Lampedo: after, Ohera and Antiope the daughter of Marthesia, in the time of Hercules, reigned: then Penthesilea, who in the Troian warres was slaine. Yet the reliques of that Nation continued vntill Mintbia or Thalestris, in Alexanders time; and by degrees ware out altogether. One of their Queenes instituted the sacrifice to Mars and Diana, called Tauropolium, saith Diodorus [l], who addeth that they liued not without men, but that they put the men to domesticke drudgeries, and exercised the women in the field. Yet doth hee no lesse then Strabo make doubt of these Amazonian, or Vnimammian Nation [m]: and no lesse of the HYPERBOREAN, which hee thus relateth out of Hecatæus, that they dwell in an Iland in the Ocean neere vnto the Pole, in which Latona was borne, and Apollo was most of all worshipped: and that the Ilanders generally are Apolloes Priests, euerie day chanting Hymnes in his praise: they haue also a huge Groue, and a round Temple dedicated to Apollo, to whom their Citie is sacred. These and other things fable they of the Hyperborei, to which Salinus [n] addeth many other, of the clemencie of the ayre, of the innocencie of the men, of their freedome from sicknes, and voluntarie seeking for death in the fulnes of daies (after they haue made merrie, casting themselues from a certaine Rocke into the Sea) all these pleasures concurring notwithstanding; things contrarie both to Truth and Nature, except with Goropius [o] wee turned some parts, at least of this Historie into an Allegorie. He yet historically interpreteth, that they which placed the Hyperborei beyond the Arimaspi, these beyond the Issedones, and those also beyond the Scythians, and these againe beyond the Cimmerians, intended the Europæan Scythians, or inhabitants about Mæotis, the Liuonians and Muscouites, the Issedones to be in Scandia, and all alongst those frozen or Icy Seas, as he proueth by Etymologie of the word: North-East, and Eastwards from these in the continent of Asia he placeth the Arimaspi, and in the continent of America Mexicana hee seateth the Hyperborei: They which list to haue recourse to his learned discourses of this argument. Porcacchi [p] telleth of some Scythians, which hanged their dead on trees (as the Colchi of old, and some Tartarians are still reported to do) esteeming it a disgrace to be buried in the earth. The Taurici buried with their Kings some of their best friends. The DERBICES [q] feasted with the flesh of their kinsmen, which were seuentie yeeres old: the women at that age they strangled, and after buried. The CASPIANS straitly imprisoned such as attained to that age, and their famished them. Some say they laid them amongst the woods, and obserued what became of them; esteeming them (as is said before of the Persians) highly honoured, and next to a canonizing, whom the Birds tare with their talons. In the next degree of happinesse, whom Dogs or wilde beasts praied on: but beneath all disasters and disaduentures, which could find neither the one nor the other, to become vnto them such enemie-friends. The TIBARENI crucifie those old men which they haue best loued. The HERVLES being sicke or old, were placed by their kindred on a pile of wood, and there by another, which was not of that kinne, slaine with a dagger, who being descended, the pile was fired. His wife was forced to hang her selfe, or else to abide perpetuall infamie. But I am loth to burie you in these buriall Rites.

The Scythians punished [r] no fault more seuerely then theft. They would make themselues drunken with the smoake of hearbs burnt in the fire. They sware by the Kings Throne, by their Sword, and by the Wind [s]. When they had sacked Athens, and piled a heape of bookes to the fire, which others had compiled with studious paines, one of the companie disswaded burning of them, lest that the Greekes neglecting the Muses, would become Martiall. [t] They doubled their numbers at foure, as we doe at ten, through vnskilfulnesse in numbring.

Of the Tartarians, and of Diuers Nations which they Subdued; with their Pristine Rights.

THE names of Scythia and Sarmatia, are now together with those Nations swallowed vp and drowned in that Tartarian deluge, which about foure hundred yeeres since, with a sudden torrent ouerwhelmed the greatest part of Asia; that we speake not of Europe, the heart whereof, quaked and trembled with feare of this Tempest. From Rome did Pope [a] Innocent the fourth send Embassadors, by entreaties to preuent their Armes, when as they had already ouerrunne (besides those Countries which still beare their name) Russia, Polonia, Silesia, Morauia, Hungaria, euen as farre as Austria. So farre was the huge vnwealdie Empire of Alexander, or of the Romans, short of the Tartarian greatnesse, that the expedition of some one [b] of the Subiects of this Empire, hath pierced as farre into the West, as euer Alexander into the East, and that happily among more resolute courages, then the Persians or Indians, effeminated with wealth and Peace, could afford: and Tamerlane alone some ages after (if wee credit that Historie [c] of his life, translated out of the Arabike) subdued and obtayned more (besides his owne inheritance) then all that which the Romanes had atchieued in that eight hundred yeeres and vpwards, wherein their Empire was growing to the full: but of him afterwards.

§. I.

Of the beginning of the Tartarian Nation.

THE name Tartar is proper to a Riuer in Mongull, from whence it was deriued to the people inhabiting neere the same, which after gaue both name and lawes to so great a part of the world. For thus writeth Ioannes [d] de Plano Carpini, which was sent Embassador to the Tartarian Court, from Pope Innocent, Anno 1246. There is a Countrey in the East part of the world called Mongol: which had sometimes foure sorts of Inhabitants: Teka-Mongol, that is, the great Mongols; Sumorgul, that is, water-Mongols; these called themselues [e] Tartars, of a Riuer which runneth thorow their Countrey, named Tartar: the third Merkat, the fourth Metrit. These all were alike in person and language, but diuided amongst themselues into seuerall Prouinces, and vnto seuerall Princes. In the land of Teka-Mongol, was [f] Cingis, who began to bee a mightie hunter before the Lord: for he learned to steale men. He ranged into other Countries, taking as many captiues as he could, and ioyned them vnto himselfe. Also he allured the men of his owne Countrey vnto him, who followed him as their Ring-leader to doe mischiefe. Then began he to warre vpon the Sumongols or Tartars, and slew their Captayne, and after many conflicts subdued them to himselfe, and brought them all into bondage. Afterward he vsed their helpe against the Merkats, whom also hee vanquished in battell. Proceeding from thence, hee fought against the Metrites, and vanquished them also. Naimani hearing that Cingis was thus exalted, greatly disdayned thereat: for they had a great and mighty Emperour, vnto whom all the fore-foresaid Nations payed tribute. Whose sonnes (when hee was dead) succeeded him in his Empire. Howbeit, being yong and fooliſh, they knew not how to gouerne the people, but were diuided, and fell at variance among themselues. These inuaded Cingis his Countrey, putting the Inhabitants to the sword, but were after ouerthrowne by the Mongols, and either slaine or made captiues.

Some g fetch the Tartarian pedigree from the ten Tribes of Israel, which Salmanasar carryed captiues: and in their Maps h place hords of Danites, Nepthalites, &c. in the furthest Northerly and Easterly bounds of Asia; which yet are a great part of the world, not only from Media (whither those people were conueyed) but from any part of the Assyrian Empire. (The King of Tabor, or Tybur, in these parts, is said to haue come into France, to Francis the French King about the yeare 1540. and was after at Mantua by Charles the Emperor burned, for secret sollicitation of him and other Christian Princes to Iudaisme.) And Opmeerus i reporteth of that their iourney passing thorow Euphrates, miraculously staying his streame (to wonder at the vanitie of Writers) when they went into a Region called Aisarich, which was a yeere and a halfes trauell, there to keepe their Law; where neuer before had beene any habitation. But these things haue small probabilitie.

M. Paulus k (who with his Father and Vncle liued many yeeres in the Court of the great Chan, aboue three hundred yeeres since) saith, that they dwelled at first (if such wandring may be so called) in the North, where they had no Lord ouer them, but payed tribute to a great Signor (there called Uncam, and here in these Countries Presbyter Iohn) to whom they payed the tenth of their beasts. But this Uncam, or Presbyter Iohn fearing their numbers euery where multiplying, deuised to disperse them through the World: which the Tartars perceiuing, with ioynt consent forsooke their former habitation, and departed thence farre off into the North, denying further tribute vnto Vncam.

After they had there continued a certayne time, they chose to their King about the yeere 1162. one which was called Cingis Can, who ruled them with such modestie and iustice, that they loued and feared him as a god, his fame reducing all the other Tartars in other parts vnder his obedience. He thus strengthened, wearie of those desarts, commanded them to arme themselues with bowes, and other weapons, and began to inuade and conquer Cities and Prouinces to his subiection, the principall inhabitants whereof hee carryed with him, kindly entertayning them, leauing such discreete Gouernours in the same, that the people were secured in their persons and goods. When he had thus subdued about nine Prouinces, he sent his Embassador to l Uncam, to demand his daughter in marriage: which Vncam with much indignation and many threatnings denying, Cingis assembling his forces, marched against him, and by the way enquired of his Astrologers and Diuiners touching his successe. They taking a greene reed, cleft it a sunder, placing the parts thereof a good distance one from another, and writ vpon the one the name of Vncam, and Cingis on the other; telling the King, that whiles they were reading their coniuring charmes, these reeds would fight together, and the victory should remaine with him whose reede got the better: which accordingly came to passe in the sight of the Armie: Cingis his reed ouercomming the other, as after Cingis himselfe did Vncam, whom he slew in the field, and possessed his daughter and state, wherin he continued sixe yeeres conquering Cities and Kingdomes, and at last was wounded at a Castle called Thaigin, in the knee, whereof he dyed, and was buryed in Mount Altay.

The next Emperour (after his account) was Cin Can; the third, Baythin Can; the fourth, Allan the brother of Mangu; Esu Can, the fifth; Mongu Can, the sixth; the seauenth Cublai Can, who not only inherited what the former had conquered; but in the sixtieth yeere of his raigne subdued in a manner the rest of (those parts of) the World. The word Can signifieth Emperour. Whereſoeuer these Emperours dye, they are buryed in Altay aforesayd; they which carry him killing all they meete within the way, bidding them goe to the other world to serue their Emperor. For this end they also slay the best horses, to serue their dead Lord in another world. When Mangu Can was buried, there were more then ten thousand men slaine by the Souldiers which conueyed him. In this Historie of M. Paul, obserue that this Catalogue of Emperours is vnsound: for W. de Rubruquis in Bathyes time, was at the Court of Mangu Can, to whom Bathy was subiect. Occoday is left out, and Esu put in. The cause of this errour seemeth to bee, the giuing of this name Can to the chiefe Dukes, as Bathy, &c. and the want of exact written Chronicles in those times amongst them.

The great Exploits of CINGIS or CANGIVS the first Tartarian Emperor.

FOr further light into this Historie, I thinke it not amisse to set downe what Haithon or Anthony the Armenian hath written of the Tartarian beginnings. This our Author was Royally descended in Armenia, where hee liued about three hundred yeeres since, and at the request of Pope Clement the fift, writ the History of the Tartars, from Cingis or Cangius till Mango Can, taken out of the Tartarian Histories: the rest he partly saw with his eyes, and partly learned of his Vnckle, an eye-witnesse of the same, who had attended on Haithon the Armenian King, in the great Cans Court. The Countrey where the Tartars first dwelt (saith [m] Haithon) is beyond the Mount Belgian, where they liued like beasts, hauing neither letters, nor Faith, nor Habitation, nor Souldierie, nor reputation among their Neighbour-Nations. There were of them diuers Nations, called by one common name Mogli, which were diuided into seuen principall Tribes, whose names were Tartar, Tangut, Cunat, Talair, Sonieh, Monghi, Tebeth. These all being subiects to their Neighbours, a poore old man being a Smith (who, as they beleeue, was ingendred of the Sun beames) saw in his sleepe an armed man on a white horse, which said vnto him, O Cangius, The will of the Immortall GOD is, that thou bee the Gouernour of the Tartarians, and Ruler of the seuen Nations, to free them from their bondage and tribute. This his vision, when he reported to others, they would not beleeue him, vntill that the night following, the chiefe men amongst themselues saw the same man, with command from the immortall GOD, to yeeld obedience vnto Cangius. This they performed with all reuerence, and spred in the midst of them a black felt, with a seat thereon, on which the seuen Princes or chiefe men placed Cangius, calling him Can, that is, Emperor, and kneeled before him. This happily was then the most sumptuous [n] Throne their State could afford, but continued in the Royall inuestiture of their succeeding Soueraignes, their exceeding Riches and Conquests notwithstanding: at two of which solemnities (saith our Author) I my selfe haue beene present. Cangius thus inthronized on his felt, commanded them many things: first, to beleeue the immortall GOD: and from thence forwards, the Tartars began to call vpon the name of the immortall GOD, seeking for his ayde in all their enterprises: secondly, hee commanded to make a generall view of all such as were able to beare armes, appointing Captaines ouer tens, ouer thousands, and ouer ten thousands, which made a full Regiment. Hee commanded also those seuen principall heads of their Tribe, to bereaue themselues of their dignities; and for further triall of their obedience, each of them to bring thither his eldest sonne, and to cut off his head, each with his owne hand: which they refused not to doe, in reuerence to that diuine ordinance, whereby hee was made their Soueraigne. Cangius hauing thus made tryall of their fidelitie, subdued many Nations: and one day hauing his horse slaine in battell vnder him, was forsaken of his Tartars, dispayring his recouerie after they saw him fall, and might easily haue beene slaine, had not his enemies through ignorance neglected him, to pursue the rest: which Cangius perceiuing, conueyed himselfe into a thicket of shrubs; and when his enemies returned to despoile the dead, an Owle came and sate on the shrub, vnder which Cangius was hidden, which caused them not to suspect any to lurke there, and so they departed. He the next night fled to his people; who seeing him, and hearing the order of his escape, gaue thanks to the immortall GOD, who by meanes of that Bird had preserued him. They also had (after this) that [o] Fowle in such reuerence, that it is accounted a happy thing to weare one of her feathers on their heads. Cangius afterwards assaulting his enemies, brought vnder, both them, and all the Countries on that side of Belgian. The exact time of these things Haithon could not learne, notwithstanding his much enquiry: which he imputeth to their want of letters at that time.

These Countries thus conquered, the armed man appeared to him the second time, and commanded him in the name of the immortall GOD to passe the Mountayne Belgian, and goe towards the West, where he should conquer Kingdomes, Signories and Lands. And that thou mayest be assured that this is the will of GOD, arise and goe with thy people towards the Mountayne, to that part which ioyneth on the Sea: There thou shalt dismount, and turne thee toward the East, and kneeling downe nine times, shalt worship the immortall GOD, and he which is Almightie shall shew thee the way by which thou mayest commodiously passe. Cangius presently commands his people with their wiues and families to accompanie him in this enterprise; and when they were come to the Sea, forgat not with his followers to performe those nine worships; and staying there that night in his prayers, the next day hee saw that the Sea had gone nine foot backe from the Mountayne, and left a spacious way, by which they with all their substance passed Westward. Hence it is that the Tartars ascribe some happinesse to the number of nine, and hee that will offer a present to any Tartarian Signor, must offer nine p things, which custome they vse in their tributes vnto this day, as Master Ienkinson found by experience to his cost. Cangius after many aduentures, and many lawes which of him were called Iasack Cangis Can, hauing first perswaded his twelue sons (wherein I thinke his nephewes were also reckoned) to concord, bidding each of them to bring him an arrow, which together, none of them, asunder, the least of them might easily breake; hee dyed.

p The number of nine.

This Historie of Cingis or Cangius, I haue thus fully related, for knowledge both of the beginnings of their State and Religion: and if these Visions seeme fabulous, yet might Cingis in his subtilty deale with them, as Mahomet with his Arabians, or Numa with the Romans; the one making Gabriel, the other Ægeria, Authors of their policies: and what hee in part pretended, might by Fame and Time be augmented. Although I see not, but that this History of Cingis may as well be credited, as that of Alexander in Iosephus, to whom appeared one in the habite of the Iewish High Priest, commanding him to vndertake that enterprise, with promise of assistance; for which cause, he whom the World worshipped as a King, and as a God, did worship, q himselfe prostrate before Iaddus the High Priest. And the same r Author also saith, that the Pamphylian Sea diu ded it selfe to giue way vnto his Macedonian Souldiers, hauing no other way to destroy the Empire of the Persians.

r Ios. Antiq. lib. 2. in fine.

To returne to our Fryer with whom we began; he reporteth s that Cingis, after his victorie against the Naimani, warred vpon the Kythayans, where hee was ouerthrowne, and all the Nobles, except seuen, slaine. Hauing breathed himselfe a while at home, hee inuaded the Huyri, a Christian people of the Nestorian Sect, whom they ouer-came, and receiued of them Letters, of which before they were ignorant. After them, he subdued the Saroyur, Karanites, and Hudirat. This done, he waged Warre against the Kythayans or Cathayans, whose Emperour he shut vp into his chiefe Citie, where Cingis besieged him, till that Victuall fayling in his Campe, he commanded that they should eate euery tenth man of the Armie. They of the Citie fought valiantly with Engines, Darts, Arrowes: and when Stones wanted, they threw Siluer, especially molten siluer. But by vnder-mining the Tartars made way from the Armie into the middest of the Citie, where they issued vp, and opened the gates by force, and slew the Citizens. This is the first time that the Emperour of the Kathayans being vanquished, Cingis Cham obtayned the Empire. The men of Kaytay t are Pagans, hauing a speciall kinde of writing by themselues, and, as it is reported, the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament. They haue also recorded in Histories the liues of their fore-fathers, and they haue Eremites, and certayne houses made after the maner of our Churches, which in those dayes they greatly resorted vnto. They say, that they haue diuers Saints also, and they worship one God. They adore and reuerence Christ Iesus our Lord, and beleeue the Article of eternall life, but are not baptized. They doe also honorably esteeme and reuerence our Scriptures. They loue Christians, and bestow much almes, and are a very courteous and gentle people. They haue no beards, and they agree partly with the Mongals in the disposition of their countenance. There are not better Artificers in the world. Their Countrey is exceeding rich in Corne, Wine, Gold, Silke, and other commodities. Of their writing, Fryer Bacon, from the Relations of W. Rubruquis, which liued in his time, and Rubruquis himselfe (as in the Manuscript thereof appeareth) testifie that it was done with pencils and in characters: as the Chinois and Iaponites still vse. The Iugres write from the top to the bottome of the page, and from the left hand to the right: the men of Tebeth as wee doe: those of Tangat from the right hand to the left, but multiply their lines vpwards. The Cathayans (saith Rubruquis) are little men, and speake thorow the nose. They are good artificers, the sonne succeeding in the fathers trade. Their Physitians deale with hearbes, but not with vrines. There were amongst them Nestorians, who had a Bishop residing in Segni. Their bookes were in Syriake: themselues ignorant of that tongue. They were drunkards, vsurers, and some of them had many wiues. They washed their lower parts when they entred their Churches: they feast and eat flesh on Fridayes, as the Saracens. Their Bishop visits them scarce once in fiftie yeeres. And then all their Males, euen infants also, are ordred Priests. The Idolaters amongst them are more moderate, some of which weare yellow broad cowles: some are Eremites, and leade an austere life in woods and hills. Cathaya had not then any vines, but they made drinke of Rise, wherewith they also tooke a kinde of Apes, which would drinke themselues drunken with that pleasant liquor: out of whose neckes they tooke the blond wherewith they died purple.

the Indians, who subdued India Minor. These Indians are the blacke Saracens [u], which are also called Æthiopians. Thence hee marched to fight against Christians, dwelling in India Maior, whose King was commonly called Presbyter Iohn, who by a stratageme repelled them out of his dominion. In trauelling homewards, the said Armie of the Mongals came vnto the Land of Buirthabeth, the inhabitants whereof are Pagans, and conquered the people in battaile. This people haue a strange custome: When any mans father dieth, hee assembleth all his kindred, and they eat him. They haue no beards, but with an iron instrument plucke out the haires, if any grow. Cyngis himselfe went vnto the Land of Kergis, which they then conquered not, And in his returne home his people suffered extreme famine: and by chance finding the fresh entrailes of a beast, they cast away the dung, sod it; and brought it before Cyngis, and did eate thereof. Hereupon Cyngis enacted, That neither the bloud, nor the entrailes, nor any other part of a beast, which might bee eaten, should be cast away, saue onely the dung. Hee was afterward slaine by a thunderclap, leauing behind him foure sonnes; the first Occoday, the second Thossut Can, the third Thiaday, the name of the fourth is not knowne.

of OCCODAY the next Emperour, and CVINE CAN.

CYNGIS being dead, Occoday was chosen Emperour. He sent Duke Bathy his nephew, the sonne of Thossut Can, against the Countrey of Altisoldan, and the people called Bisermini, who were Saracens, but spake the Language of Comania, whom hee subdued. Thence they marched against Orna, a Port Towne on the Riuer Don, where were many Gazarians, Alanians, Russians, and Saracens, which he drowned with the Riuer running thorow the Citie, turning it out of the chanell. Thence they passed into Russia, and made foule hauocke there, destroying Kiou, the chiefe Citie. They proceeded against the Hungarians and Polonians, and in their returne inuaded the Morduans, being Pagans, and conquered them in battaile. Then they marched against the people called Bylori, or Bulgaria magna, and vtterly wasted the Countrey. From hence they proceeded towards the North against the people called Bastarci, or Hungaria magna, and hauing conquered them, subdued also the Parossitæ and Samogetæ, thence proceeding vnto the Ocean Sea.

Occoday 2. Tart. Imp.

At the same time Occoday sent Cerpodan against Kergis, who subdued them in battaile. These are Pagans, hauing no beardes at all. They haue a custome, when any of their fathers die, in token of lamentation, to draw (as it were) a Leather thong ouerthwart their faces, from one eare to the other. Hence hee marched with his forces Southward against the Armenians, which they conquered, with part of Georgia, receiuing tribute of the other part; and from thence into the Dominions of the mightie Soldan, called Deurum, whom they vanquished in fight. And to be short, they went on further, sacking and conquering euen vnto the Soldan of Aleppo, whose Countries they subdued. They marched against the Caliph of Baldach, and exacted at his hands the daily tribute of foure hundred Byzantines, besides Baldakines, and other gifts. Thus farre of their Conquests out of Frier Iohn aforesaid, who was in person with Bathy, or Baydo, and at the Court of Cuine the Emperour.

The Kergis.

Haithon [x] calleth Baydo the second sonne of Occoday, or Hoccota Can, affirming, That hee sent his three sonnes; Iochi into the West, as farre as Tygris; Baydo towards the North: and Chagoday towards the South. Hee sent also one Baydo (whither the same, or another) with thirtie thousand horse, against the Soldan of the Turks, whose Realme hee subdued in the yeere 1244. He addeth, That Baydo hauing conquered Cumania [y], (which hee confineth on the East with the Corasmians, on the West with the Euxine, on the North with Cassia, haply Casan, on the South with the Riuer Etil) he subdued Russia, Gazaria, Bulgaria, and so passing into Austria; following the streame of his victories, in the passage of a great streame was there drowned. His heires succeeded him in the places which he had conquered; which Seignorie Tochay possessed in Haithons time. This Historie of Baydo his death is not likely: For Yvo of Narbona, in an Epistle to the Archbishop of Burdeaux, recorded by [z] Matth. Paris in the yeere 1243. saith, That in the same present summer they had departed out of Hungarie, and laid siege to Neustat, wherein this Yvo then was: and in the yeere 1246. Frier Iohn was with the said Baydo, who also rehearseth that Hungarian Expedition, and his returne vnto those parts about Volga, or Etil. Likewise William de Rubruquis, a Frier Minorite, was sent to Baatu (so he calleth him) from Lewes the French King, in Anno 1253.

a Mat. à Michou de Sarmat. lib. 1.

And to this agreeth Mathias a Michou [a] in his Sarmatian Historie, who witnesseth, That in the yeere 1241. the Tartars, vnder Bathu, came into Russia, and destroied Kiou, a Citie before stately and beautifull, hauing in it three hundred Churches and more, very faire, of which some remaine to this day among the shrubs and briers, receptacles for wilde beasts. It was the Seat of the Metropolitan, who had vnder him many Bishops thorow Moldauia, Valachia, Russia, and Muscouia. Hee sent Peta into Polonia, who destroied the Countrey, and on Ashwednesday turned Cracouia into ashes, abandoned before both of the Prince and People; and after ouerthrew Duke Henrie, and other Noblemen, with the forces of the Countrie assembled against them, together with Pompo, the great Master of the Dutch Order in Prussia: in which battaile, a certaine Tartarian Standard-bearer, carrying in a great Standard the Grecke letter X, and on the top of the staffe a blacke and terrible Image, with a long beard, began [b] with inchantment strongly to shake the head of the Image: whereupon a smoake and cloud of intolerable stinke was presently dispersed ouer the Polonians, and they became heartlesse and vnable to fight. Duke Henrie, and Duke Boleslaus, and Pompo, with the flower of their Nobility, were heere slaine, and the Countrie miserably spoiled. From hence they went into Morauia, where they put all to fire and sword more then a moneth together: and thence to Hungary to Bathy, who entred Hungarie with 500000. souldiers; where first ouerthrowing those forces which King Bela had sent to prohibite them passage, they after chased the King himselfe, with the power of his Kingdome opposing himselfe against them, out of the field, who fled into Austria, and after into Sclauonia, leauing his Countrey a prey to the Tartars: who making spoile on that side of Danubius, the next Winter passed ouer the Riuer, then frozen, and filled all with bloud and slaughter. Bathy sent Cadan to pursue the King into Sclauonia, still fleeing before him, who wasted Bosna, Seruia, and Bulgaria. And after two yeeres sackage in Hungarie, they passed by the fennes of Mæotis into Tartaria, and haply had returned to make fresh spoiles in Europe, if the Embassage of Pope Innocent had not diuerted their purpose: or rather, that Occaday their great Chan being about that time poisoned, they were to expect a new Commission from his successour, which was Cuine; who when he was installed, euen in the presence of Fryer [c] Iohn, the Popes Legat, erected a Banner against all Kingdomes of the Christians, except they would bee subiect to him: for their intent was to subdue all the world, as Cyngis Cham had ordained; and the superscription of his Seale was God in Heauen, and Cuine Chan vpon Earth, the strength of God, the Seale of the Emperour of all men. Hee kept his Court vsually in the land of Naymans, the plaines whereof were extended like to the Sea, without the rising of any hill. The cold most eager and sharpe till March, little winde, nor snow, except in the end of Aprill. At Caracarum Rubruquis met with an English man borne in Hungaria, which was expert in many languages; his name was Basilius. Heere hee found two Mosches and one Church.

BVt Cuine in short time after died, and left the Empire to Mangu Can; to whom Aytonus [d] the Armenian King went voluntarily in person, about the yeere 1257. and receiuing gracious entertainement, made vnto him seuen petitions: first, That he and his people should become Christians: secondly, That there should be perpetuall peace betweene the Tartars and Christians: thirdly, That in all Countries conquered by the Tartars, the Churches and Clergie-men of the Christians should bee free from seruitude and tribute: fourthly, That hee would redeeme the Holy Sepulchre and the Holy Land from the Saracens: fifthly, That hee would destroy the Caliph of Baldack: sixthly, That himselfe might haue aid, as neede should require, in his defence, of such Tartars as were neere vnto Armenia: seuenthly, That such parts of Armenia as the Saracens now possessed, and the Tartars should recouer from them, might returne to the Crowne of Armenia. Mangu-Can answered, after deliberation with his Nobles, to the first, That himselfe would bee a Christian, and perswade other his subiects, but force none thereunto: and to the rest in order, that his requests in all should be fulfilled, and to that end hee would send his brother Haolon into those parts, as is before alreadie shewed. Thus was Mangu baptized by a Bishop, then Chauncellor of Armenia, and all his houshold, and many Nobles of both sexes. But before Ierusalem could bee recouered, Mangu died, and Cobila, or Cublai Can succeeded, in whose time M. Paulus [e] was an eye-witnesse of the Tartarian proceedings, who affirmeth, That this Cublai exceeded in power, not his predecessours onely, but all the Kingdomes of Christians and Saracens, although they were ioyned in one. Before hee obtained the Soueraigntie, hee shewed himselfe a valiant Souldier: but after hee was Emperour, hee neuer fought field but once against Naiam his vncle, who was able, out of the Prouinces wherein he gouerned, to bring together foure hundred thousand Horse, to whom Caidu should haue added a hundred thousand Horse more. These both conspired against their Master and Lord Cublai: but before their forces were ioyned, Cublai stopping the passages, that none might passe to carrie newes, suddenly assembled, within ten dayes iourney of Cambalu, three hundred and threescore thousand Horse, and an hundred thousand Footmen. With this power riding day and night, he came suddenly on his enemies, and hauing first consulted with his Diuiners, after their manner, gaue the on-set, and tooke Naiam prisoner, whom hee strangled betwixt two Carpets, lest the Earth should drinke, or the Sunne should see the bloud of that imperiall family. Naiam had beene secretly baptized, and now also had the Crosse for his Banner, which occasioned the Iewes and Saracens to scoffe at the Christians: but Cublai vnderstanding hereof, called them all before him, and said, that the Crosse would not helpe such wicked men as Naiam, who was a Traitour to his Lord; say yee not therefore, that the God of the Christians is vniust, to forsake his followers; for hee is the chiefe Bountie and Iustice. Cublai by his Captaines conquered the Kindomes of Mien, Bengala, Mangi, &c. Anno 1286.

§. I.

Of the Tartarian Succession to our dayes.

a M. P. l. 2. c. 5. Tamor 6.

AFter a Cublai Can succeeded Tamor Can, sonne to Cingis, the eldest sonne of Cublai: in whose time Haithon (which then liued) saith, That there were besides, three great Tartarian Princes, but subiect to the great Can: Chapar, which ruled in Turquestan, who was able to bring into the field foure hundred thousand Horsemen armed: Hotchtay, in the Kingdome of Cumania, who was able to arme six hundred thousand horsemen to the wars, but not so resolute as the former. Carbanda, the third, ruled in Tauris, able to assemble an Army of three hundred thousand Horse, well prouided. And all these liued in the Westerne bounds of the Tartarian Empire, euerie way inferiour in wealth and numbers to the Southerly and Easterly parts thereof.

Tarik Mircond a Persian, in his Catalogue of the Cans or Tartarian Emperours, calleth Cublai, by a transposition of the syllables, Vlaku. For thus doth hee recite their names, with the yeeres of their coronations. Chinguis in the yeere of the Hegira 602. Otkay Khaon 626. Gayuk Khaon 643. Manchu Khaon 644. Vlaku Khaon 657. Haybkay Khaon 663. Hamed Khan or Nicudar Oglan 680. Argon Khon 683. Ganiaru Khon 690. Budukhan 693. Gazunkhan 694. Alyaptukhan 703. Sulton Abuzayd Bahader Khan 716. These from Cublai or Vlaku, are the Cans or Vice-royes of Persia and those parts adioyning, and not the great Cans themselues. But of these and of Tamerlane and his issue, wee haue before related at large, in the fourth Persian Dynastie. I haue seene the transcript of a letter sent by King Edward the Second, written 1307. in the first yeere of his reigne, October 16. to Diolgietus King of the Tartars, against Mahomet, and in behalfe of William Liddensis Episcopus and others to preach to his people. But these Tartars it seemeth were of the neerer Mahumetans, and not the great Can of Cathay.

Since Tamor Can, we haue not so continued a Historie of their Empire and Emperours as before, and yet wee haue had succeeding testimonies a long time of their State and Magnificence, but neither so diligent obseruers, nor so exact Writers as the former: besides that, their Histories seeme in some things more fabulous. Of this later sort are Odoricus b, a Frier, which liued three yeeres in the Emperors Court, and trauelled as farre as Quinsay, who died in the yeere 1331. Sir Iohn Mandeuile c our Country-man spent many yeere in those Countries, a few yeeres after Odoricus, and writ the Historie of his Trauels, in the reigne of Edward the third of England; Echiant Can being then Emperour of the Tartars: in which, if many things seeme not worthy credit, yet are they such as Odoricus, or some others, not of the worst Authors had before committed to writing, and haply by others after his time, in those dayes when Printing wanted, foisted into his booke. Once, hee setteth downe the distances, and passages of Countries so exactly, as I thinke he could not then haue learned, but by his owne Trauels. After his time d Nicholo di Conti, a Venetian, trauelled thorow India and Cathay, after twentie fiue yeeres returning home: and going to Eugenius the fourth, then Pope, to bee absolued, because hee had denied the Christian Faith to saue his life, his enioyned penance was, truly to relate to Poggius tht Popes Secretarie his long peregrination: This was in the yeere 1444. About the same time e Iosafa Barbaro, a Venetian, in the yeere 1436. had learned of a Tartarian Embassadour (which had beene at Cambalu, and returning by Tana, was entertained of the said Iosafa) some particulars touching the great Cham and Cathay, some part whereof he heard after confirmed by the mouth of Vsun-cassan, the mightie Persian King, in the yeere 1474. So that from the yeere 1246. thus farre we haue continued succession of the Cathayan Historie, besides that which an Arabian f hath written in this Historie of Tamerlane, now extant in English.

§. II.

The queſtion diſcuſſed whether Cathay be the ſame with China.

I Am the more curious in naming theſe Authors, leſt any ſhould thinke that which is written of this people to bee fabulous (all theſe, in a manner, concurring in the moſt ſubſtantiall things) and becauſe many confound [h] the Countries and affaires of China and Cathay. The cauſe of both which opinions may bee, becauſe that in theſe laſt hundred yeeres and more, in which more of the World, then euer before hath been diſcouered, yet nothing of moment is found out of this Countrie or People. Whereunto may bee anſwered, That ſince, diuers of the great Tartarian Lords, before ſubiects to the great Cham, hauing made themſelues abſolute Lords of their ſeueral States, the way hath not bin ſo open to paſſe, being otherwiſe of it ſelfe exceedingly both long, difficult, and dangerous: and the adioyning Princes recouering themſelues from Tartarian ſeruitude, will neither ſuffer their owne to goe out, nor others freely to enter their Dominions; as the Muſcouite, the King of China, and others. Maſter Ant. [i] Ienkinſon, which went as farre thither-ward as Bogharre, could not paſſe further for warres in thoſe parts. Neither haue any gone thither by Sea. And yet euen in this time wee haue not altogether wanted witneſſes. Ludouicus [k] Vertomannus, an hundred yeeres ſince, in Bengala, met with diuers Chriſtians, who affirmed, That there were in their Countrie diuers Signiors, Chriſtians, ſubiect to the great Cham. Theſe were white men, of a Citie called Sarnau. In M. Hakluits [l] paineſull labours we may reade of diuers paſſages out of Ruſſia and Perſia by Carauans into Cathay. Ramuſius alſo, in his Annotations [m] before M. Paulus, telleth of one Chaggi Memet, a Perſian Merchant, who had beene at Campion and Succuir in Catay (Damircan then reigning) and had acquainted him with diuers partiulars thereof.

Alſo in the Epiſtle of [n] Emanuel Carualius, a Ieſuite, dated at Malaca in Ianuarie, 1599. is contained the tranſcript of Ierome Xauerius his letter from Lahor, the Citie Royall of the great Mogor, dated Auguſt. 1598. Wherein the Ieſuit relateth, That whiles he was in conference with the Prince, there entred into the Palace an olde man of Mahomets Religion, threeſcore yeeres of age, who affirmed to the Prince, That hee had come from Xatai by the way of Mecca. Preſently ſome which knew him, affirmed, That hee had diſtributed in almes an hundred thouſand pieces of gold at Mecca. The Prince asking if it were ſo, hee affirmed, That he did it becauſe he was old, and could not long liue, nor carrie thoſe things away with him. Being demanded of the State of Xatai, he anſwered, That he had there liued thirteene yeeres in the Citie Royall, Xambalu, the King whereof was verie mightie, and had in his Empire a thouſand and fiftie Cities, ſome of them verie populous. He ſaid, he had often ſeene the King, with whom no man ſpeaketh but by a ſupplication, nor is anſwered but by an Eunuch. Being asked how he had acceſſe thither, he anſwered, That he ſuſtained the perſon as well of the Embaſſadour of the King of Caygar, as of a Merchant: and being detained in the firſt City by the Magiſtrate, he ſhewed his Commiſſion, and poſt was preſently ſent to the King who returned in a moneth, riding nintie or an hundred miles a day, with change of Horſes, bringing him letters of admiſſion. No man was troubleſome to him in the way. They puniſh theeues ſeuerely (which alſo is obſerued of the Cathayans in Ioſapha Barbaro, and in Marcus Paulus aforeſaid.) The people he affirmed were white, comely, long-bearded, and very perſonable. In Religion he ſaid they were Iſauites (or Chriſtians, profeſſors of Ieſus) and ſome among them Muſauites, or Iewes, and many Mahumetans, who hoped to draw the King, being a Chriſtian, to their Sect. The Ieſuit addeth, That he further conferred with him another day about their Religion, who told him, that they had many Churches, and ſome very great many Images, both painted and carued, eſpecially of the Crucifixe, which they religiouſly worſhip. Euerie Church hath his Prieſt much reuerenced. The Prieſts liued ſingle, and kept Schooles, wherein they inſtructed the youth, which ſhould after take Orders: they had alſo one among the Prieſts ſupereminent, and were all maintained at the Kings coſts, as were the Churches alſo both built and repaired. They ware blacke clothes, and on Holy-dayes, red; with Caps much like the Ieſuites, but greater. He added, That hee had often ſeene the King go to Church: That there were many of both Sexes, which in Cloyſters liued a Monaſticall life, ſome obſeruing alſo a ſingle life in their owne houſes. He reported, That the Countrie was rich, and had in it many Mines of Siluer: the King had foure hundred Elephants, which they ſaid were brought from Malaca. And from Pegu: alſo hee ſaid, that Merchants reſorted thither, which voyage was halfe a yeere (it ſeemeth thorow the Sea betweene China and Iapan.) Xauerius addeth, That while he was at Caximir, he heard of many Chriſtians in Rebat, a Kingdome ioyning to Xatai, who had Churches, Prieſts, and Biſhips, to whom he had written three wayes in the Portugall and the Perſian Tongues.

This agreeth with Vertomans report.

The greatest obiection against this History, that distinguisheth Cathay from China, is the o Iacob Pantogia. report of Iacob Pantogia o, a Iesuite, in a letter dated from Paquin, the Seate Royall of China, in March 1602. in which hee blameth a double errour of our Maps, both for making China larger then it is, and for adioyning to the same this questioned Kingdome of Cathay, whereas (saith he) China, or Sinay, is Cathay, and this Paquin, where now wee liue, is Cambalu. This hee proueth by the incredible riches which he here saw, agreeing to that which is commonly reported of Cathay, and by the testimonie of certaine Moores and Mahumetans, p Goes saith fixe. whom he found in Paquin, which vsually, euerie fifth p yeere, resort hither vnder shew of an Embassage, and paying of Tribute; indeed for gaine, by way of traffique: (their tribute meane while obtaining sufficient retribution out of the Kings Coffers, who sustaineth them and theirs, all the time of their abode in China, at his owne costs, besides other gifts.) Of these Merchants, which resorted hither out of Persia and the Countrie of the Mogores, the Iesuites by enquiry learned, that this Countrie of China was called Cathay, and had no other name in Persia, and among the Mogores, nor did they know any other Countrie so called. And asking further, how they called the Citie Paquin, they answered, Cambalu: whereupon the Iesuit concludeth without all scruple, as is said. And againe, in the Chinian Epistles, dated 1607. is reported, That q Bened. Goes. q Benedictus Goes (sent fixe yeeres after of the Iesuites by the way Mogor to finde out Cathay) remained in the borders of China, in the Prouince of Xanti, from whence he writ, Anno 1606. That he could finde no other Catay, then the Kingdome of China. This report furthereth Pantogiaes opinion.

But if it be not sufficient to oppose the former report of Xauier, to these of Pantogia and Goes, and the different qualities of the Chinians and Cathayans (as in their proper places shall follow) both in things priuate and publike, Diuine and Humane; I answere, That the name r Marc. Paulus lib. 2. cap. 7. of Cambalu is by Marcus Paulus r and others interpreted, The Citie of the Prince, or Cam.
f Galeotto Pereira relationes Chin. Pequim sig. And Perera f interpreteth Pachin, or Paquin, where the King of China alwaies resideth, to t Trigant sunt Borealem Curiam, ad similitudinam australis quæ dicitur Naquin. signifie the Towne of the Kingdome t, as he was there aduertised, the same signification (in manner) remaining to the diuers appellations in differing languages, as a common name to be applied to any Citie u Royall.

Now for custome of both, whereas in China theeues and malefactors are seldome executed (and none hath power to execute any, without speciall Commission from the King) but either they die by stripes, hunger, or imprisonment, except some few once in a yeere: Marcus Paulus and Iosafa Barbaro, from the relation of eye-witnesses affirme, That in Cambalu was such sudden and rigorous execution of Iustice, that one taking a iarre of Milke u Lit. Iac Anon. Anno 1603. from a womans head, and beginning to drinke, vpon the womans out-cry was apprehended, and presently with a sword cut in sunder, that the bloud and milke issued together; a Tartarian Embassador affirming both this, and that he had seene the like execution vpon another, for taking a piece of Bayes from a woman, so chopped in twaine. But the relation of the Chinian and Cathayan differing Rites will further yeeld scruples in this case. As for the name of x Wil. de Rupr. Hak. tom. 1. Cathay, ascribed to China by the Moores, I answere, That William de Rubruquis x, who was in the Court of Mangu Can, supposeth Cathay to be Serica Regio described by Ptolomey farre more Northerly, then the Iesuite reporteth China to bee, by his owne Astrolabicall y Ptol l. 6. c. 16. obseruation. And to these Seres y Ptolemey ioyneth the Sinæ, or Chinois, on the South, and our later Geographers generally concurre in this opinion. Hee also which readeth z Ioannes de Plano Carp. cap. 5. z Ioannes de Plano Carpini shall finde, that the Tartars conquered the Kara-Kitai, or blacke Cathayans, and then the Emperour of Kithai, be vndermining his Citie, as is said, in the daies of Cyngis; and yet a great part of Kitai remained still vnconquered, and withstood his forces; and namely that part which is neerest the Sea. And this wealthy countrie of great Cathaya hath many Prouinces, the more part whereof doe yet withstand the Moals or Tartars (it is the last Printed period in William de Rubriquis.) I hence gather that the name Kitai was applied to a great part of the North-East of Asia, happily no lesse generall to many Regions on that side, then India to the Southerly parts. And why may not the name of Kathay, as well by the Mogores and Persians, bee giuen to the North parts of China (one parcell of the North-East of Asia) as the name of India, not onely to so great a part of Asia, but to America also, which was called India, because the first Discouerers thought they had encountered the Indian Continent? And these parts of China, may much fitter retaine the name of Cathay, to which Empire it had so long been subiect, and by the Cathayan conquest was first knowne to our world. Since my first Edition I met with the other part of Rubruquis, which Master Hakluit (then whom I know none in this kind more industrious) copied out of an entire booke in the Librarie of Bennet Colledge in Cambridge. Where betweene Cataya and India he placeth a Sea: which fitly agreeth to the Chinian Map, made by the Chinois themselues, who paint a great Bay or Gulfe of the Sea betwixt the Northern parts of China, which we reckon to Cathaia, and the Southerne which may be accounted to India.

India. Further, hee addeth, That all the Nations of Great Cathaya (which Epithete is not a little to bee obserued) are situate amongst the Caucasean hils, on the North side, euen to the Easterne Sea.

But they knew no countrie else so named! True [c]; for the Lawes of the Cathayans forbidding egresse of the Natiues and ingresse of Aliens, and a more forcible law of Mountains and Desarts, wilde beasts, and wilder men; the manifold smaller and more beggerly Segniories betweene, euerie one challenging their ninth (if not themselues confiscating, or theirs robbing all) now in so long a space, may burie euen the name and knowledge of the Great Can, whereas neither Armes of Princes, nor traffique of Subiects can open any new, or retaine the olde notice of Nations. What dreames did the West conceiue of the East in Asia, and South in Africke, till the Armies first, and Merchants after, of the Carthaginians, Macedonians, and Romanes discouered them? And yet how did those flouds of barbarous people afterwards drowne with barbarous ignorance the knowledge of all Arts, and this of Geographie amongst the rest? And till the Tartarians, like a terrible thunder-clap, with the lightning and noyse of their Armies, brought a more sudden then welcome knowledge of themselues to the world, who euer in Persia or Assyria had heard of their names, or of diuers people else (and these Cathayans among the rest) first knowne by their conquests? Further the Iesuite himselfe, to Paquin ascribeth iust fortie degrees: and Marcus Paulus his Father and Vncle went from Boghar (the altitude whereof Master Ienkinson [d] at his being there, obserued to be thirtie nine degrees, and ten minutes: or as [e] Abilfada Ismael placeth it, thirtie nine and an halfe, North, and North-East to goe into Cathay. The like course did the same men hold going into Cathay, from Armenia afterwardes with Marcus himselfe, [f] sempre alla volta di Greco & Tramontana; whereas a course directly East, or inclining to the South, must haue beene taken, if China had beene Catai. Neither is is likely that their iourney would haue beene so much letted by Frosts and Snowes. The same may be gathered out of the discourses following in Marcus Paulus, [g] where he abutteth the countries in succeeding linkes to Cathay, from the East to the Northwards, and from the North-East declining Westward in reckoning from thence. And whereas Pantogia raiseth the most Northerly part of China but to fortie two degrees at the most, wherein, as to an eye-witnesse wee yeeld him credit: How can it stand with reason, how can it be likely that in those temperate climes, the world can yeeld but a few Nations, and those base Moores and Etlinikes, when as a good part of Spaine, halfe Italy, Greece, all France, Germanie, and Hungarie (to omit other welthy parts of the world) are subiect to the same parallels? And indeed herein Pantogia hath well helped vs, whereas our moderne Maps haue caused no small scruple to a diligent obseruer, in placing Cathay, a countrie reported to bee so fertile and ciuill in so Northerly a clime, very indiscreetly [h] raising Cambalu to the height of sixtie degrees, and paralellin g Cathay with Norwey: which cannot stand with other things thereof reported, howsoeuer the Tartars themselues were happily of a more Northerly climate then this mentioned. Others go not so farre, yet they place Cambalu too farre within land, which Paulus saith is within two dayes iourney of the Sea. It seemeth that now this great Tartarian Prince (if there be any such) hath no strength at Sea, and therefore is lesse knowne. And herein participate other great and mightie Princes, Prester Iohn (so called) of Æthiopia in Africa, and the Sophi, and great Mogor, in Asia, ranked iustly amongst the greatest Emperours of the world: who hauing some part of their Dominion adioyning to the Sea, make little or no vse thereof. Abilfada Ismael a Syrian Prince, who wrote an exact Geographie in Arabike about [i] three hundred yeeres since, placeth Cambalu in 144. 8. Long. and 35. 25. Latit. it may happily bee 45. degrees in Latitude, one Figure being falsified, or else inuerted for 53. And as this Latitude disagreeth from that of Paquin, so the Longitude a great deale more: this confirming this opinion further, that Chaggi Memet, Mar. Polo, Mandeuil, Odoricus, Nicolo di Conti, and others, eye-witnesses, speake of China, or Mangi, and of Cathay, as diuers Countries.

c The names of China haue often altered, and so we may thinke of Cathay that sometimes more generall, it is now restrained by the Saracens (the only trauellers into these parts of China where they trade.

vnder the Can three yeeres (according to the Tartarian custome) in Iangui f one of the chiefe Cities of Mangi, hauing vnder it twentie seuen other Cities: and the whole Prouince of Mangi hee placeth South-East from Cathay. And wherefore doth the King of China alwayes abide in Paquin, in the Northerly part of his Kingdome; but, as all which write hereof affirme, because of the Tartars which from those parts conquered the Kingdome? which if they were so base a people, as Pantogia affirmeth, could not be so dreadfull to the Chinois, that their King for their sakes should there make his residence in the skirts and borders of the Kingdome. Albacen g a learned Arabian wrote the Historie of Tamerlanes life, wherein hee telleth of the great Cham of Cambula, and the King of China: as diuers Princes of diuers Countries, one of which accrewed to Tamerlaine by marriage of the Chams onely daughter, and the other by conquest. What needed such a wall (which I my selfe haue seene drawne in a Map of China, of a verie large forme, and made in China it selfe with Chinian characters, hanging in Master Hakluits Chamber at Westminster) made by the Chinois, if the Tartars were not mightie neighbours, especially themselues being so mightie and populous? But it is vnknowne! And who knew that there was such a Kingdome as China an hundred yeeres agoe? Or who hath sayled that way to seeke this, since? And how long was it before it was knowne in our world, that there was such a Prince in the world, as the great Negus aboue mentioned, in Æthiopia; especially hee hauing no Ships for Warre or Merchandize, nor many (scarce any) good Hauens by Sea, to make himselfe knowne: and within land Nature hath as it were imprisoned him, barring vp the passages with Mountains and Desarts: which seemeth now to be the case of the Cathayan; furthered by the iealousie of many great Princes, not to admit any Forreiner in; or licence any of theirs to passe out, for feare of innouation. Sed plenum aleæ est, saith h SCALIGER, de ijs aliquid statuere quæ nobis per caliginem duntaxat nota sunt. It is hard to determine in these mistie mysteries. Euen as in Nature it falleth out that the Sunne shineth there many houres before it ariseth to vs, so in Historie it may happen that there may shine a Tartarian Sun in Cathay, when as a darke night in this long iniquitie of distance hideth him from our eyes.

Thus haue I argued the question, and well know not which way to determine. If this could any thing further the Iesuiticall vow to the Papacie, I could then suspect this opinion of Noueltie (they indeed being the Nouatores, a word which Serarius so delights to fixe vpon vs; or Veteratores, as Scaliger answeres him; quibus nihil antiquius quàm antiquare antiquitatem, as H. Stephanus obiects to some Lypsian Mimikes:) but in matters of Geographie wee may follow him more safely then in Ouranographie, as neerer of kinne to that Great Compasser of the Earth. I know not how to answere many obiections against this Chinian Cathay, but by deniall of truth in Trauellers assertions, some taking too Hyperbolicall and Diabolicall i authoritie: or in the coniectures of Saracens, which, seeing Paganisme in China, so conspire with Popish Imagerie, in selfe-imagined worship: with whites, lights, funerall rites, and other blacke, darke, dead, deuotions, wherein the Chinois and Iesuits seemed alike; thought them of one religion (the Iesuites k owne coniecture:) or that, Time the consumer of all things hath deuoured Cities, Peoples and Religions: or what else soeuer.

If any respect my opinion in this controuersie, I confesse the iournall of Goes lately published, and hereafter inserted, hath made mee make a new search, and take a neerer view: and though Time the Father of Truth must determine the question more fully, yet this is for the present my iudgement (if I may so stile it:) That neither they which confound Cathay with China, nor they which wholly separate them are to be followed. Medio tutissimus ibis. They seeme in this altercation to let truth fall betweene them, which in my conceit is this, that the present Kingdome of China comprehends the best part of Cathay, besides the ancient Chinian limits, by Polo called Mangi. For Mangi (which is the true China) was by the great Can diuided into nine Prouinces or Kingdomes, as Paulus (which assisted in that Conquest) relateth. But when Humvu expelled the Tartars out of China, hee indeuoured the same in all the best parts of Cathaya (now the Northerly parts of the Chinian Kingdome) where the Tartars were strongest, and had kept their residence. These Northerly parts were gouerned by Yunlo his Nephew and Generall of his Forces, who after Humvu his death dispossessed his Sonne, and fixed his vsurped Imperiall seat at Paquin, or Pequim in the North, as being better secured there of his friends, and against the Tartars also his practising neighbours. This Citie hee called Pequim, that is the Northerne Court, in relation to Nanquim or Nanquin, which signifieth the Southerly Court, where Humvu had before resided; both which continue Royall Cities or supreme Courts to this day. The same which in respect aforesaid, they call in China language quim, the Tartarian founders called in their Idiome, Cambalu, Citie of the Prince, which name the Tartars and Saracens (as you haue heard) continue. But that all Cathay is not included in these sixe Prouinces, subiect to China, our reasons before out of Rubruquis are sufficient. And that there is yet a Grand Can in those parts, Lord of great Cities, which are also rich and fortified, hauing Printing, Ordinance, and other ciuill Arts, as in China, may appeare by the Persian Chaggi Memet his Iourney into these Countries, related by himselfe to Ramusio. Goes from Camul in nine daies came to the Northerne parts, those famous walls of China: but Memet trauelled from Camul fifteene daies to Succuir; fiue daies further to Gauta, and then sixe to Campion, not mentioning any wall or impediment from the Chinois. These Cities hee placeth in Tanguth, which Paulus also doth, more Northerly the China or Cathay: both of them mentioning the plentie of Rheubarb, which draweth Merchants thither from farre. Marcus Paulus calleth Tanguth a great Prouince, containing many Prouinces and Cities; himselfe hauing liued at Campion a whole yeere. The Emperour raigning (about seuentie yeeres since) Memet cals Daimircan, this last syllable vsually being annexed to all Princes names in those parts: and cals him the Grand Can, affirming that Succuir and Campion, were but the beginning of his Estate, and his frontire Townes towards the Mahumetans: his people being Idolaters: Now, Tanguth was neuer that I know, by any reckoned either to Cathay (in proper signification) or China. And therefore still wee may beleeue, that there is a Great Can (though little in comparison of those times, when all Asia was in manner subiect to them) still holding some Northerly and worse parts of Cathay, with Tanguth and other [m] better Countries, and perhaps another Cambula too (this being a name appellatiue) though the King of China bee Lord of the best parts of Cathay (of the world) which will bee more apparant by the Relation of this ensuing iourney, through a great part of the Tartarian Prouinces on the West of China, here for the studious Geographie inserted out of Ricci and Trigantius their Relations of China published Ann. 1615. touched before out of the Iesuites Epistles.

§. III.

The long and dangerous Iourney from LAHOR, a Citie of the Great MOGOL to CHINA, by BENEDICTVS GOES.

VPon the Relations of that Mahometan, before mentioned out of Xauerius his Letter, Pimenta the Father Visitor of the Iesuites sent notice thereof into Europe to the Pope and Spaniard. They hearing of so mightie a Nation Christian, the Viceroy of India was commanded to follow Pimenta's directions, who employed Benedictus Goes a Portugall Iesuite in that Expedition, furnished as an [n] Armenian Merchant, changing his name to Abdula Isai, this later appellation signifying a Christian. Thus obtaining the Great Mogol Achabar his Letters Patents to his Viceroyes and neighbour Princes, accompanied with one Isaac an Armenian, he departed from Lahor the sixth of Ianuary 1603. Euerie yeere there is a Carrauan of Merchants which passe out of these parts into the Kingdome of Cascar, about fiue hundred together, for their better defence against Robbers. With these adioyning himselfe, in a moneths trauell hee came to Athec in the same Prouince of Lahor. After passage of a riuer and some stay, hee came after two moneths to Passaur: thence trauelling to a small Towne, they met with a certaine Heremite, who told them that thirtie daies thence was the Citie Capherstam, [o] in which no Saracen was permitted entrance, but Ethnikes may enter except in to their Temples. Hee tasted also of their wine, of which the countrie is fertile. They goe to their Temples in blacke. Here where they met this Heremite, they stayed twentie daies, and were faine to hire foure hundred Souldiers of the Gouernour for their defence. In twentie fiue daies they trauelled from hence to Ghideli, the Merchants trauelling armed on the toppe of hilles, the carriages at the bottome, to preuent theeues which vse from those toppes to stone the Trauellers. They were yet assaulted and many wounded by these Robbers. After twenty dayes more, they came to Cabul where they stayed eight moneths. At this place there hapned into their company the sister of Mahamet Can King of Cascar, by whose countrey they were to passe towards Cathay. Shee was called Agehane, Age being an honourable title annexed to her name for her Pilgrimage to Mecca (from which place shee had now returned) who being in some want borrowed sixe hundred Ducats in Merchandize of Goes, which shee repayed after in most fitting Marchandize for Cathay; namely, a kind of Marble (they call it Iasper, the Chinois Tusce) which is of two sorts, one taken out of the bottome of the Riuer Cotan by such as Diue for it, as they doe for Pearles, it is like to great Flintes; the other meaner, drawne forth of the Mountaine called Consangui Cascio. The solitarinesse of the place distant from Catan twentie dayes, and the hardnesse of the stone, which they mollifie with fires ouer the place, make it costly; the Merchants which buy this Priuiledge of the King, carrying with them a yeeres prouision for their Labourers. From Cabul they went to Ciarcar, where the Mogors Patents (which had had made him hitherto tribute-free) were neglected by the vnruly borderers: from thence to Parua the last towne in the Mogors subiection. After fiue dayes stay they passed in twentie dayes ouer exceeding high mountaines to the Region of Aingharan, and fifteene dayes after to Calcia, where the people resemble the Hollanders. Ten dayes being past, they came to Gialalabath, where the Bramenes exact custome, granted them by King Bruarate. Fifteene dayes after they came to Talhan, where by ciuill broyles they were stayed a moneth, the Calcians being in rebellion. Thence they trauelled to Cheman, vnder Abdulahan King of Samarhan, Burgauia, and Bacharate, and other confining Kingdomes, where the Calcians robbed them of great part of their goods: In eight dayes troublesome trauell they came to Badascian, where they were againe fleeced: neyther were they free at Ciarciunar their next resting, from whence in ten dayes they came to Serpanill, a desart place, and twentie dayes after to Sarcil a countrey full of villages. Two dayes iourney from this place they came to Ciecialith a hill couered with snow, where in sixe dayes trauell, many of the company perished with cold. Thence they attained to Tanghetar in the Kingdome of Cascar, and in fifteene dayes more to Iaconich; which iourney was so irkesome that Goes lost sixe horses. He went from hence to Hiarchan [p] the royall City of Cascar in Nouember, 1603. a Mart famous for concourse of Merchants and variety of Marchandize. He presented the King with a Watch, a looking glasse, and other Europæan gifts, obtayning his letters patents for furtherance of his iourney.

From hence hee went with the Carauan Bassa or Captaine (which buyes this place at a deare rate of the King) about the middest of Nouember 1604. to Iolci, Hancialix alceghet, Hagabateth, Egriar, Mesetelec, Thalec, Horma, Thoantac, Mingrieda, Capetalcol, Zilan, Sarc Guebedall, Canbasci, Aconserec, Ciacor. Acsu, in twentie fiue dayes, a very tedious way by stones and sands. In this Iourney they passed the desart of Caracathay. Thence they trauelled to Oitograch Gazo, Cascian, Dellai, Saregabedal, Vgan, and Cucia. And after a moneths stay here, in twentie fiue dayes more to Cialis, gouerned by the King of Cascars base sonne: with whom at first he had some difference about Religion, which with a gift was pacified. And in a disputation with the Mahumetan Doctors before him, the Viceroy tooke part with Goes, affirming that the Christians were the true [q] Misermans, and that their Ancestors professed that law: a thing worthy by the way to bee obserued. Here hee met with some Merchants returning from Cathay, which could tell him of Ricci and the other Iesuites at Paquin, as before you heard out of Pantogia. And here first did he learne, that China was Cathay. At his departing from Cialis, the Viceroy gaue him his letters of passe, and inscribed him a Christian according to his desire, whereat a Mahumetan Priest much wondered, affirming, that theirs with the Region shifted also their Religion.

This iourney for the principall places vnto Camul agrees with that report of Chaggi Memet in Ramusius.

[q] Musulmans, that is, right beleeuers.

In twenty dayes they came to Pucian, thence to Turphan a fortified Citie: thence to Aramuth, and so to Camul, the last City of this Kingdome of Cialis. In nine dayes they passed from Camul to the Northerne walles of China, where they stayed twenty fiue dayes, expecting the Viceroyes answere for their admission, at a place called Chiaicuon. And then being entred the walles, they came in one dayes iourney to the Citie Socieù. All the space betweene Cialis and the borders of China, is subiect to the out-rodes of the Tartars; the cause that Merchants trauell in great feare, in the day time, looking not whether the coast be cleare, and trauelling the night with great silence and secresie. They found many Saracens slaine in the way. The countrey people they seldome kill, but rob of their cattell: as for corne and rice, they hold it food for beasts, and not for men, feeding on flesh, and liuing aboue an hundred yeeres. The Saracens in these parts are effeminate, and might easily bee subdued by the Chinois if they would. On the West parts of China is that Wall before mentioned to exclude the Tartars: and two fortified Cities with strong Garrisons, hauing their proper Viceroy and other Magistrates, Canceu the head City of the Prouince Scensi; and Soceù, which is diuided into two parts, one of which is inhabited by Saracens, which trade here for Merchandize, the other by Chinois, whom the Saracens heere call Cathayans. Euery night the Saracens are enclosed in their owne Citie, in other things as the Chinois, subiect to the same Lawes and Magistrates. Neyther may any forreyner returne into his countrey which hath stayed there nine yeeres. Euerie sixth yeere, seuenty two Legates come after an olde custome to pay a kind of tribute to the King: this but a shew; the intent being to inrich themselues (as is sayd) with Marchandize, being maintained in respect of that pretence at the Kings Charge. Into Soceù Goes came at the end of the yeere, 1605. and here met with other Saracens returning from Paquin, which told him of the Iesuites there residing, adding that the King did not tell, but powred out of a measure a dayly allowance of money to them; which I mention, to shew that a man must bee sparing of credite to Saracen Trauellers and Merchants. But Goes could not a long time certifie these his fellowes of his arriuall, being ignorant of their China names, and it was foure monethes iourney to Paquin from Soceù;

ceu; & the force of Winter is there very great: yet did they send in that vnseasonable season one of their Conuerts a Chinois called Ioannes Ferdinandus, who, after a tedious iourney found Goes then lying on his death-bed, when hee brought him the letters from the Society. Eleuen dayes after, he dyed, not without suspition of poyson, giuen him by the Saracens, who had also before deuised by the way many shifts to make themselues Masters of his goods; they haue likewise a custome, that if any dye by the way, his goods are shared amongst the rest. Here did the Saracens offer to seize all into their hands; but Ferdinandus professed himselfe his Nephew, (borne of a China Mother) and with much a doe, eating Swines flesh together with the Armenian, in token they were not Saracens, obtayned that little which was left of Goes his substance, scarcely enough to pay charges: yet this and all the other tedious circumstances of this long Narration, I haue thus largely related, for the instruction of Geographers and Merchants of these parts, desirous to know or trade those Countryes, the knowledge whereof I thinke no Europæan else hath learned by experience in some hundreths of yeeres last past. His Companion the Armenian was sent from Paquin to Macao, and thence to India, and being taken by Hollanders in the way at Sincaputa, was redeemed by the Portugals, and returned to Ciaul, where he yet liues, as Trigautius our Authour affirmeth. But it is high time for vs to take view of our Tartarian Religion.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Religion of the Tartars, and Cathayans.

IOANNES [r] DE PLANO CARPINI thus writeth of their Religion. They beleeeue that there is one GOD, the maker of all things visible and inuisible, the Authour of good things and punishments, yet do they not worship him with prayers, prayses, or any certaine rites. They haue also Idols of Felt, in the fashion of a man, and the same they set on both sides of their Tent-doores, and vnder them they put a thing of Felt fashioned like a Dugge. These they account the keepers of their Cattell, Authors of their Milke and young store. Others they make of Silke, and doe them much honour. Some place them in a faire Chariot couered, before the doore of their station: and whosoeuer stealeth any thing out of that Chariot is slaine without all pitty. Their Captaines haue one alway in the middest of their Tent. To these Idols they offer the first fruits of their Milke: and the first morsels of their meate, and first draught of their drinke, at meales. And when they kill a beast, they offer the heart to their Idoll, leauing it before him till the morning, and then they take and eate it. They make an Idoll also to their chiefe Emperour, and offer thereunto with great solemnitie, as well other creatures as horses, which none after dare ride on till death. They breake not a bone of the beasts which they kill for meate, but burne them with fire. They bend themselues to this Idoll towards the South, as to a God. They worship the Sunne, Lights, and Fire; Water also, and the Earth, offering thereunto the first of their meates and drinkes, and in the morning before they eate or drinke. They haue no set rites prescribed by Law, nor doe they compell any to deny their Religion simply: although in some of their customes they are very rigorous. Thus they martyred Michael Duke of Russia, because he refused to doe reuerence to the Image of Cingis Can, which had beene their first Emperour: and compelled the younger brother of Andrew Duke of Saruogle in Russia, to marrie his said brothers wife according to their custome, after that they had slaine her former Husband.

[r] Io. de Pl. Car. c. 3. ap. Hak. 1061

They haue certaine traditions, according to which they reckon these things following to bee sinnes. To thrust a knife into the fire, or any way touch the fire with a knife, or with their knife to take flesh out of the Cauldron, or to hew with an hatchet neere to the fire. For they thinke that they should so cut away the head of the fire. They account it sinne also to leane on the whip wherewith they beate their horses (for they ride not with spurres.) Also to touch arrowes with a whip, to take or kill young Birds, to strike an horse with the raine of their bridle, and to breake one bone against another. Likewise to powre out meat, milke, or any kinde of drinke, vpon the ground: or to make water within their Tabernacle, which whosoeuer doth willingly, is slaine: but otherwise he must pay a great summe of money to the Inchanter to bee purified: who causeth the Tabernacle, with all things therein, to passe betweene two fires. Besides, if any hath a morsell giuen him which hee is not able to swallow, and for that cause casteth it out of his mouth, there is an hole made vnder his Tabernacle, by which hee is drawne forth, and slaine without all compassion. Likewise whosoeuer treades vpon the threshold of any of the Dukes Tabernacles, hee is put to death. Thus are these Gnats strained, when as hostile inuasions, murther, and such other Camels, are easily easily amongst them swallowed. They thinke that after death they shall liue in another world, and there multiply their cattell, eate, drinke, and doe other actions of life. At a new Moone, or a full Moone, they begin all new enterprises. They call her the great Emperour, and bow their knees, and pray thereto. The Sunne they say is the Moones mother, because shee hath thence her light.

Their Sorceries. They are giuen to Diuinations, Auguries, Sooth-sayings, Witchcrafts, Inchantments: and when they receiue answere from the Deuill, they attribute the same vnto God, whom they call Itoga, and the Comanians call him Chan, that is, Emperor, whom they maruellously feare and reuerence, offering to him many Oblations, and the first fruits of their meate and drinke. According to his answere they dispose all things. They beleeue that all things are purged by fire: therefore when any Embassadours, Princes, or other personages whatsoeuer, come vnto them, they and their gifts must passe betweene two fires to bee purified, least peraduenture they haue practised some Witchcraft, or haue brought some poyson or other mischiefe with them. And if fire fall from heauen vpon men or beasts, which there often hapneth; or if they thinke themselues any way defiled or vncleane, they thus are purified by their Inchanters. If any be sicke, a speare is set vp in his Tent with blacke felt welted about it, and from thenceforth, no stranger entereth therein. For none of them which are present at his death, may enter the hord of any Duke or Emperour, till a New-Moone. When hee is dead, if hee bee a chiefe man, hee is buried in the field where pleaseth him. And hee is buried with his Tent, sitting in the midst thereof, with a Table set before him, and a platter full of meate, and a Cup of Mares-milke. There is also buried with him [f] a Mare and Colt, a Horse with bridle and saddle: and they eate another Horse, whose bones the women burne for the soule of the dead, stuffing his hide with straw, setting it aloft on two or foure poles, that hee may haue in the other world a Tabernacle and other things fitting for his vse. They burie his gold and siluer with him: the Chariot or Cart in which hee is carried forth is broken, his Tent is destroyed, neither is it lawfull to name his name, till the third generation. They obserue also other Funerall Rites, too long to rehearse. They lament their dead thirtie dayes, more or lesse. Their Parents, and those of their family are thus cleansed: They make two fires, and pitch neere thereunto two Speares, with a line from the top of the one to the other, fastening on the same line some pieces of Buckram, vnder which, and betwixt the fires, passe the Men, Beasts, and Tents. There stand also two women; one on this side, the other on that, casting water, and repeating certaine charmes: if any thing fall, or be broken, the Inchanters haue it. And if any be slaine of Thunder, the men in the Tent must thus be cleansed and all things in the Tent, being otherwise reputed vncleane, and not to be touched. No menare more obedient to their Lords then the Tartars. They seldome contend in words, neuer in deeds. They are reasonably courteous one to another: their women are chaste; adulterie is seldome heard of, and theft is rare, both punished by death. Drunkennesse common, but without brawles among themselues, or discredit among others. They are proud, greedie, deceitfull. They eate Dogs, Wolues, Foxes, Horses, and in necessitie, mans flesh, Mice, and other filth, and that in as filthy a manner, without Clothes, and Napkins (their Bootes and the Grasse can serue to wipe their greasie hands:) they haue no beard, Hearbs, Wine, Meate or Beere, nor doe they wash their dishes. It is a great sinne amongst them to suffer any of their food to be lost: and therefore they will not bestow a bone on a Dogge, till they haue eaten the marrow.

Their conditions.

[t] Yuo Narbonensis in an Epistle recited by Mat. Paris [t] Anno 1243. reporteth the confession of an Englishman, which was taken with other Tartars by the Christians. Hee saith, that they called by the Name of Gods, the auncient founders and fathers of their Tribes, and at set times did solemnize feasts vnto them, many of them being particular, and but foure onely generall. They thinke that all things are created for themselues alone. They be hardy and strong in the brest, leane and pale-faced, rough and huf-shouldred, hauing flat and short noses, long and sharpe chinnes, their vpper jawes low and declining, their teeth long and thin, their eye-browes extending from their foreheads downe to their noses, their eyes inconstant and blacke, their thighs thicke, and legges short, yet equall to vs in stature. They are excellent Archers. Vanquished, they aske no fauour; and vanquishing, they shew no compassion. They all persist as one man in their purpose of subduing the whole world.

Their proud swelling titles appeare in the Copies of those Letters of Duke Baiothnoy and Cuin Can, expressed by [u] Vincentius. One of them beginneth thus: By the precept of the liuing GOD, CINGIS CHAM sonne of the sweet and worshipfull GOD saith, that GOD is high aboue all, the immortall GOD, and vpon Earth CINGIS CHAM onely Lord, &c. These Letters of the Emperour, the Tartars called the Letters of GOD: & so beginneth Duke Baiothnoy to the Pope, who had sent Frier Ascelline, with Alexander, Albericus, & Simon, thither in Embassage. The word of BAIOTHNOY, sent by the diuine disposition of CHAM, Know this O Pope, &c.

Will. de Rubruquis [z] saith, that they haue diuided Scythia amongst them, from Danubius to the Sunne rising, euery Captaine knowing the bounds of his pastures which they feede, in the Winter descending Southwards, ascending in the Summer Northwards. Their houses are moueable, remoued on great Carts which containe twentie foot betweene the wheeles; their houses on each side ouer-reaching fiue foot, drawne by aboue twenty Oxen. When they take them downe, they turne the doore alwaies to the South. Ouer the Masters head is an Image of Felt, called the Masters brother: and another ouer the head of the good wife or Mistres, called her brother, fastened to the wall; and betwixt both of them is a little leane one, which is the keeper of the whole house. Shee hath also at her beds feet a Kids skin, filled with wooll, and a little Image looking towards the Maidens and Women. Next to the doore on the Womens side (which is the East, as the mans side is on the West) there is an Image with a Cowes Vdder for the Women, whose office it is to milke the Kine: on the other side another with a Mares Vdder for the Men. When they make merrie, they sprinkle their drinke vpon these Images in order, beginning at the Masters. Then goeth a seruant out of the house with a cup full of drinke, sprinkling thrice toward the South, and bowing the knee at euery time: and this is done for the honour of the Fire. Then performeth he the like superstition toward the East, for the honour of the Ayre: next to the West for the honour of Water: and lastly, to the North, in the behalfe of the Dead. When the Master holdeth a cup in his hand to drinke, before he tasteth thereof hee poureth his part vpon the ground: if he drinketh sitting on horse-backe, hee first poureth part thereof on the Mane of the Horse. After the seruant aforesaid hath discharged his cups to the foure quarters of the world, hee returneth to the house: and two other seruants stand readie with two cups, and two Basons, to carry drinke vnto their Maister, and that Wife, which lay with him the last night, sitting together on a bedde. Their Sooth-sayers or Inchanters are their Priests. To this may bee added out of the Manuscript aboue mentioned, their Diuination by three bones, thorough which (being first burned blacke) the Diuinor lookes; and if the sight passeth straight and right, it is a good token; but if it be inwardly crooked or broken, hee then vpon this euill presage ceaseth from his enterprise. (Master Ienkinson trauelled with certaine Tartars, which diuined by the blade-bones of sheepe, sod, and then burnt to powder, which being mingled with the bloud of the sheep, they writ therewith certaine Characters, with diuers words and Ceremonies, and thence diuined of their successe, which they found true to their cost.) They vsed Diuination also by foure swords. Mangu Can desired a conference betwixt the Christians, Saracens, and Idolaters, to see which of them could make best proofe of his Religion. The Moal Tartars professed to beleeue one onely GOD, the Author of life and death: but as the hand, which is one, hath diuers fingers, so thought he and they, that this one GOD was pleased with diuers waies of deuotion. Their Priests were diuiners: they were many, but had one Captaine or chiefe Bishop, who alwaies placed his house or tent before that of the great Can, about a stones cast distant. Hee had charge of the Waine which carried the Idols: the other Priests had their places appointed them. Some of them were Astrologers, specially that High-Priest, which foretold the Ecclipses of the Moone. All the people prouided them their meat, that they might not go out of their Tents. When an Ecclipse happens, they sound their Organs and Timbrels, and make a great noyse: and when it is past they make great feasting, drinking, and mirth. They foretell Holy-daies, and those which are vnluckie for enterprises. No warres are begun or made without their word. They cause all presents which are sent to the Can to passe through the fire: they purifie the houshold of the dead by the like rite, which before may not bee touched. On the ninth day of May they assemble all the white Mares, and hallow them: at which the Christians must be present with their Censors. They then cast on the ground new [a] Cosmos, and make a great feast. They foretell the destinies of Infants newly borne: and when one is sicke, they diuine by charmes whether the disease bee naturall, or proceed of Sorcerie. They are themselues Witches, Sorcerers, Inuokers of the Deuill: this they doe in the night, setting flesh in the midst of the house readie boiled, vsing charmes, Timbrells, and falling into mad fits are bound. Then comes the Deuill and giues them answeres. Thus much Rubruquis.

M. Paulus thus reporteth of their Religion: They say, [b] that there is a GOD on high in heauen, of whom lifting vp their hands, & smiting their teeth three times together, euery day with Censer and Incense they desire health, and vnderstanding. They place a Table aloft in the wall of their house, in the which is written a name, that representeth this god. They haue another, which they call Natigay (or Itogay) of Felt or other stuffe in euerie house. They make him a wife and children, and set his wife on the left hand, and his children before him, which seeme to doe him reuerence. This they call the God of earthly things, which keepeth their children, beasts, and corne: and when they eat they annoint his mouth with the fat, and the mouthes of his wife & children, and then cast out the broth out of the doore vnto other spirits. And when their God hath had his part, they take theirs. Of this Natigay, they with like Ceremonies of lifting vp their hands, and smiting of their teeth, desire temperature of the ayre, fruits of the earth, children, and such like. Their wiues are exceeding chaste and obseruant: and though they bee many, yet can Rachel and Leah, yea, ten or twentie of them, agree with a maruellous vnion, intent vnto their houshold, and other businesse, whereby they are gainefull, and not chargeable to their Husbands. When they marry, [a] the Husband couenanteth with the Father of the Maide, who hauing giuen him power to take her where-soeuer hee shall finde her, hee seeketh her among some of her friends, where shee hath then of purpose hidden her selfe, and by a kinde of force carrieth her away. They marry with any, except their owne Mother and Sister. Their Widdowes seldome marry, because of their seruice to their former Husbands in another world, except the sonne marrie his fathers wiues, or the brother his brothers, because they can there in the next world bee content to resigne them to their former Husbands againe. The women buy, sell, and prouide all necessaries into the house, the men intending nothing but their Armes, Hunting, and Hawking. If one hath buried a Male-child, and another a Female, the Parents contract a marriage betwixt those two, and painting in papers, Seruants, Horses, Clothes, and Houshold, and making writings for the confirmation of the Dower, burne these things in the fire, by the smoake whereof they (in their smokie conceits) imagine all these things to be carried and confirmed to their children in the other world: and the Parents of the two dead parties claime kindred each of other: as if they indeed had married their children while they liued.

a. W. de Rich. in this sort.

In Xamdu did Cublai Can build a stately Palace, encompassing sixteene miles of plaine ground with a wall, wherein are fertile Meddowes, pleasant Springs, delightfull Streames, and all sorts of beasts of chase and game, and in the middest thereof a sumptuous house of pleasure, which may be remoued from place to place. Here hee doth abide in the moneths of Iune, Iuly, and August, on the eight and twentieth day whereof, hee departeth thence to another place to doe sacrifice on this manner: He hath a Heard or Droue of Horses and Mares, about ten thousand, as white as snow; of the milke whereof none may taste, except hee bee of the bloud of Cingis Can. Yea, the Tartars doe these beasts great reuerence, nor dare any crosse their way, or goe before them. According to the direction of his Astrologers or Magicians, he on the eight and twentieth of August aforesaid, spendeth and poureth forth with his owne hands, the milke of these Mares in the ayre, and on the earth, to giue drinke to the Spirits and Idols which they worship, that they may preserue the men, women, beasts, birds, corne, and other things growing on the earth.

These Astrologers, or Necromancers, are in their Art maruellous. When the skie is cloudy and threatneth raine, they will ascend the roofe of the Palace of the Grand Can, and cause the raine and tempests to fall round about, without touching the said Palace. These which thus doe, are called Tebeth, and Chesmir, two sorts of Idolaters, which delude the people with opinion of their sanctitie, imputing these workes to their dissembled holinesse: and for this cause they goe in filthy and beastly manner, not caring who seeth them, with dirt on their faces, neuer washing nor combing themselues. And if any bee condemned to death, they take, dresse, and eate him: which they doe not if any die naturally. They are also called Bachsi, that is, of such a Religion or Order; as if one should say a Frier-Preacher, or Minor, and are exceedingly expert in their diuelliſh Art. They cause that the Bottles in the Hall of the Great Can doe fill the Bowles of their owne accord, which also without mans helpe, passe ten paces through the ayre, into the hands of the said Can; and when hee hath drunke, in like sort returne to their place. These Bachsi sometimes resort vnto the Officers, and threaten plagues or other misfortune from their Idols, which to preuent they desire so many Muttons with black heads, and so many pounds of Incense, and Lignum Aloes, to performe their due sacrifices. Which they accordingly receiue and offer on their Feast-day, sprinkling Broth before their Idols. There be of these, great Monasteries, which seeme like a small Citie, in some whereof are two thousand Monkes, which shaue their heads and beards, and weare a religious habite, and hallow their Idols Feasts with great solemnitie of Hymnes and Lights. Some of these may bee married. Other there are, called Sensim, an Order which obserueth great abstinence and strictnesse of life, in all their life eating nothing but Bran, which they put in hot water, and let it stand till all the white of the meale bee taken away, and then eate it being thus washed. These worship the Fire, and are condemned of the other for Heretikes, because they worship not their Idols, and will not marry in any case. They are shauen, and weare hempen-garments of black or bright yellow, and although they were Silke, yet would they not alter the colour. They sleepe on great Mats, and liue the austerest life in the world.

Of their Astrologers in Cambalu were not fewer then fiue thousand; Christians, Catayans, and Saracens, maintained with food and rayment at the Great Cans charge. These, by their Astrolabe foretell of the change of weather, mortalitie, warres, diseases, &c. And if any enterprise any great worke, he resorteth vnto them, and telling the houre of his Natiuitie, by their Art is informed of the successe. They hold the soule to be immortall, and according to euery mans merits in his life, to passe into a more noble creature, till it be deified; or ignoble, as to a Pesant, and then to a Dogge, and so by degrees to the vilest. They shew much reuerence to their Parents, to whom if any bee vngratefull in their necessitie, there is an Office and Officers appointed to trie and punish the offence. In the Emperours hall none dare spit, but for that purpose carrieth a little vessell to spit in: nor dare any there make any noyse or loud talking. The Tartars were at first very vncharitable to the poore, and would curse them, saying, That if God had loued them, he would haue prouided for them: but after the Idolatrous Bachsi had commended Almes for a good worke, there was great prouision made for them, and euery day at least twentie thousand dishes of Rice, Mill, and Panike, by certaine Officers distributed amongst them. And for this liberalitie they adore him as a God.

Cingis amongst his first Lawes enacted (as saith Vincentius) the punishment of death to bee inflicted vpon offenders in those three vices, which before time had beene most rife amongst them, namely, lying, adultrie, and theft: of which yet towards other men that were not Tartars they made no conscience. Vincent. Bel. spec. histor. lib. 30. ca. 70.

They are great Vsurers, taking ten in the hundreth for a moneth, besides vse vpon vse: insomuch, that a Souldior in Georgia, which had borrowed fiue hundred pieces of coyne, called Yperpera, retaining the same fiue yeeres, was constrained to repay seuen thousand. And a Tartarian Lady for seuen yeeres vse of fiftie sheepe, demanded seuen thousand Yperpera. They are so couetous, that though they abound in cattell, they will scarce allow any to their owne expence, while it is sound and good, but if it die, or be sicke. They are addicted to Sodomie or Buggerie. They eate sometimes for necessitie, mans flesh, sometimes to delight themselues, and sometimes to terrifie others, reckoning it a great glorie to haue slaine many, and that by varietie of cruelties. Their heads they shaue from eare to eare, in manner of a Horse-shooe: wearing long lookes at their eares and neckes. There bee some of the Tartars, which when they see their fathers grow old and diseased, they giue them fat meates which may choake them. And when they are thus dead, they burne their bodies, reseruing the ashes as a precious jewell, sprinkling their meates with that powder. But if any thinke not this enough (which I am afraid the most will deeme too much) let him resort to the large reports of Vincentius in his three last Bookes, an Author, I confesse, otherwise fabulous and monkish, but herein to be beleeued, as receiuing his Reports from the eye-witnesses. Ca. 75. Ca. 76. Ca. 77. Ca. 28.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the festiuall Solemnities, and of the Magnificence of the Grand Can.

WEe haue alreadie spoken of the solemne sacrifice obserued on the eight and twentieth day of August: we reade in our Author [a] Marcus Paulus, an eye-witnesse of these his Relations, of other the Grand Cans grand solemnities. Of which, two are principall; one, on his birth-day, which in Cublai Cans time was the eight & twentieth of September. On which himselfe was royally clothed in cloth of gold, and twentie thousand of his Barons & Souldiers were all apparelled in one colour, and like (excepting the price) to himself, euery one hauing a girdle wrought of gold and siluer, and a paire of shooes, some of their garments richly set with pearles and jewels, which they weare on the thirteene solemnities, according to the thirteene Moones of the yeere. On this day all the Tartars, and seuerall Princes subiect, present him with rich gifts; and all sects of Religions pray vnto their gods for his health, and long life. [a] Marcus Paulus.

But their chiefe feast is on the first day of their yeere, which they begin in February, celebrated by the Grand Can, and all the Countries subiect to him: in which they are all arrayed in white, a colour in their estimation portending good lucke. And then he is presented with many Clothes and Horses of white colour, and other rich presents, in the same religiously obseruing the number of nine; as nine times nine Horses, if they bee able, and so of pieces of Gold, Cloth, and the rest. Then also the Elephants (which are aboue fiue thousand) are brought forth in sumptuous furniture: and Camels couered with Silke. And in the morning they present themselues in the Hall as many as can, the rest standing without in their due order. First, those of the Imperiall progenie; next, the Kings, Dukes, and others, in their due place. Then commeth forth a great man or Prelate, which cryeth out with a loud voyce; Bow downe your selues, and worship: which they presently doe, with their faces to the earth. This Prelate addeth, GOD saue and preserue our Lord, long to liue with ioy and gladnesse. They all answere; GOD grant it. The Prelate againe; GOD increase his Dominion, and preserue in peace all his subiects, & prosper all things in all his Countries. Whervnto they answere as before. Thus doe they worship foure times. After this, the said Prelate goeth to an Altar there, richly adorned; on which is a Red Table, with the name of the Great Can written in it, and a Censer with Incense, which he incenseth in stead of them all, with great reuerence performed vnto the Table. This done, they returne to their places, and present their gifts, and after are feasted.

When Cublai had ouerthrowne Naiam his vncle (as before is said) vnderstanding that the Christians obserued their yeerely solemnitie of Easter, hee caused them all to come vnto him, and to bring the Booke of the foure Gospels, which he incensed often with great Ceremonies, deuoutly kissing it, and caused his Barons to doe the like. And this he obserueth alway in the principall Feasts of the Christians, as Christmasse and Easter. The like he did in the chiefe Feasts of the Saracens, Iewes, and Idolaters. The cause (he said) was because of those foure Prophets, to which all the world doth reuerence: IESVS of the Christians, Mahomet of the Saracens, Moses of the Iewes, and Sogomambar Can the first Idoll of the Pagans; and I (saith he) doe honour to them all, and pray him which is the greatest in Heauen, and truest, to helpe me. Yet hee had best opinion of the Christian Faith, because it contained nothing but goodnesse: and would not suffer the Christians to carrie before them the Crosse, on which so great a man as Christ was crucified. Hee also sent Nicolo and Maffio, the Father and Vncle of Marco Paulo our Author, in Embassage to the Pope, to send him a hundred wise men which might conuince the Idolaters, that boasted of those there Magical wonders, whereas the Christians that were there, were but simple men, not able to answere them; which if it had beene effected, he and his Barons would haue beene baptized. Thomas à Iesu, a Iesuite in his second booke of Procuring the conuersion of all Nations, reporteth, that Clement the fifth ordained Iohn à Monte Coruino, a Minorite, Archbishop of Cambalu, and nine other of the same Order he consecrated Bishops, and tooke order for the successour of the Archbishop, when he died. Whether these went or no, is vncertaine. Great pitie it is, that the Iesuites, men of so refined wits, and such mightie miracle-mongers, (our world must witnesse the one, and the East and West the other) were but of yesterdaies hatching, and that Ignatius had not broken his legge before those times. These had been (if they then had been) the onely men to haue remoued those obiected scandals of the simplicitie of Christians, and to haue confronted these Magicall Montebankes, as the Can here required. But these were reserued to times more fatall to the Pope, to helpe at a dead lift, by peruertings here, and conuertings there, to hold vp the supposed sanctitie of the triple Diademe. But looke wee to our Tartars.

h Odoricus Vinc. & Io. Boem.

h Odoricus saith, that in his time the Can celebrated, besides the former, the Feasts of his Circumcision, Marriage, and Coronation. But before the Conquest of Cathay, they obserued not any day at all with festiuall solemnities.

Cublai Can was of meane stature, of countenance white, red, and beautifull. He had foure wiues, which kept seuerall Courts, the least of which contained at least ten thousand persons. He had many Concubines; euery second yeere hauing a new choice of the fairest Maidens in the Prouince of Vngut, most fertile (belike) of that commoditie: which passe a second election at the Court, and the fairest and fittest of them are committed to Ladies, to proue and to instruct them. Their parents hold it a great grace so to haue bestowed their children: and if any of them proue not, they impute it to their disastrous planet. They hold it for a great beautie, to haue their noses flat betweene the eyes.

In December, Ianuary, and February, hee abideth at Cambalu, in the North-East part of the Prouince of Cathay, in a Palace heere to the Citie builded on this manner. There is a circuit walled in, foure square, each square containing eight miles, hauing about them a deepe ditch, and in the middle a gate. A mile inwards is another wall, which hath sixe miles in each square; and in the South side three gates, and as many on the North. Betwixt those wals are Souldiers. In euery corner of this wall, and in the middest, is a stately Palace, eight in all, wherein are kept his Munitions. There is a third wall within this, containing foure miles square, each square taking vp one mile, hauing sixe Gates and eight Palaces, as the former, in which are kept the Grand Cans prouisions. And betweene these two wals are many faire Trees and Meadowes stored with many beasts. Within this is the Grand Cans Palace, the greatest that euer was seene, confining with the wall aboue said, on the North and South. The matter and forme thereof is of such cost and Art, with such appurtenances of pleasure and state, as were too long heere to recite. Hee for a superstitious feare suggested by his Astrologers, of a rebellion which sometime should bee raised against him in Cambalu, built a new Citie neere thereunto called Taidu, [i] twentie foure miles in compasse, and yet not able to receiue the Inhabitants of the old Citie, whence hee remoued such as might moue suspicion, hither. This Citie was built by line, in foure squares, each whereof contained sixe miles, and three gates, so streight, that vpon the wall of one gate one might see the gate right against it. In the midst of the Citie is a great Bell, which is rung in the night, to warne men to keepe within doores. The Great Can hath 12000. Horse-men, vnder foure Captaines to his Guard. He keepeth Leopards, Wolues, and Lions to hunt with, and with them to take wild Asses, Beares, Harts, &c. and one sort of Eagles able to catch Wolues. The two Masters of his hunting game had ten thousand men vnder each of them, the one part clothed in red, the other in skie-colour: and when the Emperour hunteth, one of these Captaines goeth with his Men and Dogges on the right hand, the other on the left, compassing a great quantitie of ground, that not a Beast can escape them. From October to March, they are bound daily to send in a thousand head of Beasts and Birds. He hath also when hee trauelleth, ten thousand Falconers, diuided in diuers companies, himselfe abiding in a chamber, carryed vpon foure Elephants, whence he may see the game, hauing also his tents pitched for his solace neere thereby. None may carry Hawke or Hunting-dog out of his Dominion, nor may Hawke or Hunt neere the Court by many daies iourneys, nor at all, in their times of breeding, from March to October.

CHAP. XV.

Of the alteration of Religion among the Tartars: and of the diuers Sorts, Sects, and Nations of them now remaining.

§. I.

Of the Precopite, or Crimme Tartars.

After so long narration of the Religion of the ancient Tartars, and of the Cathayans, where their Emperours fixed their abode: it followeth to consider of the times following, wherein they haue beene diuided both in Policie and Faith. Maginus [l] diuideth them into fiue principall sorts; which may likewise bee subdiuided into many inferiour branches of Hords. The first of these he calleth Tartaria Minor, or the lesse, which is in Europe betwixt Boristhenes and Tanais, comprehending Taurica Chersonesus, inhabited by the Precopite Tartars, or as Bronouius [m] termeth them, Perecopenses of Perecopia, a Town and Castle in Taurica: they are called also Ossouenses and Crims, of two Townes bearing those names. These are now subiect to the Turke both in State and Religion, hauing some Townes and Mahumetane Temples, and Monasteries, and Turkish Garrisons, and a few Temples and persons Christian, of the Armenian, Grecian, and Westerne profession. They liue in their homely Cottages in the Winter, but in the Summer wander in their Carts, as the other Tartars, then whom they are somewhat more ciuill. They pay three hundred Christians yeerely to the Turke for tribute: of whom their Can, since the time of Zelim, receiueth a banner, and his approbation to the Empire, giuing his children or brethren in hostage. They elect also an heire apparant to their Empire, whom they call Galga: and if the Can will preferre his sonne to that dignitie, he killeth all his brethren, as the Turkes also deale with theirs.

It should seeme that they deriue their pedigree from Cingis, descended (if I may coniecture, where certaine Historie fayleth) of some of the sonnes of Bathy, the great Conqueror in those parts of the World. Lotchton Can was the first which ruled in Taurica: long since Bathy's time. They [n] vse the Chaldæan and Arabian Letters: they haue their Cadies to administer Religion and Iustice, as haue the Turkes.

They count the Don or Riuer Tanais holy, in respect of the commodities which it yeeldeth them. These [o] Tartars passing through the confines of Polonia and Podolia, to helpe the Turkes in the warres of Hungary, the wayes being secured and defended with the Garrisons, they vsed a new stratagem to make way, by driuing a multitude of Buls before them, which contrarie to their expectation, affrighted with the Ordnance, recoiled vpon their driuers, treading them downe, and scattering them. The Chan, when Saint Bathor, King of Poland, was was dead, ſent his Embaſſadours to be elected their King; affirming, that their Pope ſhould be his, their Luther his alſo: and for dainties, Horſe-fleſh would content him. His ſuit was reiected with laughter. William Bruiſe a Scot, from the relation of Anthony Spinola, deſcended of that Family in Genua, and then Embaſſador from Caſghere the Crim-Tartar into Polonia, affirmeth diuers things of the Tartarians, as namely, of threeſcore and ten diuers Kingdomes of them, the names whereof are ſcarce known to any Tartar: differing in language and manners, but all agreeing in the Tartarian appellation, warring, wandring, hard and ſpare diet: all ſometimes ſubiect to the Great Can, now inferiour in power (as the Crims ſay, which know nothing of him but by tradition) to the Crim or Precopite.

Guil. Bruſſius de Tar.

Theſe Precopites abhor Drunkenneſſe, puniſh Adulterie with death; ſteale not from their Countrey-men, nor conceale any thing which they find, walke not with weapons, haue few Lawes, the Interpreters of which are their Prieſts, which they greatly reuerence, as they doe alſo thoſe of the Chriſtians: if any thing bee not expreſſed by Law, they referre it to that generall Head, whereon hang the Law and the Prophets, To doe as men would be done to. The Sar or Emperour ſitteth himſelfe in Iudgement, with the Galga, and Soldans (ſo they call the Princes children) and the Chancellour, with other Senators, whoſe ſentences being firſt deliuered, hee determineth, and preſent execution followeth. All mettalls are the Sars prerogatiue (except gold, which is the Turkes peculiar) he hath alſo the tenths of the ſpoiles, and of euerie Captiue a Chekine, and if he be of great eſtate, three. He receiueth 5500. Duckets a yeere from the Turke, for which hee is bound to warre vpon none but the Muſcouite without his leaue. He brings into the field 150000. Horſe-men (leauing at home but one man in a houſe) and when the Circaſſians and Aſtracans adioyne their forces, two hundred thouſand. It is paine of death not to come. They bring with them three moneths victuall, which are dried Fleſh, Cheeſe, Garlicke, Rootes, and a ſpare Horſe for food, beſides a better for ſeruice. Their haires tied to long poles, are their banners; onely the Prince receiueth from the Turke one of ſilke. Both Horſe and Men are exceeding skilfull in ſwimming. In paſſing ouer large ſtreames, they ſet their Saddles and Baggage on Reedes or Ruſhes, which they tye to diuers Horſe-tailes, themſelues holding them by the Manes, and guiding them: ſometimes they ſit themſelues on thoſe Ruſhes, and ſometimes they kill and flay ſome of their Horſes, and turning the inſide outward, timbering them with the ribs of the Horſe, and ſowing them with the hayre, make Boates for tranſportation. They take off the wheeles of their Carts, and ſetting them on Ruſhes, as aforeſaid, tranſport them. The ſpoile is diuided in common, and euery mans loſſe thence made good: to conceale any thing is death, whether pillaged from the enemie, or found of their owne people.

D. Fletcher Deſc. of Ruſſia, 19.

In the yeere 1571. they came to Muſco and fired the Suburbs, which being of wood, burned with ſuch rage, that in foure houres ſpace it conſumed the greateſt part of the Citie, being thirtie miles or more in compaſſe. The ruſulneſſe of this ſight was ſeconded with a more diſmall euent, the people burning in their houſes, and ſtreets, and whiles they ſought to flye out of the Citie, they wedged themſelues with multitude ſo faſt in the Gate (which was furtheſt from the enemie) and the ſtreets adioyning, as that three rankes walked one vpon the others heads, the vppermoſt treading downe thoſe that were lower: ſo that there periſhed at that time, as was ſaid, by the fire and the preſſe, the number of eight hundred thouſand people or more. The Tartar ſent the Ruſſe a knife, (as vpbraiding him this loſſe and his deſperate caſe) therewith to ſtab himſelfe. The cauſe of this quarrell is, the Tartars title to Cazan, Aſtracan, and Moſco it ſelfe, which the Moſcouite was wont to acknowledge with this homage yeerely in the Caſtle of Mosko, to giue the Cans or Crims Horſe Oates out of his Cap, himſelfe on foot, the Crim abiding on his Horſe. This homage Baſilius changed into a tribute of Furres, which alſo by his ſonne Iohn was denyed. Hereupon once or twice euery yeere, ſometime about Whitſontide, but oftner in harueſt, hee inuadeth the Country: either in great numbers, if the Can himſelfe come, or otherwiſe in fewer, with lighter border-skirmiſhes. Their common practiſe is to make diuers Armies, and drawing the Ruſſe to one place, to inuade another: They are all Horſe-men, carrying nothing but a Bow, a ſheafe of Arrowes, and a Fauchion Sword: they are expert Riders, and ſhoot as readily backward as forward. The Morſes or Nobles haue Armour like the Turkes, the Common-people none other then their apparell, viz. a Black-ſheeps skin, with the wooll-ſide outward in the day time, and inward in the night, with a cap of the ſame.

They haue a rule, that Iuſtice is to be practiſed but towards their own: and therefore will promiſe any thing when they beſiege a Citie, but being once poſſeſſed of the place, performe all manner of hoſtilitie. When their number is ſmall, they make greater ſhew with counterfeit ſhapes of men ſet on horſe-backe. In giuing onſet, they make a great ſhout, crying together, ℞ Olla billa, Olla billa; they will dye rather then yeeld, contrary to the Turkes cuſtome. The chiefe bootie they ſeeke for is ſtore of Captiues, ſpecially yong boyes and girles:

for which purpose they haue bands intending nothing else, and baskets like Bakers Pannyers, to carrie them tenderly. If they tyre or sicken on the way, they dash them against the ground or some tree, and so leaue them dead. The Russe borders being vsed to their inuasions, keepe few other cattell but Swine, which their Religion abhorreth to touch.

They differ herein from the Turkish Religion, that they haue certaine Idoll puppets made of silke or like stuffe, of the fashion of a man, which they fasten to the doore of their walking-houses, to be as Ianusses or Keepers of their house. And these Idols are made not by all, but by certaine Religious women, which they haue among them for that and like vses. They haue besides, the Image of their King of an huge bignesse, which they erect at euerie Stage, when the Armie marcheth: to which euery one must bow as he passeth by, both Tartar and Stranger. They are much giuen to Witch-craft and ominous coniectures. In marriage they onely abstaine from the Mother, Sister, and Daughter; neither doe they account that woman a wife, which hath not honoured them with the name of a Father, and then beginneth he to take a dowrie of her friends of Horse, Sheepe, Kine, &c. If shee bee barren after a certaine time, he turneth her home againe. Their Images.

Vnder the Emperour they haue certaine Dukes or Morseys, which rule ouer hords of ten, twentie, or fortie thousand, which are bound to serue the Emperour, with a certaine number of men double-horsed. They preferre horse-flesh before other meates, esteeming it stronger nourishment: this notwithstanding, they vsed to send thirtie or fortie thousand horse yeerely to Musko, to exchange for other commodities. Their Herds of Kine, and Flocks of black Sheepe, they keepe rather for the Milke then the Flesh, though they sometime eate it. They drinke Milke or warme Bloud, and for the most part curde them both together: as they trauell they sometime let their horse bloud, and drinke it from his bodie. Townes they plant none nor standing Villages, but haue walking houses built vpon wheeles, like a Shepherds Cottage; which they moue in the Spring from the South to the North, and so with Winter returne Southwards; when they come to their Stage or standing Place, planting their houses in a rank, making the forme of a Towne and Streets. Gold and siluer they neglect, as they do also Tillage, which freeth their Countrey from inuasions.

For person and complexion, they haue broad and flat visages, of a tanned colour into yellow and blacke, fierce and cruell lookes, thin haired vpon the vpper lip and pit of the chin, light and nimble bodied with short legs, practising themselues to ride and shoot from their child-hood, their Parents not suffering their children to eate till they haue shot within a certaine scantling of the marke. Their speech is sudden and loud, as it were out of a deepe hollow throat, their singing like a Cowes lowing. In the description of these Crim I haue been thus long, because they are now the chiefe knowne Nation of the wandring Tartars, and the rest differ little from them, except in greater Barbarisme.

Master George Barkly, a friend of mine, a Merchant in London, hauing trauelled Liuonia, Russia, Lithuania, and Poland, went from Cracouia, with a Tartar Duke, (which had come thither to the Parliament to sue for his two Daughters, taken by the Polachs) and staied with him in his hords (which consisted of about a thousand housholds of a kindred) six moneths. These Tartars sowed a three-square graine, called Totarka; they liued in great ease and pleasure, euerie day hunting, that for worldly pleasure he neuer any where enioyed such a life, with such loue and liking of his Tartar-Host, as if he had beene his sonne. These vsed to make sudden inrodes vpon the Polachs: the Gentlemen of Poland not dyning without their Peeces and Souldierly-seruing-men, readie to giue them entertainment. If the Christians make head against them, they know not where to find them. Resolute they are, and will ride with their Bowes in the face of a Peece. G. Barkly.

§. II.

Of Tartaria Deserta.

THE second part in this diuision is attributed to Tartaria Deserta, so called of the Desart huge tract of the Country betweene Tanais, the Caspian Sea, and the Lake Kitay: sometime knowne by the name of Sarmatia Asiatica. It containeth many Tribes: of which the principall are, Zunelhensis, called Burgar Tartars, of Volga: betweene which Riuer and Iaick they haue their abode. This they called the great Hord, and the Emperor thereof Vlucan, in the yeere 1506. subdued by the Crim-Tartars before mentioned: and after that by Basilius the Muscouite, to whose large stile Bulgaria is added, taking that name of Volga, as it were Volgaria, or of Bulgar, a Towne vpon that Riuer. Cazan and Astracan, Hords of these Zauol-Tartars, haue bin subiect also many yeeres to the said Great Duke, h who caused the Prince of Cazan (being taken prisoner when hee was young) to bee baptized. Neere vnto Cazan is Vachem, the people whereof are Gentiles; and the Cheremizes halfe Gentiles, halfe Tartars, and Mangat, or Nagai, Mahumetan Tartars, which in the yeere 1558. were thorow ciuill warres, famine, and pestilence, destroyed to the number of aboue a hundred thousand. These Nagayans haue their diuers Hords subiect to their seuerall Dukes, whom they call Murzes, hauing no vse of Money, Corne, or Arts. They, in the time of their distresse, would for one Loafe of bread, worth sixe pence, haue sold Sonne or Daughter to Master Ienkinson, if hee would haue bought a thousand, although other-whiles they deride the Christians, as liuing on the tops of weedes (so they call our Corne). This our Author and Country-man trauelled downe the Riuer Volga to Astracan, which Riuer, after it had runne aboue two thousand English miles, hath threescore and ten mouthes or falls into the Caspian Sea. Through this Sea hee passed to Manguslaue, another part of the Desart Tartaria. The Prince whereof (Timor Soltan) he found and saluted in a i little round house, not hauing Towne or Castle, made of Reeds, couered without with Felt, within with carpets, accompanied with the great Metropolitane of their country, esteemed of amongst that field-people, as the Bishop of Rome is in most parts of Europe. And had he not presented himselfe to him with the Great Dukes Letters, he had been spoyled of all that he had.

i Regumq; turres, Pauperum tabernæ.

They passed thence with a Caruan of Merchants twentie dayes, not finding water, but as they drew out of old deepe Wells, brackish and salt: and passed sometimes two or three dayes without the same. After that, they came to a Gulfe of the Caspian Sea againe, where the water is fresh and sweet. Not so, the people; for the Customers of the King of Turkeman tolled of euery fiue and twentie, one; and seuen ninths for the said King and his brethren. Into this Gulfe the Riuer Oxus did sometimes fall, but is now intercepted by the Riuer Ardock, which runneth toward the North, and (as it were) loath to view so cold a Clime and barbarous Inhabitants, after he hath run with a swift race a thousand miles (as it were) in flight, hee hideth himselfe vnder ground for the space of fiue hundred miles, and then looking vp, and seeing little amendment, drowneth himselfe in the Lake of Kithay.

Thence they had three dayes iourney to Sellizure, where finding Azim Can, to whom hee presented a ninth, hee receiued there the like festiuall entertainment as before with Timor, that is, the k flesh of a wilde Horse, and Mares milke without bread. Hee and his brethren ruled all from the Caspian Sea to Vrgence, and had continuall warres with the Persians; which space is called Turkeman: for the other Hords of that huge Tartarian Desart, the Kirgessen, Melgomazan, Scibanski, Thumen (which still is said to remaine vnder the obedience of the Grand Can) Basscheridi, Heseliti, harsh names of harsher people in those most harsh and horrid Desarts, will hasten my pen and your eares, to some more pleasing subiect. The Thumen and their Neighbours are great Inchanters, and by their Art (they say) raise tempests, and ouerthrow their Enemies. The Kirgessen obserue these stinking holies: their l Priest mixeth bloud, milke, and Cow-dung together with earth, and putting them in a Vessell, there with climeth a tree, and after his deuout exhortation to the people, hee besprinkleth them with this sacred mixture, which they account diuine. When any of them dye, they hang him on a tree in stead of buryall.

The Tartars in Turkeman vse to catch wilde Horses with Hawks, tamed to that purpose, which seising on the necke of the Horse, with his beating, and the Horses chasing, tyreth him, and maketh him an easie prey to his Master, who alwayes rideth with his Bow, Arrowes, and Sword. They eate their meate, and say their prayers sitting on the ground crosse-legged, spending the time very idlely. As Master Ienkinson with his company trauelled from hence towards Boglar, they were assayled with fortie theeues; of whom they had intelligence somewhat before, and therefore certaine holy men (for so they account such as haue beene at Mecca) caused the Caruan to stay while they made their praiers and diuinations touching their successe. They tooke certaine sheepe and killed them, and tooke the blade-bones of the same, which they first sod, and then burnt, mingling the bloud of the said sheepe, with this poulder of their bones, with which bloud they wrote certaine Characters, vsing many other Ceremonies and words, and thereby diuined that they should meete with enemies, which after much trouble they should ouercome: which accordingly proued true. Of the faithfulnesse of these holy men he had good proofe, both heere and elsewhere, they refusing not to expose themselues to danger, and (faithlesly-faithfull) to forsweare themselues, rather then betray him and the Christians to their theeuish Country-men. For these robbers would haue dismissed the Bussarmans, so they call their Catholikes, if they would haue deliuered the Caphars, that is, Infidels, as they esteeme the Christians, vnto their power. One of their holy men (which the enemies had surprized) by no torments would confesse any thing to the preiudice of his fellowes. But at last they were forced to agree, and giue the theeues twentie ninths, ninths, that is, twentie times nine seuerall things, and a Camell to carry the same away. This Countrey of Turkeman or Turchestan, is the first habitation of the Turkes, and the people were called by that name, both in Haithons time, and in the time of Mauritius, as in the Turkish Historie you haue heard. Pliny nameth the Turkes neerer Maotis: but whether in deuouring the people with their swords, as they did the pastures with their cattel, they came from hence, or these from thence, or that Pliny might easily wander in so wandering a subiect, all auer, that from hence they went first into Persia, and in succeeding ages haue made many fertile Countries, like their Turcomania, where Master Ienkinson saith, groweth no grasse, but heath whereon the cattell feed: The Ottoman-horse blasting with his breath the ground he treads on (according to their owne Prouerbe) there's neuer groweth grasse more. The Turkeman Nation is (saith Haithon) for the most part Mahumetan, and many of them without Law at all. They vse the Arabike Letters. Simocatta & Niceph. Cal. l. 11. cap. 30.

Of the Zagathayan Tartars.

THese Desarts and Theeues haue almost made vs forget our diuision, according to which wee should haue told you, that from the Caspian Sea hither, you must (according to Maginus) call the Tartars generally Zagathayans, [m] so called of Zagathay, the Great Cans brother, sometime their Prince. Which name [n] comprehendeth also diuers other Nations more ciuill then the former, possessing the Countries, sometime knowne by the names of Bactriana, Sogdiana, Margiana, now Ieselbas, that is, Greene heads, of the colour of their Turbants: differing from the Persians, whom they call for like cause, Red-heads. These haue cruell warres continually with the Persians, whom they call Caphars (as they doe the Christians) for their supposed heresie, of which in the Persian relation hath beene shewed, and for that they will not cut the haire of their vpper lips, for which they are accounted of the Tartars great sinners. In [o] Boghar is the seat of their Metropolitane, who is there more obeyed then the King, and hath sometime deposed the King, and placed another at his pleasure. There is a little Riuer running through the Citie, whose water breedeth in them that drinke thereof (especially strangers) a worme of an ell long, which lieth in the leg betwixt the flesh and the skin, and is plucked out about the ancle, with great Art of Surgeons well practised herein. And if it breake in plucking out, the partie dieth. They plucke out an inch in a day, which is rolled vp, and so proceed till she be all out. And yet will not the Metropolitane suffer any drinke but water or Mares milke, hauing Officers to make search, and punish such as transgresse, with great seueritie. Zagatai liued the space of one hundred twentie and one yeeres before Marcus Paulus, and was (as hee saith) a Christian, but his sonne followed him in his Kingdome, not in his Religion.

Here in this Countrey is Samarcand, the Citie of Great Tamerlaine, (of some called Temir Cuthlu, that is, as Mathias a Michou [p] interpreteth it, Happy Sword) whose Armie contained twelue hundred thousand: whose Conquests exceed (if Histories exceed not) all the Great Alexanders, Pompeys, Cæsars, or any other Worthies of the World. And one of the greatest Monarch now of the Earth. The Great Mogore is said to [q] descend of him.

Of him are many Histories written by some [r] that haue liued since his time, and could not well know his proceedings, it being generally deplored, that this Achilles wanted a Homer [s], which Alexander applauded in him, but wanted for himselfe: onely one Alhacen (an Arabian which then liued) hath written largely thereof, and that (as he saith) by Tamerlans command, which Iean du Bet [t], Abbot of Mortimer, in his voyage into the East Countrie, met with, and had it interpreted to him by an Arabian, and wee vpon his credit: which if any thinke to be insufficient, I leaue it to his choice and censure. That Author saith, that Tamerlan descended of the Tartarian Emperours, and Og his father was Lord of Sachetay, who gaue to his sonne Tamerlan, (which name signifieth Heauenly grace in their Tongue) his Kingdome, while hee yet liued, appointing two wise Counsellours, Odmar, and Aly, to assist him. Hee was well instructed in the Arabian learning, and a louer of Learned men. Nature had set in his eyes such rayes of Maiestie and beautie, that men could scarce endure to looke on them. He wore long haire, contrary to the Tartarian Custome, pretending, that his mother came of the race of Sampson. He was strong, and had a faire leg: whereas Leunclauius saith, he was called Tamurleng, of his lameneſſe. His first Warre was against the Muscouite; whom he ouercame. The second, against the King of China, with like successe (I mention not his battailes in ciuill warres:) The third, against Baiazet the Turke (whom he captiued) passing thither by the way of Persia; where Guines Author of the Sophian Sect, a great Astrologer, loger, and accounted a holy man, encouraged him with propheſies of his good ſucceſſe. This Warre he made againſt Bainzet in behalfe of the Greeke Emperour, and others, whom the Turke oppreſſed. He went priuately to Conſtantinople, and had ſight of the Citie, with all kindneſſe from the Emperour. He inuaded Syria and Ægypt, ouerthrew the Soldan, and won Cairo; deſtroyed Damaſcus, viſited and honoured Ieruſalem, and the holy Sepulchre, and granted great Priuiledges thereunto. The Princes of Lybia and barbarie, by their Embaſſages in Ægypt, acknowledged his Soueraignetie: In his returne by Perſia he was encountred by Guines, who brought with him an infinite number of ſundry kindes of beaſts, which he made tame, and by which he taught men. As ſoone as he ſaw Tamerlan, he made his Praiers towards the Heauens for his health, and for the Religion of the Prophet, excommunicating the Ottomans, as enemies to the faithfull beleeuers. Tamerlan gaue him fifteene or ſixteene thouſand of his [u] priſoners, which he inſtructed in his opinion: and after conquered Perſia, and ſo returned to Samarcand, where he had vowed to erect a Church and Hoſpitall, with all ſumptuous Magnificence: thence he went to Mount Althay, to burie his vncle and father in law, the Great Chan, in whoſe State he ſucceeded. He enriched Samarcand with the ſpoiles gotten in his warres, and called the Temple which he there built, the Temple of Salomon, wherein he hanged vp Trophees and Monuments of his victories, and cauſed all his battailes there to be ingrauen, thereby (ſaid he) to acknowledge the Goodneſſe of GOD. His Religion was not pure Mahumetiſme, for he thought GOD was delighted with varietie of worſhips: yet he hated Polytheiſme and Idols, onely one GOD he acknowledged, and that with much deuotion, after this manner. Thus he beat downe all the Idols in China, but honoured the Chriſtians, with great admiration at the ſtrict life of ſome Votaries. When Aly his Counſellour was dead, he built a ſtately Tombe for him at Samarcand, and cauſed prayers to be ſaid three dayes for his ſoule. Being neere his end, hee bleſſed his two ſonnes, laying his hand on the head of Sautochio the elder, and preſſing it downe, but lifting vp the chinne of Letrochio the younger, as it were preſaging vnto him the Empire, although the elder were proclaimed. But this Empire was too great, and too ſuddenly erected to continue. Of his ſucceſſe and ſucceſſors in Perſia, you haue heard before in the eight Chapter of this Booke.

[u] Some ſay 30000.

These three ſorts of Tartars which we haue hitherto mentioned, are all, for the moſt part, Mahumetans. There are ſome yet (as Michouius [x] affirmeth) neere the Caſpian Sea, which are not Mahumetans, nor ſhaue their haire off their heads, after the Tartarian manner; and therefore they call them Calmuch, or Pagans.

Of the Cathayan and Mogol Tartars, &c.

THE fourth are thoſe which in greatneſſe are firſt, namely, the Cathayans, called Carabas (that is Black-head) of their Turbants, as the former, Ieſelbas. But of their Religion, further then that which hath beene before expreſſed, we can ſay little. And it ſeemeth by the relations mentioned in the former Chapters, that they are Gentiles or Chriſtians, and not of Mahomets errour. Chaggi Memet [y], a Perſian Merchant, related (as in part is ſaid before) to Ramuſius, that he had beene at Campion, Damir Can then raigning, and that vnto Camul, the Weſterly part of Tanguth, they were Idolaters and Ethnikes: from thence Weſtwards, Muſulmans, or Saracens. In the Epiſtle of Caruallius [z] the Ieſuite, it is reported by a Mahumetane Merchant, that they were Chriſtians, for thoſe reaſons (it ſeemes) yee haue heard before. By Benedictus Goes his obſeruations yee haue ſeen them ſo deuoted to Mahomet, that a tender Lady of the weaker ſexe (in the ſtrength of ſect) from the remote parts of Caſcar, bordering on China, viſited Mecca in Pilgrimage. And their zeale, or pretence thereof, put him into often perils, for his faith ſhall I ſay, or his goods? yet doth he make a difference between the Saracens and the Tartars; theſe it ſeemes profeſſing robbery, and little minding any religion. They worſhip in thoſe parts to the Weſt, for that way ſtands Mecca.

The fifth and laſt forme of our Tartars, are thoſe which abide in thoſe places, whence the Tartars firſt iſſued to ouer-whelme all Aſia with their Armies: of which is related at large in the eleuenth Chapter: of which, for want of probable intelligence, I can ſay little more. Our Maps place there the Hords of the Danites, Nephthalites Ciremiſſians, Turbites, and other, which ſome deriue from the diſperſion (as is ſaid) of the ten Tribes. Here is Tabor alſo, whoſe King was by Charles the fifth, Emperour in the yeere 1540. (as before is ſaid) burned at Mantua, for ſoliciting to Iudaiſme.

Pope Innocent, King Lewes of France (by meanes of William de Rubruquis) and the King of Armenia, solicited (as you haue partly heard) both the great Can, and his chiefe Princes, to become Christians: and it is likely that the Tartars might, if diligence had beene vsed, and some Superstitions had not darkened the Christian profession, haue thereunto beene perswaded, which many also of them were, as appeareth in Haiton. Mat. Westmonast. and Vincentius.

But the Saracens which had before polluted those Countries, where the Mahumetan Tartars now abide, by that suitablenesse of their Law to their lawlesse lusts of Rapine and Poligamie, preuailed (as Michouius [a] reporteth) with Bathi and those other Tartars, to embrace Mahumet, and refuse Christ. They say, Erssa Rocholla, that is, Iesus is the Spirit of the Lord; Mahomet Rossollai, that is, Mahomet is the Iustice of GOD. They obey (saith hee) the Pentateuch of Moses, are circumcised, obserue the legall Ceremonies: they haue no Bels, but euery day crie, La illo illo loh, which signifieth, that there is but one GOD. They professe themselues Ismaelites, the Christians they call Dzintzis, that is, Pagans; and Gaur, Infidels [b]. They obserue three Feasts: the first Kuiram, to which they prepare themselues, with their thirtie dayes Lent, and in that Feast offer Rammes, Birdes, &c. The second they celebrate for All Soules, for which they fast a moneth, visit the graues, and doe workes of mercie. The third, they keepe for themselues and their owne saluation, and fast twelue dayes.

[a] Lib. 3. Cap. 5.

[b] See the Saracen History.

Iosafa Barbaro [c] (a Venetian, which liued among the Tartars about the yeere 1437.) saith, That they embraced not the faith of Mahomet generally, but as euery man liked, vntill about that time, in the dayes of Hedighi, a Captaine vnder Sidahameth Can, who first compelled them thereunto, being before free vnto their Idolatries, if they pleased. And of the other Tartars neere the Zagathayans, he saith, That many of them were Idolaters, and carried Idols in the Carts: yea, some of them vsed to worship whatsoeuer Beast they first met with, after they went abroad in the morning: This Doctor Fletcher reporteth of the Mordiuit Tartars, adding that they vse to sweare by it all that day, whether it bee Horse, Dog, or whatsoeuer else. And when his friend dieth, hee killeth his best Horse, and flaying off the skin, carrieth it on high vpon a long Pole, before the corps to the place of buriall.

The Moxij, at a certaine time in the yeere, take a horse, which they set in the field, with his foure legges tyed to foure posts, and his head to another post, fastened in the ground. This done, one of them standing in a conuenient distance, shooteth him to the heart. Afterwards they flay him, and obseruing certaine ceremonies about the flesh, eate the same. The skin they fill with chaffe: and in each of his legges thrust a straight stick, that hee may stand vpright, as if hee were aliue. Lastly, they goe to a great Tree, and loppe there from as many boughes as they thinke good, and make a Roome or Sollar in that tree, where they set this horse on his feet, and worsh p him, offering vnto him Foxes, and diuers Beasts which beare rich Furres; of which offerings the Trees hang full.

Master Ienkinson mentioneth a Nation liuing among the Tartars, called Kings; which are also Gentiles, as are also the Kirgessen (of whom wee haue spoken) and the Colmackes, which worship the Sunne, as they doe also a redde Cloth, fastened to the toppe of a Pole, and eate Serpents, Wormes, and other filth. Neere to which hee placeth (in his Mappe of Russia) certaine Statues, or Pillars of Stone, which sometime were Hords of Men and Beasts feeding, transformed by diuine power (if it bee not humaine errour) into this stonie substance, retayning their pristine shape. These Nations are eyther Tartars, or, in manner of life, like vnto them, and may therefore passe vnder that generall appellation. And this may suffice touching the Tartarian Nation and Religion, which in the West and South parts of their abode is Mahumetane, in the more Northerly and Easterly, partly Heathenish, partly Iewish, or Moorish, or mixed, or as may best aduantage them, and most please them, wandring in opinion in like sort, as in their habitation. Doctor Fletcher reckons these things as generall to all the Hords of Tartars. First, to obey their Magistrates whatsoeuer they command about the publike seruice. Secondly, Except for the pulique behoofe, euery man to bee free and out of contolement. Thirdly, No priuate man to possesse any Lands, but the whole Countrey to bee common. Fourthly, To neglect all daintinesse and varietie of meates, and to content themselues with that which commeth next to hand. Fiftbly, To weare any base attire and to patch their clothes, whether there bee any need or not. Sixthly, to take or steale from any stranger whatsoeuer they can get. Seuenthly, Towards their owne to bee true in word and deede. Eightly, To suffer no stranger to come within their Dominion, but the same to bee slaue to the first taker, except they haue a Pasport.

D. Flet. desc. of Rus. Cap. 19.

But by this time I thinke the Reader will wish mee their pasport to bee gone from them, who haue shewed my selfe no Tartarian, whilest I dwell so long on this Tartarian discourse, happily herein as tedious to him, as staying in one place would be to the Tartar; a thing so abomi-abominable, as in anger he wisheth it as a Curse, Would GOD thou mayest abide in one place, as the Christian, till thou smell thine owne dung. Indeed this Historie, not throughly handled before by any one, drew me along, and I hope will purchase pardon to this prolixitie.

Of the Nations which liued in, or neere to those parts, now possessed by the Tartars: and their Religions, and Customes.

M. Paulus l. 1. FRom those Countries, inhabited by the Persians and Zagathayan Tartars Eastward, we cannot see with M. Paulus his eyes (the best guides wee can get for this way) any Religion but the Saracen, till we come to Bascia, a Prouince somewhat bending to the South, the people whereof are Idolaters and Magicians, cruell and deceitfull, liuing on Flesh and Rice. Seuen dayes iourney from hence is Chesmur, wickedly cunning in their deuillish Art, by which they cause the dumbe Idols to speake, the day to growe darke, and other maruellous things, being the wel-spring of Idols and Idolatrie in those parts. They haue Heremites after their Law, which abide in their Monasteries, are very abstinent in eating and drinking, containe their bodies in straight chastitie, and are very carefull to abstaine from such sinnes, wherewith they thinke their Idols offended, and liue long. There are of them many Monasteries. They are obserued of the people with great reuerence. The people of that Nation shed no bloud, nor kill any flesh: but if they will eate any, they get the Saracens which liue amongst them, to kill it for them. North-eastward from hence is Vochan, a Saracenicall Nation; and after many dayes iourney ouer mountaines (so high, that no kind of birds are seene thereon) is Beloro, inhabited with Idolaters. Cascar (the next Countrey) is Mahumetan, beyond which are many Nestorian Christians in Carchan. There are also Moores, or Mahumetanes, which haue defiled with like superstition the Countries of Cotam and Peym (where the women may marrie new husbands, if the former be absent aboue twenty dayes [a], and the men likewise) and of Ciarcian, and Lop. From Lop they crosse a Desart, which asketh thirtie dayes, and must carrie their victuals with them. Here (they say) spirits call men by their names, and cause them to stray from their companie, and perish with famine. When they are passed this Desart, they enter into Sachion, the first Citie of Tanguth, an Idolatrous Prouince, subiect to the Great Can: there are also some Nestorians and Saracens, where they haue had the Art of Printing these thousand yeeres. They haue Monasteries replenished with Idols of diuers sorts, to which they sacrifice, and when they haue a male child borne, they commend it to some Idoll, in whose honour they nourish a Ramme in their house that yeere, and after on their Idols festiuall, they bring it, together with their Sonne, before the Idoll, and sacrifice the Ramme, and dressing the flesh, let it stand till they haue finished their prayers for their childs health: in which space (they say) their Idoll hath sucked out the principall substance of the meate: which they then carrie home to their house, and assembling their kinsfolke, eate it with great reuerence and reioycing, sauing the bones in goodly vessels. The Priests haue for their fee, the head, feet, inwards, skinne, and some part of the flesh.

a This marriage admits no Non-residence.

b Funerall obseruances in Sabion.

When any of great place dieth, they [b] assemble the Astrologers, and tell the houre of his nativitie, that they may by their Art finde a Planet fitting to the burning of the corps, which sometime, in this respect, attendeth this fiery constellation a weeke, a moneth, or halfe a yeere: in all which time they set before the corps a Table furnished with bread, wine, and other viands, leauing them there so long as one might conueniently eate them, the Spirit there present (in their opinion) refreshing himselfe with the odour of this prouision. If any euill happen to any of the house, the Astrologers ascribe it to the angry soule for neglect of his due houre, agreeing to that of his Nativitie. They make many stayes by the way, wherein they present this departed soule with such cates, to hearten it against the bodies burning. They paint many papers, made of the barkes of trees, with pictures of Men, Women, Horses, Camels, Money, and Rayment, which they burne together with the Body, that the Dead may haue to serue him in the next World. And all this while of burning, is the Musike of the Citie present, playing.

Idolaters, how vnderstood in this Booke.

CHAMVL, the next Prouince, is Idolatrous, or Heathenish: for so we distinguish them from Saracens, Iewes, and Christians, which I would were not as guilty of Idolatrie as the former, in so many their forbidden Rites, although these haue all; and the other, part of the Scriptures, whereof those Heathens and Idolaters are vtterly ignorant. Here they not onely permit, but account it a great honour to haue their wiues and sisters at the pleasure of such strangers as they entertaine, themselues departing the while, and suffering all things to be at their guests will: for so are their Idols serued, who therefore for this hospitalitie (they thinke) will prosper all that they haue. And when as Mangu Can forbad them this beastly practice, they abstained three yeeres; but then sent a pitifull Embassage to him, with request; That they might continue their former custome, for since they left it, they could not thriue: who ouercome by their fond importunitie, granted their request; which they with ioy accepted, and doe still obserue.

Scrip-

In the same Prouince of Tanguth is Succuir, whose Mountaines are clothed with Rheubarbe, from whence it is by Merchants conueyed through the World. Campion is the mother Citie of the Countrey, inhabited by Idolaters, with some of the Arabian and Christian Nations. The Christians had there, in the time of M. Paulo, three faire Churches. The Idolaters had many Monasteries, abounding with Idols of wood, earth, and stone, couered with gold, and artificially made, some great, ten paces in length lying along, with other little ones about them, which seeme as their Disciples, to doe them reuerence. Their religious persons liue, in their opinion, more honestly then other Idolaters, although their honestie is such, as that they thinke it no sinne to lie with a woman, which shall seeke it at their hands; but if the man first make loue, it is sinfull. They haue also their Fasting-dayes, three, foure, or fiue in a moneth, in which they shed no bloud, nor eate flesh. They haue many wiues; of which, the first married hath the first place and preheminence. Here Marcus Paulus liued about a yeere.

Touching the Religion and Customes in Tanguth, the reports [c] of Caggi Memet in Ramusius (who of late yeeres was in Campion) are not much diferent. He sayth, That their Temples are made like the Christians, capable of foure or fiue thousand persons. In them are two Images of a man and woman, lying in length fortie foot, all of one piece, of stone: For which vse they haue Carts with fortie wheeles, drawne of fiue or sixe hundred Horses and Mules, two or three moneths iourney. They haue also little Images, with sixe or seuen heads, and ten hands, holding in each of them seuerall things, as a Serpent, Bird, Flower, &c. They haue Monasteries, wherein are men of holy life, neuer comming forth, but haue food carried them thither daily: Their gates are walled vp; and there are infinite of Frier-like companions passing to and fro in the Citie. When any of their kindred die, they mourne in white. They haue Printing, not much vnlike to that which is vsed in Europe; and Artillerie on their walls very thicke, as haue the Turkes. All the Catayans and Idolaters are forbidden to depart out of their native Countrey. They haue three Sciences, Chimia, Limia, and Simia: the first, Alchymie; the second, to make enamoured; the third, Iugling, or Magicke.

Succuir also is, according to his report, great and faire, beautified with many Temples. Their Rheubarbe they would not bestow the paines to gather, but for the Merchants, which from China, Persia, and other places fetch it from them at a cheape price. Nor doe they in Tanguth vse it for Physike, as we here, but with other ingredients make perfumes thereof for their Idols: and in some places they burne it in stead of other firing, and giue it their Horses to eate. They set more price by an herbe which they call Membroni cini, medicinable for the eyes, and another called Chiai Catai, growing in Catay at Cacianfu, admirable against very many diseases, an ounce whereof they esteeme as good as a sacke of Rhubarbe; whose description you may see at large, according to the relation and picture of the said Chaggi, in Ramusius: for (to adde that also) they haue many Painters, and one Countrey inhabited onely by them. These Tanguthians are bearded as men in these parts, especially some time of the yeere.

Northwards from Tanguth is the Plaine [d] of BARGV, in customes and manners like to the first Tartars, confining with the Scythian Ocean, fourescore dayes iourney from Ezina, in the North parts of Tanguth, and situate vnder the North starre. Eastward of Tanguth (somewhat inclining to the South) is the Kingdome of Ergnul, addicted likewise to Ethnike superstitions, wherein yet are some, both Nestorians and Mahumetans. Here are certaine wilde Bulls as big as Elephants, with manes of white and fine haire, like silke; of which, some they tame, and betwixt them and their tame Kine engender a race of strong and laborious Oxen. Here is found a beast also as big as a Goat of exquisite shape, which euery full Moone hath an apostemation or swelling vnder the belly, which the Hunters (at that time chasing the said beast) doe cut off, and drie against the Sunne, and it proueth the best Muske in the world.

Christian and a Priest of the posteritie of Presbyter Iohn, subiect to the Grand Can. And the Gran Cans giue commonly their daughters in mariage to this generation and stocke of Presbyter Iohn. The most part of the inhabitants are Christians, some Idolaters and Mahumetans being there also. There bee also that are called Argon, descended of Ethnikes and Moores, the wisest and propereſt men in those parts. All the people from hence to Cathay, are Christian, Mahumetan, and Gentile, as themselues like best. In Thebet, the next Countrey, the people in times past (saith William de Rubruquis) bestowed on their parents no other Sepulchre then their owne bowels, and yet in part retaine it, making fine cuppes of their deceased parents skuls, that drinking out of them in the middest of their iolitie, they may not forget their progenitors. They haue much gold, but hold it an high offence to imprison it, as some doe with vs, in Chests or Treasuries; and therefore hauing satisfied necessitie, they lay vp the rest in the earth, fearing otherwise to offend GOD. Cambalu is in the North-east parts of Cathay: and fortie miles Westward from hence (all which way is enriched with Palaces, Vineyards, and fruitfull Fields) is Gouza, a faire Citie, and great, with many Idoll-Monasteries. Here the way parted, leading Westward into Cathay, and Southeastward vnto Mangi, or China. TANIFV and Cacianfu are Prouinces, which tend Westward from hence, inhabited with idolatrous Nations, and here and there some of the Arabian and Christian profession, full of Cities. Cunchin and Sindinfu are Ethnikes; as is Thebeth; where they haue a brutish custome, f not to take a wife that is a Virgin; and therefore, when Merchants passe that way, the mothers offer vnto them their daughters, much striuing which of them may be the most effectuall bawde to her childe. They taking to their pleasure such as they like, gratifie them with some iewell, or other present, which on her mariage-day shee weareth, and shee which hath most of such presents, bringeth the most accepted dowrie to her husband, as testimonies of the great fauour of their Idols. This Thebeth contained sometimes eight Kingdomes, with many Cities, but was now desolated by the Tartarians. There are great Necromancers, which by their infernall skils cause Thunders and Tempests. They haue Dogges as bigge as Asses, with which they catch wild Oxen & all sorts of beasts.

CAINDV is an Heathenish Nation, where in honour of their Idols, they prostitute their wiues, sisters, and daughters, to the lust of Trauellers; which being entertained in the house, the good man departeth, and the woman setteth some token ouer the doore, which there remaineth as long as this stallion-stranger, for a signe to her husband, not to returne till the guest be as well gone from her house, as honesty from her heart, and wit from his head. They make money of salt, as in Cathay of paper. In Caraian also, (a large Prouince adioyning) there are some Christians and Saracens, but the most Ethnikes, which are not discontented, that other men should lie with their wiues, if the women be willing.

CARAZAN is of like irreligion, their soules captiuated to the Olde Serpent, and their bodies endangered to mighty huge bodies of g Serpents, tenne paces long, and tenne spannes thicke, which that Countrey yeeldeth. They keepe in their dennes in the day, and in the night prey vpon Lyons, Wolues, and other Beasts, which when they haue deuoured, they resort to some water to drinke, and by their weight leaue so deepe impression in the sand, that hereby men knowing their haunt, doe vnderset this their Tract with sharpe stakes, headed with yron, couering the same againe with sand; by this meanes preying on the spoyler, and deuouring the deuourer; esteeming nothing more sauorie then the flesh, nor more medicinable then the gall of this Serpent. More Serpentine then this diet, was that custome which they vsed; when any proper and personable Gentleman, of valourous Spirit, and goodly presence, lodged in any house amongst them: in the night they killed him, not for the spoyle, but that his soule furnished with such parts of body and mind, might remaine in that house. Much hope of future happinesse to that house did they repose in so vnhappy attempts. But the great Can killed this Serpent also, ouerthrowing this custome in the conquest of that Prouince.

CARDANDAN confineth on the Westerne limits of Carazan. They make blacke lists in their flesh, razing the skinne, and put therein some blacke tincture, which euer remayneth, h accounting it a great ornament. When a woman is deliuered of a child, the man lyeth in, and keepeth his bed, with visitation of Gossips, the space of fortie dayes. They worship the ancientest person of the house, ascribing to him all their good. In this prouince, and in Caindu, Vocian, and Iaci, they haue no Phisicians, but when any be sicke, they send for their Witches or Sorcerers, and acquaint them with their maladie. They cause Minstrels to play while they dance and sing, in honour of their Idols, not ceasing till the Diuell entereth into one of them, of whom those Sorcerers demand the cause i of the parties sickenesse, and meanes of recouerie. The Demoniake answereth, for some offence to such, or such a god. They pray that God of pardon, vowing that when he is whole, he shall offer him a sacrifice of his owne bloud. If the Diuell see him vnlikely to recouer, he answereth, that his offences are so so grieuous, that no sacrifice can expiate: but if there be likelihood of recouery, he enioyneth them a sacrifice of so many Rams with blacke heads, to be offered by these Sorcerers, assembled together with their wiues, & then will that god be reconciled. This is presently done by the kinsemen of the sicke, the sheepe killed, their bloud hurled vp towards Heauen. The Sorcerers and Sorceresses make great lights, and incense all this visited house, making a smoke of Lignum Aloes, and casting into the ayre, the water wherein the sacrificed flesh was sodden, with some spiced drinkes, laughing, singing, dancing in honour of that God. After all this reuel-rout they demand againe of the Demoniake, if the God be appeased? if so, they fall to those spiced drinkes, and sacrificed flesh with great mirth, and being well apayed, returne home; if not, they (at his bidding) renue their superstition, ascribing the recouerie (if it happen) to that Idoll; and if he dyeth notwithstanding, they shift it off to the want of their full due, fleecing, or tasting the same before, to the Idols defrauding. Thus doe they in all Cathay and Mangi. Thus much out of the large reports of Paulus that renowmed Venetian, k to whom our Relations are so much indebted.

k Of him, his wealth and family see Ramus. Preface: his Palace is yet in Venice, now deuided into 70. dwellings. Mich. Lock. saw both it & his Mappa mundi mentioned by Ramus. and his Sepulchre.

Rubruquius telleth the like of CAILAR and CARACORAM, where hee had beene in these Catayan Prouinces, concerning their Christopher or Giant-like Idols, and Idol Temples: in one of which he saw a man, with a crosse drawne with inke on his hand, who seemed by his answers to bee a Christian; with Images like to that of Saint Michael, and other Saints. They haue a Sect called Iugures, whose l Priests are shauen, and clad in Saffron-coloured garments, vnmarried, an hundred or two hundred in a Cloyster. On their holy-dayes they place in their Temples two long formes, one ouer against another, whereon they sit with bookes in their hands, reading softly to themselues. Nor could our Author (entring amongst them) by any meanes breake this their silence. They haue, whersoeuer they goe, a string about them full of nut-shels, like the Popish beadrols; alway they are vttering these words, Onmam hattani, God thou knowest, expecting so many rewards, as they make such memorials of God. They haue a Church-yard, and a Church-porch, with a long pole on it (as it were a steeple) adioyning to their Temples. In those porches they vse to sit and conferre. They weare certaine ornaments of paper on their heads. Their writing is downewards, and so from the left hand to the right; which the Tartars receiued from them. They vse Magicall Characters, hanging their Temples full of them. They burne their dead, and lay vp the ashes in the top of a Pyramis. They beleeue there is one God, that he is a Spirit: and their Images they make not to represent God, but in memoriall of the rich after their death, as they professed to Rubruquius. The Priests (besides their Saffron-iackets buttoned close before) weare on their left shoulder a cloake descending before and behind vnder their right arme, like to a Deacon carrying the Housel-boxe in Lent. They worship towards the North, clapping their hands together, and prostrating themselues on their knees vpon the Earth, holding also their foreheads in their hands. They extend their Temples East and West in length, vpon the North side they build (as it were) a Vestrie; on the South, a Porch. The doores of their Temples are alwayes opened to the South. A certaine Nestorian Priest told him of so huge an Idoll, that it might be seene two dayes before a man came at it. Within the Quier, which is on the North side of the Temple, they place a chest long and broad, like a Table, and behind that chest stands their principall Idoll, towards the South: round about which, they place the other lesse Idols: and vpon that chest they set candles and oblations. They haue great Bels like vnto ours. The Nestorians of those parts, pray with hands displayed before their breasts, so to differ from that Iugurian Rite of ioyning hands in prayer. Thus farre William de Rubruquius, who was there Anno, 1253. In Thebet (sayth Odoricus) resideth the Abassi, or Pope of the Idolaters, distributing Religious preferments to those Easterne Idolaters, as the Roman Pope doth in the West.

CHAP. XVII.

Of other Northerne people adioyning to the Tartars, and their Religions.

THE Permians and Samoits that lye from Russia North, and North-east, are thought to haue taken their beginning from the Tartar-kind, whom they somewhat resemble in countenance. The Permians are subiect to the Russe, they liue by hunting and trading with their furres, as doe the Samoits, which dwell more toward the North-Sea. The Samoit, or Samoed, hath his name as the Russe sayth, of eating himselfe, as if they had sometime beene Canibals: and at this time they will eate raw flesh, whatsoeuer it be, euen the very carrion that lyeth in the ditch. They say themselues, that they were called Samoie, that is, of themselues, as if they were Indigenæ, therebred, and not transplanted from any other people. I talked (sayth our Author) with certaine of them, and finde that they acknowledge one God, but represent him by such things as they haue most vse and good by: and therefore they worship the Sunne, the Ollen, the Losy, and such like.

a W. Pursgloue. b Russes trauels translated by Rich. Finch. Oneeko hist. ap. Hessel. Gerard. Whose Mappe makes these things more plaine.

The PERMACKS, and SEBYRIANS are of the Russe Religion. The Yougorians are clothed after the Permacke fashion, but worship Images as doe the Samoeds. The Tingoseys a people farre more Easterly, are sayd to worship the Sun and Moone. They weare their apparell all of Deere-skinnes, made closer to them then the Samoeds, being also a taller people. Beyond b the Tingoseys liue the Boulasheos: beyond them the Seelahee. Beyond the riuer Yenisey the Imbaki, and Ostaki, a kind of Tartars. Beyond the Tingoseys is a Riuer called Gera. This space extending Eastward from Ob, a Russe was a Sommer in trauelling, and liued three sixe yeeres. Oneeko another Russe was first occasion of subduing the Samoyeds to the Russian Dominion, in the raigne of Pheodor Iuanouich. He sending his sonnes into the Samoyeds Country, found that about the Riuer Ob they were gouerned by the ancientest, had no Cities, liued in hords or companies, eate the beasts they tooke, knew not corne nor bread, were good Archers, sharpning their Arrowes with fish bones and stones: sewed Furres with bones and sinewes for their clothing, which they ware inward in Winter, outward in Summer, couered their houses with Elkes-skinnes: He grew rich by trading with them for Furres. The Muscouite sent thither Messengers gallantly attired, which easily obtayned leaue to erect Castles neere Ob, to which he sent condemned persons, and brought it into the forme of a petty Kingdome. Boris the next Emperour built Toóma 200. leagues vp the riuer Ob, and many other Townes on both sides the Riuer, the which were peopled with Samoyeds, Tartars, & Russes. It is ten weekes trauell from Ob to the Tingoseys through the Desarts. They in hords, haue deformed swellings vnder the throat. These trauelling Eastward passed a Riuer which they called c Pisida, & heard the sound of brazen bels: which if it be so, is argument of some more ciuill people, eyther of Cathay or the parts adioyning. The Cathayans are said to trade to Sergol: From the mouth of Pechora to Ob is tenne dayes sayling. Ob and Ienisey runne North and South. The Samoyeds report that in Ieneseу are great vessels drawne with ropes.

c The Russes call it great Ob.

W. Pursgloue & Ios. Logan.

In the yeare 1611. Iosias Logan and William Pursgloue, sailed to Pechora, where they anchored July the tenth, and on the sixteenth came to Pustozera: where Master Logan wintered, but Pursgloue trauelled from thence by Land to Colmogro. The nine and twentieth of Nouember hee departed with Russes and Permacks, for Slebotca in a sled drawne with two Deere: in their Argeshey (so they call their whole company) were two hundred and tenne sleds: and they had aboue fiue hundred for change when the other were weary. These kept company till the fourth of December, and then in company of foure sleds and a Samoyed for a guide, he left the laden sleds, and went in post for Slebotca, where he arriued the ninth day at night: and thence trauelled day and night to Colmogro, where he arriued the twelfth being two hundred and fiftie Verst's or Russe miles, somewhat shorter then ours. He returned againe with a better passage to Pechora, by reason of much snow falne in the meane while and frozen, passing ouer the mountaines, which are not high, but a Champaine Countrey. Hee left the company the first of Ianuary, and in forty houres continuall post, passed (by report) three hundred and fifty verst's. About the mouth of the Riuer Ob, d is sayd to bee an ancient Idoll, in forme of an olde woman, holding in each arme a child, and a third at her feet, called by her worshippers (the Iugri, Obdarani and Condorani) Zlata Baba, that is, the golden olde wife, to which they offer precious Furres, and sacrifice Harts, besmearing the mouth and eyes of the Idoll with the bloud. In the time of their sacrificing, the Priest demands of the Idoll touching things to come, and sometime receiueth answere. Doctor Fletcher e found this to be a very fable, Onely (saith he) in the Prouince of Obdoria, on the Seaside neere the mouth of Ob, there is a Rocke, which naturally (being somewhat helped by imagination) seemes to beare the shape of a ragged woman with a child in her armes (as the Rocke by the North Cape, the shape of a Fryer) where the Obdorian Samoites vse to resort, by reason of the commoditie of the place for fishing: and there sometimes practise their Sorceries, and ominous coniecturings about the good or bad successe of their iourneyes, fishings, huntings, and such like.

The Samoits or SAMOYEDS are clad from head to foot in Deeres-skinnes, or in Seale-skinnes, with the hairy side outwards downe as low as the knees, with their breeches and netherstocks of the same, both men and women. They are all blacke haired, naturally beardlesse. And therefore the men are hardly discerned from the women, but by the lockes which the women weare downe their eares. They liue a wilde and sauage life rouing from one place to another, without any property of House or Land. Their leader in euery company is their Papa or Priest.

The Samoyeds are Idolaters and Witches, obſeruing Deueliſh ſuperſtitions, as witneſſeth Rich. Iohnſon, who on the fifth of Ianuary, in the yeere, 1557. ſaw amongſt them, as † followeth. The Samoyeds about the bankes of Pechore, are in ſubiection to the Muſcouite, and when they will remoue from one place to another, then they will make Sacrifices, in manner following. Euery kindred doth Sacrifice in their owne Tent, and hee that is moſt Ancient, is their Prieſt. And firſt the Prieſt doth begin to play vpon a thing like a great Siue, with a skinne on the one end like a Drumme; his Drumme ſticke is about a ſpanne long, and one end is round like a ball, couered with the skin of an Hart.

Alſo the Prieſt hath as it were a white garland on his head, and his face is couered with a peece of a ſhirt of male, with many ſmall ribbes, and teeth of fiſhes, and wild beaſts hanging thereon. Then he ſingeth, as wee vſe here in England to hollow, whoope or ſhout at Hounds, and the reſt of the company anſwere him with this Outes Igha, Igha, Igha, to which the Prieſt with his voyce replyeth. And they anſwere him with the ſelfe ſame words, ſo many times, till in the end, he become, as it were, madde, falling downe as he were dead, hauing nothing on him but a ſhirt, and lying on his backe. I perceyued him yet to breath, and asked why he lay ſo: they anſwered, Now doth our God tell him what wee ſhall doe, and whither we ſhall goe. And when he had lyen ſtill a little while, they cryed thus three times together, Oghao, Oghao, Oghao, and as they vſe theſe three cals, he ryſeth with his head, and lyeth downe againe; and then he roſe vp & ſang with like voyces as he did before, with the like anſwere, Igha, Igha, Igha. Then he commanded them to kill fiue Ollens, or great Deere, & continued ſinging ſtill, both he and they as before. Then he tooke a ſword of a Cubite, and a ſpan long (I did mete it my ſelfe) and put it into his belly halfe way, and ſometime leſſe, but no wound was to be ſeene; they continuing their ſweete ſong ſtill. Then he put the ſword into the fire, till it was warme, and ſo thruſt it into the ſlit of his ſhirt, and thruſt it thorow his body, as I thought, in at his Nauell, and out at his fundament, the point being out of his ſhirt behind, I layd my finger vpon it. Then he pulled out the ſword, and ſate downe.

This being done, they ſet a Kettle of water ouer the fire to heate, and when the water doth ſeethe, the Prieſt beginneth to ſing againe, they anſwering him. For ſo long as the water was in ſeething, they ſate and ſang not. Then they made a thing being foure ſquare, and in height and ſquareneſſe of a chaire, and couered with a gowne very cloſe, the fore-part thereof, for the hinder part ſtood to the Tents ſide. Their Tents are round and are called Chome, in their language. The water ſtill ſeething on the fire, and this ſquare ſeat being ready, the Prieſt put off his ſhirt, and the thing like a garland, which was on his head, with thoſe things which couered his face, and hee had on yet all this while a payre of hoſen of Deere-skinnes with the hayre on, which came vp to his buttockes. So he went into the ſquare ſeat, and ſate downe like a Taylor, and ſang with a ſtrong voyce or hollowing. Then they tooke a ſmall line made of Deere-skinnes of foure fathomes long, and with a ſmall knot the Prieſt made it faſt about his necke, and vnder his left arme, and gaue it to two men ſtanding on each ſide of him, which held the ends together. Then the kettle of hot water was ſet before him in the ſquare ſeat, which ſeat they now couered with a gowne of broad cloth-without lining (ſuch as the Ruſſes vſe to weare.) Then the two men which did hold the end of the line, ſtill ſtanding there, began to draw, and drew, till they had drawne the ends of the line ſtiffe, and together; and then I heard a thing fall into the kettle of water, which was before him in the Tent. I asked what it was, and they anſwered, his head, ſhoulder and left arme, which the line had cut off, I meane, the knot which I ſaw afterward drawne hard together. Then I roſe vp, and would haue looked whether it were ſo or not, but they layd hold on me; and ſayd, that if they ſhould ſee him with their bodily eyes, they ſhould liue no longer. (And the moſt part of them can ſpeake the Ruſſian tongue, to be vnderſtood, and they took me to be a Ruſſian,) Then they beganne to hollow with theſe words Oghaoo, Oghaoo, Oghaoo, many times together: in the meane while I ſaw a thing like a finger of a man, two times together, thruſt thorow the gowne from the Prieſt. I asked them that ſate neere to me what it was, that I ſaw, and they ſayd, not his finger for he was yet dead; and that which I ſaw appeare thorow the gowne, was a beaſt, but what beaſt they knew not, nor would not tell. And I looked vpon the gowne, and there was no hole to be ſeene. At laſt, the Prieſt lifted vp his head, with his ſhoulder and arme, and all his body, and came out to the fire. Thus farre of their ſeruice, which I ſaw during the ſpace of certaine houres. But how they doe worſhip their Idols, that I ſaw not: for they put vp their ſtuffe to remoue from that place where they lay. And I went to him that ſerued their Prieſt, and asked him what their God ſayd to him, when hee lay as dead. Hee anſwered, that his owne people doth not know, neither is it for them to know, for they muſt doe as he commanded.

reporteth) certaine Images, some in likeneſſe of a Man, others of a Beare, Wolfe, &c. which they behang with the richeſt Furres they can get, hiding them in Caues in the Woods, for feare of the Ruſſes: who trauell thoſe Countries to hunt after wild beaſts, as Sable, Fox, and Beuer: who, if they light vpon thoſe furred Deities take away the Furres, and beſtow on them greater heat in fires. Puſtozera is in 68. degrees 50. minutes. The inhabitants hold trade with other Samoieds, which haue traffique with the Ougorians and Molgomſey, for Sables, blacke and white Foxes, Beauers, Downe, Whales-Finnes. The Ruſſes malegning others that gaine which themſelues find in the Samoied-trade, traduced the Engliſh amongſt them as Spies. The Ozera or lake before the Towne was frozen ouer, the thirteenth of October, and ſo continued till the twentieth of May. Ioſias Logan there obſerued, and the eleuenth of December, hee could ſee but the way of the Sunne-beames: on the thirteenth, the beames but not the Sunne: which on Chriſtmas day he ſaw riſing at South and by Weſt, and ſetting at South Weſt and by South: not wholy eleuated from the Horizon, but all the way the nether part of the Sunne ſeeming iuſt and euen with it. They found the harbor of Pechora full of Ice in Iuly, the tide ſtrong and dangerous. The Towne of Pechora is ſmall, it hath three Churches: the poore in the Spring and Summer time liue by catching Partridges, Geeſe, Duckes, Swans: ſalt the fleſh and liue on them moſt of the Winter. Sayling from Puſtozera in Auguſt towards Noua Zimla, they faſtened themſelues to a piece of Ice, which cauſed their returne homewards.

The Samoieds know theſe vnknowne Deſarts, and can tell where the Moſſe groweth, wherewith they refreſh their wearied Deere, pitching their tents of Deere-skins neere the ſame. Their wiues and daughters fetch wood ſometimes tenne verſts off, they hang kettles on the fire with ſnow, of which melted, euery one drinkes a carouſe. When they haue ſupped, they ſpread a Deeres skinne on the ſnow within the Tent. Whereon he reſteth couered with his day-apparell. Tenne or twelue of the boyes, or maides watch the Deere to keepe them from Wolues or Beares: making a great ſhout if they ſee any. For two hundred and fifty ſleds they pitch euery night three Tents. The light of the Moone and ſnow helpe them in their trauels.

The Hollanders in the yeere 1494, ſent to diſcouer a way to Cathay and China, by the North-East, g which by Maſter Burrough, Pet and Iacman, Engliſhmen, had beene long before in vaine attempted. William Barents was the chiefe Pilot for this diſcouerie. This yeere h they ſayled thorow the ſtraits of Vaygats, and thought themſelues not farre ſhort of the Riuer Ob, The next yeere they returned for the ſame diſcouery. They i landed in the Samogithians or Samoyeds Countrey, and named a place, becauſe they there found Images carued of wood, Idall nooke. They gaue names to places long before diſcouered by the Engliſh, as if they had beene the firſt founders. They learned of certaine Muſcouits, that the Inhabitants of Noua Zemla, had neither religion, nor Ciuility preſcribed them by any Law, but worſhipped the Sunne, Moone, and North-Starre, and euery yeere offered vnto them ſacrifices of Deere and other things. On the nine and twentieth of Auguſt there aroſe a thicke fogge, whereupon Oliuer Brunel (which had beene three ſeuerall yeeres ſent by the King of Denmarke, for the diſcouery of Groenland) reporteth that in 76. Degrees hee had often obſerued ſuch thicke fogges, that ſome periſhed thereby. Theſe happened moſt commonly in October and Nouember. The laſt of Auguſt they had ſpeech with the Samoyeds, they were of k ſhort ſtature, ſcarſely foure foot high, with long hayre, broad faces, great heads, little eyes, ſhort and bow legges, very ſwift, clothed with beaſts skins, whereof the hayrie ſide was outward. They know no God. The Sunne (whoſe preſence they are long depriued of in the Winter (which is recompenſed in their nightleſſe Summer:) is worſhipped amongſt them. And when the Sunne is declining out of their ſight, the Moone or North-Starre, is his receiuer or ſucceſſour (if you will) in that tribute of their deuotions. They haue beſides, many Idols rudely carued. In times paſt they had no King; but now they chuſe one to that dignity. They bury the dead, and offer yeerely their ſacrifices for them to the Sunne, Moone, and North-Starre, of their Deere, which they burne, except the head and feet. They eate the fleſh of wild beaſts, eyther raw, or dryed in the ayre; which make them haue very vnſauory breath. On the ſixth of September two of them went on ſhore, on the Continent of Moſcouia, and encountred with a Beare, which killed one of them: his crie brought in other of their fellowes (which were alſo ſtragling about) to his reſcue, but the Beare laid hold alſo vpon one of them, and could not be driuen to forſake his prey, till himſelfe became a prey in recompence. The two torne carkaſſes were there buried. They tooke from one Beare which they killed, an hundred pound of fat, which ſerued them for their lamps: the skinne was nine foot l long, and ſeuen wide.

Rainbow, one encompassing them, the other crossing them ouerthwart. After many dreadfull combats with the Ice, and one of the ships departing from the other, they were forced to winter in Noua Zemla; where they built them a house to serue them for a fortification against the sauage Beares, tempestuous stormes, continuall snowes, Ice, and vnspeakeable cold; and (if worse may bee) a worse then all these, they endured a continuall night of many weekes, wherein neither the Sun, nor any of his courtly traine, the least rayes to be the harbingers of his desired presence, did present themselues to their eyes: and the fire could scarcely preuaile against the insulting tyranny of the cold to warme them. The Beares together with the Sun forsooke them, but plentie of Foxes remained; and with the Sun the Beares also returned; sometime laying violent siege to their house. From the fourth of November, till the seuen and twentieth of Ianuarie they saw no Sun. Their Watch also or Clocke was by violence of the cold forced to stand still, that they could not measure their times. Thus did they waite in expectation of the Sunnes returne, that they also (not able futher to pursue the voyage) might returne home, which eleuen of them did in October following.

But seeing these North-easterne Seas are so frozen and vnpassable, I will therefore in an inkie Sea finde an easier passage for the Reader, with more, both ease and securitie, to the mightie Kingdome of China, whereof wee are next to speake.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the Kingdome of China.

§. I.

Of the Names, Prouinces, Cities, and situation thereof.

CHina is supposed of some, to be that Countrey, whose people of Ptolomey are [a] called Sina. Some thinke them to bee the people mentioned by the Prophet Esai [b], whereunto Iunius also inclineth. The Arabians call them צינין Tzinin: and the Portugals first of all other (because they could not pronounce it aright) called them Chinians (saith [c] Ioseph Scaliger) Pierre du Iarric, saith, [d] that before that time in all the East they were called Chijs, and the Inhabitants of Ceilan were called Chingales, because they were mixed with the Chinois; and Cinamom, was of the Persians named Darchini, that is, wood of China, as some thinke: he addeth their opinion that deriue that name from the Chinian salutation, in which they vse the word Chij, Chij, as a nickname therefore giuen them: and others that thinke the Citie Chincheo gaue name to the whole Region: but it were tedious to recite heere the seuerall opinions in this question. And fitter it is to heare Ricius his iudgement, who being sent into the Indies Anno 1578. after foure yeeres stay at Goa and Cochin, was by the Iesuiticall Visitor employed for China, in which he liued, about eight and twentie yeeres; some of which he spent in Nanquin and other places, but the ten last in Paquin, the Royall Citie and Residence. Hee out of his experience could best informe vs of China affaires, and a little before his death (which hapned the eleuenth of May 1610.) writ certaine Commentaries of his obseruations, which Trigautius another Chinian Iesuite, hath since reuised and published; protesting sincere truth in his Relations, which (hee saith) many former Writers, euen of their societie, wanted in many things, partly receiuing by heare-say of China-Merchants, partly staying small time, and but in the skirts of the countrey. This I premise, that none impute to mee a fault, so much after so good intelligence, to haue increased this History of China, the most admirable this day in the world. For the name he acknowledgeth Ptolomey his Sinæ, and the ancient Seriça Regio, to agree with this, where the poorest are clothed in silke, and whence other countries are therewith stored, the inuention whereof their Annals report 2600. yeeres before Christ. But of all these names [e] the Chinois know none: whose custome is, that when any new family attaineth the soueraignrie, the Countrey receiueth with the new Lord, new Lawes, and a new Name. So they write that it hath sometimes beene called Than, which signifieth Broad; after that Yu, that is, Rest; next Hia, or Great; afterwards Sciam, Adorned; then Cheu, which is Perfect; Han, the Milken way in Heauen; with other names many. But in the reigne of this family, which is called CIV, the Kingdome is stiled MIN, which signifieth Brightnesse, to which they adde TA, calling it [f] Tamin, or Great Brightnesse. Few of the neighbour Nations obserue this, and by diuers of them it is diuersly named; Those of Siam and Cochin call it Cin, whence the Portugals call it China;

China; the Iaponites, Than; the Tartars Han; the Westerne Saracens (as hath beene obserued) Cathay: and the Chinois themselues haue one name common to all ages Ciumquo, as also Chium hoa; which signifie, the former, a Kingdome, the other a Garden, in the middest: they conceiuing the Earth square, and their Countrey in the midst thereof, which made them offended with our Maps, that placed them in the furtheſt East; and Ricius so disposed his Maps after, that hee placed them in the middle of the same. The King is entituled Lord of the Vniuerse, which how boysterous soeuer, is more excusable then in many other inferiour Potentates, the Chinois thinking (according to their Geographie) that the World contained but few other Nations, and those for the most part so contemptible, that they willingly relinquished them, or thought them not worth the conquering. Neither was euer any one Kingdome so worthy the name of GREAT, beginning at the Ile Hainam (which signifies the South Sea) in the 19. degree, and extendeth Northwards to 42. and from the 112. degree in Longitude (reckoning from the Canaries) in the Prouince Yunan, to the 132. Eastwards. This hath been obserued by Mathematicall Instruments and obseruations of Eclipses in their Kalenders, and especially for the Northerne computation, it is out of doubt. But for illustration hereof, we will adde out of one of their own bookes, entituled A description of that King- "dome, printed 1579. thus interpreted. In this Kingdome are two Royall or Parliament Pro"uinces, Nanquin and Pequin (the one signifying the South Court, the other the "North) and besides these, thirteene others. In these fifteene Prouinces or Kingdomes, "are numbred by another diuision 158. Regions or Shires (they call them Fu) the most "of which haue twelue or fifteene Cities, besides Townes, Villages, Castles, and Hamlets.
"In these are two hundred seuen and fortie great Cities, which they call CHEV, rather "in dignitie then greatnesse, or otherwise, exceeding the inferiour Cities, called Hien, of "which are 1152. The persons of such as are growne to mans estate (all which pay tribute "to the King are 58. millions, 550. thousands, 801: not reckoning the feminine Sexe, "Boyes, Striplings, or Youths, Eunuches, Souldiors, Magistrates, the Kings kindred, Stu"dents, and many others. And yet of Souldiors, notwithstanding their long peace, are "maintained in perpetuall pay and seruice aboue one million; the three Northerne Prouin-
"ces, being almost halfe of them in militarie stipend. The bordering Kingdomes tribu-
"tarie, are to the East three, to the West fiftie three, numbred in that Booke; though this "tribute bee of no great value. The Kingdome is also fortified by Nature and Art: the Sea on the South and East, and steepe Precipices ioyned together with a strong wall, the space of foure hundred and fiue leagues to the North, and a sandie Wildernesse on the North-west; all conspiring to the strength thereof: and for the South-west it is full of Hills and Desarts, with a few small Seignories, vnworthy their feare or desire. It is diuided into fifteene Pro-
I. Pantoia. uinces, six whereof border on the Sea, Cantan, Foquien, Chequiam, Nanquin, Xantum, Paquin:
the other nine be in-land, Quiamsi, Huquam, Honan, Xiensi, Xansi, Suchion, Queichen, Iunan, Coansi. Some sound these names somewhat otherwise. The Kings residence is at Paquin, though Paquin enioyeth also a Court Royall, as being the Royall Seat of the ancient Kings; which some place in Quinsay: but of that afterwards.

Of the Commodities of China; and commodious Riuers and shipping: with two Maps, one made by HONDIVS, the other [h] taken out of a China Map made there by the Chinois.

h Of the large China Map, see an exposition, To. 2. of my Pilgrimes. M. Ricci.

BY reason of this large extent both East and West, and North and South, it comes to passe, that no Countrey yeelds such varietie of things, growing in such varietie of Clime and Soyle; making others indebted to it, but it selfe not indebted to any Countrey, either for necessitie or delicacie of diet. Neither haue wee scarcely any thing in Europe, which is not there found; and what is missing, is more then recompenced in other things exceeding. There is store of Wheat, Barley, Millet, Panike, and other kindes of graine. In Rice (their chiefe food) it farre excelleth Europe. Of Beanes and Pease (wherewith they feed their Beasts) in some Prouinces they haue two or three Haruests in a yeere. None of our principall fruits, but Oliues and Almonds, are wanting: others they haue vnknowne to vs, as those which they call Longanas, Coco-nuts, and other Indian fruits. Their Oranges, Limons, Pome-Citrons, farre excell the Europæan in varietie and delicacie. The like we may say of their Garden hearbes, which Religion to some, to others Pouertie, haue made their only food. Great is their varietie of Flowers; many heare vnknowne: but there, the colour more respected then the sent. As for distillations, they neuer, till of late by vs, had heard of farre inferiot to ours; for their Grapes are fewer, and leſſe pleaſant: nor doe they make Wine of them, but of Rice and other things; which is both well taſting, and not ſo burning as ours. They commonly feed on Porke: they haue ſtore alſo of Beefe, Mutton, Goats fleſh, Hennes, Duckes, Geeſe: they feed alſo on Horſes, Mules, Aſſes, Dogs, which are ſold in the Shambles as well as other fleſh. But in ſome places, either for Superſtition or Husbandry, they ſpare their Beeues and Buffalls. Veniſon, eſpecially of red Deere, is plentifull, Hares, and other things, all verie cheape. Their Horſes are not ſo comely as in theſe parts, but in number, cheapeneſſe, and vſe for burthen, excelling. Yet is there leſſe need of ſuch carriages, by reaſon of plentie of Riuers, which Nature or Art hath prouided through all the Countrey. Hence is there ſuch ſtore of ſhipping, that a moderne Author hath written, that there liue as many on the Waters, as on the Land: which, to ſuch as ſayle in thoſe Streames, will not ſeeme too exceſſiue an hyperbole. And I dare affirme this as a thing credible, that there is as much ſhipping in this Kingdome, as in all the world beſides; vnderſtanding this aſſertion of freſh-water veſſels: for their ſea-veſſells are fewer and worſe then ours. Pantoga [k] reporteth his owne iourney from Macao to Paquin, the ſpace of ſix hundred Spaniſh leagues (which the next way, by land, is reckoned 450.) in all that ſpace trauelling but one day by land, for ſhortning his way; otherwiſe all the way by water, carried in a Riuer, called of the Chinians a little Sea for the greatneſſe, (being the greateſt which euer he ſaw, in ſome places two or three myles broad, often tempeſtuous, and cauſe of many ſhipwrackes.) The Chinois dare not ſayle in it by night: and they ſay, That if one fall in, hee is ſo whirled, that ſwimming can ſcarcely ſaue him. They call it Yamſu, or the ſonne of the Sea. It abounds with Sea-fiſh a hundred leagues leagues from the Sea. Hee sayled after that in another Riuer of like bigneſſe, whoſe waters were thicke and myrie, which they clariſie with Allome, before they can drinke it: All the reſt of the ſtreames that hee paſſed, were made by mens hands, aboue two hundred leagues. That yellow or muddie ſtreame, at his beginning makes a Lake, and then runnes Weſtward beyond the walls, to the Tartars, and then backe againe by thoſe walls, compaſſing the Prouince of Scienſi, running South, and after Eaſt, to the Sea. It often ouerflowes, and doth much harme, not ſubiect to their walls and lawes, and often changes the ſandie channell. Some Magiſtrates are appointed to appeaſe the Spirit therof with rites, (for they aſcribe Spirits to the rule of many things.) From Nanquin to Paquin, the ſpace of three hundred leagues, it ſeemed to be, as it were, a continued ſtreet of ſhips: and though they came in the morning betimes to Nanquin, yet were there the ſame houre aboue fiue hundred ſayle of Veſſels vnder ſayle, readie to enter, which were laden with prouiſion for the Citie. The Kings ſhips in that Region, about Nanquin, are reported to be about ten thouſand, to carrie his rents and tributes, beſides a thouſand ſayle belonging to priuate men. The ſhips wherein the Mandarines or Magiſtrates and Officers are carried, are not inferior in ſumptuous ſtatelineſſe to the ſhips Royal in Europe; and ſome exceeding them, hauing Parlors, large Hals, Kitchens, with other Offices; and many windowes, with ſilke curtaines, and curiouſly painted; without, enuironed with galleries; the height, as of high houſes; and painted within and without with a certaine liquor, made of a gumme, called Claran, of ſhining brightneſſe, and long continuance, beſides great ſtore of carued workes, that they ſeeme Princes Palaces. Eſcalanta and Gaſpar da Cruz report a Prouerbe of the Chinois, That their King is able to make a bridge of ſhips from China to Malacca, which is neere fiue hundred leagues. They haue ſo great ſtore of timber, that a ſhip may there bee built for a fourth part of that which it will here coſt. The Riuers are no leſſe adorned and beautified with Cities, Townes, and Villages; ſo many, as that in all this way being neere or againſt one, they had alway ſight of another, that all the way ſeemed a continuall habitation; and ſo great, that ſometime they ſayled two or three houres alongſt the walls of ſome Citie. Their Townes and Cities haue high walls.

But to returne to their Horſes: Such as are for Warre, are innumerable, but vnfit for ſeruice, running away at the firſt neighing of a Tartarian Horſe: beſides that, they are vnſhod with yron, and therefore too tender-hoofed, for hard trauell: neither haue they skill to manage them. Fiſh is there aboundant, by the neighbour-hood of the Sea, ſtore of Riuers, and Lakes (for their greatneſſe and depth) as it were little Seas; beſides Fiſh-ponds plentie, maintained to that intent and purpoſe, which euerie day ſtore the Market.

Their Forreſts breed no Lyons, but great quantitie of Tygres, Beares, Wolues, Foxes: Elephants none, but at Paquin, for ſhew in the Court: Flaxe they haue not, but Cotton enough for the world; and yet not aboue foure hundred yeeres ſince it was brought thither. Silke is plentifull and cheape: of Hempe and certaine other hearbes they make cloth: their wooll they ſheare, and make thereof ſlight clothes; but good cloth they know not how to make; although that [b] which is thither brought, bee deare ſold. And this note I would commend to our Engliſh Merchants, that can beſt furniſh them. For the cold in the Northerne Prouinces, ſeemes more then the Climate threatens, farre beyond the Countries of Europe in the ſame height; their huge Riuers and Lakes being frozen ouer, the cauſe vnknowne, but gueſſed to bee the Tartarian Mountaines ſnowie tops, not farre diſtant: againſt which, they vſe furred garments.

b A note for our Engliſh Eaſt-India Merchants.

All ſorts of Metalls are here found. Beſides the ordinarie Braſſe and Copper, they make another kind, white as Siluer, no dearer then the former. Of melted yron, they make Cauldrons, Bells, Mortars, Furnaces, Ordnance, and the like, all cheaper far then here. Their gold is not baſe, but not ſo fine as ours. Siluer is vſed for money, but by weight, not by coyne; and ſo in all bargaines they vſe the ballance, the price higher or lower, as the Siluer is in fineneſſe: wherein much fraud is vſed. In many places they haue ſmall coynes of Braſſe, which come out of the publike Mint. Their great men haue veſſels of ſiluer and gold, but not ſo common as in Europe. But the women ſpend much gold & ſiluer in adorning their heads. Porcelane is their vſuall Table-furniture; the moſt excellent whereof, is made in the Prouince of Kiamſi, of yellow earth: whence it is diſperſed into the other Prouinces, and euen to vs. They will with wyre ſow the broken pieces together, and make them hold liquor, as we doe with woodden diſhes. Their glaſſe is not comparable to ours. Their buildings are of Timber, euen the Kings houſes, the lower walls ſometimes of Bricke; which, together with their ſtore of ſhipping, argues their plentie of Timber: the kindes, moſt part, ſuch as with vs. Okes are ſcarce; but in ſtead thereof, they haue a hard kind of euerlaſting wood, which the Portugalls therefore call Iron, being like it alſo in colour. Cedar they vſe for Funerall Coffins and Tombes, in which they are curious and coſtly. They haue alſo a kind of Reed (the Portugalls call it Bambu) almoſt as hard as yron, the greater ſort, though hollow and diſtinguiſhed guiſhed with knots, yet ſupplying the roome of ſtuds, or poſts, in ſmaller houſes, being as big as with both hands may be griped: the ſmaller ſerue for launces, and other manifold vſes. Of theſe is exceeding plenty and cheapneſſe.

For Fuell, they haue Wood, Coales, Reeds, Stubble, and a kinde of pitchy bituminous matter, called [1] Mui (they haue the like in the Biſhopricke of Leege) digged out of the earth, very cheape; and not troubleſome with the ſmoake. Here growes plenty of Rhubarbe, and Lignum ſanctum: here is alſo ſtore of Muske. Salt is made not only by the Sea-ſide, but of diuers waters within land. Sugar is more vſed then Honey, yet like plenty of both. Waxe is there not of Honey alone, but another whiter and better, and burning clearer, made by certaine Wormes, which they keepe on Trees to this purpoſe: and a third ſort, made of the fruit of a Tree. Their Paper will not laſt with ours, nor beare Inke but on one ſide: yet they haue as white as ours, made of Cotton.

[1] This ſeemes to be ſome kind of Coale; ſuch as is found in diuers places of our Ilands.

They haue Marbles of diuers colours, precious Stones, odoriferous Woods, and Gums, with other rarities. Amongſt the reſt, a certaine Shrub, the leaues whereof are gathered in the Spring, and dried in the ſhadow, and ſo preſerued to their daily decoctions; which they drinke continually, both at Table, and when one friend enters anothers houſe, or ofter, if he makes any ſtay. They call it Cia, ſup it hot, more healthſome then toothſome, for it hath a bitter ſmacke. The Iaponians will giue ten or twelue duckats for one pound of the beſt, and drinke it in poulder mingled with two or three ſpoonfuls of boyling water: but the Chinois ſteepe the leaues. They haue another pitchy ſubſtance like milke, which they ſtraine out of the barke of a certaine Tree, whereof they make their Cie, the Portugals call it Cicon, wherewith they varniſh their houſes and houſhold-ſtuffe, and ſhips, in diuers colours, with glaſſe-like ſhining to the eye, ſmoothneſſe to the touch; beſides the long continuance, pleaſingly maieſticall: the cauſe they need no clothes for their Tables; which are eaſily reſtored to their cryſtall luſtre with a little waſhing, if by any fatty ſubſtance dimmed. Oyle is alſo expreſſed out of the fruit of another Tree, of vſe like the former, but inferiour ſomewhat, and more plentifull. Cinnamon and moſt excellent Ginger are here growing; Pepper, Nutmegs, Aloes, and other like, are here plentifully, out of the Ilands and bordering Kingdomes. Gunpoulder they haue in great ſtore, which they vſe not ſo much in Peeces (whereto they are more vnapt) as in Fire-workes; in which they are curiouſly artificiall, liuely expreſſing Trees, with their fruits, and other rarities. In the firſt moneth of the yeere wee ſaw as much this way ſpent at Nanquin, as would haue ſerued for two yeeres continuall warre.

§. III.

Of the Cities and Caſtles in China: and of Quinſay.

OF the number of their Cities and their differing ſorts is mentioned before. Beſides theſe, they haue two ſorts of Caſtles, both for fortification and habitation, with priuiledges alſo of Market, the greater ſort named Huy 293. the leſſe of greater number 2593. Their Villages are innumerable. In each Citie is an Officer that hath charge of the walls, whereby they are kept faire and ſtrong: and for further beautie, beſides commoditie of ſhadow, they plant trees at their doores, which continue greene all the yeere long. The Cities generally are like one another, except in greatneſſe. Ant. Dalmeida Barros. Eſcalanta c.8. Gaſpar de Cruz.

The ſtreets are ſtrait, yeelding proſpect from one gate to another. Canton (ſo the Portugals call it, according to the name of the Prouince: the Chinois call it Quamcheu, or Canceu) is accounted the leaſt of the Metropolitan Cities: it hath on one ſide a great nauigable Riuer, elſewhere enuironed with a deepe trench, filled with water, which is nauigable alſo: the walls haue foureſcore and three Bulwarkes: the ſtreets ſo broad that ten men may ride in front, and paued, adorned with many triumphant Arches, and ſhops on both ſides: the bridges there and elſewhere in the Kingdome are many, of large free ſtones very coſtly, the high wayes very ſtately which leade to the Cities: and the Kings houſes for the publike Officers very magnificent after their manner. Such was the plenty and abundance, that in this one Citie were ſpent euery day betweene fiue and ſixe thouſand Hogs, and betweene ten and eleuen thouſand Duckes, beſides a great number of Kine, Birds, Hens, Conies, Frogs, Dogs, Fiſh of many ſorts: and yet the moſt vſuall meate of the Chinois is Rice boyled with water.

Nanquin ſtandeth in two and thirtie degrees, and is eight or ten leagues from the Sea, with a Riuer leading thither. [m] It hath three faire brick walls, with large and ſtately gates. The firſt wall containeth the Kings Palace, which it ſelfe alſo is compaſſed with three walls, [m] Pantogia.

in manner of a Caſtle, with ditches full of water round about them. This I dare be bold to n Chriſt.exp.l.3. cap.10. ſay (it is n Ricius his report) that no King in the world excells this King in a Palace, if we compare not particulars, but all things together. This firſt wall is in circuit foure or fiue Italian miles. The ſecond wall contayneth the firſt; and withall, the beſt part of the Citie, hauing in it twelue gates plated with Iron, furniſhed with Ordnance; it comprehendeth eighteene Italian miles. The third wall is not continued, but Arte ſupplying Nature elſewhere fortifying it; the compaſſe whereof can ſcarcely be knowne. The Inhabitants ſay, that two went out on horſebacke, one this way, the other that, and met againe at night, hauing ſpent the day, each in his ſemicircle. The greateſt part is very populous, howſoeuer there are alſo Mountaines, Gardens, Groues, and Lakes within the Citie. This circular forme is to bee obſerued, as of greateſt capacitie. There are fortie thouſand Souldiers in continuall garriſon. It is full of Palaces, Temples, Bridges, Towers; of beſt aire, fertilitie, and ingenious Inhabitants. The Riuer doth not onely paſſe by, but entreth the Citie with diuers channels made by arte, capable of great ſhips.

The ſtreets are (ſaith Pantogia) of two leagues, or of two and a halfe in length, wide, and paued. The compaſſe is at leaſt eleuen or twelue leagues, and contayneth by coniecture two hundred thouſand houſes, and (according to all the opinions of the Ieſuites there abiding) equalling, or exceeding in people foure of the greateſt Cities in Europe.

Paquin in 40. degrees. Paquin (or as Ricius alway calls it Pequin) is ſituate about a hundred miles from that famous Wall againſt the Tartars: in greatneſſe and neatneſſe exceeded by that of Nanquin, but in multitude of Inhabitants, Souldiers, and Magiſtrates, exceeding it. Two high and ſtrong walls compaſſe the South parts, ſo wide, that twelue horſe may eaſily runne thereon together, without hinderance. Theſe walls are of bricke, ſauing at the foundation of huge ſtones, filled with earth in the midſt, farre higher then thoſe in Europe. On the North ſide there is but one. On theſe walls as diligent watch is kept euery night, as in the hotteſt warre: in the day-time Eunuches watch at the gates, or rather exact cuſtomes. The Kings Palace is within the inner Southerne wall, neere the Gates, and ſo runnes vnto the Northerne wall, the reſt of the Citie ſtretching on both ſides. It is leſſe then the Palace at Nanquin, but more glorious, that ſeeming by the Kings long abſence a carkaſſe without life. The Citie is troubleſome (being little of it paued) in winter with durt, in ſummer with duſt, which in that Region, wherein it ſeldome raines, vpon any blaſt of winde, fills their houſes, and to preuent the trouble, there is none of any ranke which goes on foot, or rideth without a vaile hanging downe to their breaſts and couering their faces, ſo thinne that it may hinder the duſt and not the ſight, preuenting alſo the tedious knowledge and ſalutations by others. There are Muletters and Hackney-men in euery corner, to let their beaſts to ſuch as will hire them, who alſo know all chiefe places, and make way in thoſe populous ſtreets vnto their cuſtomers, both for a little money. But for this there is alſo a Booke which relateth the ſcite and ſtreets of the Citie: they may alſo hire chaires and bearers to carrie them.

In the Prouince of Sciantum is Cinchiamfu (which in Paulus his time, had two Churches of Chriſtians) whence is a Riuer made by hand (a thing vſuall in China) whereby they haue paſſage to Suceu, and to the Metropolitane Citie of Chequian, Hamceu. This Riuer is ſo cloyed with ſhips, becauſe it is not frozen in winter, that the way is ſtopped with multitude: which made Ricius exchange his way by water into another (more ſtrange to vs) by wagon, if we may ſo call it, which had but one wheele, ſo built that one might ſit in the middle as it were on horſe-backe, and on each ſide another; the wagoner putting it ſwiftly and ſafely forwards with leuers or barres of wood (thoſe wagons driuen by wind and ſaile, he mentions not) and ſo he came ſpeedily to Suceu and Hamceu, which are of the Chinois eſteemed Paradiſes. They haue a prouerbe, thien Xam thien tham, ti Xam ſu Ham: that which the Hall of heauen or Preſence-chamber is in heauen, that on earth are Suceu and Hamceu. And firſt for Suceu, the beautie, plentie, frequency, ſituation, make it admirable. It is ſeated as Venice, but better, in a pleaſant Riuer of freſh water, if it may not rather be called a Lake for the ſtilneſſe. They may paſſe quite through it, either by water or land, all the ſtreets and houſes are founded vpon piles of Pine-tree, and the merchandiſe brought from Marao, and other parts and ports are here ſold, as the fitteſt centre for diſperſion. It hath one gate into the land, other paſſages by boat; innumerable bridges, very ſtately and durable, but in thoſe narrow rills hauing one only arch: butter and milke-meates no where more ſpent, nor better wine of rice, which is carried thence to Paquin: by the frequencie of the Hauen and multitude of ſhips, almoſt denying faith to the eyes, which would thinke all the ſhips of the Kingdome here aſſembled, and notwithſtanding the continuall going out ſo ſupplied as if they neuer weighed: the hand-made Riuers that are made from Nanquin-ward hither, ſo peopled with Townes, Cities, Villages, as no where in the Kingdome more, as from hence also to Hamceu. It is scarsely two dayes iourney from the Sea, and the head of that Region, in which are eight Cities. When Hunni expelled the Tartars, this Region held out longest against him, and therefore to this day payes an excessiue tribute, euen halfe of all which the earth brings forth: some two small Prouinces not paying so much as this one Region, and the ° Citie alone (as in the printed Booke of the Kings tributes is extant) payes twelue millions to the King, more then the greatest Kingdome in Europe, if some haue not accounted P falsely; and he which knowes this Citie will not maruell at it. It is still kept with a strong Garrison, for feare of innouation.

But Hamceu or Hanceu, the Metropolitane of Chequian, is perhaps more to be admired, situate South-east from Nanquin almost nine dayes iourney, not two dayes from the Sea, in 30. degrees. This Prouince of Chequian is the chiefe of the thirteene washed on the East with the Sea, hauing Nanquin and Kiamsi on the West, Fuquian on the South, Xanton on the North: numbring twelue greater Cities, the chiefe of sixtie three lesse, besides innumerable Townes, Castles, Villages; the best wits, and most learned students in the whole Kingdome; it yeelds a fertile soyle, Art contending with Nature for varietie of Riuers, so many as may seeme impossible to humane industrie, adorned with numberlesse Bridges of many arches, made of huge stones, equall to the Europæan workmanship, and so abounding with Mulberie trees and Silke-wormes, that all the China Markets, besides other Countries, are hence furnished; and ten vests of Silke may bee here had at a cheaper price, then one of Cloth in Europe. Hamceu is the chiefe Citie of this Prouince, yea, in all this Kingdome; lesse perhaps somewhat in compasse of walls then Nanquin, but better peopled; no place in the Citie emptie, not occupied with Gardens, but all builded, and all the buildings almost with diuers stories, which in other Cities of China is not vsuall. The Inhabitants are so many, and the Tribute so much, that the Iesuites durst not relate that which hereof they had heard by graue testimonie, for the incredibilitie: the description would aske a whole volume. The chiefe street is almost halfe a dayes iourney in length, and cannot be lesse then admirable. For whereas the Chinois vse to erect triumphall Arches, as Monuments, to weldeseruing Magistrates and ornaments to their Cities; this one street hath at least three hundred such (besides very many others in other parts of the Citie) of massie stones, and exceeding curious workmanship, that if the houses on both sides yeelded the like splendour, the world could not shew such a spectacle. But they occupie it all with shops, and build the most magnificence of their houses inwards, and yet those not like the Europæan Palaces. There is also a Lake close to the Citie, which the eye can scarcely measure, which sliding into a valley encompassing, embossed with diuers hillockes, hath giuen occasion to Arte to shew her vtmost in the adorning the same, beautifying all those spacious bankes with houses, gardens, groues; a very labyrinth to the bewitched eyes, not knowing whereat most in this maze to be most amazed, wherein most to delight. And in delights doe they spend their dayes, filling the Lake with vessels, furnished with feasts, spectacles and playes on the water. There is a pleasant Hill in the middle of the Citie, whereon is a faire Tower or Steeple, where they measure their houres by a strange deuice. Out of huge vessels water droppeth from one to another, the lowest being very large, in the middle whereof is perpendicularly raised a rule, distinguished with houre-spaces, which by the ascent or descent of the water, diuide the rising and declining day, and declare the houres: euery halfe houre some men appointed by tables with cubitall letters, to giue notice of the time to all men. From this Hill is a prospect ouer all the Citie. All the streets being set with trees, make shew of pleasant gardens. It is so full of Riuers, Lakes, Rills, Ponds, both in the Citie and Suburbs, as if a man would frame a Platonicall Idea of elegancie to his minde. The Idoll Temples are many and stately, which Idolatrie where it is wanting in China, hath a worse successour, Atheisme.

Quinsay, ciuitas cœli. See it described supr. 98.

Let vs stay a while and gaze (for where haue you such an Obiect?) Is not Quinsay (whilome, the Royall Seat of the Kings of Mangi, as Venetus recordeth, supposed by our moderne Geographers, to be swallowed vp with some Earthquake, or in Bellona's all-consuming bellie) here raised vp from the graue? The Lake situate on the one q side, (so Paulus reports of Quinsay) the Name Quinsay signifying the Citie of Heauen, and this called a Heauenly Paradise by the Chinois; and Han signifies Lactea via in Heauen; and Ceu, perfect: yea, Quinsay, or as Odoricus calls it, Canasia, and Han or Chanceu, not so disagreeing in sound, as different Dialects are wont: the excellency being chiefe Citie in the Kingdome, and this Prouince sometimes royall, as Pequin now and Nanquin are: the situation, South-east from Cinczianfu, and r fiue and twentie miles from the Sea: the high houses, and shops vnderneath: the exceeding trade, reuenue, pastimes by water, multitudes, faireneesse, and length of the streets; all so conspiring to proue this Han or Hamceu to bee that Quinsay of Paulus. True it is, that Quinsay was then greater, being as Venetus sayth, an hundred hundred miles about: But the ouerring of that Farfur and his Familie, then raigning, the diuerting of the Court to Cambalu by the Tartars, and after to Nanquin by Humvm, and neuer returning hither, might leſſen the ſame. And might not warres, in that long ſiege by the Tartars, in the recouerie thereof by the Chinois, eaſily circumciſe her ſuperfluitie? Beſides, who knoweth whether all this huge Lake might be contained in that account of Paulus, ſtill compaſſed about with buildings? Or before thoſe warres, the Lake it ſelfe might (as Suceu now is) be builded on; which Time and Warre hath conſumed; nor ſince the remoue of the Court were ſo neceſſarie. Mandeuile mentions warres at Quinſay in his time; Nicolo di Conti (which was here about the yeere 1440.) ſaith Quinſay was in his time new built, of thirtie miles compaſſe. Or if any like better, that Suceu it ſelfe (to which alſo many of theſe arguments agree) ſhould be this Quinſay, I contradict not. That which ſometimes I haue thought that Quinſay, after ſo long a ſickneſſe, and conſumption of warres, died; bequeathing her Land-greatneſſe to Nanquin, her Sea-treaſures to Suceu, both ariſing out of the aſhes of that Quinſay-Phenix; I finde cannot (I meane for Nanquin) agree with the diſtance betwixt Suceu and Nanquin, aboue foure dayes iourney. Of this Quinſay, let the Reader take a large and leaſurely view in Marcus Paulus, which but for tediouſneſſe I could hither haue tranſcribed. Whether Hanceu or Suceu bee it, or whether both theſe Paradiſes doe now ſucceed that Citie of heauen, or whereſoeuer elſe it be, it was (which theſe are) the wonder of the world: reported (ſaith Paulus) to haue 12000. bridges, 1600000. houſholds: in which was a rich Mart of all commodities of the world; there was ſpent euery day 9589. pounds of Pepper, it had ten principall Market-places, ſquare, each ſquare halfe a mile, the chiefe ſtreets leading thereto being fortie paces wide, and running ſtraite from one end of the Citie to the other, theſe Market-places foure miles aſunder. But I forbeare the reſt; this Citie had twelue principall Companies or Arts, each of which had 12000. ſhops: the adioyning Countrey (reckoned the ninth part of Mangi) paide ſixe millions and 400000. Duckats to the Great Chan yeerely for cuſtome of Salt, made of the Sea-water, by the heate of the Sunne in large plaines: beſides ſixteene millions and 800000. Duckats otherwiſe.

But let vs looke on ſome of the meaner Cities, one (of thoſe called Hien) is Scianhai in the Prouince of Nanquin, in 29. degrees ouer-againſt Cerra, and within foure and twentie houres ſayle of Iapon, and therefore is defended with a Garriſon and a Nauie; it hath about 40000. houſholds, and the iuriſdiction adioyning ſeemes a continued Citie with Gardens intermixed; payes to the King 300000. Duckats: there is great ſtore of Rice and Cotton, and in this Citie and the Suburban liberties are 200000. Weauers thereof: the aire wholſome, and they liue ordinarily to a great age, ſome to foureſcore, and foureſcore and ten, and many to a hundred yeeres. The keyes of Cities are euery night brought to the Gouernours, and thouſands appointed to watch to preuent theeues, themſelues being the worſt: they ring bells at certaine ſpaces to each other.

These Cities of China ordinarily want that elegance and magnificence, which ſtately Temples and ſumptuous building doe affoord vnto our Cities of Europe. Their houſes are lowe; without the ornament of Porches, Galleries, Windowes, and proſpect into the ſtreets. Beſides theſe habitations, they haue many which dwell not on land but in their ſhips. For their ſhipping is of two ſorts, one for ſayle, another for habitation alſo, and theſe meaner or fairer, according to the wealth of the owners. In the one ſide they carrie their families, in the other ſide their paſſengers. Many Barques are as victualling houſes by the way, and likewiſe as ſhops of merchandize. Many of the poorer water-dwellers get their liuing by labour on land: their wiues ferry ouer paſſengers, and vſe meanes to get fiſh. They bring vp thouſands of Duckes, hatched with artificiall heate in dung, which hauing fed with a little Rice in the morning, they put out at a doore into the water, which preſently ſwim on land, and eate the weedes which growe among the Rice (theſe weeders thereby procuring ſome wages of the husband-men to their owners) and at night are called home with a Tabor, each reſorting to their owne Barque. They haue certaine Sea-crowes or Cormorants, wherewith they fiſh, tying their gorges that they cannot ſwallow the fiſhes which they take, till their Maſters turne being ſerued, they are ſuffered to hunt for themſelues: which one in this Citie of London hath lately imitated and effected.

In the winter [f] they haue ſtore of Ice and Snow, whereby the Riuers are frozen euen about Nanquin. They haue abundance of all things neceſſarie to the life of man, fruits, fleſh, and fiſh, with prices correſpondent. They haue two, and ſomewhere three haruеſts in the yeere. Few Mountaines, but Plaines of an hundred leagues. Wine they make of Rice. They eate thrice a day, but ſparingly. There drinke (be it water or wine) they drinke hot, and eate with two ſtickes of Iuorie, Ebonie, or like matter, nor touching their meate with their hands; and therefore little napery ſerueth them. Their warme [t] drinkes and abſtinence nence from fruits, are great preseruatiues of their health, which for the most part they enioy, and none of them haue the stone; which some say is with vs caused by cold drinkes; but let vs take more full view of their persons and conditions.

§. IIII.

Of their Persons, Attire, and many strange Rites.

SOme of the Chinois haue faces almost square: many in the Prouinces of Canton and Quamsi, haue two nayles on their little toes, a thing common to all the Cauchin Chinois. Their women are all of lowe stature, and account small feet their greatest elegance, and therefore binde and swaddle them so from their infancy all their liues, that they seeme, in going, stump-footed: which seemes to be by deuice of some to keepe them within doores. Neither men nor women euer cut off their haire (which is generally blacke, and other colour a deformitie) they let it growe on their crownes only till fifteene yeeres of age, after that all their heads ouer, loose on their shoulders till twentie yeeres, when they put on their virilis [a] pileus, the cap of manhood, and then gather it vp, the men into caules or hats, hollow at the top for the haire to passe thorow; which the women vse not, but trimme vp their haire on knots with gold, siluer, stones, and flowers, eare-rings also at their eares, but no rings on their fingers. Both men and women weare long garments with wide sleeues. The men weare shooes of silke with curious workes and knots: none weares of leather but the baseſt: yea, their soles they make of cloth. The learned men weare square caps or hats, others round. They bestow long time euery morning in trimming their haire. They vse no shirts, but weare their inmost garment of white cloth, and vse often washing. They haue visants or vmbrellas to keepe off the sunne or raine, borne ouer them by their seruants; the poorer carrie them of lesse forme, themselues. The generall colour of the Chinois is white, more or lesse according to the climate. Their beard is thin, long before it comes, of a few staring haires (in some none) noses little, scarse standing forth; eyes prominent, blacke, little, of egge-fashion; (many dreames they had of Pantogia's eyes of a darke gray colour, as if iewels and precious things might thereby be knowne where they were hidden) their eates are small. If they would paint a deformed man, they giue him a short garment, great eyes, and beard, with a long nose, like to vs.

[a] Virilis pileus to the Chinois as virilis Toga to the Romans.

Their custome of names is very strange. The surname is ancient, vnchangeable and significant, of which there are not a thousand in all China. The name is also significant, and arbitrary, at the fathers pleasure, if a sonne: For daughters haue no names, besides the surname, but are called after their age and order; the sonnes also are so called by others; first, second, or otherwise, with their surname; the parents onely and ancestors calling them by their names, and themselues in their writings. It would bee accounted an iniurie if any other should call them thereby: or if he should call his father or kinsman by his name. When first a childe betakes himselfe to studie, his Master giues him another name, which hee and his schoole-fellowes may call him by, and no man else. When he puts on his Mans hat, and marries a wife, some chiefe man giues him another name more honorable, by which all men may call him, but his seruants, or such as are subiect to him. This they call the Letter. Lastly, when he is of full ripe age, some graue man giues him his most honorable name, which they call Great, and by this any one may stile him: which yet his parents and elders doe not, but onely by the Letter. If any make profession of Religion in any of their Sects, his ghostly Father or Authour of his profession giues him a new name (which they call) of Religion. When one visits another, if hee doe not write in his letter (of which afterwards) his honorable name or surname, the Visitee askes him of it, that he may call him thereby without iniurie. And the Iesuites did also take to themselues in China-fashion such honorable names.

Names. Surnames few.

Seales.

They are studious of Antiquities. Pictures artificially drawne with inke, without other colours they haue in highest price; the characters also and writings of the Ancients, with their Seales annexed. For many will seeke to gull men with counterfeits. All Magistrates haue the Seale of their office deliuered to them by Humvu, which if they lose, they are both depriued and punished, most diligently therefore preserued, carrying it with them to all places, and laying it vnder their heads at night. Men of good sort goe not in the streets on foot, but are carried in a close chaire by foure men, the curtens drawne on all parts but before: to distinguish them from Magistrates, whose chaires are euery way open. The Matrons are also carried in chaires closed euery way, by the forme easily knowne from those of Men. Coaches and Chariots the law forbids. Dice and Cards are common playes in China; Chesse also somewhat vnlike ours: for the King goes not out of foure places next him, and the two Bishops haue their Queenes: two men also goe before the Knights, besides the ordinary pawnes. They haue another play which makes the skilfull therein well esteemed, though he can doe nothing else, with two hundred men, some white, some blacke, on a table of three hundred diuisions. This is vsed by the Magistrates. Women goe not abroad, except seldome to see their neerest kindred, or some of basest condition.

In their offices of vrbanitie and courtesie they goe beyond all others, haue many bookes thereof, and reckon it one of those fiue vertues, which they call Cardinall. I feare to be in the relation, as they in action, tedious: and will but salute their salutations. They vncouer not the head to any, nor stirre the knee or foot, or vse embraces or kissing the hand. Their hands are hid and ioyned in their wide sleeues, except they doe some worke or with a fanne coole themselues, and in salutations first lift vp both sleeues and hands aloft in a modest manner, and then let them fall againe, standing face to face, and saying, Zin, Zin, which word is a rituall interiection, without any signification. When one visits another, or when friends meet in the streets, they doe thus, bowing also their bodies with their heads almost to the ground: they call this Zo ye: the inferiour placing the superiour, and the visited the visitor, on the right hand (in the Northerne Prouinces on the left) and then turne themselues both to the North. In solemner salutations, on high dayes, or after long absence, after the first bowing they kneele and touch the ground with their forehead: and then rise and doe it againe three or foure times ouer. In visitations, after other officious ceremonies, they offer him Chia to drinke (of which we haue spoken) with other iunkets. Except there bee great familiarity, he which will salute a friend, must at the doore deliuer to the seruant a letter before for his harbenger, to signifie his name in modest termes and affection towards him, with termes answerable to his estate. He is hereby warned to prepare himselfe for entertainment, clothing himselfe with apparell for that purpose, as must the guest also. If they were vnknowne to each other, they prostrate themselues, and knocke the ground diuers times with their foreheads. If they send a Present, they send withall a Letter, contayning the Inuentorie of the things sent, with termes very complementall; which he must answere with another Letter of thankes, and a Present of like or greater value besides a recompence to the messenger. Their partings from each other are as full of ceremonie. In their feasts, they set each guest to tables, one furnished with flesh and fish, the other with fruits and iunkets. They send a Paitre or Letter (the day, and sometime fiue or sixe dayes) before, to inuite them; and he which cannot come, with another Letter must excuse himselfe. On the day, with the first light he sends new inuitations, and againe a little before the time, or else his guests will not come. Much curtesie is in the meeting, exceeding much strayning and striuing about the place of sitting, as much solemne ceremonie in eating, as if they were bidden to be witnesses of their Hosts ostentation, to view and a little to taste his meates: but after sixe houres spent in this banquet, they may goe home to fill their bellies. In this officious trifling the Chinois spend a great part of their liues; but especially at the beginning of the new yeere fifteene dayes together, and at their birth-dayes.

When seruants salute their Masters, or the baser people their Superiors, they fall on their knees and thrice touch the ground with their foreheads, iust as they doe to their Idols: and when the Master speakes to his seruants, they stand at his side, and at euery answere fall on their knees; and so doe the people to the great men. When one speakes to another they neuer vse the second person, nor the first when they speake of themselues, except Masters and Superiours to their seruants or inferiours. Many formes of complementall modestie in termes they haue, but the lowest, to call himselfe by his proper name, as we vse the pronoune I: and if they speake of any, they vse some more honorable name and circumlocution, if of themselues some modester termes. The Iesuites obserue a state and keepe within doores, not easie to be spoken with, because the Chinois contemne such as obserue modestie, and price men by their maiestie and solemne reseruations.

When they send presents to each other, they may without inciuility take some and refuse others: they also vse to send presents in money. If a man be not within, when one comes with his Letter to visit, they leaue the Letter at the doore, to signifie his purpose: and this is enough also for the visited partie when in reuisiting he findes him absent. For euery one that visits must within three dayes be visited, in which respect the Iesuites were forced to cause their Porter or Seruant to keepe a note of them all, lest they should forget to repay these offices. If one meet another which hath not on his salutatory habite, he may not performe these rites till the other be vested for it; for which cause their seruants attend them with these robes; or else he that was attired must put off, and both salute in ordinary habit.

In drinking, the Inuiter beginnes, holding vp his cup in a dish with both hands, all the guests turning to him, and pledging him together at once: supping vp their liquor, at foure or fiue times, although it be water, and not at one draught. No bread is brought into their feasts, feasts, nor Rice. None are compelled to drinke more then they please. The maiestie of feasts is in variety of dishes, none being taken off the table that are once set on, till the feast ended, and then bestowed on the guests seruants.

Their bookes are full of precepts of obseruance to Parents and Superiours, which outwardly is there performed more then in all the world besides. They neuer sit in equall site, or ouer-against their betters, but on the lower side. This the Scholers performe to their Masters, speaking to them with great reuerence, and (if they bee poore) nourishing them whiles they liue with their owne labour. And when one is admitted Scholer to another, Trigaut. the Master sits in the higher end of the Hall (which is ordinarily to the North, all the Temples, and priuate buildings, if it may be, opening to the South) with his countenance to the doore. The Scholer comes before him, and foure times bowes his body, and as often kneeles downe and toucheth the ground with his forehead: euer after (though higher preferred) sitting at his side in euery meeting: although he hath beene his Scholer but one day.

Of the mechanicall Arts in China, their Printing, &c.

WHere Nature is so prouident of Materials, Art is easily induced to triall of experiments: of which we will name such as to vs seeme rarest. They generally are not so curious for exquisite workmanship, as to make things saleable at easier and cheaper rates: where Nobilitie is wanting, & the Mandarines pay what they please, and sometime force their employments. They build for themselues, not minding continuance to posteritie: nor will they beleeue without much astonishment the magnificence and antiquitie of European buildings. Foundations they lay not deepe (vsually not at all) within the earth: which makes the greatest buildings short-liued, and their Cities walls to be often repaired. The rooses of their houses, euen where the walls are bricke, are sustained with pillars or posts of wood, and not on those walls. Printing is with them of ancient vse, at least fiue hundred yeeres, some say, more then a thousand and sixe hundred. Their manner differs much from ours, and is rather an expression then impression: they prouide a table of Peare-tree, or other smooth wood, and vpon the same lightly glue the whole sheet or written copie, which being dried is cunningly taken off, so as the characters remayne on the same table, which is presently carued and cut with Iron instruments, that nothing but the draughts or lineaments of the letters are eminent and standing vp. Then with incredible celeritie and facilitie they print off the same, one man sometimes fifteene hundred in one day. And in cutting their tables they are so ready and expedite, that one of our Composers seemes to mee as long in setting a sheet of ours, as they in cutting theirs. The reason is, the greatnesse of their characters; for so small as our letters could not easily bee engrauen in their tables. This commoditie they haue, that they may be layd by for as many impressions as they please, and in the meane time he may print off, for number of copies, as he findes sale: both which are wanting in our manner of printing. This makes their bookes so many and so cheape: and this easinesse made the Iesuites print at their owne houses, what bookes they liked. They haue also another way of printing. An Epitaph or other copie being cut in stone or wood, they lay thereon a leafe of moist paper, and on the same a woollen cloth: and then beat it on with a hammer till the thinne paper insinuate it selfe into the emptie spaces of the mould or forme, and then lightly lay on inke or what other colouring they please, so that the Epitaph or Copie remaynes in an elegant white: prouided that this be vsed where there is vse of greater characters. M. Ricci. l. 1. c. 4. Printing.

That which some hold of steeping and burning the earth, of which their Porcelane is made an hundred yeeres in the earth, remouing it euery eight dayes, others gainsay, and our Iesuite is silent. Linschoten affirmeth, that the earth is naturally hard, beaten small, steeped, often stirred, and of the finest swimming in the top the finest made. Painting is much vsed but not in such perfection as with vs; which is true also of graving and caruing. To adorne their pictures with oyle, or shadowes and landskips they know not, and in statues they haue no other rule of symmetrie but the eye. Their bells haue woodden clappers, and seeme not able to indure Iron, and therefore not comparable in sound to ours. Musicall Instruments they haue many and manifold: but they want Organs (except some blown with the mouth) and all such as goes with keyes, their strings are wouen of raw-silke, and know not our way of making them. Nor doe they know the discord-concord in musicall harmonie of diuers voyces; so that their musike to vs is harsh, in their owne opinion glorious. For measuring houres they vse houre-glasses of water and other deuices, but in this and dyalling very rude. Seal. Ex. 92. Mons. de Montfart. Linsc. l. 1. c. 23.

They are much addicted to Comedies and therein excell vs: many young men trauelling through the Kingdome in this profession and practice, or abiding in chiefe places of resort: But there (as here) the dregs of mankind. They are hired vnto feasts, whither they come prouided for what play shall be demanded: offering to that end their booke of Comedies to the feast-Master, to chuse which hee liketh: which the guests behold in their feasting-time with such pleasure, that they continue sometimes ten houres in feeding their eyes, and tastes, with one seruice after another in both kindes. Their Comedies are ancient, few of later writing, which the Actors pronounce in a singing accent. They haue also dancers on the rope, tumblers, and other feat-workers. Mathon an Eunuch feasted the Iesuites, where all these kindes were employed, being of his owne familie. One of them cast three kniues vp into the aire, still catching them by the hafts. Another lying on his backe, tossed with his feet lifted vp, an earthen vessell euery way, so as hardly might be done with the hands: the like tennisse-play with his feet he vsed with a bell, and a great table. They had also dumbe shewes acted: and a boy dancing very artificially: on a sudden start vp a boy of earth keeping the same measures, and much admirable sport betwixt them.

Seales are in much vse, not onely for their Letters, but for other their writings, Poems, Pictures, and other things: they contayne onely their name, surname, degree and dignitie. They vse not one, but diuers, not in waxe, but coloured red; the Grandes hauing at table a boxe full of Seales, which contayne their diuers names engrauen (for euery Chinois is called by many names) and are of diuers matter, Wood, Marble, Iuorie, Brasse, Crystall, Corall, and other stones more precious. The makers of them are many and those learned, the characters differing from the vulgar, and sauoring antiquitie. The arte of Inke-making also is not here illiberall, which they make vp in balls, [x] of the smoake of oyle, and grinde with water on a stone, and then take it vp with pensils made of Hares haire, and write therewith, not with pennes, their paper being like thinne transparent parchment.

[x] I haue had of it in a square forme, to be carried in a mans pocket, as it were a marking stone.

They all of both sexes vse fannes, without which none of them come abroad, not so much for necessity (especially in colder places and seasons) as for a kind of grace: Euen as gloues with vs are most for ornament, and the most vsuall presents, so are fannes in China; of diuers matter and forme, Reed, Wood, Iuorie, with Paper, Silke, or a kind of odoriferous Straw; round, square, ouall, with sentences written therein. In these things these differ from vs, in other things are very like, in the vse of tables, stooles, beds, which other people neere and farre obserue not, but sit, feede, and sleepe on carpets spred on the ground.

Things are there exceeding cheape: [y] a hundred pound of Sugar may be bought for nine or ten six-pences; and other things proportionable: so that though there are none rich, as wee interpret the word in Europe, for such and such reuenues: yet this cheapnesse doth recompence that other defect. They haue Artificers of all trades: and in idlenesse none may liue. The impotent are well prouided for in Hospitals. They haue no Gentlemen, but euery man is a Plebeian vntill his merits raise him. Preferment is atchieued onely by learning. This maketh them generally studious.

§. VI.

Of their language, writing, Astrologie, Philosophie, and Phisike.

THe beginning of this discourse must bee with their words, letters, and writing: wherein this is first to be admitted, that they haue not one booke written in the vulgar idiome or common language. But they haue one language called Quonhoa, for their Courts, and writings, which is common through all China, which alone the Iesuites learned, and which the learned and strangers commonly vse; women also and children attayning by this common vse to the vnderstanding thereof. As for the differing languages of each Prouince, it is not so necessary nor commendable, being but of vulgar both vse and reckoning. But in euery Tongue and Dialect the words are euery one Monosyllables, howsoeuer sometimes two or three vowels fall into one diphthong. As for them, they mention not vowels or consonants, or letters, but in writing, the letter, syllable, and word is all one, being nothing else but hieroglyphicall characters, of which there are no fewer then words, or things; which yet they so compound and connexe, that they haue not aboue 70. or 80000. If we pronounce any of their words in two syllables, it is when two of their characters are applyed to signifie one thing. Some 10000. of these characters are necessary for vsuall writing: for to know them all, is that which few either can, or need. Their sound also is in great part the same, and yet both figure and signification different: so that there is no so equiuocall a language; neither can a Hearer write out an Oration or Speech from from the Speakers mouth, nor a booke be vnderstood of them which heare it read, but they must look, and discerne with their eyes that equiuocation which their eares cannot. And in speaking they are often hereby forced sometime to repeat that which hath before been elegantly deliuered, sometimes to write it, or (if such meanes be wanting) with water on the Table, or Characters formed with the finger in the ayre, to expresse their mindes to the conceit of others: and this is most common amongst the most learned which speake in print, and affect inke-horne Rhetorike. They haue fine accents, by which they also distinguish this equiuocation, that one and the same word thus by accents diuersified, shall signifie fiue seuerall things nothing alike. This makes the language hard to be learned of strangers; which yet the Iesuites haue learned to write and reade: and I would all the Equiuocators amongst them (that teach to illude oathes, and delude the World by their two-fold, two-forked, serpentine Equiuocation in Mental reseruations, & Verbal double-significations) were all there, learning the China language to conuert Heathens, rather then here practising the Romish equiuocating Dialect to peruert Christians to worse then Heathenisme. Peruerse Masters, louers of strange language, in Prayers to GOD, in Oathes and Assertions to Man; in the one, Parrats without reason; in the other Deuils, without Religion: this being the strongest bond which Religion hath, binding at once to GOD and Man, and yet these Religious Mountebanks, by iuggling querks dissoluing these bonds, and at once deluding both GOD & Man. Foolish Romans! that sent backe the Legates to Hannibal, that by equiuocation had before fulfilled their Oath of returning! foolish Regulus! that returnedst to thy Tormentors, chusing thy selfe rather then thy Oath to be tortured! and most most foolish Martyrs, that so sleightly for want of this sleight, ran vpon Fire, Swords, Lyons! And might not we begin a contention with that assertion, That an Oath for confirmation is to men an end of contention, which in this equiuocating Hydra is rather multiplied? That nei her Rome Ethnike, nor primitiue Christian Rome, could (at least by imitation of diabolicall ambiguous Oracles) deuise in those dayes so transcendent a suttlety, but Moderne Rome by Iesuiticall midwiferie, must be the Mother of so super-fine a babe! But what doth this Brat in our way? I will rather follow the Iesuits in China then in Rome (except when Rome followes them thither too) and herein with thankfulnesse accept their report. The reason of this equiuocall sound of words is ascribed to the Chinois account of eloquence, in writing rather then speaking, and therefore to furnish that, neglecting this: insomuch as familiar messages are sent by writing, and not by word of mouth. Musicall skill was a good helpe to the Iesuites in learning the language, by reason of their varietie of accents. And although this multitude of Characters be to the Memory burthensome, yet it helpes it as much another way in sauing the labour of learning diuers languages, whiles euery Prouince of China speaking diuersly, agree in writing: the Iaponians, also Corayans, Cauchin-Chinois, Leuhiees, all conceiuing the same Characters, although the Iaponians haue an Alphabet of letters to write after our manner, which the Chinois haue not. They write their lines from the top of the Page to the bottome downewards, which they multiply from the right hand to the left: whereas our custome is quite contrary, from the left hand, side-wayes. We haue three consonants B.D.R. which the Chinois neither vse, nor can by any Character expresse: and in our words which haue them they borrow some sound neerest the same. Likewise, they neuer haue two consonants without a vowell betweene: and all their words end in vowells, except M. or N. of consonants onely. This and the diuers pronuntiation of their Characters in diuers places, made the Latin forme of Baptisme hard to be expressed by the Ietuites.

Quonhoa signifieth of the Court, by this meanes the Magistrates need not in euery new Prouince learne a new language.

China writing.

Now for the subiect of their studies, their chiefe is Morall Philosophie: in Naturall they are rude: and their Ethikes are confusedly deliuered, not digested into formall method (for of Logicke they are ignorant) but in confused sentences and discourses. The greatest of the Chinian Philosophers was Confutius, who was borne fiue hundred and fiftie one yeeres before the Incarnation of our Lord, and liued aboue seuentie yeres in great shew of learning & holinesse. And few of our Ethnike Philosophers haue equalled him, many he hath exceeded. The Chinois haue him in such reputation, that they thinke there neuer liued man more holy, and all his sayings are of authoritie beyond gaine-saying amongst the learned. And the Kings themselues haue euer since had him in veneration, not as a god, but as a most excellent man and Author of their learning; honouring his posteritie, the chiefe of which enioyeth by inheritance ample titles, immunities and reuenues.

They are also indifferently skilled in Astrologie and diuers Mathematicall Sciences: in Geometry and Arithmetike they haue beene more expert. The Constellations they doe not distinguish as we do, and number foure hundred Stars more then our Astrologers, reckoning some smaller, which doe not alway appeare. They tell the Quantities, and foretell Eclipses, but not exactly: and referre all their Astrologie to that which is called Iudiciall, esteeming a fatall dependance of all things from the Stars: and haue borrowed in these Arts many things from the Saracens. The Author of this Royall Family forbad the ſtudie of Iudiciall Aſtrologie to all but one Family, in which it continueth by inheritance. But he which now reigneth maintaines many at great coſt, both Eunuchs in his Palace, and Magiſtrates without, which haue two Courts in Paquin, one obſeruing China Kalenders, the other the Saracenicall, and compare both together. Both of them haue an open place on the top of a ſmall Hill to contemplate the Starres, in which they haue Mathematicall Inſtruments, of exceeding greatneſſe, of molten braſſe, which ſeeme to bee ancient. On this Hill alwayes one of their Colledge doth watch by night to obſerue, if any new Comet, or other raritie appeare in the Heauens: which if it happen, the next day they by libell admoniſh the King thereof, together with their opinion of good or euill enſuing. This place of contemplation at Nanquin, is within the Citie, and in maſſineſſe of Inſtruments excells that at Pequin [z] or Paquin. The Pequin-Aſtrologers haue priuiledge of foretelling the Eclipſes of Sunne or Moone; and the Magiſtrates and Prieſts are commanded to meet in a certaine place in their Robes and Veſtments, to helpe the labouring Planet: which they thinke they doe with muſicall ſound of Cymballs, often bowing their knees, all the time of the Eclipſe; fearing (as I haue heard) leſt ſome, I know not what Serpent ſhould then deuoure the ſame.

Colledges of Aſtrologie in Paquin and Nanquin, and not elſewhere.

[z] Ricci. calls it alway not Paquin, but Pequin.

In Naturall Philoſophie they were too Naturall, and haue very little Art. They knew not the cauſe of the Moones Eclipſe, by the interpoſition of the earth, but thought that being oppoſite to the Sunne, it loſt the light by ſome amazement: others thought that the Sunne had a hole in the midſt, againſt which when the Moone came, ſhee loſt her light. That the Sunne was greater then the earth ſeemed to them a ſtrange paradoxe, much more that this might be ſpoken of the Starres: the like was it that the Earth was round (for they thought it ſquare, and the middle and beſt part thereof to be their Kingdome) or that there could be Antipodes without falling, or that heauy things were attracted by the Center, or that there were Orbes; and for the ayre they thought it a vacuum or emptineſſe, not reckoning it amongſt the Elements, of which yet they numbred fiue, Metall, Wood, Fire, Water, Earth. Their Arithmetike was with beades on wyre-ſtrings faſtned to a linnen cloth. In theſe things Rucius declaring their ignorance and the Europæan Science, wan great admiration, they (which before thought all beſides themſelues Barbarians) ſaying, that they were to vs as the rude Tartars to them, and that they left where we began, namely at Rhetorike and Grammar, which with Ethikes and Politikes are the chiefe. Some of the Idolatrous ſects had more monſtrous and ridiculous fancies, that the Sunne hid himſelfe euery night in a certaine Hill called Siunni, which they ſaid was fixed in the Sea 24000. miles vnder the water: and for Eclipſes, they held that a certaine god named Holochan eclipſed the Sunne, couering it with his right hand; and ſo the Moone, with his left. Their Aſtrologers rather obſerued their old rules, little knowing or ſeeking the Naturall cauſes. The Inſtruments which they had in their two Colledges at Nanquin and Paquin, were alike, very admirable, ſeeming to be made in the reigne of the Tartars. Foure of them were very great; One a Globe marked with paralells and meridians, as great as three men could fathom, ſet vpon a great Cube of braſſe likewiſe: the ſecond was a Spheare, fiue foot in the Diameter, with Chaines in ſtead of Circles, diuided into 365. degrees, and a few minutes: the third was a Gnomon, ten foot high on a huge Marble: the fourth, and greateſt conſiſteth of three or foure Aſtrolabes, each fiue foot in the Diameter, with other appurtenances very admirable.

Their Rules of Phyſicke differ much from ours: yet agree with vs in feeling the pulſe, and are not vnhappy in their cures. They vſe ſimple medicines, roots, hearbs, and the like, their whole Art in manner the ſame with our Herbariſts. They haue thereof no publike Schoole, but as each priuately learneth of ſome Teacher. In both the Royall Cities, Degrees are granted to the Profeſſors after Examination; but both this and that of little worth: none being thereby of greater authoritie, or without it hindered to practiſe. And neither in Phyſicke nor Aſtrologie doth any take great paines, which hath any hope of proficience in their Ethikes, thoſe being the refuges of Pouertie, this the high-way to Honor. Their Geography was ſuch, that they called their Countrie Thien-hia, that is, All vnder heauen, thinking the World to haue little elſe of any worth.

Of their Ethikes, Politikes, and Degrees in Learning.

CONFVTIVS, their Philoſophicall Prince, compyled foure Volumes of the Ancient Philoſophers, adding a fifth of his owne: theſe he called the Fiue Doctrines. They containe Morall and Politicall Precepts of good Life & Gouernment, with the Examples, Rites, Sacrifices, and Poems of the Ancients. Beſides theſe fiue Volumes, Volumes out of Confutius, & some of his disciples, are gathered into one Tome, diuers Rules, Sentences, Similes, touching the wel ordering of a mans selfe, family, or the kingdome; which is called the Foure bookes, and into so many parts diuided. These nine are their ancientest, and fountaines of the rest of their books, containing most part of their Hieroglyphicall Characters; authorized by royal Priuiledges & ancient Customes to be the Principles and Foundations of all Chinian Learning: wherin it is not enough to vnderstand the Text, but suddenly to write of euery sentence; to which purpose, that [a] Tetrabiblion must be cunned by heart.

a Foure bookes aforesaid.

They haue no publike Schoole, or Vniuersity, where Readers vndertake to expound them: but euery one is to prouide him a Master, at his owne choice and charge; of which are great numbers: because in that multitude of Characters, one cannot teach many, and each man desires to haue his children taught at home. They haue three Degrees, which are conferred vpon such, as by examination are found worthy. This examination is onely in writing. The first Degree, called Sieucai, is bestowed in euery Citie by the Tibio (a learned man appointed thereunto by the King) in that place which is named the Schoole; and somewhat resembleth our Batchellors. This Tibio visiteth euery Citie in the Prouince, for this purpose: whither when he is come, all the Students in the Citie and Confines, that aspire to that Degree, resort, and submit themselues to a three-fold Triall. First, he is examined of certaine Masters, which are set ouer the Bachellors, till they attaine a higher Degree: in which, all are admitted to triall that will, sometimes foure or fiue thousand in one Citie. These Masters are maintained by the King to this Office. These passe them ouer to a second proofe, by the Foure Magistrates of the Citie; which, of so great a number, chuse some two hundred of the best Writers, whom they commit to the third Examination by the Tibio, who intituleth twentie or thirtie of the chiefe of them, and numbreth them with the Bachellor of former yeeres. These are priuiledged to weare a Gowne, Cap, and Bootes, in token of their Degree: and in publike Assemblies, haue higher Places, besides larger Complements and Immunities, and are subiect to their Tibio, and those Foure Masters; other Magistrates little meddling with their cases. This Tibio doth also examine those former Bachellors, to see how they haue profited or decayed; which, according to their writing, are diuided into fiue rankes: the first, are licenced vnto some publike Offices, of lesse reckoning: the second, haue a reward, but not so great: the third, haue neither reward, nor punishment: the fourth, are publikely scourged: the last, degraded, and ranked with the Communaltie.

Schoole-Masters. Graduats, and Commencements.

1. Sieucai.

Their second Degree is called Kiugin, somewhat like the Licentiates in some European Vniuersities. This is conferred but once in three yeeres, in the chiefe Citie of the Prouince, in the eight moneth, and with greater solemnitie, to fewer, or more, according to the dignitie and largenesse of the Prouince. In Pequin, in Nanquin, 150. doe proceed Licentiats; in Cequian, Quiansi, and Fuquiam, 95. in the rest, fewer. Vnto this Triall, onely Bachellours, and but the choice of them, are admitted, not aboue thirtie or fortie of one Citie; which yet, sometimes, in one Prouince, amount to 4000. Competitors. That third yeere therefore, which happened with them 1609, 1612, 1615, &c. a few dayes before the eight Moone, which often falls out in September, the Magistrates of Pequin present vnto the King the Names of 100. the chiefe Philosophers in China, out of which, hee chuseth thirtie (two for euery Prouince) to bee sent Examiners. One of these two, must bee of the Kings Colledge, called Han lin yuem. As soone as euer they are named by the King, they must post to their designed Prouince, many Spies attending, that they speake not with any one man of that Prouince, before the Kiugin are entituled. Other principal Philosophers also of that Prouince are chosen to assist these Examiners in the first Triall. In euery Prouinciall Citie is a huge Palace erected for this end, enclosed with high walls, in which are many roomes, wherein, without noyse, they may discusse those writings: and in the midst of the Palace aboue 4000. Cels, or little Studies, which can hold nothing but a small table, a stoole, and one man, out of which, one is not permitted to see or speake with another. When these Posers are come to the Citie, they, and their Assistants of that Prouince, are shut vp in their seuerall Stations, before they may speake with each other, or any one else, and so continue all the time of this Act or Commencement, many Souldiers and Magistrates attending to prohibite all commerce & conference, on all hands, with any within or without the Palace.

2. Kiugin.

In this examination, three daies, the ninth, the twelfth, and the fifteenth of the Moone are spent in euery Prouinciall Citie, from the earliest light, til the euening darkenesse, the doores carefully shut; some refection being the day before allowed them, at publike charge. When the Bachellers come into the Palace, they are narrowly searched, whether they bring any Booke or Writing with them; and are allowed only their Pensill, Paper, Inke, and writing Plate or Stone. If any fraud bee found, they are both excluded and punished. Then the doores being shut and sealed, the two Examiners propound out of their Tetrabiblion, three sentences, on which euery one is to write so many Theames: also, out of those Fiue Doctrines, foure ſentences, the arguments of ſo many other Theames or Orations. Theſe ſeuen Writings muſt bee adorned both with eloquent phraſe, and elegant ſentences, according to the Chinian Rhetorike; not any one Writing exceeding fiue hundred Characters or Words.

The next day of triall they haue three queſtions of ſtate propounded out of the old Chronicles, or of things which may after happen, to which they returne anſwer in three Writings. Likewiſe, the third day three caſes propounded of ſuch things as may be demanded in executing publike functions, which they anſwere in ſo many writings. Thus euery one hauing that dayes arguments written out, is by ſome thereunto appointed, brought vnto his deſigned Cell, where he writeth in a Booke his Meditations, ſubſcribing his owne, his fathers, grandfathers, and great grandfathers Names; then cloſing the booke, that none but they which are deputed, may open it, to whom they offer it. Theſe bookes, before they come to the Examiners, are new copied and tranſcribed by others in red inke, whereas the former were in blacke: and theſe tranſcripts, without the Authors names, deliuered to theſe Prouinciall Examiners, which are choſen to aſſiſt the two Principall, which reiect the worſt, and offer twice ſo many of the beſt as are to proceed at that time, vnto the Kings Examiners. Theſe make a new examination, chuſing out ſo many as are to bee admitted Graduates, and obſerue which are beſt, ſecond, and third, compoſing them in their due order. This being done, all the Examiners together compare the Copies with the Originalls (knowne by certaine numbers indorſed) and taking out the Authors names, expoſe them, written on large Tables, in Cubitall letters, about the end of the eight Moone, with great concourſe of Magiſtrates, and applauſe of their friends. This degree enioyeth farre greater priuiledges and immunities, with a peculiar habit: and if they ſeeke not to proceed further, they are capable of many publike Offices. After this, the Kings Examiners publiſh a booke, which containeth the names of the Licentiates, and the chiefe writings on euery Theame; eſpecially his, who obtained the firſt name amongſt all the Competitors, who is called Quiayuen.

In theſe ſtudies they ſo ſpend their ambitious ſpirits, that many die thereof. Pantog.

3. Cin-ſu. The third degree anſwers to our Doctor: they call it Cin-ſu. This is conferred euery third yeere alſo, but only at Pequin, the yeere next after the former Proceeding. Euery Kiugin, or Licentiat, out of all Prouinces may bee admitted to the Examination, but onely three hundred are Speeders of fiue thouſand Competitors. The Examiners are principall Magiſtrates: the time, the ſecond Moone; on the ſame dayes, and in the ſame manner, as the former. Theſe being created and pronounced Doctors in that place where the Licentiates are made, all in the Kings Palace, before the chiefe Magiſtrates of the Court (the King himſelfe was wont to be preſent) doe vndergoe a new Triall, and make a writing on a Theame propounded; according to which, the order of Offices, whereof they are made capable, is declared, being of three Rankes or Formes. He which had the firſt place in the examination of Doctors, is here ſure to haue the third: but he which here obtaines the firſt or ſecond place, is dignified with an honorable title (like to that of a Duke or a Marqueſſe with vs, if it were hereditary) all his life, and obtaineth the higheſt places in the gouernment. Anno 1604. three hundred and eight Doctors were made; and then another Triall was made for the Kings Collegiats of Hanlinyen: of that number were named twentie foure, choſen out of thoſe three hundred and eight, as in the former Trialls. Theſe are choſen to the chiefe Magiſtracies in the Kingdome: but ſo, as after many other trialls, onely twelue or fifteene of thoſe twentie foure be choſen.

Theſe Doctors enioy their proper Veſt, Cap, Bootes, and other enſignes of Magiſtrates, and are admitted vnto the beſt functions, ſo as they alway exceed the Licentiates, and are ſuddenly become the Grandes of the Kingdome. Thoſe Licentiates which are reiected from their Doctorſhip, if they haue no further hope, are admitted, and betake themſelues to ſome places of gouernment. But if they intend to make and abide a new triall, the ſtudie hard at home other three yeeres: ſome of them ten times aduenturing the ſame, without deſired ſucceſſe, wearing and wearying out their liues in priuate. There is a booke alſo publiſhed of the Doctors Commencement or Act, as of the former: and another yeerely, containing all the Doctors names in the Kingdome, with their Countrey, Parents, Offices, and places of Reſidence. They alſo which are fellow Commencers, and proceed either Licentiates or Doctors the ſame yeere together, euer after affect each other as brethren, and their Examiners as Parents or Maſters, although they ſometimes attaine higher preferments then theſe. In ſome Cities they haue Exerciſes of Learning, euery learned man of chiefe note hauing his day appointed whereon, to lecture or diſcourſe of ſome Morall Vertues. And they haue alſo an eſpeciall Officer, called Tauli, which on certaine dayes is to call an Aſſembly (he is a great Magiſtrate) and to exhort the people to vertue, as it were by preaching.

Militarie degrees. Militarie Honors are conferred in the ſame yeeres, places, titles, vnto the Profeſſors thereof: the time, is the Moone following: the ſolemnitie much leſſe, according to the Chinian account of Souldierie. Their firſt triall is on Horſe-backe, and then in full carriere they ſhoot nine Arrowes: in the ſecond, three at the ſame marke, on foot. And they which with foure arrowes mounted, and with two ſtanding, haue hit the marke, are admitted to the third triall: in which, they are enioyned to write an Oration, or Theame, of ſome queſtion propounded. And the Iudges declare in each Prouince ſome fiftie of theſe Licentiates: and when Doctors are made at Pequin, an hundreth of the beſt militarie Licentiates in all the Kingdome, after a threefold examination are there declared Doctors. The Doctors of this Societie, ſooner then Licentiates, but not without bribes, are admitted to ſome militarie place of commaund. And both Philoſophicall and Militarie, being admitted Doctors, write ouer their doores, in Cubitall letters, their Degree and Title. The Preſidents and Iudges, in all Examinations, whether of Militarie, Mathematicall, Phyſicke, or Ethicke Sciences, are their Philoſophers, without aſſiſtance of any of other profeſſors: ſo much doe they account of this Confutian Philoſophie, as if it had made them able to iudge of all things.

§. VIII.

Of the King, his Court, Iſſue, Reuenue, and Maieſtie.

CHina is a Monarchie, not knowing the names of Ariſtocratie, or Democratie, or any other Polycratie: not ſo much as Dukes, or great Nobles, enioying either Title there, or Dominion, (whereof in ancient times were many) theſe 1800. yeeres paſt. Sometimes it hath beene ſubiect to ciuile broyles, and ſometimes diuided into many petty kingdomes: but was neuer quite ſubiected to forraine Soueraigntie, till the Tartarian Conqueſt vnder one Tiemor (ſo the Chinois call that great Chan) which ſo continued till the yeere 1368. When one of their Chieftaynes (whom they called of the euent Hum-vu, that is, a floud of weapons) expelled the Tartars, compelled the Chinois to his ſubiection. The Kingdome paſſeth by inheritance. Some ancient Kings are yet commended for commending the Kingdome to the vertuous ſucceſſion of ſome rarer men then their kindred yeelded: and ſometimes the people rebelling haue diſpoſſeſſed one and ſubſtituted another. In this kingdome are no ancient Lawes: But the firſt of any Family which obtayneth the Soueraigntie, makes new Lawes at his pleaſure, which his Succeſſors in that family doe not eaſily alter. That Hum-vu the Conqueror is the founder of their preſent Lawes, either enacting new, or confirming the old, as he ſaw good. From ignorance of Geographie they eſteemed their King Lord of the World, and therefore call him Thien-cu, the ſonne of Heauen: for they eſteeme Heauen the greateſt God. Yet commonly the people call him Hoamſi, that is, the greateſt Monarch. Hum-vu was a great both Warrior and Polititian. He ordayned that none of the Kings children ſhould deale in publike functions or affayres of ſtate: yet hee made them ſeeming amends, with aſſignation of moſt ample reuenues, and the title of Guam, a Prince or petty King. Their reuenue is paid out of the Exchequer, to preuent Clients and dependance of Tenants. Much complement of reuerence is done them by the Magiſtrates, but no ſubiection. Their Children and Nephewes are honored alſo, but their titles and reuenues ſtill decreaſing as they deſcend further from the Royall ſtemme: till at laſt no more bee allowed them, then may ſupply their neceſſitie without trade or worke. Like care is had of the Royall daughters marriage and maintenance.

The Commanders which aſſiſted him in the Conqueſt, hee vouchſafed honourable titles, militarie prefectures, with other immunities and reuenues, ſtill deſcending to their poſteritie, who are ſubiect neuertheleſſe to the Citie Magiſtrates. One ſtrange priuiledge of theirs is this. The exploits of the head of their family vnder Hum-vu, are grauen in an yron plate. This continueth with the firſt borne of that family, who thereby may challenge pardon for any man in any crime, three ſundrie times, if hee offer the ſame to the King. Only treaſon is vnpardonable, which depriueth the Traytor and all his poſteritie for euer of all dignitie. Like honors doe the Kings ſonnes or fathers in law enioy, and ſome others who haue well deſerued of the State.

Only the Doctors and Licentiates are admitted to offices of gouernment, not preferred by fauour of others, or the King himſelfe, but by the Law and his merits. All Magiſtrates are called Quonfu, that is, Preſidents: and as an honourable title [b] Laoye, or Laofie, a Lord or Father. The Portugalls ſtile them Mandarines. And although theſe Magiſtrates can finiſh nothing, till by Petition they obtayne the Kings confirmation: yet he enacteth nothing which they doe not firſt ſollicite. And if any priuate man preferre a Petition to the King (which ſeldome happens, becauſe there is an Officer appointed to examine them before the King ſees them) yet the King referres them to that Tribunall whereto they belong. This I haue diligently ſearched and found for certaine, that the King himſelfe may not giue a ſumme of money, or office to any man, vnleſſe hee bee firſt petitioned by ſome of the Magiſtrates, ſtrates, except in his owne houſhold: for thoſe gifts are not taken out of the publike treaſure, but the priuie purſe. His Cuſtomes and Tributes, which exceede without controuerſie a hundred and fiftie millions yeerely (euery houſe not priuiledged, paying tribute) are not brought into the Treaſurie of the Palace; nor may the King ſpend them after his pleaſure: but all the money and prouiſion is brought into the publike Treaſuries and Store-houſes, which are through the Kingdome. Out of theſe a certaine allowance is appointed by Law, and nothing more or leſſe, for the Kings expences, his Wiues, Children, Eunuchs, and Family. Thence the Magiſtrates and Souldiers ſtipends, and other officers through the Kingdom are diſcharged. Thence alſo the publike Edifices of the Palaces of the King and his kinſemen, Cities, Walls, Forts, and all prouiſions of Warre are mentioned. And ſome yeeres it happens, that this huge reuenue will not ſerue for neceſſary expences, but they are forced to new impoſitions. The ordinary Cenſus or poll-money is three Mazes or halfe Duckets; beſides the profits of the earth and handicrafts. The reſt are Cuſtomes, which in Canton, one of the leaſt Prouinces, are neere eight millions.

The Kings reuenues.

Cenſus. Tributum. Vectigal.

Vanlie, that is now King, hath raigned fortie yeeres, a man of great wiſedome, but vicious and tyrannicall. Hee vſeth his ſonne and apparant Heire very hardly, and hath indeuoured to make a ſecond ſonne, which he had by a more beloued wife, his ſucceſſor: but was gainesaid by all the Magiſtrates in the Kingdome, thoſe of the Court reſigning their robes and hanging them on the Palace walls, ſo that hee was forced to proclaime the eldeſt. Whoſe mother lately lying on her death-bed, the Prince could hardly obtaine his fathers licence to viſit her, and then attended with two Eunuchs: the mother comforted her ſonne, ſaying, It neuer yet happened that the heire of the kingdome dyed of hunger: (For the King ſcarſe allowes him neceſſaries, none elſe daring for feare.) The King forbad mourning and publike pompe vnto her funeralls. The King reſpects beautie only in choice of his wiues (as doe all of the Royall bloud) nor doe the great men care to preferre their daughters to the Royall bed. For it is little they can doe, and much they muſt ſuffer, euer incloſed in the Palace, neuer admitted the ſight of their friends, who alſo are not thereby aduanced to further preferments. The King hath Officers which make choice of women for him. One wife is chiefe and is as it were legitimate: the King and Heire apparant, marry other nine a little inferior: and after them ſixe and thirtie others; all which enioy the title of wiues: to which are added many more Concubines, not entituled Wiues or Queenes. Thoſe which bring the King ſonnes, proue moſt gracious, eſpecially the mother of the eldeſt ſonne: howſoeuer it fared otherwiſe in this before mentioned. This King was not the ſonne of the firſt wife, nor is his Heire.

Trigaut.
King Vanlie.

The Chinois are a deceitfull and trecherous people, and therefore the Kings in this age come not abroad in publike: and when in times paſt they did it, they obſerued a thouſand cautels for ſafetie, the Palace and the ſtreets being all in armes for his guard, nor was he ſeene when thus hee was ſeene, nor the ſeat knowne in which he was carryed, many other being then carryed to preuent intelligence. And when hee came into the Tribunall, hee appeared from a high window, couering his face with an Iuory table in his hand, and hauing another table on his head a cubit long, halfe ſo broad, ſo behanged with ſtones that they hid his face. The Kings colour is yellow, his garment being embroidered with golden Dragons. Theſe alſo are painted or carued in all the Palace, Plate, and houſhold furniture; the tiles alſo being yellow, and ſet forth with Dragons. This hath cauſed ſome to thinke them to be of gold or braſſe, whereas they are of earth (as I haue often felt) and yellow, greater then ours, and faſtned on the roofe with nailes, the heads whereof are guilded. If any priuate man ſhould vſe the yellow colour, or Dragons in priuate vſe, except of the Kings bloud, it were high treaſon in him. Theſe of Royall poſteritie (being now aboue 60000. all maintained at publike charge, and daily encreaſing) are a great burthen to the common-wealth: being idle, and as occaſion is offered, licentious; on whom the King hath continuall ſpies. None of them without the Kings leaue may goe out of the Citie appointed him, vnder grieuous puniſhments: nor may any of them reſide in the Royall Cities Pequin or Nanquin. The Kings Palace hath foure oppoſite gates, by which whoſoeuer paſſeth, they alight off their horſes or ſeates in which they are carryed, and paſſe by on foot, which is alſo obſerued at Nanquin. The South ſide hath three gates both within and without: by the middle of which the King paſſeth in or out, and is neuer elſe open; others at the right or left hand. No man ſpeakes to the King but the Eunuchs, and the reſt of his Family: others of all ſorts ſpeake to him only by Petition, and thoſe ſo full of complement, that euery learned man cannot make them; beſides, peculiar Magiſtrates are as it were Maſters of Requeſts to examine all Petitions to bee exhibited. At the beginning of euery yeere (which is at the new Moone which next goeth before or followes the Nones of February, the beginning of their Spring) a Legate is ſent out of euery Prouince to the King, which is done with more formall ſolemnity euery third third yeere. And in euery Citie, euery new-Moone-day, all the Magistrates assemble to a place in the Citie, where is the Kings Throne, and his Armes (gilded Dragons) and doe worship on their knees before the same, praying ten thousand yeares of life to the King. The same is done yearely on the Kings Birth-day; on which day, the Magistrates of Pequin, and other Legats out of the Prouinces, and all his kindred, come to the Court with gratulations and presents. All others that haue obtained preferments, by the Kings nomination, are to goe before day, and with appointed Rites to doe veneration to the Kings Throne, hauing on a Vest of purple, siluer and gilt head-tyres, for that purpose. The kingdomes adiacent are willingly refused of this King, whose predecessors sometime possessed, after freed them, as bringing more burthen then profit: which of late appeared in Corea, which the Iaponites inuaded, the Chinois defended, as abutting on the frontiers: but when the enemy left inuading, the defender soone after voluntarily relinquished these new subiects. Yet these, Cochin-China, Sian, and other adioyning, pay a tribute rather voluntarie, for hope of protection or gayne, then required, exacted, or by the Chinois regarded. Fiue Prouinces, Chiansi, Cechian, Nanchin, Vquam, and Sciantum, pay their tributes in Rice and Wheat, which are carried in the Kings Vessels and Ships thereto appointed, which are before related to bee more then ten thousand, belonging to these fiue Prouinces, besides those belonging to Magistrates and Merchants: insomuch, that Merchants that dwell Southwards from it, are forbidden to enter those streames, lest the multitude of vessels should cloy vp the passage, or endammage the King: and yet they are so many, that sometimes they are forced to stay many daies, especially in drier seasons, notwithstanding floud-gates made against Bridges, wherewith they stay, and heighten the waters; which being full, are opened, and sometimes in the Cataract, Vessels drowned as they goe out or in; the King being at a million of gold yeerely charge to make one Streame, called the yellow Streame of the muddie colour, nauigable and safe for his ships, which are drawne against the Streame by thousands of men. Neither dare they aduenture passage by Sea, for feare both of Pyrates, and of the Sea it selfe, which would bee farre more speedie, and lesse costly. The other tenne Prouinces pay their Tributes in Siluer. His Courtiers are Eunuchs; whom their poorer parents haue gelded in their youth, in hope of this Court-preferment: where, after they are admitted by that Manderine, appointed to this Office, they are trained vp vnder elder Ennuchs, to bee made seruiceable. Of this drosse of mankind, are in the Court ten thousand; Pantogia supposeth sixteene thousand. This King is esteemed more tyrannicall then his predecessors: neither doth hee euer come abroad, as they were wont once in the yeare, to sacrifice in the Temple sacred to Heauen and Earth. His Palace is farre more spacious, but not equall in workemanship to those in Europe. It is compassed with a triple wall, the first wherof might enuiron a large Towne. Herein, besides the many lodgings of the Eunuchs, are Hills, Groues, Streames, and other things of pleasure. The Iesuite [c] our Author saith, That he passed eight huge Palaces, before he came to the lodgings of those Eunuchs, which were appointed to learne how to order their Clockes or Watches, wherewith they had presented the King: and there were as many beyond. And ascending vp a Tower, hee saw Trees, Gardens, Houses, exceeding all that euer he had seene in Europe, who yet had beene in many the most sumptuous buildings therein. Within the third wall is the King, with his women, children, and such seruants as are thither admitted. When the heire apparant is proclaymed, all his other sonnes are sent away soone after, and confined to certaine Cities, where they nothing participate in affaires of State; otherwise, are honoured as the Kings kindred, liuing in pleasure in their Palace prisons, vnto the third and fourth generation. Neither is any meanes of greatnesse left to any: the Royall kindred not dealing with affaires of Gouernment, the Gouernours neither inheriting their Offices, nor leauing either place or name of Gentrie to their Families. And those which haue command of the Souldiers, pay not their wages; nor haue their Treasurers command of their persons: and their imployments are (out of their natiue) in some remoter Prouince. Vpon occasion of the warres against the Iaponites in Corea (which much terrified this vnwarlike Nation) the Royall Treasure being exhaust, tyrannicall meanes were vsed to supply them. There is report of many Gold and Siluer Mynes in China, which the ancient Kings, vpon some policies, shut vp; and this now commanded to bee opened. Hee exacted also an imposition of two in the hundreth on all goods that were sold in the Kingdome: which had beene tolerable, if the Magistrates had beene employed: but hee vsed his Eunuchs; a proud, shameless, slauish, and imperious Nation; which, in stead of searching for Mynes, vsed their Commission in wealthy Cities, where euery rich mans house was a Myne; and except they would haue digged it vp, must bee redeemed. Some Cities and Prouinces compounded at certaine summes, which was payd to the King, as extracted out of his Mynes. Some zealous and couragious Magistrates made complaint by Libels to the King; but themselues therefore punished. One Fumocean, of the Prouince

of Vquam, was cruelly beaten, and cast in close prison: whom his Prouince so honored euen then, that they published his worthie acts in bookes: they made his picture to bee sold through all the Prouince, that all men might priuately honour him as a Saint; and erected vnto him some publike Temples, with tapers and odours continually burning. But the Eunuches, to the extreame distaste of all the subiects, continued in their tyrannicall exactions (or robberies rather) throughout the Kingdome; into one of whose hands the Iesuites fell, with their presents: The Magistrates hate them, and they insult ouer the Magistrates. At Nanquin are also some thousands of these Eunuches in the Palace, one being chiefe ouer the rest. Some of them are so arrogant, that they looke for apprecations of a thousand yeeres life (which is the custome to the Queenes and Kings children; whereas to the King they say, Van van sin, that is, ten thousand yeeres, as Daniel to Nabuchodonosor, O King liue for euer) besides the bending of the knee, as to the chiefe Magistrates. The King will for light causes sometimes cause his Eunuches to be beaten, till they die vnder the blowes. When Ricius was dead, they coffined him after the China fashion, till they could find some place for his burial (which till that time was at Macao, whither they sent their dead) Pantogia put vp a petition to the King, in behalfe of Ricius his corpes. (This storie will be, I hope, acceptable, as shewing the manner of obtaining any thing at the Kings hand.) I IAMES PANTOGIA, a stranger of a most remote Kingdome, moued with the vertue and fame of your Noble Kingdome, haue in three yeeres saile, with much trouble, passed hither aboue 6000. leagues. In the twentie eight yeere of VANLIE (for so, as we, they account their yeres by the Kings reigne) in the twelfth Moone, I, with MATTHEVV RICIVS, came into your Court; where wee presented some gifts, and haue since beene sustained at the Kings charge. The nine and twentieth yeere of VANLIE, in the first Moone, we petitioned your Maiestie for a place of residence, and haue many yeeres enioyed the Royall bountie. In the eight and thirtieth of VANLIE, the eighteenth day of the third Moone RICIVS died, I, a Client of the Kingdome of the great West, remaine a fit subiect of pitie. The returne into our Countrey is long, &c. And I now, after so many yeeres stay, suppose that we may be numbred to the people which followeth your Royall Chariot, that your clemencie, like that of YAO[a], may not containe it selfe in the Kingdome of China alone, &c. So proceeds hee to set forth the good parts of Ricius, and with a long supplication to beg a place of buriall, some Field, or part of a Temple; and he, with his fellowes, should obserue their wonted prayers to the Lord of Heauen, for thousands of yeeres to him and his Mother. This Libell was written with peculiar forme, Characters, Seales; many Rites herein necessarily obserued. Before any be offered to the King, it must be viewed of some Magistrate, and they got this to be allowed by one which is Master of Requests, which sent it presently to the King. They must also haue many Copies thereof, to shew to those Magistrates, to whom it appertaines; which they did: one of them affirming, That Ricius deserued a Temple also, with his Image to bee there set vp. This message he sent them by another: for when they fauour a cause, they shew great strangenesse. The King commonly answers the third day (except hee mislike, for then hee suppresseth) and sends it to the Magistrate that had presented it, who shewes which of the sixe is the peculiar Court, which iudgeth of these things: This being sent to the Rituall Tribunall. Their answere is sent to the King within a moneth (which there is a short space) and repeating the Petition verbatim, and the Kings command to the peculiar Office, answeres what the Law sayth in that case, and concludes the Petition to bee agreeing to Iustice, and earnestly pleads and sues for confirmation. The King sends this answere to the Colao, which subscribed his approbation; which being sent againe to the King, hee subscribed with his owne hand Xi, that is, Fiat, or be it done: which the third day after was deliuered them.

These petitions, see verbatim, Exped. Sinica. l. 5. Of the Officers, see the next §.

Of the Magistrates, Courts, and Gouernment.

THat which the Philosopher wished, That Kings might be Philosophers, and Philosophers Kings, is in part fulfilled in China; where all the Gouernment is in their administration, which haue attained thereto, not by birth, fauour, wealth, or other Mediators, but their Philosophicall proficience and degrees, of which we haue spoken. Of these, there are two Orders: one, of the Court, which, besides their Offices in that Citie, moderate euen all those of the second sort, which are Prouinciall Magistrates, abroad in the Cities or Prouinces. Euery two moneths there is a new booke printed at Pequin, of all their Names, Places, and Degrees. First, of the Officers of Court. There are sixe Tribunals, or chiefe Courts: the first, called Li pu (pu signifieth Tribunall) which is the Court of Magistrates, ſtrates, who are hence nominated throughout the Kingdome; which nomination is guided by the excellencie of their writings aforeſaid. And all beginning with inferiour Offices, come by Degrees preſcribed by the Lawes, in order, to the higher: except Iniuſtice caſt them lower, or quite degrade them; which makes him paſt hope of regayning his dignitie. The ſecond Tribunall, is Hopu, or the Treaſurie, which receiueth and payeth out the Kings reuenues. The third, is Lypu, the Court of Rites, whence are ordered matters of Sacrifices, Temples, Prieſts, Schooles, Examinations, Feſtiuall dayes, Gratulations to the King, Titles, Phyſicians, Mathematicians, Embaſſages, with their Letters and Preſents (for they thinke vnworthy the Maieſtie of their King, himſelfe to write to any.) The fourth Court is called Pimpu; to which are ſubiect all Militarie Matters, and Charges, and Examinations. The fifth, is Cumpu, that hath the handling of publike Ædifices; as the Palaces of the King, of his Kindred, of the Magiſtrates; the Nauie, Bridges, Walls of Cities, and the like. The ſixt, is Himpu, of criminall Caſes, Priſons, and Impriſonments.

2. Hopu, Court of Treaſurie.
3. Lypu.
4. Pimpu.
5. Cumpu.
6. Himpu.

All the publike affaires depend of theſe Courts, which haue their Officers and Notaries in euery Citie and Prouince, which informe them of all things. One in euery of theſe Courts is Preſident, called Ciam, who hath his two Cilam, or Aſſiſtants, one at his right hand, the other at the left: Theſe are accounted the higheſt Dignities in the kingdome. Next to theſe, euery Court hath their ſeuerall Offices, and ouer each, many Officers, beſides Notaries, Apparitors, and others. Beſides theſe Courts, there is another, the greateſt in the whole Court and Kingdome, called Colaos, which are three, foure, or ſixe Councellors of State, hauing no peculiar charge, but looking to the whole. The King was wont to ſit with them in Counſell: but now they doe it without his preſence; euery day admitted into the Palace, and there remayning in conſultation, ſend Libels many and often vnto Him, who approueth, diſalloweth, or altereth at his pleaſure.

Colaos.

Beſides theſe and other Magiſtrates, there are two ſorts, one called Choli, the other Zauli, of each aboue threeſcore, all choiſe Philoſophers, which haue before giuen approued teſtimonie of their ſufficiencie. Theſe are employed in affaires of moment extraordinarie with the Court or Prouinciall officers, with Royall authoritie: and their eſpeciall Office is, to admoniſh the King by Libell, if any thing bee done contrary to Law through the Kingdome; not diſſembling the faults of the greateſt Magiſtrates, nor of the King himſelfe, or any of His: which they performe, to the aſtoniſhment and wonder of other Nations, at their integritie and libertie; neuer giuing ouer (frownes or threats notwithſtanding) their complaints and admonitions, till they procure redreſſe. This is alſo lawfull to euery Magiſtrate, yea, to euery priuate man: but theſe are moſt reſpected, becauſe it is their peculiar Function. Theſe Libels and the Kings anſwers are printed by many, and ſo paſſe through the Kingdome, whence their Hiſtorians may bee furniſhed with intelligence. This was lately apparant in the caſe of the Prince, whom the King would haue diſ-herited, the King being ſo incenſed with numbers of Libels or Bils of Complaint; that hee depriued or deiected to inferior places aboue a Hundred; whereupon the reſt abdicating themſelues (as is ſaid) he was forced to ſurceaſe his attempt. And lately, when the greateſt of the Colaos tooke indirect courſes, hee was accuſed by thoſe Officers in a hundred Bills, within two moneths ſpace, though in greateſt grace with the King; which (as it was thought) killed him ſoone after with thought.

Choli & Zauli.

Beſides theſe Magiſtrates in Court, there are diuers Colledges inſtituted, to diuers purpoſes; the nobleſt of which, is Han lin yuen; conſiſting of choiſe Doctors, which deale not in the Gouernment, and yet are accounted of greater Dignitie. Their Office is, to compoſe the Kings Writings, to compyle the publike Annales, and to write out the Lawes and Statutes. Of theſe, are choſen the Schoole-maſters of the Kings and Princes. They wholly addict themſelues to Studie, haue their Degrees of honour in the Colledge, which they attaine by their writing; and are preferred to the greateſt Dignities, but in the Court onely. None is choſen to be of the Colaos, but theſe. They gaine much, by compoſing Writings for their friends, as Epitaphs, and the like, which for their very name are precious. They are alſo Preſidents and Iudges in the Examinations of the Licentiates and Doctors.

Han lin yuen Colledge.

All theſe Magiſtrates (except the Colai) are as well at Nanquin as Pequin. The Cities attributed to them both, are gouerned as other Cities in other Prouinces. The gouernment of thoſe thirteene Prouinces depends of one Magiſtrate, called Pucinſu, and of another, called Nuganzaſu, the former iudging ciuill caſes, the later criminall. Their Reſidence, is in the chiefe Citie of the Prouince, with great pompe. In both theſe Courts are diuers Colleagues, called Taulo, which are alſo principall Magiſtrates, and ſometimes reſide without the Mother-Citie, in ſome other, where they haue ſpeciall charge. The Prouinces are diuided into diuers Regions, which they call Fu, and the proper Gouernor of each Region, Cfu. Theſe are alſo ſubdiuided into Cen and Hien, that is, nobler, or meaner Townes, as bigge yet as our Prouinciall Gouernment.

 Europæan

Europæan greater (not greateſt) Cities. Each of theſe hath a Prouoſt, called Cicen, or Cihien. Ci ſignifies to gouerne. Theſe Prouoſts or Gouernours haue their foure Aſſiſtants to helpe them. That which ſome thinke, that they are onely in repute of Cities, which are intituled Fu, and the reſt Cen and Hien but villages, is a tale. For both the Prouinciall Citie hath her Cifu and Cihien, and the Lieutenant of the Shire, or Region, hath no more power in the Shire-Towne, then in other Cities of the Shire, that is, the right of firſt Appeale. The ſecond Appeale is to the Pucinſu and Naganzaſu, Gouernours of the Prouince. Beſides theſe in euery Prouince, there are other two of more eminent place, ſent from the Court: one of which is reſident there, called Tutam; the other ſent yeerely from the Court, called Cia yuen. The former hath power ouer all, both Magiſtrates and Subiects, and in militarie affaires, and may be compared to our Vice-royes, or Deputies. The other is a Commiſſioner, or Viſiter, who enquireth into all Officers, and puniſheth the faultie (except the greateſt, whom he accuſeth to the King) and onely of all Magiſtrates executeth the ſentence of death. Many other Officers in Cities, Towns, and Villages, many Captaines and military Commanders, many which haue charge of Wals, Gates, Bridges, Forts, (euen as it were in time of Warre;) Muſters daily, and Wreſtlings might here be recited.

All the Magiſtrates, both Philoſophicall and Militarie, are reduced to nine Orders, and according to their ſeuerall Order, they receiue Money or Rice monthly: which, in ſuch maieſtie of Maieſtrates, is very ſmall; the ſtipend of the higheſt not amounting to a thouſand duckats yeerely, and euery one of the ſame Order receiuing alike; the chiefe in the militarie Order receiuing the ſame ſtipend, which the chiefe in the Philoſophicall. True it is, that more accrues to them by induſtrie, gifts, or otherwiſe: but this is the Legall allowance. All Magiſtrates weare the like Cap of blacke cloth, with eares or wings on both ſides, of Ouall forme, apt to fall off: which is done purpoſely, to make them walke gravely, without light mouing of their heads. They weare all like attire, Bootes alike, of peculiar faſhion and ſubſtance, of fine blacke Leather. They weare alſo a faire girdle, about foure fingers broad, large and looſe, of curious embroiderie, and on their breaſts and backes they haue ſquare pieces of Cloth embroidered: by both theſe are diſcerned their Places and Dignities. They are alſo knowne by their Vmbrelas, which are carried ouer their heads, ſome blew, ſome yellow; ſome two, three, and ſome one: the meaneſt on horſe-back, the greater on chayres, carried on foure or eight mens ſhoulders, according to their Dignitie. They haue other Ornaments, Banners, Chaines, Cenſers, multitudes of Sergeants, or inferiour Officers, going before them, two and two in a ranke, with Halberds, Maces, Battle-axes, Chaynes, Canes, crying out to giue way, with ſuch clamours and noyſe, that euen dogs ſhrinke away, and not a man to bee ſeene in moſt populous ſtreets: this more or leſſe, according to the degree of the Magiſtrate. Thus haue we ſeene a Philoſophicall Empire, all, euen the Souldiers, being ſubiect to them; yea, the Captaines beaten by them, as boyes by their Maſters: Neither is the ſentence of Militarie men, in matters of Warre, of authoritie with the King, like theirs; no, nor their valour comparable to theſe, in maintenance of their loyaltie, being (as yee haue ſeene) prodigall of preferment and life. The Souldiers betake themſelues to Handy-crafts, or Seruice of great Men, making ſhew of themſelues on Muſter and Pay-daies. Their Weapons, as their courage, ridiculous for offence or defence. I haue ſeene many Gunnes (ſaith Pantogia) in their Souldiers hands, but none, whoſe barrell was aboue a ſpan * long: a little Ordnance on their walls, but little ſeruiceable. Militarie men are little eſteemed, in ſo long peace, where they feare no enemy, not care for encrochments; that which ſome ſay, of their extending their Dominions to the Indies in former times, being a fable, and diſagreeing with their Chronicles, which are ſtudiouſly continued foure thouſand yeeres to theſe times. Neither doe they conceiue the reſt of the world worth the conquering. Maruellous alſo is the Symmetrie of all the Magiſtrates, the members of this great Body, both with the Head and each other, both in reall obedience and complemental Rites. The inferiors, whether priuat men or Magiſtrates, ſeldome ſpeaking to their ſuperiors, in the Court, or elſewhere, but on their knees, and with honourable termes, how meane ſoeuer knowne before their Degree.

No man alſo enioyeth any place aboue three yeeres, except he be a new confirmed by the King: but vſually is preferred to a greater; but in another Region, to preuent acquaintance, an occaſion of vniuſtice, or popular affection. And all the Pucinſu, Naganzaſu, Cifu, Cicen, Cihien, and the like principall Officers, muſt euery third yeere appeare ſolemnly at the Court at Pequin: at which time, diligent inquiſition is made of all Officers in the Kingdome, with great rigour, euery one rewarded according to his deſert. I haue obſerued, that the King himſelfe dares not alter any of thoſe things, which in this Inquiſition are conſtituted. In the yeere 1607. foure thouſand Magiſtrates, in this publike Diſquiſition, were condemned, as appeared by their names publiſhed in a Booke: ſome for couetous corruption, vſurping a This it is like, was miſtaken by the Tranſlator or Printer: for Captaine Saris hath ſeene many, & ſaith they are as long as piſtols but the cock ſuch, as makes them of little ſeruice. Botero Iarie, &c.

vsurping publike or priuate goods; these were wholly depriued: some for rigorous, seuentie were so serued: a third sort were such, as were old, sickly, or remisse; these might vse the ensignes of Magistrates, but liue a priuate life: the fourth were rash and vnaduised, which were put into inferior Offices, or sent to places of easier gouernment: The last ranke was of such as gouerned not themselues, or their families, in good order; and such were also for euer depriued. The like Inquisition euery fift yeere is obserued, concerning the Officers of Court, and Militarie. The Iesuites were acquainted with one great Magistrate, which was thrust into an inferior Office three yeeres space, onely for being too often at Feasts, and too much addicted to Chesse-play.

No man may beare Office (except Militarie) in that Prouince where he was borne. Thus the Militarie men haue sparres of fidelitie, and the other want occasions of corruption: for which cause also, his house-hold seruants and children may not stirre out of doores, whiles he executes his Office; but when he goes out, he seales vp his doores, both priuate and publike, hauing all necessarie seruices performed by such as are appointed thereto by the State. None weare any Weapons in the Cities, not Souldiors or Captaines, nor men of Learning, but then when they goe to their Masters, Exercises, or Warres: onely some attend the chiefe Magistrates with weapons. Nor hath any weapons at his house, except some rustie Blade, for feare of Theeues when he trauailes: and further then scratching, or pulling off the haire, they manage no quarrels, esteeming no iniurie a mortall indignitie, and him the wisest and most valiant, that flyes the furious, and offers no wrong. When the King dies, none of his bloud, but the heire onely, may stay in the Citie Royall, or remoue out of the Cities where they are confined, on paine of death. And when any contention ariseth amongst them, one of the chiefe of them, which is their Gouernor, decides it: if with others, not of the bloud Royall, the publike Magistrate.

When the King preferreth any Magistrates to some higher dignitie, if they haue verie well deserued, they are requested to leaue their Bootes behind, which are kept in the publike Chests, together with verses in their prayse, and are honoured with gifts. If they be of supereminent worth, a publike Marble Pillar is erected, with inscription of their deserts. Yea, here are two whom Temples are built at publike charge, and their Images as like as the workemen can make, set on the Altars; with a yeerely reuenue, and certaine men appointed to keepe perpetuall odours and lights there burning, (supplications excepted) in manner as they doe to their Idols. The Cities are all full of these Temples, sometime by fauour more then merit, to which at certaine times they goe, and exhibite kneelings, with meat-offerings, and other things.

In some Prouinces, vpon speciall occasions, they alter their course, as to preuent Pyracies and Robberies. Some were constituted, with Commission extended into diuers Prouinces, some bordering parts of all those Prouinces obeying him as Vice-Roy: As at Canceu, one superior to the Vice-roy of the Prouince, hauing part of Chianfi, Fuchien, Canton, and Vquam subiect, hauing out of euery Prouince two Regions, all adioyning together, assigned to him.

Although they haue no Nobilitie employed in Magistracie, yet there are some descendents of those Captaines and Great men, which helped Hum-vu in expelling the Tartars, which are borne Noble, called Quocum, as we haue elsewhere shewed. These are capable of Militarie places. One head of one of these families, resides at Nanquin, which liues in great magnificence, carried on eight mens shoulders; his Gardens, Palaces, household Furniture, Royall. Ricius was entertained in his Garden, wherein (besides other rarities) he saw an artificiall Mount made of vnpolished Marbles, which in the hollow places thereof contayned Chambers, Halls, Stayres, Trees, Ponds, and other Deuices; this increasing both delight and wonder, that it was of Labyrinthian forme, in a little space of ground detayning the steps two or three houres, in passing the many Mazes thereof. The coolenesse of this place was conuenient both to their Studies and Feasts.

§. X.

Of their Punishments Diuine and Humaine, and a Catalogue of their Kings.

When the King preferreth any to the dignitie of a Manderine, or to a higher Office, their custome is, to put vp a Libell or Supplication, inferring their insufficiencie, with many modest refusals: yet loth to be beleeued, and that the King should accordingly refuse them; as sometimes (against their will) hee doth, and certainely would, if this officious forme of deprecation be omitted by them. all prouisions to the contrarie, they are couetous, cruell, and exceedingly addicted to bribes: and where they finde not (as it often happens) they make Lawes, sometimes contrarie to others, alway for their owne will and aduantage.

None may execute the sentence of death, but by speciall commission from the King. And therefore the Malefactors are consumed in the prisons. But they haue authoritie with certayne Canes to beat men on the legs, thighs, and hammes, in such terrible crueltie, that a few blowes may either lame or kill the partie. And therefore no King is more feared then these Mandarines or Magistrates. In the middest of their Cities are Palaces of the Kings for these Officers to reside in. In Paquin and Nanquin the multitude of these Magistrates is incredible, one of these Cities containing more then two thousand and fiue hundred, as many as somewhere are of Citizens. These all twice a day heare causes, and execute iustice.

These Magistrates are no way comparable in wealth to the Nobles in Europe. Their sentence against guiltie persons is without solemne furniture of words; as, Let him haue twentie strokes more or lesse, which by those Canine Cane-men is suddenly executed, the partie lying grouelling on the ground. These Canes are cleft in the midst, three or foure fingers broad: twentie or thirtie blowes will spoyle the flesh, fiftie or threescore will aske long time to be healed, an hundred are vncurable. They vse also the Strappado, hoysing them vp and downe by the armes with a cord. They bee aboue measure patient in hearing causes: and their examinations are publique. Condemned persons haue a pillory-boord fastned about their necke, and hanging downe before them to the knees, in which his Fellony or Treason is expressed; which boord neither suffereth them well to sit or lye, to eate or sleepe, and in fine killeth them. There be in euery Metropolitane Citie foure principall houses, for those chiefe Officers before mentioned; the fourth for the Taissu, wherein is the principall Gaole or Prison, walled about high and strong, with a gate of no lesse force: within the same are three other gates before you come where the prisoners lye, in the meane space are such as watch and ward day and night. The prison within is so great, that in it are streets and market-places, and neuer void of seuen or eight hundred men, that goe at liberty. In Canton alone are said to bee 15000. prisoners: and in this and euery other Metropolitane Citie, thirteene prisons, sixe of which are alwayes possessed, or doe possesse rather, those which are condemned to death. In euery of them are a hundred Souldiers, with their Captayne to keepe them. The offendors are allowed to worke in the day-time for their liuing; for little almes are giuen in China, and but a little Rice allowed them by the King. Such prisoners as are in for debt, haue a time appointed for payment: at which if they fayle, they are whipped, and a new time assigned: and so they proceed till the debt bee paid, or the debtor dead. If any man remone his dwelling from one place to another, the Neighbours cause a Cryer to proclaime it with ringing of a Bason, that his creditors, if hee haue any, may come to demand their debts, which the Neighbours, if they neglect this dutie, are charged with. Executions of deadly sentence are seldome, and that with many ceremonies. Thus it comes to passe, that of whippings and imprisonment there die thousands yeerely. Theeues are slightly punished the first time. The second they are burned with two characters on the arme: the third receiueth the same punishment on the face. If he steale ofter, hee is whipped more or lesse, or condemned for a certayne time to the Gallies. This makes pilfries common: for they are neuer done to death for theeuery. Many extraordinary crimes haue new deuised extraordinary punishments, as after in this history followeth. One had so freely libelled against the Kings tyrannies, that many were cruelly tormented being thereof suspected, and one by torments confessed the fact, and was therefore adiudged to haue 1600. pieces of his flesh cut from him, his head vntouched that his eyes might see this mangling: and lastly, his head cut off, which amongst them is a great abomination. Others accused of treason at Nanquin, were forced to stand in those pillory boords till they rotted, some continuing fifteene dayes in torment. Those which out-liue their beatings, must passe vnder the Surgeons hands for cure, which ordinarily proue new tormentors, except money make them propitious: and this the Iesuites report of their owne fauours amongst them in all difficulties, money hath bin their best friend; without which is no friendship in China, no Faith, no Loue, no Hope of them. But by following Perera (sometime a prisoner there) into his prison, & others, I find my selfe almost imprisoned, and therfore will flee hence into their Temples, & there take Sanctuary. Here they deale as madly with their gods, as there with their men. Yet first let vs take view of some rare workes of diuine Prouidence in this Countrey.

b Maginus and Ortelius.

Ludouicus Georgius in his Map of China, [b] describeth a huge Lake in the Prouince of Sancij, made by inundation, in the yeere of our Lord 1557. wherein were swallowed seuen Cities, besides Townes and Villages, and innumerable multitudes of people: one only Child in a hollow tree escaping so great a destruction. Such as escaped drowning, were, as Boterus addeth, destroyed with fire from heauen. Gasper de Cruz reciteth a Letter of the Manda-

Mandarines to the King 1556. containing newes of a terrible Earth-quake in the Prouinces of Sanxi and Santon; wherein the day waxed darke. The earth opened the yeere before in many places, vnder which was heard the noise, as it were, of bells: there followed winde and raine. The winde, which they call Tufan, is so violent, that it driueth ships on the land, ouerthroweth men and houses: it commeth almost euery yeere once, lasteth foure and twentie houres, in which space it compasseth the Compasse. In Vinyansu the Earth-quake caused a fire to breake out, which consumed all the Citie, and innumerable people. The like happened to another Citie neere it, where none escaped. It caused the Riuer at Leuchimen to encrease and drowne multitudes. At Hien the fall of the houses slue eight thousand. In Puchio the house of the Kings kinsmen fell, and slue all therein but a child. Cochu with fire from aboue, and waters from beneath, was left desolate. At Enchinoen almost an hundred thousand perished. At Inchumen the Riuer ebbed and flowed ten times in a day and night. This perhaps was the same with that which Georgius and Boterus mention.

Boterus ascribeth vnto China seuentie millions of people, whereas hee alloweth to Italy scarce nine, and to Spaine lesse, to England three, to all Germany, with the Swizzers, and Low-Countries, but fifteene, and as many to all France. Lamentable it is that the Deuill should haue so great a tribute in this one Kingdome. Gonsales (in his Discourse of China, translated by Parkes) reckoneth (I know not how truely) almost seuen millions of Souldiers in continuall pay. Dalmeida numbreth seuentie millions, and two hundred and fiftie thousand Inhabitants, besides Souldiers, and reckoning but the principall in each Family, often-times not aboue three of ten, as their Bookes testifie.

I. Gon. de Mendoza.

I thought it not impertinent here to adde the Catalogue of the Kings of this countrey, according [m] to their owne stories, which although it be in part fabulous (as what ancient prophane storie is not?) yet, because I haue done thus in other Nations, and haue so worthy a paterne in this, as the Worthy of our Age [n] Iosephus Scaliger, pardon mee to trouble thee with this Chronicle of their Kings.

[m] Historie of China.

The first was Vitey, a Gyant-like man, a great Astrologer and Inuenter of Sciences; hee reigned an hundred yeeres. They name after him an hundred and sixteene Kings, (whose names our Author omitteth) all which reigned two thousand two hundred fiftie and seuen yeeres; all these were of his linage: and so was Tzintzon, the maker of that huge wall of China, which killed many of the Chinois, of whom hee tooke euery third man to this worke. For which cause they slue him, when he had reigned fortie yeeres, with his sonne Aguizi. They ordained King in his stead Auchosau, who reigned twelue yeeres; his sonne Futey succeeded and reigned seuen yeeres; his wife eighteene; his sonne, three and twentie: then followed Guntey, foure and fiftie; Guntey the second, thirteene: Ochantey, fiue and twentie: Coantey, thirteene: Tzentzey, fixe and twentie, and foure moneths: Anthey, fixe: Pintatey, fiue: Tzintzuney, three and seuen moneths: Huy Hannon, fixe: Cuoum, two and thirtie: Bointhey, eighteene: Vnthey, thirteene: Othey, seuenteene: Yanthey, eight moneths: Antey, nineteene yeeres: Tantey, three moneths: Chitey, one yeere: Linthey, two and twentie yeeres: Yanthey, one and thirtie yeeres: Lanpy, one and fortie yeeres: Cuythey, fiue and twntie yeeres: Fontey, seuenteene yeeres. Fifteene other Kings reigned, in all, one hundred seuentie and fixe yeeres. The last of which was Quioutey, whom Tzobu deposed, who with seuen of his linage reigned threescore and two yeeres: Cotey, foure and twentie yeeres: Dian, fixe and fiftie yeeres: Tym, one and thirtie yeeres: Tzuyn, seuen and thirtie yeeres; Tauco, with his linage (which were one and twentie) reigned two hundred ninetie and foure yeres: Bausa a Nunne, wife of the last of them (whom she slue) one and fortie yeeres: Tautzon slue her, and reigned with his posteritie (which were seuen Kings) one hundred and thirtie yeeres: Dian, eighteene yeeres: Outon, fifteene yeeres: Outzim, nine yeeres and three moneths: Tozon foure yeeres: Auchin, ten yeeres: Zaytzon, and seuenteene of his race, three hundred and twentie yeeres: Tepyna, the last was dispossessed by Vzon the Tartar, vnder whom, and eight of his Tartarian successours, China endured subiection ninetie and three yeeres: Gombu or Hum-vu expelled Tzintzoum, the last of them. He with thirteene successours haue reigned about two hundred and fortie yeeres. Their computation [o] of times is more prodigious then that of the Chaldæans, after which this present yeere of our Lord 1614. is in their account from the Creation 884793.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the Religion vsed in China.

§. I.

Of their Gods and Idols in former times.

HOw much the greater things are reported of this so large a Countrey, and mightie a Kingdome, so much the more compassion may it prouoke in Christian hearts, that amongst so many people there is scarce a Christian, who amongst so ample reuenues, which that King possesseth, payeth either heart or name, vnto the King of Heauen, till that in so huge a Vintage, the Iesuites of late haue gleaned a few handfulls to this profession. Before wee come to the Narration of their gods, I thinke it fit to deliuer what our ancienter Authors haue obserued of their Religion, and then to come to the Moderne. They were before the Tartarian Conqueſt [a] giuen to Astrologie, and obserued Natiuities, and gaue directions in all matters of weight. These Astrologers or Magicians told Farfur the King of China or Mangi, that his Kingdome should neuer be taken from him, but by one which had a hundred eyes. And such in name was [b] Chinsanbaian the Tartarian Captaine, which dispossessed him of his state, and conquered it to the great Can about 1269. This Farfur liued in great delicacie, nor did euer feare to meet with such an Argus. He brought vp yeerely two hundred thousand Infants, which their Parents could not prouide for: and euery yeere, on certaine of his Idoll-holy-dayes, feasted his principall Magistrates, and all the wealthiest Citizens of Quinsay, ten thousand persons at once, ten or twelue dayes together. There were then some few Nestorian Christians; one Church at Quinsay; two at Cinghianfu, and a few others. They had many Idoll-Monasteries. They burned their dead: the kinsmen of the dead accompanied the corps, clothed in Canuas, with Musicke and Hymnes to their Idols: and when they came to the fire, they cast therein many papers, wherein they had painted Slaues, Horses, Camels, &c. as of the Cathayans is before reported, to serue him in the next world. They returne, after their Funerall Rites are finished, with like harmony of Instruments and Voyces, in honor of their Idols, which haue receiued the soule of the deceased. They had many Hospitals for the poore, where idle persons were compelled to worke, and poore impotents relieued.

Odoricus [c] affirmeth that at Kaitan or Zaiton, hee found two Couents of Minorite-Fryers, and many Monasteries of Idolaters, in one whereof hee was, in which (as it was told him) were three thousand Votaries, and eleuen thousand Idols. One of those Idols (lesse then some others) was as big as the Popish Christopher. These Idols they feed euery day with the smoake of hot meates set before them: but the meate they eate themselues. At Quinsay a Chinian conuert led him into a certaine Monastery, where hee called to a Religious person, and said, This Raban Francus, that is, this Religious French-man commeth from the Sunne-setting, and is now going to Cambaleth, to pray for the life of the great Can, and therefore you must shew him some strange sight. Then the said Religious person tooke two great baskets full of broken reliques, and led mee into a little walled Parke, and vnlocked the doore. We entred into a faire greene, wherein was a Mount in forme of a steeple, repleniſhed with Hearbs and Trees. Then did hee ring with a Bell, at the sound whereof many Creatures, like Apes, Cats, and Monkeyes, came downe the Mount, and some had faces like men, to the number of foure thousand and two hundred, putting themselues in good order, before whom he set a platter, and gaue them those fragments. Which when they had eaten, he rung the second time, and they all returned to their former places. I wondred at the sight, and demanded what creatures they were. They are (quoth he) the soules of Noble-men, which we here feed for the loue of GOD, who gouerneth the World. And as a man was honourable in his life, so his soule entereth after death into the body of some excellent beast, but the soules of simple and rusticall people, possesse the bodies of more vile and brutish creatures. Neither could I disswade him from the opinion, or perswade him that any soule might remaine without a body.

Nic. di Conti [d] saith, that when they rise in the morning, they turne their faces to the East, and with their hands ioyned, say, God in Trinitie keepe vs in his Law.

Of their preſent Gods and Idols.

THeir Religion at this time is Idolatrous and Pagan, wherin the common people are somewhat e superſtitious, but the King himſelfe, & the Mandarines or Magiſtrates, as ſeeing the vanitie thereof, and not able to ſee the truth, are in manner irreligious and profane: the firſt worſhip that which is Nothing in the World, and theſe find nothing in the World, but the World and theſe momentany things, to worſhip. e Gotar. Arthus cap. 52.

Ricius reports, that the ancient Chinois worſhipped one only great GOD, which they called the King of Heauen, or otherwiſe, Heauen and Earth: wherby he gathers, that they thought Heauen and Earth to be endued with life, and the Soule thereof to be the greateſt GOD. Beneath which they worſhipped alſo diuers Spirits, Tutelares, preſeruers of the Mountaines, of Riuers, and of the foure parts of the World. They held that Reaſon was to be followed in all actions, which light they confeſſed to receiue from Heauen. They neuer conceiued yet ſuch monſtrous abſurdities of this god, and theſe ſpirits, as the Egyptians, Grecians, and Romanes haue done: whence the Ieſuite would haue you thinke (euen in this Idolatry) many of them to be ſaued, by I know not what congruitie, which merits not the mention. In ſucceeding ages, this Idolatry became more manifold in ſome, whiles other became Atheiſts, of which their King and Magiſtrates are blamed. And yet this King, when ſome few yeeres ſithee his Palace was fired with lightning, being guiltie of his owne vnworthineſſe, he commanded his ſonne to pray to Heauen for reconciliation.

Fryer Gaſper de la Crux, being in Canton, entred a certaine Religious houſe, where he ſaw a Chappell, hauing therein, beſides many other things of great curioſitie, the Image of a woman, with a child hanging about her necke, and a Lampe burning before her. The myſterie hereof (ſo like the Popiſh myſterie of iniquitie) none of the Chinois could declare. The Sunne, the Moone, Starres, and eſpecially Heauen it ſelfe, are gods of the firſt forme in their Idol-ſchoole. They acknowledge Laocon Tzantey the Gouernour of the great god (ſo it ſignifieth) to be eternall and a ſpirit. Of like nature they eſteeme Cauſay, vnto whom they aſcribe the lower Heauen, and power of Life and Death. They ſubiect vnto him three other ſpirits, Tanquam, Teyquam, Tzuiquam: The firſt, ſuppoſed to bee Author of Raine; the ſecond, of humane Natiuitie, Husbandrie, and Warres; the third, is their Sea-Neptune. To theſe they offer Victualls, Odors, and Alter-clothes; preſenting them alſo with Playes and Comœdies. They haue Images of the Deuil with Serpentine lockes, and as deformed lookes as here he is painted, whom they worſhip, not to obtaine any good at his hand, but to detaine and hold his hand from doing them euill. They haue many Hee and Shee-Saints, in great veneration, with long Legends of their liues. Amongſt the chiefe of them are Sichia, the firſt inuenter of their religious Votaries of both Sects; Quannia, an Anchoreſſe; and Neoma, a great Sorcereſſe. Frier Martin in one Temple in Vcheo, told a hundred and twelue Idols. They tell f of one Huiunſin, in the Prouince of Cechian, which did much good to the people, both by Alchimy, making true Siluer of Quick-ſiluer, and by freeing the Metropolitan Citie from a huge Dragon, which hee faſtened to an yron pillar, ſtill ſhewed, and then flew into Heauen with all his Houſe, Mice and all (lye and all) and there they haue built him a Temple; the miniſters whereof are of the Sect Thanſu. Trigantius writes of certaine Gods, called Foe, which, they ſay, goe a viſiting Cities and Prouinces: and the Ieſuites in one Citie were taken for theſe Idols Foe. At Sciauchin, they in time of drought proclaimed a Faſt, euery Idoll was ſollicited with Tapers and Odours, for Raine. A peculiar Officer, with the Elders of the people, obſerued peculitr Rites to theſe purpoſe; the Prieſts went on Proceſſion, all in vaine. When the Citie-Gods could doe nothing, they fetched a Country-Idoll, called Locu, which they carrie about, worſhip, offer to: But LOCV is now growne old; thus they ſaid of his deafeneſſe. At laſt they goe to a Witch, who told them, Quonin (a Goddeſſe) was angry, that her backe was burned; meaning the Conuerts, which burnt their Idols, which inſenſed them againſt the Chriſtians. Hoaquam is the name of an Idoll, which hath rule ouer the eyes, which they carry about in Proceſſion, and beg in his name. In time of trouble they haue familiaritie with the Deuill; Pedro de Alfaro obſerued, being in a Ship with the Chinois, in this ſort. They cauſe a man to lye on the ground groueling, and then one readeth on a booke, the reſt anſwering, and ſome make a ſound with Bells and Tabors. The man in ſhort ſpace beginneth to make viſages and geſtures, whereby they know the Deuill is entred, and then doe they propound their requeſts, to which he anſwereth by word or Letters. And when they cannot extort an anſwere by word, they ſpread a red Mantle on the ground, equally diſperſing all ouer the ſame a certaine quantitie of Rice. Then do they f Ricius.

they cause a man that cannot write to stand there, themselues renuing their former inuocation, and the Deuill entring into this man, causeth him to write vpon the Rice. But his answeres are often full of lyes. In the entries of their houses they haue an Idoll-roome, where they incense their Deities morning and euening. They offer to them the sweetest odours, Hennes, Geese, Duckes, Rice, Wine; a Hogs-head boyled is a chiefe offering. But little hereof falleth to Gods share, which is set in a dish apart: as the tippes of the Hogs-eares, the bylls and feet of the Hennes, a few cornes of Rice, three or foure drops of Wine. Their Bookes tell much of Hell; their deuotions little. Their Temples are homely, and filthy: no Oracle is in any of them. They haue fables of men turned into Dogs or Snakes, and againe metamorphosed into men. And they which beleeue the paines of Hell, yet beleeue after a certaine space, that those damned soules shall passe thence into the bodies of some beasts. But their Idolatries and religious Rites will better appeare, if we take view of their different Religions and Sects.

§. III.

Of their three Sects: and first of that of CONFVTIVS.

Ric. l. 1. c. 10. THey reckon in the World, and obserue amongst themselues, three Sects; the first, of the Learned; the second, Sciequia; the third, Laucu. One of these three, euery Chinois professeth, as doe their Neighbours also, which vse their Characters, the Iapanders, Corians, Lequians, and Cochin-Chinois. The Sect of the Learned is peculiar to the Chinois, very ancient and famous, which they drinke in together with the Studies of Learning, all their Students and Magistrates professing the same, obseruing Confutius, the Author thereof. These worship not Idols, nor haue any. One God they worship, as preseruer of all things; certaine Spirits also, in an inferiour honour. The chiefe of them neither acknowledge, Author, Time, or Manner of the worlds creation. Somewhat they discourse of Rewards, of Good and Euill, but such as are bestowed in this life vpon the Doer or his Posteritie. The Ancients made no question of the Soules immortalitie, speaking often of the Dead as liuing in Heauen. But of the punishments of wicked men in Hel, not a word. The later Professors teach that the Soule dies with, or soone after the Bodie, and therfore beleeue neither Heauen nor Hel. Some of them hold that good mens soules by the strength of vertue, hold out some longer time, but of bad men to die with the bodie. But the most common opinion, taken from the Sect of Idolaters, and brought in fiue hundred yeeres since, holdeth that the World consisteth of one substance, and that the Maker thereof, together with Heauen and Earth, Men, Beasts, Plants, and the Elements, doe make vp one bodie, of which euery Creature is a distinct member: thence obseruing what loue ought to be amongst all things, and that Men may come to become one with GOD.

Although the learned men acknowledge one supreame Deitie, yet doe they build him no Temple, nor depute any place to his worship, no Priests or Ministers of Religion, no solemne Rites, no Precepts or Rules, none that hath power to ordaine or explaine their Holies, or to punish the Transgressors. They doe Him no priuate or publike deuotions or seruice, yea, they affirme, that it belongs to the King only to do sacrifice and worship to the King of Heauen; and that it is treason for others to vsurpe it. For this cause the King hath two Temples very magnificent in both the Royall Cities, the one consecrate to Heauen, the other to Earth: in the which hee was wont himselfe to sacrifice, but it is now performed by some principall Magistrates, which slay there many Sheepe and Oxen, and performe other Rites many to Heauen and Earth, in his stead. To the other spirits of Hills, Riuers, and the foure Regions of the World, onely the chiefe Magistrates doe sacrifice, nor is it lawfull to priuate men. The Precepts of this Law are in their nine Bookes before mentioned.

Nothing in this Sect is more generall, from the King to the meanest, then their yeerely Obits to their Parents and grand-fathers, which they account obedience to Parents, though dead; of which afterwards. The Temple they haue is that, which in euery Citie is by the Law built to Confutius, in that place where there Schoole or Commencement house is. This is sumptuous, and hath adioyning the Palace of that Magistracie, which is ouer the Bachellors or Graduates of the first degree. In the chiefe place of this Temple or Chappell is placed his Image, or else his name in golden Cupitall Letters, on a faire Table: besides which stand other Images of his disciples, as inferiour Saints. Into this Temple euery new and full Moone, all the Magistrates of the Citie assemble with the Bachellors, and adore him with kneelings, wax-lights and incense. They do also yeerely on his birth-day, and other appointed times, offer vnto him meat-offerings or dishes with great prouision, yeelding him thanks for for the learning they haue found in his Bookes, as the cauſe of their Degrees and Magiſtracies. But they pray not to him for any thing, no more then to the dead in their Obits.

There are other Chappels of the ſame Sect vnto the Tutelare ſpirits of each Citie, and proper to euery Magiſtrate of the Court. Therein they binde themſelues by ſolemne oath, to obſerue the Lawes in their function, and that at their firſt entrance: heere they offer meates and burne odours, acknowledging diuine Iuſtice in puniſhing periurie. The ſcope of this Sect of the learned, is the publike peace and well ordering of the priuate and publike ſtate, and framing themſelues to Morall vertues, wherein they doe not much diſagree from the Chriſtian veritie. They haue fiue concords in their Moralitie, in which as Cardinall vertues, they compriſe all Humanitie, the duties namely of Father and Child, Husband and Wife, Maſter or Superiour, and thoſe vnder them, Brethren amongſt themſelues, and laſtly, Equals and Companions. They condemne ſingle life, and permit polygamie. This precept of Charitie to doe to others as one would bee done to, is well handled in their Bookes, and eſpecially the pietie and obſeruance of Children to their Parents, and Inferiours to their Superiours.

Longobardus ſaith, that euery new and full Moon-day, a little before Sun-riſing, in all the Cities of this Kingdome, and in all the ſtreets, at one and the ſame houre, they make publication of theſe fixe Precepts. Firſt, Obey thy Father and Mother. Secondly, Reuerence thy Elders and Superiours. Thirdly, Keepe peace with thy Neighbours. Fourthly, Teach thy Children. Fiftly, Fulfill thy Calling and Office. The laſt prohibiteth crimes; Murther, Adulterie, Theft, &c. Nic. Longobard.

Many mixe this firſt with other Sects: yea, ſome hold not this a Sect, but an Academie, Schoole, or Profeſſion of Policie, and gouerning the priuate and publike State.

§. IIII.

Of the Sect Sciequia.

THe ſecond Sect is called Sciequia, or Omitoſe, in Iapon pronounced Sciaccu and Amidabu, the characters to both are the ſame: the Iaponites call it alſo the Totoqui Law. This was brought into China from the Weſt, out of a Kingdome called Thiencio, or Scinto, now Indoſtan, betweene Indus and Ganges, Anno Dom. 65. I haue read, That the King of China, mooued by a dreame, ſent Legates thither, which brought thence Bookes, and Interpreters, which tranſlated thoſe Bookes: from hence it paſſed into Iapon; and therefore the Iaponders are deceiued, which thinke, that Sciaccu and Amidabu were Siamites, and came into Iapon themſelues. Perhaps they then heard of the Apoſtles preaching in India; and ſending for that had this falſe doctrine obtruded on them. 2. Sciequia.

Theſe hold, that there are foure Elements (whereas the Chinois fooliſhly affirme fiue, Fire, Water, Earth, Metals, and Wood, not mentioning the Aire) of which they compound this Elementary World, with the creatures therein. They multiplie Worlds with Democritus, and with Pythagoras, hold a Metamplychoſis, or paſſage of Soules out of one body into another. They tell of a Trinitie of Gods, which grew into one Deitie. This Sect promiſeth rewards to the good in Heauen; to the euill, threatens puniſhments in Hell; extolleth Single life; ſeemes to condemne Marriage; bids fare-well to houſe and houſhold; and begs in Pilgrimages to diuers places. Their Rites doe much agree (it is the Ieſuites aſſertion) with the Popiſh: their Hymnes and Prayers with the Gregorian faſhion, Images in their Temples, Prieſtly Veſtments, like to their Planialia. In their Mumſimus they often repeate a name, which themſelues vnderſtand not, Tolome which ſome thinke may be deriued from that of Saint Thomas. Neither in Heauen or Hell doe they aſcribe eternitie: but after certaine ſpaces of yeeres, they allow them another birth in ſome other Earth, there allowing them penance for their paſſed ſinnes. The ſeuerer ſort eate not fleſh, or any thing that had life: but if any delinquiſh, their penance is not heard; the gift of ſome money, or the mumbling ouer their Oriſons, being (they promiſe) of power to free from Hell. Theſe things made a faire ſhew; but their corruptions made them diſtaſtfull: and this alſo (which the Learned often obiect to theſe Sectaries) that the King and Princes, which firſt gaue way hereto, died violently and miſerably, and fell into publike calamities. Yet hath it euen to theſe times, in diuers viciſſitudes, encreaſed and decreaſed, and many Bookes haue beene thereof written, which contayne many difficulties, inexplicable to themſelues.

Their Temples are many and ſumptuous: in which, huge monſtrous Idols of Braſſe, Marble, Wood, and Earth, are to be ſeene; with Steeples adioyning, of ſtone, or timber; and therein exceeding great Bells, and other ornaments, of great price. Their Prieſts are called Oſciami: They continually ſhaue their heads and beards, contrary to the Countrey cuſtome. Some of them goe on Pilgrimages: others liue an auſtere life, on Hills or in Caues; and the moſt of them (which amount to two or three millions) liue in Cloyſters, of their reuenues and almes, and ſomewhat alſo of their owne induſtrie. Theſe Prieſts are accounted the moſt vile and vicious in the Kingdome, being of the baſer raskalitie: ſold, when they are children, by their parents, to the elder Prieſts; of ſlaues, made Diſciples, and ſucceeding their Maſters in Sect and Stipend; few voluntarily adioyning themſelues to theſe Cloyſterers. Neither doe they affect more liberall learning, nor abſtayne (but perforce) from diſauowed Luxurie. Their Monaſteries are diuided into diuers Stations, according to their greatneſſe: in euery Station is one perpetuall Adminiſtrator, with his ſlaue-Diſciples, which ſucceed him therein. Superiour in the Monaſterie they acknowledge none, but euery one builds as many Cells, or Chambers, as he is able, which they let out to ſtrangers for great gaine, that their Monaſteries may be eſteemed publike Innes, wherein men may quietly lodge or follow their buſineſſe, without any explication of their Sects. They are hired alſo by many to Funerall Solemnities, and to other Rites, in which wilde Beaſts, Birds, or Fiſhes, are made free and let looſe; the ſeuerer Sectaries buying them to this meritorious purpoſe. In our times this Sect much flouriſheth, and hath many Temples erected and repaired; many Eunuches, women, and of the rude vulgar embracing the ſame. There are ſome Profeſſors, called Ciaicum, that is, Faſters, which liue in their owne houſes, all their life abſtayning from Fiſh and Fleſh, and with certaine ſet prayers, worſhip a multitude of Idols at home, but not hard to be hired to theſe deuotions, at other mens houſes. In theſe Monaſteries, women alſo doe liue ſeparated from men, which ſhaue their heads, and reiect Marriage. Theſe Nunnes are there called Nicu. But theſe are but few, in compariſon of the men. One of the learned Sect, famous in the Court, relinquiſhed his place in the Colledge, and ſhaued his haire, wrote many Bookes againſt the Confutians: but being complayned of, the King commanded hee ſhould be puniſhed; which hee puniſhed further on himſelfe, with cutting his owne throat. Whereupon a Libell or Petition was put vp to the King againſt the Magiſtrates, which relinquiſhed Confutius, and became of this Sect: the King (notwithſtanding all the Queenes, Eunuches, and his Kindred, are of this Sect) made anſwere, That ſuch ſhould goe into the Deſarts, and might bee aſhamed of their Robes. Hence followed orders, That whoſoeuer in his Writings mentioned an Idoll, except by way of Confutation, ſhould be vncapable of degrees in Learning; which cauſed much alteration in Religion: for many of this Sect had preuayled much in Court, and elſewhere. Amongſt the reſt, one Thacon was ſo honoured of the chiefe Queene, that ſhee worſhipped daily his garment, becauſe it was not lawfull for himſelfe to enter the Palace, but dealt by Eunuches. One libelled to the King againſt him, but had no anſwere (which is the Kings faſhion, when he denies or diſallowes it) which made him more inſolent. But being ſuſpected for a Libell made againſt the King, and ſome writings, in zeale of his Idols, againſt the King, being found, he was beaten to death, howling in his torments, which before had vanted a Stoicall Apathie. The other Sect-maſters were baniſhed the Court.

Oſciami

§. V.

Of the third Sect Lauzu.

3. Lauzu.

THeir third Sect is named Lauzu, of a certaine Philoſopher which liued in the ſame age with Confutius. They fable, that he was foureſcore yeeres in his mothers womb, before his birth, and therefore call him Lauzu, that is, old Philoſopher. He left no booke written of his Sect, nor ſeemes to haue intended any ſuch inſtitution. But his Sectaries called him after his death Tauſu, and haue fathered on him their opinions, whereof they haue written many elegant bookes. Theſe alſo liue ſingle in their Monaſteries, buying Diſciples, liuing as vile and vicious as the former. They ſhaue not their haire, but weare it like the Lay-men, ſauing that they haue a Hat or Cap of wood. There are others married, which at their owne houſes profeſſe greater auſteritie, and recite ouer ſet prayers. They affirme, That amongſt other Idols, they alſo worſhip the God of Heauen, but corporeall, and to whom their Legends tell, that many indignities haue happened. The King of Heauen which now raigneth, they call Ciam; he which raigned before was Leu, who on a time came riding to the Earth on a white Dragon. Him did Ciam, who was a Diuinor, giue entertainment, and (whiles Leu was at his good cheere) mounted vp his Dragon, which carried him to heauen, & there ſeized on the heauenly Royaltie, and ſhut out Leu, who yet at laſt was admitted to the Lordſhip of a certaine Mountaine in that Kingdom.

Thus

Thus they professe their god to bee a coozener and vsurper. Besides this King of Heauen, they faine another threefold Deitie; one of which they say was the head of their Lauzu sect. They promise to theirs Paradise, which they shall enioy both in bodie and soule, and in their Temples haue pictures of such as haue the Images of such Saints. To obtaine this, they prescribe certaine exercises, which consist in diuers postures of sitting, certaine prayers and medicines, by which they promise to the obseruers through their gods fauour an immortall life in Heauen, at least a longer mortall in the bodie. The Priests of this Sect haue a peculiar Office of casting out Deuils, which they do by two meanes: one is to paint horrible shapes of Deuils in yellow paper with inke, to be fastned on the walls, and then fill the house with such sauage clamors, that themselues might be thought to be Deuils: the other is by certaine prayers or coniurations. They professe also a power of faire weather and foule, and other priuate and publike misfortunes: and some of them seeme to be Witches.

These Priests reside in the Kings Temples of Heauen and Earth, and assist at the Kings sacrifices, whether by himselfe performed, or his Deputie Magistrates, and thereby acquire great authoritie. At these sacrifices, they make musicke of all sorts which China yeeldeth, harsh to Europæan eares. They are called likewise to Funeralls, to which they come in precious Vestments, playing on Musical Instruments. They assist also at the consecrations of new Churches, and in pompous Processions through the streets, which the chiefe Inhabitants at certaine times obserue at the common cost of the Neighbours all about.

This Sect hath a Prelate, called Ciam; which dignitie these thousand yeeres together hath descended by inheritance, and seemes to haue receiued originall from a Southsayer, which liued in a Caue in the Prouince of Quiamsi, where his posteritie still continue, and with them his iuggling sorceries. This their Prelate liues for the most part at Paquin, in estimation with the King; being admitted into the Palace for hallowings, and chasing away ill spirits. Hee is carryed through the Citie in a chayre, otherwise accomplished as the chiefe Magistrates, and receiues a large salarie of the King. I haue heard that in these times the Prelates are so ignorant, that they know not their owne Deuillish charmes and rites. This Prelate hath no iurisdiction ouer any but those of his profession. Many of these doe worke by Alchimy to obtaine the Precepts of longer liuing, of both which their Saints (they say) left certaine rules. There are the three Sects of the Chinois, which are since by their vaine Sectaries so diuersifyed, that they may seeme rather three hundred. Hum-vu that raised his now raigning Family to the Scepter, was himselfe professed Religious in one of these Sects, and authorised all three Sects, admitting onely the first to the Gouernment. Hence it is that One seekes not the ruine of the Other Sect: and the Kings themselues foster all, as they see occasion, building and repairing their Temples. The Queenes are more prone to the Idoll Sects, and bestow much almes on the Priests, maintaining whole Monasteries, to be helped by their prayers. The multitude of Idols is seene not onely in the Temples, but in priuate houses (in a place appointed after the fashion of the Countrey) in the Market-place, in Streets, Ships, publike Palaces: and yet it is certaine that few beleeue their Legends, but thinke if these things do them no good, they yet will doe them no harme. The wisest in these times thinke, that all these three Sects may concurre and bee all obserued together, and esteeme varietie most acceptable. From this hotchpotch, vniting and separating, perhaps haue risen those confused and various reports of these confusions and varieties of rites: wherein if any haue like pleasure in varietie, and be wearie of hearing Riccius and Trigautius, the latest spectators, I will not defraud them of those things, which out of former Authors I had more confusedly before gathered.

They haue (if Mendoza be not mendax) [m] many Monasteries of foure differing orders of Religion, distinguished by the seuerall colours of their habit, black, yellow, white, and russet. These foure Orders are said to haue their Generalls (whom they call Tricon) which reside in Paquin. These ordaine Prouincials, who againe haue subordinated to them the Priors of seuerall Houses or Colledges, in those their houses acknowledged chiefe. The Generall is clothed with silke in his owne colour, and is carryed on mens shoulders in an Ivorie chaire, by foure or six men of his habit. They liue partly of reuenues giuen them by the King, & partly by begging: which when they do, they carry in their hands a certaine thing wherein are prayers written, whereon the almes are laid, and the giuer thereby cleered (of his money, I should haue said) of his sinne. They are [n] shauen, vse beades, eate together, and haue their Cells, assist at burialls, arise two houres before day to pray vnto the Heauen and Sinquian, who (they say) was the inuenter of that their manner of life, and became a Saint, in which their deuotion they continue vntill breake of day, singing and ringing of bells. They may not marry in the time of their Monkish deuotion, but they may (acquainting the Generalls therewith) at there pleasure relinquish their vow. The eldest sonnes may not enter into Religion, because they are bound to sustaine their aged Parents. At the admittance admittance of any is a great feast, made by their friends. At the launching of any ship, they dedicate the same to the Moone, or some Idoll: and besides, there resort thither these Monkes, to make sacrifices in the poope, and reuerence the Deuill, whom they paint in the fore-castle, that he may doe them no harme. Else would shee make an vnfortunate voyage. The people weare long haire, in combing whereof they are womanishly curious, these hoping by their locks to be carryed into Heauen; the other, professing a state of greater perfection, refuse any such helpe. There be of their religious more austere, [o] which liue (in desarts and solitary places) the liues of Hermites, with great abstinence and austeritie of life.

[o] Iacob. Anton. 1603. Adm. Reg. Sinensis.

Nancan [p] is a Citie at the foot of Mount Liu, on which are many Anchorets, which haue each a house by himselfe, and there exercise themselues in voluntary chastisements. There are said to be as many of those houses on this Hill, as are dayes in the yeere: they obserue it as a prodigie, that when it is elsewhere cleere sun-shine, there it is cloudie and mistie alway, so that the Hill cannot be seene from a Lake neere it, which Lake also deserues mention, being great and as farre as the eye can discerne, crowned with innumerable Townes, Castles, and Habitations.

[p] Ricius, l. 3. c. 9 Anchorets.

They haue Hils consecrated to Idols, whither they resort in heapes on pilgrimage; hoping hereby to merit pardon of their sinnes, and that after their death they shall be borne againe more noble and wealthy. Some of these will not kill any liuing creatures, especially such as are tame, in regard of this their Pythagorean opinion of the [q] transanimation or passage of soules into beasts. The Iesuites conuerted one man neere vnto Nanquin, which had thirtie yeeres together obserued a fast, not strange among the Chinois, neuer eating flesh or fish, and on other things feeding temperately. Vsurers are punished in China, with the losse of that money so imployed. Their fast is not a totall abstinence, but from flesh and fish.

Of their Priests is before shewed, that they haue both secular and regular: [r] the one weareth long hayre and black clothes, and hath priuate habitation; the other liue in Couents and are shauen. Neither may marrie, though both doe (and not here alone) farre worse. They much commend in their bookes [s] the consideration and examination of a mans selfe, and therefore doe esteeme highly of them which sequester themselues from humane societie to diuine contemplation, that (as they say) they may restore themselues to themselues, and to that pristine state, wherein the Heauen created them; And therefore haue not onely Colledges of learned men, who leauing the affaires of state and secular distractions, doe in priuate Villages liue together, obseruing these contemplations with mutuall conferences: but euen women also haue their Nunneries, & liue a Monastical life vnder their Abbesses after their manner: although euen such as are marryed liue closely enough; their feet to this end so straitly swadled in their infancie, that they grow but little (and to haue little feet is with them great commendation) whereby they cannot but lamely walke abroad. And if any widdow refuse a second marriage, shee obtaineth hereby much praise and many priuiledges. Their Bonzy are so little accounted of, that the Iesuites wearing their habit were little set by, and therefore taking the Mandarine-habit, were exceedingly honoured of all sorts, as professors of learning.

§. VI.

Of their superstitious Diuinations, and curious Arts.

OF their Mechanicall and Liberall Arts wee haue alreadie spoken, the same in this Suruey of their Religion, you may expect of those Arts which are curious and superstitious. None of which is so generall, as their vaine obseruations of luckie and vnluckie dayes and houres, by which they measure the oportunities of all their actions. To this end they haue Almanacks or Kalenders yeerely set forth by the Kings Astrologers with publike authoritie, in such numbers that no house wants them. Somewhat of these hath beene spoken alreadie. Trigautius writeth at large of their mysteries in this kind, comparing the differences thereof with outs in Europe. They follow certaine rules, the first Authors whereof liued 2970. yeeres since in the reigne of Yao (whom they still obserue as a Saint) who set two brethren on worke to finde out the celestiall motions. Their names were Hi and Ho: these wrote certaine rules, which two thousand yeeres after were burned by Xi Hoam, and not a booke left that was knowne, till some Copies were againe discouered in the time of King Yuen, aboue an hundred yeeres after. These rules haue beene fiue and fiftie times examined, and as it were new reuised and allowed, the last of which was three hundred yeeres since, by Co xeu kim, while the Tartars reigned. As for the Theoricall Astrologie they know it not, and in the practicall they are not so practised, but their rules deceiue them.

them. So it hapned about fiue yeeres since, they foretelling an Eclipse falsly, for which One libelled against them to the King, and they confessed the errour, but blamed their grounds: whereupon consultation was had, and the Iesuites employed by publike Commission to ioyne with their Mathematicians in reforming their Kalender: which they intended to doe by bringing in the Europæan. This, and the Kings grant of an Idoll-Temple to them a little before 1610. for the buriall of Ricius, wanne the Iesuites great respect in this Kingdome. Their yeere they reckon by the Moone like the Hebrewes. Their day they account from mid-night to mid-night, diuiding it into twelue equall spaces. But that which I intend, is not to shew their want of Art so much, as their wanton Art, and artlesse trifling in superstitions without ground. As, such a Day is fit for sacrifice, for bankets, for a iourney, a suite to the King, building of a house, or the like, what is to be done or not, wherein they are not more ridiculous prescribers, then the people superstitious obseruers. Ric. l.1.c.9.

There are others also that get their liuing by this profession, appointing daies and houres: many deferring their necessary affaires till the Wizard findes out a luckie houre for the beginning, and then wil he begin, although the blustering windes, lowring skie, and all the elements forbid him, and force him to a present retrait. This hath beene a generall folly in the East, g and thence hath infected the West also, but China runs mad thereof. The like care they vse in calculating Natiuities, an Art professed by many: as is that also by the course of Stars, or certaine superstitious numbers, to foretell things. Physiognomie and Palmistrie, and Diuination by Dreames, by words in communication, by casuall gestures, auguries, sunne-beames, and innumerable other fancies, haue conspired to this phrensie: wherein it is hard to iudge whether is more absurd, the fraudulent Impostor impudently promising without feare or wit, what the impotent Consultor with a witlesse feare, makes credible by his credulitie: Many of them sickning and sometimes almost dying, vpon meere conceit of sickneese on such a day, foretold. Many also consult with Deuills and familiar Spirits (of which before h is mentioned) and diuers wayes receiue his Oracles, by the voyces of Infants, of Beasts, of Men distracted, or otherwise. Besides these fooleries, they haue one more peculiar namely, in choosing a plot of ground for priuate or publike buildings; which plot they compare with the head, tayle, feet, of certaine imagined Dragons, which they thinke liue vnder the earth, from whence all aduerse or prosperous fortunes befall Families, Cities, Prouinces, and the whole Kingdome. And therefore many chiefe men spend their wits in this so profound a science, and are employed, especially in publike structures. As Astrologers view the Heauens, so these the Earth, and by the Mountaines, Riuers, Site, foretell the Fates: and make good or bad fortune to depend on the placing of the doore, window, or other part of the house, on this or that side, or site. It is a world to see what a world of these Impostors their are in this their world (so they call the Kingdome) of China, which gull the learned, the Magistrates, and the King himselfe.

Strange is their Diuination by Idolatrous Lots, which some tell on this manner. They haue their Idols in their houses, with which they consult, sometimes praying, and sometimes beating them, and then setting them vp againe with renewed incense and flatteries, and with (as they see occasion) redoubled stripes, being cruell or propitious (as Tertullian obiected to the Romanes) to their Gods. And in a word, the Mandarines are the Gods (or Deuils rather) whom the people must feare, as dreading blowes from them, which they themselues at pleasure can and doe inflict on the other. This God-beating they vse with Lots. i For when any is to vndertake a iourney or any matter of weight, as buying, lending, marrying, &c. They haue two stickes flat on the one side, otherwise round, as bigge as a Walnut, tyed together with a small thread, which after many sweet Oraisons they hurle before the Idoll. If one or both of them fall with the flat side vpwards, they reuile the Image with the most opprobrious termes: and then hauing thus disgorged their choller, they againe craue pardon with many fawning promises. But if at the second cast they find no better fortune, they passe from words to blowes, the deafe God is hurled on the earth into the water or fire, till at last with his vicissitude of sweet and sowre handling, and their importunate reiterations of their casts, he must needs at last relent, and is therefore feasted with Hens, Musicke, and (if it be of very great moment, which they consult about) with a Hogs-head boyled, dressed with Hearbes and Flowers, and a pot of their Wine. They obserue another kind of Lots, with stickes put together in a pot, and drawing out the same, consult, with a certaine booke they haue, of their destinie.

Mongst other their curious Arts, there are two in chiefe request, Alchimie, to bring siluer out of other metalls, and the other to procure a long or endlesse life. They fable that some of the Ancients, which they hold in estimation of Saints, diuised these Arts, and after ascended bodie and soule into Heauen. Many volumes are written in both these Arts, and many printed. Both seeme to haue like successe, the one lessening their siluer for siluer, the other ſhortning their liues to lengthen them. The Alchymiſt paſſeth his dayes, and euaporateth his ſubſtance in ſmoake, either aduanced by great labour and coſt to beggerie; or if hee attaine to any ſiluered ſiluer-ſcience, it furthers him in deceiuing himſelfe and others. One only Alchymiſt (ſaid a madde lad of this generation, that had melted a faire houſe in theſe furnaces) hath beene in this kind happy, that can turne ſo little Lead into ſo much Gold. But theſe Chinois want ſuch ſanctified fires, howſoeuer herein alſo beſides their exceeding diligence, many of them ſeeke to better their attempt by many yeeres faſtings. No people more bewitched with this (though vniuerſall) foolery; no harmes, fraudes, loſſes, teaching them more diſcretion. And yet greater madneſſe may be aſcribed to the other, who hauing obtained ſome proſperous condition of life, thinke nothing wanting to felicitie but continuance. Few there are in this City Pequin (ſaith Ricius) of the Magiſtrates, Eunuchs, and chiefe men, which are not ſicke of this diſeaſe, none being warned by the ordinary deaths of Maſters and Schollers in this kinde. I haue read in the Chineſe Chronicles of one of their ancient Kings, who by theſe Impoſtors helpe had procured a potion, which hee thought would make him immortall. A friend of his ſought to diſſwade him from this vanitie, but in vaine: whereupon watching opportunitie, he catched the cup and dranke vp the potion. The King in his furie offered to kill him; whereat the other, How canſt thou kill mee (ſaid hee) whom this cup hath made immortall? and if thou canſt, then haue I freed thee of this error. The King reſted ſatiſfied; but not ſo this people, which though many write againſt both theſe profeſſions, doe now more then euer practiſe them. Trigautius writes of one man which had obtained the ſecond Degree of learning, which by this profeſſion had gotten much wealth. He had bought many children and killed them ſecretly, compoſing his Recipes of their bloud, as if hee could adde life to others which he had taken from them. This came to light by one of his Concubines, and he apprehended and thereof conuicted. A new puniſhment was inuented for this new inuention, that hee ſhould be bound to a ſtake, and three thouſand pieces of his fleſh ſhould be cut from him with a Raſor, the vitall parts being ſpared as much as might be. This ſentence being ſent to the King, was by him confirmed.

A pleaſant hiſtorie.

There be which fable themſelues to be very old, vnto whom is great recourſe of Diſciples, as to ſome heauenly Prophets, to learne leſſons of long liuing. They ſuppoſed the Ieſuites (whom they tooke to be of great learning) did not truely tell them their Age, but ſuſpected, that they had alreadie liued ſome Ages, and knew the meanes of liuing euer, and for that cauſe abſtained from marriage.

The Spaniards of the Philippina's being feaſted by the Viceroy, two Captaines, appointed Stwards, or Feaſt-maſters, before they ſate downe, did take each of them a cup full of liquor in his hand, and went together, whereas they might diſcouer the Heauen, and offered the ſame to the Sunne, adding many prayers, that the comming of their gueſts might bee for good, and then did fill out the wine, making a great curteſie. And then proceeded they to their feaſt. The Chinois [k] in the Eclipſe of the Sun and Moone, are afraid that the Prince of Heauen will deſtroy them, and pacifie him with many ſacrifices and prayers; they hold the Sunne and Moone, Man and Wife.

§. VII.

Of the Marriages, Concubines, and other vices and errours of the CHINOIS.

THeir Marriages and Eſpouſals want not many Ceremonies. Both are done in their youth. They like equalitie of age and ſtate betwixt the parties. The Parents make the contracts, not asking their Childrens conſent, neither doe they euer refuſe. As for their Concubines, euery one keepes according to his pleaſure and abilitie, reſpecting in them eſpecially their beautie, and buy them for the moſt part, the price being a hundreth Crownes or leſſe. The common people alſo buy their wiues, and ſell them at their pleaſure. The Magiſtrates marry in their owne ranke their legitimate wife. This chiefe wife only ſits at table with her husband, the reſt (except in the Royall Families) are as ſeruants, which in the preſence of either of the former may not ſit, but ſtand. Their children alſo call that wife their Mother, not their naturall Parent, and for her Funeralls alone ſolemnize their three yeeres mourning, or leaue their Office, not for their owne Mother. In their marriages they are very ſcrupulous that the wife haue not the ſame ſurname with her husband, although there be no kindred betwixt them, and the ſurnames in all China are not a thouſand (as before is ſaid) neither may any deuiſe new, but muſt haue one, & that the ſame which their Anceſtors by the fathers ſide (not the mothers) had, except he be adopted into another Family.

They

Digitized by Google

They heed not degrees of affinitie or consanguinitie, so this surname differ, and therefore marry in the Mothers kindred be it almost neuer so neere. The Bride brings no portion to her husband, and yet the first day she comes to his house, she hath to attend abundance of houshold-furniture, euen the streets being therewith filled, all at the husbands cost, who some months before sends her a great summe of mony to this purpose. There are many, which being poore doe for lust make themselues slaues to rich men, that so they may be furnished with a wife amongst his women-slaues, whereby also the children become perpetually bond. Others buy their wiues, but seeing their increasing family grow chargeable beyond their abilitie, sell their young sonnes and daughters at the same price they would sell a swine or beast, or some two or three duckats more, yea though they bee not by dearth compelled thereto. Thus this Kingdome abounds with seruants, not taken in the warres, but home-bred Citizens.

The Spaniards also and Portugalls carry many of them out of the Countrey into euerlasting seruitude. But this child-sale is the more tolerable, because the estate of seruants is there more easie then in other Nations, & the number of the poore which liue hardly is exceeding, and they may redeeme themselues at the same price if they be able to giue it. And lastly, a greater villiny in some Prouinces vsed, makes this seeme the lesse, which is to murther those their children (especially of the female sexe) which they thinke they cannot bring vp: which fact also is with them the lesse heynous, not by preuenting that sale and transportation of their children (an impious pietie) but by a pious impietie, that opinion of transanimation or passage of soules into other bodies, thinking that by this vntimely and sudden murther, they may haue more timely and quick passage, and be borne againe in richer Families. And therefore they seeke no corners, but execute their bloudy parricides publikely. Yea, greater abominations then these are here perpetrated vpon as sleight grounds, many laying violent hands vpon themselues, both in desperation and impatience, and in malice also, so to hurt their enemies. Thus, they say, many thousands both of men and women euery yeere drowne themselues in Riuers, hang themselues, sometimes at their aduersaries doors, or poyson themselues; whereupon their kindred complaine to the Magistrates on those, which gaue cause or occasion to these extremities, which sometimes are seuere in these cases to the accused. It may be reckoned among their cruelties (which in the Northerne Prouinces is practised) the gelding of their Male-Infants, so to make them capable of the Kings seruice, none other being admitted to attend or speake with Him, and the whole sway of the Kingdome, being in great part in these vn-manly hands, of ten thousand scarce any but Plebeian, illiterate, seruile in condition and conditions, impotent, impudent, of weake both conceit and performance. Neither is this a little cruelty, that the Magistrates are thought to kill as many against the Lawes, as the Lawes themselues by execution of iudiciall sentence, by their custome of beating men with Canes, in manner at their owne lust. This makes men that they are not Masters of their owne, but are in continuall feare to be vndone by calumny and tyranny. The Choinois are also a fraudulent and treacherous people.

Metempsychosis.

They contemne strangers, scorning to learne any thing out of their bookes, as being vnlearned and rude: yea all the Characters whereby they expresse the name of strangers, are compounded of such as signifie beasts, hauing indeed a beastly and diabolicall conceit of them. When Embassadors come to them from Neighbour-Countries to pay their tributes, or for other busines, they are very suspiciously intreated, entertained as captiues all the time of their iourney, not permitting them to see any thing. They shut them vp (like beasts in stables) within their Palaces, neuer admit them the Kings presence, themselues dealing with few of the Magistrates, and all their businesse being ordered by Officers thereto assigned. Nor may any native trauell out of the Kingdome without diuers cauteles. Petreius the Portugall Embassador died in prison at Canton. They will not suffer strangers which haue staid long in China (in some places the custome is nine yeeres) to returne from thence. Their Souldiers are base, meere mercinaries, not regarding honor where they are not rewarded with honor, alike vile in estimation and action, the most part slaues, thereto by their owne or parents wickednesse legally condemned; except at times of employment, being Porters, Horse-keepers, or of like seruile drudgerie. Their Captaines and Commanders haue some shaddow of dignitie, but the substance we haue before rightly attributed to them, who can punish these as the meanest. Long nayles are (some say) accounted a Gentlemanly signe, as of hands not employed to labour. Their exceeding pride (in which they are not exceeded of any) appeared in this, that they thought the Iesuites must needs attaine the Popedome at their returne into Europe, as hauing so much bettered their learning by the Chinois Authors. But These haue since euen by the opinion of learning, obtained a better estimation.

In the later [1] Epiſtles from China, dated 1606. and 1607. little is there to further this Hiſtorie. As for their tales of Miracles in thoſe and the Iaponian Epiſtles (bearing the ſame date) wherein Ignatius Loyolaes picture is made a miracle-worker; I hold them not worth relation. The Chinois beleeue (as is there reported) that there is a certaine ſpirit which hath power of the life and death of children that are ſicke of the meaſells, and therefore when their children are ſicke thereof, they hang a glaſſe before the dore of the chamber where he lyeth, that the ſpirit comming to deſtroy the child, ſeeing his Image in that glaſſe, ſhould not dare to approach neerer. Their Baptiſme cured the diſeaſe: a new remedy for meaſels, a new vertue of Baptiſme.

Their order for the Poore may be a patterne vnto Chriſtians: they ſuffer none to beg, nor to be idle. If any be blinde, yet hee is ſet to ſome worke, as grinding in a Querne, or ſuch like; of which ſort (after [m] Boterus account) there are foure thouſand blind perſons that grinde ſtill in Canton alone. If they be impotent, that they cannot worke, their friends (if they be able) muſt prouide for them; if not, they are kept in Hoſpitalls, out of which they neuer paſſe, and haue all neceſſaries prouided them by Officers appointed in euery Citie to this buſineſſe. Common women are confined to certaine places, and may not goe abroad, nor dwell in the Citie, for infecting others, and are accountable to a certaine Officer of their euill earnings, which when they are old, is beſtowed on their maintenance. Their dwelling is in the Suburbs of Cities.

They are great Sodomites, although they haue many Wiues and Concubines, which they buy of their Parents, or in the Markets, in like manner as the Turkes. They are not by Law preſcribed to obſerue this or that Sect: and therefore they haue many Sects, ſome worſhipping the Sunne, ſome the Moone, ſome nothing: and all, what themſelues beſt like, as is in part before ſhewed. They take their oathes (as here by kiſſing a booke) with thrice drinking of a certaine liquor. Antony Dalmeida [n] ſaith, that in saying Maſſe, they were ſo thronged with the people, that they were almoſt trodden vnder foot. §. VIII.

Of their Temples.

Trigautius.

IT followeth now that we ſpeake of places Religious amongſt the Chinois, of which their Temples challenge the firſt place, their Sepulchres the next. Of their Monaſteries we haue already ſpoken. Their Temples, as their other ſtructures, come ſhort of the Europæan magnificence: yet are they many, and that about Paquin it ſelfe. For howſoeuer the King hath little deuotion to any Religion at all, yet his Mother is verie zealous, repaires and builds Temples in diuers places, and in one Monaſterie ſuſtaineth aboue a thouſand Miniſters of her Holies: ſo that this kind elſewhere contemned, is in the Royall Citie better reſpected. Hence they haue a Prouerbe, In the Citie Royall, Ho-xam (ſo they call their Prieſts) in the Prouinces the Magiſtrates are worſhipped. We haue mentioned the Temples dedicated to men of Merit and publike Benefactors. Such an one is in the confines of the Prouince of Conton erected to the Honor of One, which for the benefit of Trauellers made a paſſage ouer a ſteepe and vnpaſſable hill, diuiding the rocks, as Annibal did the Alpes; where are ſuch Precipices, as cannot but ſtrike horror to the paſſenger: & yet they are ſafely carried, without deſcending from their chayres, borne on men ſhoulders. On the top of this hil is a Temple built to the Colaus, that made this way, with his Image therein and odours burning perpetually: the walls and floore thereof adorned with many Poems and inſcriptions to his praiſe, cut in Marble. This Mountaine is one daies iourney, ſtanding betweene betweene two great Riuers, whereby there is continuall traffique betwixt this of Canton and the other Prouinces, there being aboue three thousand Porters, or bearers of Burthens, which carrie those wares, besides Beasts of carriage, and that with great fidelitie; a rare vertue in other parts of China. When they haue passed out of Canton, ouer this Mountaine, they come into the Riuer, which is called the Sonne of the Sea for the largenesse, but in Winter (which is their driest season) full of shoalds, the cause of much shipwrackes. But lest my Relation stay, or bee wracked in these shoalds: let vs take view of that which the King bestowed on the Iesuites for their Residence, and for the Buriall of Matthæus Riccius, to whom our China Relations are so much indebted.

It was aboue a quarter of a myle from one of the Citie gates, built by an Eunuch, who now was condemned for some crime, and left his Palace which he had here builded, with the expence of aboue 14000. duckats (which in China is a great summe, in that cheapenesse of all things, far beyond Europæan computation) should fal into the hands of spoilers (the goods of Eunuchs in this kingdome vsually becomming his, which first can catch them) he consecrated his Palace, and made it a Temple, maintaining therein one Priest. Such Palaces many of the Magistrates haue neere to the Cities, as retyring places and Tusculanes for their Muses. The portraiture of this whole House, with the Garden, and other appurtenances, Trigantius hath set forth in picture; being after the China building, with the doore Southwards, and so running a great length into the North, with foure great Halls one beyond another; in the middle parts, and on each side, Chambers and other roomes; beyond all the Garden, the pillars of Timber bearing vp the roofe; the walls and pauement of Bricke. The outmost of these Halls was conuerted into a Temple or Idoll-Chappell, in which was a great Altar of Stone and Bricke, cunningly fretted, painted red (a colour forbidden to priuate houses) and vpon the midst thereof sate a huge Monster of Earth, gilded from top to toe, of massie quantitie. The Chinois call it Ti cam, the God (as they fable) of the Earth and Treasures, as Pluto in the Poets. In his hand was a Scepter, on his head a Crowne, not vnlike those vsed by our Kings. On each side stood foure ministers of the same matter: on both sides of the roome two great Tables, and on each of them fiue Kings, or great Officers of Hell. On both the wals were painted the same Officers, or Iudges, sitting on their seuerall Tribunals, giuing sentence on wicked men, euery one according to the condition of his Court. Before them stood many Deuils, more terribly formed then with vs. The paines of Hell also were so deciphered, that could not but strike terror to the beholders; some rosted in yron beds, some fried in scalding oyle, some cut in pieces, or diuided in the middle, or torne of dogs, or otherwise tortured. The first of those Iudges examined the faults, which they said hee saw in a certaine glasse. Those which he found guiltie, were sent to the other Iudges, according to the qualitie of the crimes. One of these was Iudge in cases of Transmigration, which sent the soules of cruell men into Tygres; of vncleane persons, into Swine, and the like: or if their crimes were smaller, into the poorer sort. There was a great Ballance; in one of the Scales, a man laden with sinnes; in the other, one of their hypocriticall prayer-bookes, which counterpoysed the other Scale, and freed the sinner. There ran through the midst of Hell a discoloured Riuer, which carried away many. For ouer it were two Bridges, one of Gold, the other of Siluer; by which, those passed ouer, which had been deuout Idolaters, carrying in their hands ensignes of the same: these were guided by the Priests, which led them through the midst of Hell to faire and pleasant Groues and Gardens. In another part were painted the dungeons of Hell, with horrible Serpents, flames, Deuills. To the brazen gates thereof there comes an Idolatrous Priest, which in despight of all the Deuils deliuers his mother from those flames. There was no infernall punishment painted, but had such an inscription: Hee which shall pray to such an Idoll a thousand times shall be free from this punishment. The Iesuites beat the earthen Idols to dust, and burnt those of wood, wherein the Chinese Conuerts were the forwarder, because the Countrey custome is to fill the hollow bellies of these Images with deuoted money or iewells. They demolished the Altar and plastred ouer the pictures, and in place thereof erected the Image of Christ. No priuate man may erect a Temple by Law, which yet the mightie Eunuchs transgresse.

A little before this exchange of Idols into Images (after their distinction, and a • silly one it is) some tooke their last leaue of Ti cam: one kneeling and bidding it farewell; another chafing, said; Thou masse of dung and earth, if thou hast no power to maintaine the Temple and thy selfe, what helpe may I looke for at thy hand? neither art thou worthy of any honour at mine. Others said, that this had sometime borne the name of some other Idoll, and therefore was auenged for that change.

o The Iesuites say, that the Chinois maintaine their Idolatries, saying they worship not the Idoll, but God thereby represented, &c.

At Xauceum is the Temple of Nanhoa vpon a goodly Hill, and nigh to it a Monasterie, in which are maintained one thousand of their Religious Regulars, the lands adioyning being theirs. They tell that about eight hundred yeeres since liued one Lusu in great austeritie, alwayes alwayes girded with a chaine next to his flesh, which vsed to grinde as much rice as might serue one thousand of them a day. When the wormes (by reason of that chaine breeding in his flesh) fell off, he would place it there againe, and aske if it had nothing to gnaw. His carkasse is still kept there, to which are pilgrimages out of all the Kingdome; and this Temple built to his honor. The Regulars are diuided into twelue stations, and each hath a Superior, besides One supreme ouer all the rest. They professed chastitie, but their house was both a stewes for whoredome, and a denne of theeues and robbers. Here were many huge Idols of brasse, and other metall, and of wood, gilded; in one station fiue hundred. They had diuers steeples and bells in them, one so great, that they had neuer seene so great a bell in Europe.

The Corpse of Lusu was shewed them, which they worship (but many doubt whether it be the true, for could it escape the wormes, which had seised on it aliue?) kept in the midst of the Temple in a high place, where hang fiftie lamps, which burne at appointed times. The Abbot of this Monasterie confessed that in ancient times the Chinois had worshipped no Idols, but that they were politically appointed by Magistrates, lest the vulgar should bee without all Religion. They haue their Chappels in great mens houses. But we will take view onely of the Kings Temple at Nanquin, and so end. This is a Royall one indeed for greatnesse and statelinesse. It is built in a groue of Pine-trees neere the Citie, which is compast with a wall twelue miles in circuit. The Temple after the China manner of building is most of timber, the wals of brick; diuided into fiue Iles with rowes of pillars on both sides, which are of round timber as big as two men can fathome: the roofe is carued and guilded verie faire, hauing lost nothing of the beautie, though not vsed by the Kings for sacrifice in this their two hundred yeeres absence. In the midst is an eminent place of precious Marble, in which are two Thrones of Marble, one for the King to sacrifice in, the other left emptie for him to whom he doth sacrifice. The Cloisters without the Temple are beautified with elegant turnings, and all the windowes netted with yron to keepe out birds, which is vsed also in all the Palace. All the doores of the Temple are couered with plates of brasse guilded and richly carued: without the Temple are many Altars of red Marble which represented the Sun, Moone, Starres, and China Mountaines; whereby they inferre that the god there worshipped created all things, which are therefore set without the Temple as acknowledged not to be gods. No man vnder grieuous penalties may cut a bough off any of the trees in that groue, which makes them great and old. About the Temple are many Cels, which were baths in which the Kings and Ministers washed before sacrifice. There Altars are of the Dutch fashion that one may goe round about them.

Of their Funeralls.

THe Chinois are very superstitiously conceited of Death, and are exceeding loth to haue any die in their house. Linschoten writeth, That when a man lies on his deathbed, they present vnto him the picture of the Deuill, with the Sunne in his right hand, and a Poniard in his left, bidding the sicke man looke well on him, that hee may be his friend in the other world. How euer the sicke be visited, let vs now performe our last office to these Chinois, and follow them to their graues.

Linschot. l. 1. c. 23.

Many are the Ceremonies which they there obserue in Funerals. As they honor their parents in their life time (being otherwise lyable to grieuous punishments p, yea some of their chiefest Mandarines will sue for the Kings licence, to leaue their publike function, to giue priuat and more diligent attendance to their parents:) so, after their death, they mourne three yeeres in white Hats and Garments, although they beare the highest Magistracies in the Kingdome, as the Colai, &c. the militarie Magistrates excepted. The first moneths they gird vnto them a rough Vesture with a rope, like the bare-foot Friers. This is not onely obserued of the meaner sort; but the mightiest Mandarines, after newes of their fathers death, leaue their function, and in their priuate houses bewaile their losse. The wealthier sort keepe them aboue ground two or three yeeres, q in a Parlour, fitted for that purpose, whither they daily resort vnto them, to salute them, and to burne Incense, and set meates before them. Sometimes also the Bonzij, or Priests, resort thither with their Dirges and holy things. Their wiues, children, and neighbours come likewise to bewaile them, being admonished of the death by the sonne or neerest of the kindred, in a solemne Libell mournfully composed. The Hall is spread with white Clothes or Matts: in the midst thereof is an Altar, and thereon the Coffin and Image of the dead. To that Hall, within foure or fiue dayes, all the kindred come in mourning attyre, one after another, euery houre of the day, and burne odours, and set two Wax-lights to the dead, making foure bowings and kneelings, after their fashion, before deliuered; the sonne, meane while, standing by, and modestly lamenting. Behind the Coffin are the women of the house hid, behind a curtaine, in mourning weedes, and howling behauiour. They burne Paper and white Silkes, so thinking to minister apparell to the dead. They will not vse their wonted lodging, diet, and delights; but lye on Straw Mattresses, on the bare ground, neere the Coffin; eate no Flesh, or Dainties; drinke no Wine, Bathe not, companie not with their Wiues, come not at Feasts, nor for certaine moneths space, abroad; alwaies remitting more of this austeritie, as the three yeares grow neere an end. They vse not the same apparell, house-hold furniture, salutations. They colour part of the Paper in which they write, with another colour. They obserue not their wonted proper names, but call themselues otherwise, as Disobedient, or such like. Musick is banished; their dyet is hard. When the corpes is to bee buried, all the kindred come together, being to-inuited with another Libell, in mourning habit. The pompe is in manner of Procession: diuers Statues of Men and Women, Elephants, Tygres, and Lyons, all of Paper, diuers-coloured, and gilded, goe before, which at the graue are burned. A long rancke of Priests also attend, which performe many Rites by the way, pattering their prayers, and playing on Tymbrels, Pipes, Cymballs, Bells, and other Instruments. Likewise, huge Censers of Bell-metall are carried on mens shoulders. Then followes the Coffin, adorned sumptuously, carried of forty or fifty Bearers, vnder a great Canopie of Silke. The children come after on foot, leaning on their staues, as fainting: Then then the women, vnseene, vnder a white curtaine; and then other women, further in bloud, carryed in mourning chayres. They assemble as many Priests as they can, which on musicall Instruments, and with their voyces, tune their mournefull Ditties. The place whither the corps is carried, is adorned with diuers Images. The Coffin is very large, the prouiding of which they commit not to their heire, but themselues in their liues take order for the same, bestowing great care and cost for the best wood and workemanship which they are able to procure, therein spending sometime seuenty, eighty, or a hundred ducats. They hold it vnfortunate to die before they haue prouided the same. They are no lesse curious for the place of their buriall, thinking that hereon dependeth the fortune of their posterity, and therefore sometime spend a whole yeare in consultation, whether it shall bee toward the North, or some other Region. Their Sepulchers are in the fields on some hillocke neere the Cities, each family by themselues where they fortifie them, and oft-times resort thither to performe their obsequies. To bee buried within the walls were a thing most miserable, neuer to bee forgotten. At these Sepulchres they haue their yeerely meetings, where their kindred burne odours and make a Funerall banket. Their Sepulchres are very great of marble, with the images of diuers beasts and men standing by. Their Epitaphs also in marble, magnificent, with elegant inscriptions of their exploits. For some time after they will eate no flesh, in regard of that passage of soules before spoken of. This opinion is of more authoritie and credite with them then that of Hell or Heauen, although (as is said) their Bookes and Pictures depaint horrible things in that kinde. Others [r] adde, that as soone as one is dead, they wash him, and clothing him in his best apparell, all perfumed, set him in his best chaire, and there all his neerest kindred kneeling before him, take their leaue with teares. They Coffin him (as before) and place him in a roome richly furnished; and couer him with a sheet, in which they paint his portraiture. A table standeth by full of Viands, with Candles on it. Thus doe they keepe him fifteene dayes, euery night the Priests executing their superstitious exequies, burning and shaking certaine papers before Him. By the Sepulchre they plant a Pine tree, which is sacred, and may not be cut downe, nor conuerted to any vse, if the weather ouerthrow it. Their funerall pompe is in manner of Procession, with Candles carried in their hand. They burne vpon the graue many papers, painted with men, cattell, and prouision for his vse in the next world. It is now time to leaue them quietly resting in their graues: onely a word of their Times reputed holy.

The times religious are the new Moones, and full Moones (as yee haue heard) in which they make great banquets, and then also they muster their Souldiers, who alone may weare weapons is China. They solemnize [s] also their Birth-dayes, whereunto their kindred doe resort of custome with presents, and receiue good cheere. The Kings birth-day is a great festiuall. But [t] New-yeeres day is their principall feast. This is solemnized of all Sects alike the first new Moone, and then againe the first full Moone in the beginning of the yeere: This is their Candlemasse [u] feast, euery man deuising artificiall lanterns of paper, glasse, cloth, the Halls seeming to bee on fire with the multitude of lights; some carrying in the night with great reuels, lights and twisted lanthornes Serpentine fashion, and many deuices are practised of fire-workes with gunpowder. Then they send New-yeeres-gifts to each other, as Mendoza writes. They haue no Sabboth nor weekely solemnity.

Of Strangers, and Forren Religions in China.

OF the Iewes in China wee haue ſpoken already: with their Ethnike rites we haue royled and tyred you. It may haply be ſome refreſhing to looke vpon Sarecenicall or Chriſtian obiects, if it bee but for variety. How inhoſpitall the Chinois are to ſtrangers wee haue in part heard, neither permitting egreſſe to the Natiues, nor ingreſſe to aliens except in three reſpects. The firſt, ſuch as come to paye [a] their annuall tributes. The ſecond, ſuch as pretending honour and tribute come (as wee haue heard) from the Weſt with ſeeming tribute, a colour to their gaine by Merchandiſe. The third, ſuch as in admiration of the Chinian vertues and learning, come thither (as the Queene of Sheba to Salomon) to learne the ſame, which is the Ieſuites pretence: but theſe muſt here fixe their habitation, nor may bee ſuffered to returne; ſuch is their iealouſie, of diſcouering their myſteries to others. And this made the Ieſuites, after ſo long ſtay, free from feare of expulſion, which yet ſince complayne of [y] perſecution. But it may not bee knowne, that they haue any intelligence or commerce with ſtrangers: and therefore the Ieſuites, which haue obtained two ſo great priuiledges, the Eunuchs Palace for their Reſidence, and the imployment in correcting the China Kalender, both by Royall approbation; yet could not obtaine leaue to goe into the Prouince of Canton, though with Mathematicall pretexts for that Kalender-buſineſſe, to obſerue Longitudes and Latitudes of Places, becauſe they were ſaid to bee countreymen to thoſe of Macao. Yea, a Colao, or Counſellor of State, was depriued, for ſending a meſſage to a bordering King; a tempeſt of libelling complaints thundering and ſhowring againſt him therefore. In the bordering Prouinces they ſet narrow watch at Cuſtome-houſes, Bridges, and in the very Riuers, by ſhips of warre thereto appointed. But if they bee once gotten into the inner parts of the Kingdome, there are no ſuch officers, nor Searchers. Neither may any ſtranger paſſe out of the Kingdome, after once entring, without the Kings licence. The Ieſuites ſteale their ingreſſe and egreſſe by meanes of the Portugalls, which had the Towne of Macao aſſigned them by the Chinois for traffique. Theſe come vſually twice a yeare to the chiefe Citie of the Prouince of Canton, which is not called Quantum, or Canton, (the name of the Prouince) but Quam ceu. All the [z] day time they haue free entrance into the Citie about their Merchandiſe, but muſt lye on ſhipboord at night. In the midſt of the Riuer there is a little Iland, and therein a Temple, in which they are allowed their Catholike deuotions. There by Boat did they prouide to ſteale in or out of the Countrey. The Mahumetans that come in by land, if they ſtay nine yeeres (as is obſerued) may neuer returne home againe. Of theſe there are now many thouſand Families in China, diſperſed into moſt of the Prouinces and chiefe Cities. They haue there their Temples very ſumptuous, and their Circumciſion. But as farre as I could euer learne, they neyther teach, nor care to teach others their deuotions, but are vnskilfull of the Saracen Tenets, and are contemned of the Chinois. It ſeemes, that there comming in was in the time that the Tartars raigned here, which ſince haue increaſed, and after ſo long continuance, are not held in ſuſpition, as other ſtrangers. Some ſay, after the fourth generation they are reputed as Natiues: yea, they are admitted to the ſtudies of Learning, Degrees, and Magiſtracie, as well as the Chinois. But moſt of theſe, thus dignified, relinquiſh their former Superſtition, retayning nothing thereof, but abſtinence from Swines fleſh, which rather by Naturne, then for Religion, they abhorre. They differ in countenance from the Chinois. Perera ſaith, hee ſaw at Fuquien certaine Moores, who could ſay little of their Religion, but, Mahomet was a Moore, my father was a Moore, and I am a Moore, with ſome other words of their Alcoran, wherewithall, in abſtinence from Swines fleſh, they liue (ſaith he) vntill the Diuell take them all. He reaſoned with them, becauſe hee had in many Chiniſh Cities ſeene the Reliques of Mahomet kept; and they anſwered, That they came in great ſhips fraught with Merchandize from Paquin-ward, to a Port appointed to them by the King, where they conuerted to their Religion the chiefe Mandarine or Loytia; whereupon the people began to turne Mahumetan. They now waxing bolder, prohibited the eating of Swines fleſh, the peoples chiefe food: who hereby prouoked, complayned of a conſpiracie betwixt theſe Moores and the Loytia, againſt their King. Hereupon hee and the chiefe of them were executed, and the reſt diſperſed into certaine Cities, where they remained ſlaues to the King.

Touching Chriſtians in China, there is not ſo great certaintie. Certaine Mogotes told Riccius of ſome in the Xenſian Prouince, in the North parts of China, at a place called Xucheo, which were white, bearded, vſed Bells, worſhipped Iſa, that is, Ieſus, and Mary, and honored the Crucifix; their Prieſts married, which cured diſeaſes without medicines. quin gaue more full intelligence, that at Caifumfu, and at Lincin, in the Prouince of Sciantum, and in the Prouince of Scianfi, there liued certaine ſtrangers, whoſe anceſters had come out of forraine parts, which worſhipped the Croſſe (which the Chinois expreſſe by the Character of Ten) and made the ſigne thereof with the finger on their meate and drinke. They alſo made the ſame ſigne with inke on the foreheads of their children, to preſerue them from misfortunes. A Ieſuite alſo ſaw, in the hands of an Antiquary, a Bel, with a Church and Croſſe thereon grauen, circumſcribed with Greeke letters. The Iew alſo reported, that thoſe Croſſe-worſhippers had the ſame doctrine in their prayers which the Iewes hold: this the Ieſuites interpreted of the Pſalter common to them both. Hee affirmed that there were many of them in the Northren prouinces, which ſo flouriſhed in letters and armes, that they grew ſuſpicious to the Chinois, which he thought was cauſed by the Saracens ſome ſixty yeere before. The Magiſtrates were ſo incenſed hereby, that they for feare were diſperſed, ſome turning Iewes, ſome Saracens, others Idolaters: and their Temples were alſo conuerted into Idolatrous Temples, one of which he mentioned in his countrey. Euer ſince they hide their profeſſion, and when the Ieſuits ſent one of their Conuerts to make enquiry, hee could learne of none: which they thought proceeded from their feare, taking him for a Spie ſent from the Magiſtrates.

All theſe Sects the Chinois call Hoei, the Iewes diſtinguiſhed by their refuſing to eate the ſinew or leg; the Saracens, Swines fleſh; the Chriſtians by refuſing to feede on round-hooſed beaſts, Aſſes, Horſes, Mules, which all both Chinois, Saracens and Iewes doe there feed on. The Saracens called the Chriſtians alſo Iſai as before; and Terzai, which is a name giuen in Perſia to the Armenian Chriſtians (as an Armenian affirmed to Ricius) whence hee coniectured, that theſe Chriſtians came out of Armenia. And by the report of Haithon the Armenian[a], which ſaith, their King came to the Great Chan of Cathay (which wee haue before obſerued, at leaſt the beſt parts thereof, to be the North parts of China) to perſwade him and his to become Chriſtians; which in great part alſo he affected, beſides other Chriſtians there reported to bee, by Paulus; and thoſe of Sarnau, ſubiect to the Great Chan, mentioned by Vertomannus, which ſeeme to be neere theſe in China. The Malabar[b] Chriſtians haue Chaldee memorialls of China, conuerted by S. Thomas; and their Metropolitan hath his ſtyle of all India and China.

Now, for the later Chriſtianitie there preached by the Ieſuites, their owne Commentaries and annuall Epiſtles are full. Xauerius[c] attempted it often and earneſtly but could neuer obtaine entrance; which by others of that ſocietie was after affected, and with much trouble effected. When the Portugalls came firſt into thoſe parts, the Chinois were ſuſpicious of them, their Ordnance and great ſhippes ſeeming dreadfull. The Saracens told them, they were called Franks (ſo they call all the Europæans, ſince the Expedition of Godfrey of Bullen) which name the Chinois in Canton ſtill giue them, calling them and their Ordnance Falanks (pronouncing l for r, as th for d, p for b) and by relating the Conqueſts of Malacca, and other places in India, brought them into greater iealouſie. Yet couetouſneſſe of gaine opened them a way firſt to merchandiſe in a deſart Iland, called Sancian, ſeauenty myles off in the Sea, and after to a habitation aſſigned them in a Peninſula (part of a greater Iland) neere to China, called of an Idoll Ama, there honored, Amacao, or Amas harbour, ſhortly Macao: which ſince that time hath beene inhabited by people of diuers Nations, together with the Portugalls, and hath become a Citie, with a Biſhops See, and a Colledge of Ieſuites, and a famous Mart of Europæan and Indian commodities. After that they admitted them traffique in the chiefe Citie of Canton, two Gayes ſayling from Macao: whereby they found meanes, by degrees, to bring in firſt Ruggerius, and after Ricius, with other Ieſuites; which inſinuating by gifts and obſequiouſneſſe into the Magiſtrates affections, furthered the ſame by reputation of Sanctitie, and eſpecially of Learning. Many yeeres they ſpent to little purpoſe, till Ricius by his Mathematicke, and the Art of Memorie, in both which the Chinois admired him; then by changing his habit into that of the Learned men in China, profeſſing alſo a maintenance of the Sect of Confutius, which they profeſſed, and confutation of the Idoll Sects; and laſtly, by preſents to the King, hee made way into the Kings Palace & fauour, who alſo beſtowed an Idoll Temple for his [illegible], for the Reſidence of his Societie. Many troubles they encountred meane while, to get & keepe their Reſidences; that inhoſpitall people, ſometimes accuſing them to the Magiſtrats with deuiſed Calumnies, ſometimes tumultuouſly ſtoning their houſes, ſometimes charging them to be the cauſe of Dearth, or that their Idols ſent them not raine; calling them Deuill ſtrangers, fathering on them curious Arts, not only of Alchymie and Long life, which they honour, but others: as that they knew by mens countenance, that they had a precious ſtone in their heads, to I know not what purpoſes; that they plotted deuices againſt the ſtate; & the Crucifix was accuſed alſo, as deuiſed by inchantments to deſtroy the King. Portugalls in all the parts of India, brought theſe of Macao into ſuch feare, that they went about to Compaſſe ſome part of their Towne with a Wall: which the Chinois there dwelling, thinking to be done againſt them, cauſed ſuch an vprore, that they fell together by the eares: and another quarrell happening betweene a Religious and a Secular Prieſt, the Chinois gaue out, that Cayanem the Ieſuite went about to make himſelfe King of China (as one that knew the Countrey, and had bin in both the Royall Cities) with the helpe of the Ieſuites there reſiding, Iapanders, and others. This made the Chinois to flye from Macao, and to divulge ſuch rumors in Canton, that there was a ſudden muſter of ſouldiers through the Prouince, and one thouſand houſes of the chiefe Citie without the Walls pulled downe, one of the Ieſuites Societie apprehended and beaten with Canes to death, and with much adoe, this little adoe was after pacified. And now the Ieſuites thinke themſelues in better caſe then euer, and haue (as they ſay) conuerted fiue thouſand to their Faith in this Kingdome, after thirty yeares labours, having foure or fiue places of Reſidence. And would God, as I profeſſe my ſelfe indebted to them for this Light of Hiſtory, ſo they might haue iuſt cauſe of thankefulneſſe to God and them, for the Chriſtian Light; and that it were not confuſed with ſuch Heatheniſh exchange, of one Image for another, and rather the names, then ſubſtance of deuotion, altered; Beads, Tapers, Single Votaries, Proceſſions, Monaſteries, Altars, Images, hee and ſhe Saints, with other Rites, being there alreadie: and the very art of their Images cauſing an Ethnike adoration (as they tell of a Vice-roy, that would not looke vpon one of them, but in a Chappell, in the higher part of his houſe, ſet on an Altar, with Tapers and Odours dayly burning thereto) and their manner of Preaching being not by Word, ſo much as by Writing; and that not by Authorities of Scripture, but by Arguments of Reaſon, furthered by their owne Philoſophie, and commended by Mathematicall Sciences: ſtrange Ground-workes to Faith and Theologie.

OF THE EAST-INDIES, AND OF THE SEAS AND ILANDS ABOVT ASIA, WITH THEIR RELIGIONS.

CHAP. I.

Of India in Generall, and of the Ancient Rites there obserued.

§. I.

The Limits, and the ancient People and Inuasions of India.

THE name of India, is now applyed to all farre-distant Countries, not in the extreme limits of Asia alone; but euen to whole America, through the error of Columbus and his fellowes; who at their first arriuall in the Westerne world, thought that they had met with Ophir, and the Indian Regions of the East. But the Ancients also comprehended vnder this name a huge Tract of Land, no lesse in the iudgement of Alexanders followers in his Eastern Inuasions, then the third part of the Earth; Ctosias accounted it one halfe of Asia. Yea, a great part of Africa also is comprehended vnder that name. So Turnebus [a] in his Aduersaria, not onely findeth the Barbarians and Parthians, called by that name in Virgil; but Thebes in the higher Egypt, and Ammons Temple in Higinius; and Æthiopia also, as in our discourse [b] thereof will further appeare. But taking India more properly, Dionysius [c] bounds it betweene Caucasus, and the Red-Sea, Indus and Ganges: Ouid likewise in that Verse, Decolor extremo quâ cingitur India Gange.

But Ptolemy [d] and other Geographers, did vsually diuide India by the Riuer Ganges, into two parts, one on this side Ganges, and the other beyond. Although here we finde no lesse difficultie concerning Ganges, which the most, with my selfe, account the same with Guenga, that falleth into the gulfe of Bengala, which they also imagine to be that, which of the Ancients is called Sinus Gangeticus: Others [e] esteeme the Riuer Canton (whereon standeth the supposed Canton, chiefe City of one of the Chinian Prouinces, whereof we haue so lately taken our leaue) to be that Ganges: of which minde are Mercator, Maginus, Gotardus Arthus, and their disciples. M. Paulus [f] diuideth India into three parts, the Lesse, the Greater, which hee calleth Malabar; and Abassia, betwixt them both. Dom. Niger reckoreckoneth g the same number. The Name of India h flowed from the Riuer Indus. Semiramis is reported to inuade India with three millions of foot-men, and 500000. horse, besides counterfeit Elephants, made of the hides of 300000. Oxen, stuffed with hay. Yet Staurobates, at that time the Indian Monarch, brake her Forces, and chased her out of the field.

Megasthenes reckoneth one hundred twentie two Indian Nations. Arrianus in his eight booke makes a large description of this Indian world, saying, That they liued like the Scythians, without Houses, Cities, Temples, in a wandring course with their Tents, on the barke of the Tree Tala, and wild Venison, the skins whereof were there garments. In all India were no seruants, but all free-men. These things were altred by Bacchus or Dionysius, who made an Expedition hither, not so much with Armes as with Arts. He taught them the vse of Wine, Oyle, and Sacrificing: in memorie whereof, Posteritie honoured him for a god. Of this the Poets, and Histories of Alexander, & others, make much mention. So doth Suidas tell of one Brachman, that prescribed the Rites and Lawes of the Brachmanes: Solinus of Hydaspes; and others, of Ganges, Hercules, & the rest, with much vncertaintie. Postellus i strangely conceiteth himselfe, that Abrahams posteritie by Keturah seated themselues in India, and were there knowne by the name of Iewes, before the Iewes in Palestina: that they obserued Circumcision, and dispersed it into Syria, Egypt, Armenia, Colchis, Iberia, Paphlagonia, Chaldea, and India, before Moses led the Israelites out of Egypt: and that the Brachmanes were so called, quasi Abrahmanes, as following the instructions of Abraham. Abraham wee beleeue the Father of the faithfull, but cannot father on him such vnfaithfull and degenerate generations, no more then with the same Postellus wee acknowledge the Turkes the posteritie of the ten Tribes, and the Tartars k to be the remainder of those Turkes, following Cabalisticall coniectures. But that which he speaketh of the name Iewes and Abrachmanes in India, may perhaps arise from a testimony cited out of Megasthenes his Indica, by Clem. l Alex. That all things obserued by Naturall Phylosophers in Greece had beene handled before, partly by the Brachmanes amongst the Indians, partly of those which in Syria are called Iewes: in which testimonie he ioyneth Iewes and Brachmanes in Profession of the same learned Science of Naturall Philosophy. Apuleius m maketh the Brachmans first Founders of the Pythagorean learning: and reporteth further, That at dinner-time the Table was made readie, and the youths from diuers Places and Seruices resorted thither: at which time the Masters questioned with them what good they had done that day: one answereth, Hee had beene a Peace-maker to reduce such & such which were at oddes, to amitie: another had done this or that for his Parents: another had studied or meditated on such a point. Once, he which could not giue good account of his mornings worke, might not be admitted to receiue any dinner-wages.

Strabo in his fifteenth Booke is large in this Indian subiect. Hee reporteth out of Aristobulus, that the Riuer Indus by force of an Earth-quake, changed his channell, thereby a great part of the neighbour Region being turned into a desart. For in this, Indus is like vnto Nilus, in that, without it, the Countrey would be a Wildernesse, and therefore is also worshipped of the Inhabitants. It receiueth fifteene other Riuers into it. Hee mentioneth the Cathei not farre from thence, which after happily gaue name vnto Cathay.

The Indians are of seuen sorts: n The first in estimation, and fewest in number, were their Philosophers. These kept publike Acts once a yeere before the King, & he which in his Obseruations was found three times false, was condemned to perpetuall silence. The second sort were Husband-men, which payd the King (the onely owner of all the Land) a fourth part of the increase. The third, was of Shepheards and Huntsmen, which wandred in Tents, The fourth, Artificers. The fifth, Souldiers. The sixth, Magistrates. The seuenth, Courtiers, and those of his Priuie Councell. If any woman killeth the King in his drunkennesse, shee is rewarded with the marriage of his Sonne and Heire. If any depriue another of a member, besides like for like, he loseth his hand; and, if hee bee an Artificer, his life. They strangle their sacrifice, that it may be so offered whole to their Idols.

Of their Philosophicall or Religious Sects.

o Brachmanes, Vid. Strab. cl. Durct. Heur; &c.

OF their Philosophers, or men Learned and Religious, the • Brachmanes obtaine the first place, as being neerest in Sects to the Greekes. These are after their manner Nazarites from the wombe. So soone as their Mother is conceiued of them, there are learned men appointed which come to the Mother, with Songs, containing Precepts of Chastitie. As they grow in yeeres they change their Masters. They haue their places of Exercise in a Groue nigh to the Citie, where they are busied in graue conferences.

They

They eate no liuing Creatures, nor haue vſe of women, liue frugally, and lye vpon skinnes. They will inſtruct ſuch as will heare them, but their Hearers muſt neither Sneeſe, nor Spit, nor Speake. When they haue in this ſtrict courſe ſpent ſeuen and thirtie yeeres, they may liue more at Pleaſure and Libertie, in Dyet, Habit, proper Habitation, and the vſe of Gold, and Marriage. They conceale their myſteries from their Wiues, leſt they ſhould blab them abroad. They eſteeme this life as mans Conception, but his Death-day to bee his Birth-day vnto that true and happy life, to him which hath beene rightly Religious. They hold the World to bee Created, Corruptible, Round, ruled by the high GOD. Water they imagine to haue beene the beginning of making the World; and that beſides the foure Elements, there is a fifth Nature, whereof the Heauen and Starres conſiſt. They intreate of the immortalitie of the Soule, and of the torments in Hell, and many ſuch like matters.

The [p] Germanes, another Order of Religious or Learned men, are honoured amongſt them: eſpecially ſuch of them as liue in the Woods, and of the Woods, both for their dyet of thoſe wilde Fruits, and their habit of the Barkes of Trees, not acquainted with Bacchus or Venus any more then with Ceres. They ſpeake not to the Kings, when they aske counſell of them, but by meſſengers; and doe pacifie the angrie gods, as is ſuppoſed, by their holineſſe.

p The Indian Germanes.

Next in honour to theſe, are certaine Mendicants, which liue of Rice and Barley, which any man at the firſt asking giueth them, together with entertainment into their houſes. Theſe profeſſe skill in Phyſicke, and to remedie Diſeaſes, Wounds, and Sterilitie; very conſtant in labour and hardſhip. Others there are, Inchanters and Diuiners, Maſters of Ceremonies about the Dead, which wander thorow Townes and Cities. Some there are more Ciuil and Secular, in their life profeſſing like Pietie and Holineſſe. Women alſo are admitted vnto the fellowſhip of their ſtudies in this Philoſophie, not to their beds. Ariſtobulus writeth, That hee ſaw two of theſe Brachmanes, the one an old man ſhauen, the other young with long haire, which ſometimes reſorted to the Market-place, and were honoured as Counſellors, and freely tooke what they pleaſed, of any thing there to be ſold, for their ſuſtenance. They were anointed with Seſamine oyle, wherewith, and with hony, they tempered there bread. They were admitted to Alexanders Table, where they gaue leſſons of patience [q]: and after going to a place not farre off, the old Man lying downe with his face vpward, ſuſtained the Sun and ſhowers terrible violence. The yonger ſtanding on one foot, held in both his hands a piece of wood of three cubits lifted vp, and ſhifted feet, as the other was weary: and ſo they continued euery day. The young man returned home afterward, but the old man followed the King, with whom he changed his Habit and Life, for which, when as he was by ſome reproued, he anſwered, That he had fulfilled the fortie yeeres exerciſe, which he had vowed. Oneſicritus ſaith, that Alexander, hearing of ſome Religious Obſeruants, which went naked, and exerciſed themſelues to much hardſhip, and would [r] not come to others, but would bid Men, if they would haue any thing with them, to come to them; ſent him vnto them, who found fifteene of them twentie furlongs from the City, each of them obſerning his own geſture of ſitting, ſtanding, or lying naked, and not ſtirring til ſun-ſetting, in that vnſupportable heat, at which time they returned into the Citie. Calanus was one of them. He afterward followed Alexander into Perſia, where beginning to be ſicke, hee cauſed a great Pile or Frame of wood to be made, wherein he placed himſelfe in a golden chayre, and cauſed fire to be put to, in which he was voluntarily conſumed, telling (if they tell true) that he would meet Alexander at Babylon, the place fatall to Alexanders death. Ælianus [s] faith, That this was done in a ſuburbe of Babylon, and that the fire was of Cedar, Cypres, Mirtle, Laurell, and other ſweet woods: and after he had performed his daily exerciſe of running, hee placed himſelfe in the middeſt, crowned with the leaues of Reeds, the Sunne ſhinning on him, which he worſhipped. This adoration was the ſigne which hee gaue to the Macedonians to kindle the fire, in which he abode without any ſtirring till hee was dead; Alexander himſelfe admiring, and preferring this victorie of Calanus before all his owne. This Calanus told Oneſicritus of a golden World, where Meale was as plentiful as duſt, and Fountaines ſtreamed Milk, Hony, Wine, and Oyle. Which Country, by men turned into wantonneſſe, Iupiter altered and detayned, impoſing a life of hardneſſe and labour, which while men followed, they enioyed abundance; but now that men begin to furfet and grow diſobedient, there is danger of vniuerſall deſtruction. When hee had thus ſpoken, hee bad him, if hee would heare further, ſtrip himſelfe, and lie naked vpon theſe ſtones. But Mandanis, [t] another of them, reproued Calanus for his haſtineſſe, and, commending Alexander for his loue to learning, ſaid, that they inured their bodies to labour, for the confirmation of their mindes againſt paſſions. For his nakedneſſe he alledged, that that was the beſt houſe which needed leſt furniture of houſhold. Hee added, that they ſearched the ſecrets of Nature, and that returning into the Citie, if they met with any carrying figs or grapes, they receiued of him gratis: if oyle, they powred it on them: and all mens houſes and goods were open to them, euen to the Parlors of their wiues. When they were entred, they imparted the wiſdome of their ſentences, as the other communicated his meats. If they feared any diſeaſe, they preuented the ſame with fire, as [u] was now ſaid of Calanus. Megaſthenes reproueth this Calanus, as Alexanders Trencher-Chaplaine, and commendeth Mandanis, ſaying, That when Alexanders meſſengers told him that he muſt come to the ſonne of Iupiter, with promiſe of rewards, if he came, otherwiſe menacing torture: hee anſwered, That neither was he Iupiters ſonne, nor did poſſeſſe any great part of the earth: as for himſelfe, he neither reſpected his gifts, nor feared his threatnings; for while he liued, India yeelded him ſufficient; if he dyed, he ſhould be freed from age, and exchange for a better and purer life. Whereupon, he ſaith, Allexander both pardoned and praiſed him. Clitarchus reporteth alſo, that to the Brachmanes are oppoſed another ſect, called Pramnæ, men full of ſubtiltie and contention, which derided the ſtudies of others in Phyſiologie and Aſtronomie. He diuideth the Brachmanes into thoſe of the Mountaines, clothed in Deere skins, which carried ſcrips, full of roots, and medicines, which they applied with certaine charmes to cure diſeaſes: and the ſecond ſort he calleth Gymneta, thoſe naked ones before mentioned (whereof it ſeemeth they were called Gymnoſophiſtæ) which had women amongſt them, but not in carnall knowledge: the third he calleth Ciuill, which liued in Cities and Villages, wearing fine linnen, and apparrelled in skins. Clemens [x] Alexandrinus ſpeakes of their faſtings, and other auſtere courſes, out of Alex. Polyhiſtor, de rebus Indicis. The Brachmanes (ſaith he) neither eate any quick thing, nor drinke wine. But ſome of them eat euery day, as we doe: ſome onely euery third day. They contemne death, nor much eſteeme of life, beleeuing to be borne againe. Some worſhip Pan and Hercules. But thoſe Indians which are called σεμνοὶ for their grauitie and auſteritie, liue altogether naked. Theſe practiſe Truth, and foretell things to come, and worſhip a certaine Pyramis, vnder which they thinke are laid the bones of ſome god. Neither the Gymnoſophiſts, nor theſe σεμνοὶ vſe women, but thinke it vnlawfull and againſt Nature, and therefore obſerue chaſtitie. Likewiſe there are Virgins, which are called σεμναὶ of the female ſexe. They ſeeme to obſerue the heauenly bodies, and by their ſignification to foretell future euents. Thus farre Clemens.

Nicolaus Damaſcenus ſaith, [y] That at Antiochia hee ſaw the Indian Embaſſadors, ſent to Auguſtus from Porus the King (as his letter contained) of ſixe hundred Kings, with preſents, among which was a female-Viper of ſixteene Cubits (one of the like bigneſſe Strabo ſaith, he ſaw ſent out of Egypt) and a Cray-fiſh of three Cubits, and a Partrich bigger then a Vulture. Zarmanochagas, one of theſe Indian Philoſophers, was one of the Embaſſadours, who at Athens burned himſelfe, not moued thereto by aduerſitie, but by proſperitie, which had in all things followed his deſires, leſt in his ſucceeding age it might alter: and therefore entered the fire, anointed, naked, laughing. His Epitaph was, Here lyeth Zarmanochagas the Indian, of Bargoſa, which according to his Countrey-cuſtome, made himſelfe immortall.

But it is not ſuch maruell that their Philoſophers thus contemned death, whereas their Women, the weaker and more fearefull ſexe, wherein out-went their ſexe and weakeneſſe. For their cuſtome admitting many wiues, the deareſt of which was burned with the deceaſed husband: Hæ igitur contendunt inter ſe de amore viri (they are [z] Hieromes words) & ambitio ſumma certantium eſt, ac teſtimonium caſtitatis, dignam morte decerni. They ambitiouſly contend amongſt themſelues, to obtaine this fatall teſtimonie of their husbands loue, and their owne chaſtitie; and the conquereſſe in her former habit, lyeth downe by the carkaſſe, embracing and kiſſing the ſame, contemning the fire which thus marryeth them againe in deſpight of deaths diuorce. A thing to this day obſerued in many parts of India, as we ſhall ſee anon. Arrianus [a] reporteth of a place called Comar (it ſeemeth the Cape Comori ouer-againſt Zeilan) wherein is a Hauen, to which vſed to reſort certaine Votaries, which had deuoted themſelues to a ſingle life, to waſh themſelues in thoſe holy-waters. The like was done by their Nun-like women. They had a tradition of a certaine goddeſſe, which vſed to waſh her ſelfe there euery moneth.

Suidas telleth of a Nation called Brachmanes, inhabiting an Iland in the Sea, where Alexander erected a pillar, with inſcription, that he had paſſed ſo farre. They liue an hundred and fiftie yeeres, and haue neither bread, wine, fleſh, nor metals, nor houſes, but liue of the fruits, and cleere water, and are very religious. Their wiues liue apart on the other ſide Ganges, to whom they paſſe in July and Auguſt, and after fortie dayes, returne home againe. When the wife hath had two children, ſhee neither knoweth her husband after, nor any other man; which is obſerued alſo, when in fiue yeeres he can raiſe no iſſue of her, hee after abſtaineth. These [b] ſlay no beaſts in ſacrifice, but affirme, That GOD better accepteth vnbloudie ſacrifices of Prayer, and more delighteth in Man, his owne Image.

In the Hills, [c] called Hemodi, Bacchus is said to haue erected pillars, to witnesse his Conqueſt, as farre in that Eaſterne Ocean, as Hercules did in the Weſt. He built the Citie Nyſa, where he left his ſicke and aged Souldiers, which Alexander ſpared, [d] and ſuffered to their owne libertie, for Dionyſius or Bacchus his ſake. And as Bacchus erected Pillars, ſo did Alexander Altars to the Twelue chiefe gods, as high as Towers, Monuments of his farre trauels, where he obſerued ſolemne games and ſacrifices. Hee [e] ſacrificed alſo, not to his Countrey gods alone, but to Hydaſpis, Aceſine, and Indus, Indian Riuers, and to other gods, with other Rites and Sacrifices, then he had before vſed: drowning a golden bowle in Indus, and another in the Ocean, in his Ethnicke ſuperſtition. To him did the Indian Magi (ſo doth Arrianus [f] call their Brachmanes) ſay, That hee was but as other men, ſauing that hee had leſſe reſt, and was more troubleſome, and being dead, ſhould enioy no more land, then would ſerue to couer his bodie. And euery man (ſaid they) ſtamping with their feet on the ground, hath ſo much as he treadeth on. Euſebius [g] reciteth out of Bardeſanes Cyrus, that amongſt the Indians, and Bactrians, were many thouſand Brachmanes, which as well by Tradition, as Law, worſhipped no Image, nor ate any quick Creature, dranke no Wine nor Beere, only attending on Diuine things: whereas the other Indians are very vicious, yea, ſome hunt Men, ſacrifice, and deuoure them, and were as Idolaters.

Plinie, beſides his Relations of Monſters in theſe parts, telleth of their Philoſophers (called Gymnoſophiſts) like things to that, which is before mentioned of their beholding the Sunne from the riſing to the ſetting, with fixed eyes, ſtanding on the hot ſands all day long, on one foot by courſe. Tooth-ache, with other diſeaſes of the head and eyes, ſpitting, and other ſickneſſes, are either exiles or ſtrangers to the Indians. Tully ſaith, [h] That in this naked plight theſe Philoſophers endure the cold of Winter, and Snowes of Caucaſus, while they liue, and the burning fire at their end without any playning. The Indian women alſo ſtriue which ſhall be marryed to her husbands corps, in a fierie Chariot, riding with him into another World.

Hyſtaſpes, [i] the Father of Darius, is reported to haue learned of the Indian Philoſophers or Brachmanes, both Aſtronomie and Rites of Religion, with which hee after inſtructed the Perſian Magi. None [k] might ſacrifice without one of theſe to direct him, who onely among the Indians had skill of Diuination, and authoritie to ſacrifice, and were free from other ſeruices.

§. III.

Many doubtfull and fabulous reports of the Indians.

THe Indians are ſaid to worſhip Iupiter, Ganges, and other Heroes of their Countrey. Some of the Indian Nations accounted it diſhonourable (as they doe alſo at this day) for the wiues not to be burned with their deceaſed husbands. Thomas [l] the Apoſtle preached the Goſpell to the Indians, and ſo did Bartholomew alſo, and deſtroyed their Idols (which wrought great wonders amongſt them) Aſtaroth, Beirith, and Waldath, as Abdias [m] reporteth, who euen in this Hiſtorie may eaſily be conuinced to be counterfeit, in aſcribing the Names and Religions of the Grecians, Iuno, Neptune, Berecinthia, to the Indians; beſides thoſe vnchriſtian reuenges, in killing ſo many of their Aduerſaries, and old Heatheniſh, new Popiſh Ceremonies, fathered on thoſe Apoſtles.

To let paſſe that Abdias, a fit Biſhop of that myſticall Babylon: [n] Alexander ab Alexandro reckoneth among their gods the greateſt Trees (to cut which, was with them a capitall crime) and a Dragon, in honor of Liber Pater. Hercules they honored in a Gyant-like ſtatue, whoſe daughter Pandæa, the Pandeans ſay, was their firſt Queene. Theſe affirme, that in the Hill Meros, which they account ſacred to Iupiter, is a Caue wherein Liber or Bacchus was nouriſhed, from whence the fable grew, that hee was borne of Iupiters thigh; for ſo μηρὸς ſignifieth. Some of the Indians (ſaith [o] Solinus) kill no beaſts, nor eate fleſh: ſome liue onely on fiſh. Some kill their Parents and Kinſfolks, before Age or ſickneſſe withereth them, and deuoure their fleſh: an argument, not of villany, but pietie amongſt them. Their Gymnoſophiſts [p], from the Sun-riſing to the ſetting, fixe their eyes on the bright Orbe of the ſun, thence obſeruing certaine ſecrets. Hereunto he addeth the tales, of Men with dogs-heads; of others with one leg, and yet very ſwift of foot: of Pigmeis, of ſuch as liue onely by ſent: of hoarie Infants; of ſome like Polyphemus, with one eye in their fore-head; of others with eares to the ground, wherein many of the old Writers are Poets, and the Moderne, Painters, as in many other Monſters of Men and Beaſts. We ſeeke credit with the wiſe, and not admiration of fooles.

Cteſias in his Indica (which Photius q hath preſerued rather as a Monument of Cteſias his lying, then of Indian truth) hath told the like incredible tales; that it neuer rayneth in India, that there is a Fountaine of liquid gold receiued into pitchers of Earth, that the Sea in the top is boyling hot, with the monſtrous Martichora, a man-like beaſt, and other more horrible beaſt-like men, with tailes and heads of dogs, without ſpeech: the little truth in his little Pigmeis both beaſts and men; his great lyes of great Gryphons, Lyon-Eagles, Keepers of golden Mountaines, with other like fables, ſcarce in one thing agreeing with our Moderne, and more certaine obſeruations, and ſuch, as if of purpoſe he had in challenge of the World caſt downe the Gantlet for the Whetſtone, which for my part, I thinke he beſt deſerueth. This hath the lyer gotten by lying, that in his Perſian ſtorie, which he had better meanes to know, he is the more doubted: and ſuch relations haue made Indian reports r accounted fabulous.

The f Indians neuer ſacrificed, or ſaluted their Idols without dances. They were neuer rewarded with militarie honor or ſpoile, except they brought into the Campe an enemies head in their hand. They puniſhed periurie with the loſſe of fingers and toes; and ſuch as deceiued their Clients, with perpetuall ſilence; and beſides, they were diſabled vnto any Office. Their Lawes are not written; their Contracts without ſeales, or witneſſes. They vſed no pledges; nor might borrow or lend vpon vſury.

Philoſtratus in his large Legend of the life of Apollonius Tyaneus, their Philoſophicall Saint, relateth t his Pilgrimage into India, to the Brachmanes, in which he came to Nyſa, where was a Temple of Bacchus built by himſelfe, planted about with Bayes, Vines, and Iuy, whoſe ſhadie roofe couered the ſame. In the middeſt was an Image: all Inſtruments belonging to the Vintage were there, ſome of Gold, others of Siluer hanged vp, ſacred to Dionyſius. Hee after u came to Taxilla the Citie Royall, where he found the Temple of the Sun, and in it, the yuorie Image of Aiax, with golden ſtatues of Alexander: and ouer-againſt the ſame, the brazen Images of Porus. The walls of red Marble ſhined like fire, interlaid with Gold, reſembling lightning. The Moſaicall floore pouldred with Pearles. The King here offered ſacrifice to the Sun. For the x Pepper-trees, which (he ſaith) are great, and abound with Apes, who gather the Pepper for the Indians gratis, brought thereunto by a wyle of the Indians, who firſt gather ſome, and lay it on heapes, and then go away: at their returne, finding many the like heapes made by the emulous Apes; I leaue it to the Authors authoritie, and Readers credulitie: as that alſo which followeth of the Inhabitants of Paraca in theſe parts, who by eating a Dragons heart and liuer, attaine to vnderſtand the Language (if ſo I may terme it) of Beaſts. And if you maruell at this, y that which followes will amaze you: of Men which doe not, as the former, communicate with the nature of Beaſts, but of Spirits, making themſelues at their pleaſure inuiſible. Here in a holy Hill was a pit, whereof no man drinketh, by which the Indians bind their faith, as by the moſt ſolemne and inuiolable oath. In this pit was a fierie receptacle, where men were purged from their offences; and two tubs (of Whetſtones, I ſhould ſay) of raines and windes, the one being opened yeelding raines, and the other windes. In this place were many Indian, Grecian, and Egyptian ſtatues, with their Rites obſerued accordingly. This Hill was reported the middle of India, and euery noone-tide they ſing Hymnes to the Sun for that fire, borrowed (they ſay) from his beames. The Brachmanes ſleepe on the ground, on hearbes ſtrewed two cubits thick, that by this eleuation they might more ſignifie their deuotion to the Sun, whom they laud night and day. Hee found z Iarchas their Principall, with ſeuen Aſſociats, ſitting on Thrones of Braſſe. Iarchas could tell Apollonius his Name, Nation, and Aduentures, which had befalne him all his life. They anoint themſelues, then waſh in a Fountaine, and after this being crowned, enter the Temple in ſolemne Proceſſion, with Dances, ſmiting the ground with Rods, wherewith the earth, like vnto waues, did moue and raiſe it ſelfe. Iarchas being asked by Apollonius, What he thought of himſelfe and his company? anſwered, That they were Gods; becauſe they were good men: that hee himſelfe had ſometime beene Ganges, and Apollonius before had beene an Egyptian Mariner; an Attendant, which there waited on them, had been Palamedes, whoſe misfortunes wee read of in the warres of Troy, thus in new bodies preſenting themſelues to the world. The World, he ſaid, was a liuing creature, compounded of fiue Elements, with diuers other things of Pygmies, which liued vnder the earth, of Gryphons, &c. Thus much I thought to adde of Apollonius, becauſe ſome vaine Philoſophers haue impudently compared him to our Sauiour, that the Reader might parallell this Legend with the Goſpel; out of this darkneſſe, the more to admire that more then admirable Light. And thus much out of Philoſtratus, of the Brachmanes. The Gymnoſophiſts are by him placed, and by that name knowne, in Ægypt and Æthiopia, whither alſo Apollonius went to viſit them, and we in due place will follow him.

CHAP. II.

Of later Indian Discoueries, and an Apologie for the English Trade in the East Indies.

§. I.

Of the Portugals and Dutch.

AFter this glut of Fables (which commonly attend whatsoeuer is farre distant in Time or Place) the Indian Truth will be more welcome, as the Sun after a storme. And Time, her Father, (which was said before to deuoure her) hath now brought her out of her obscure Prison, and by Neptunes helpe shipped her into Europe. In this Expedition, the Portugalls were first in Commission, the Hollanders and English since annexed. These are the Triumviri, which of all the Europæan Nations haue subdued those Seas: Happie Three, if they enuied not each others happinesse: a three-fold-cord, by no humane power to be broken. The Portugalls in the yeere 1498. (hauing about eleuen months before passed from Lisbone, the Cape of Good Hope happily compassed) first entred the Indian Ocean, and came to Calicut, Vasco da Gamma being Generall of that Fleet, which King Emanuel set forth. Their Exploits by Sea and Land, as well on the Westerne Coast of Africa, euer since Henry the Infant had begun this Discoverie, vntill that time, as on the Easterne, beyond the Cape: their Conquests by Gamma, Albuquerque, and others, which subdued to the Portugall Scepter so many Territories, peopled so many Ilands, erected so many Forts both on the African and Asian Shoares, made Tributarie so many pettie Kingdomes; their owne Writers, Barrius, Osorius, Maffeus, and others, haue sufficiently recorded. Besides what they held in Barbarie, they reckon theirs the Açores, Madera, the Ilands of Cabo Verde, the Fortresses of Arguin in Guinea, and of Mina; the Ilands del Principe, S. Thomas, Atubon, with some places in Congo and Angola, and Brasile also, on the American shoare: beyond the Cape, Soffala, Mosambique, Bombassa, the Iland of Ormuz, in the Persian Gulfe; in India, the Castles and Townes of Diu, Daman, Baçayn, Chaul, Goa, Honor, Barcela, Mangalor, Cananor, Cranganor, Cochin, and Coulan; in Seylan, Columbo; Negapatan and S. Thomas, on Choromandel Coast; Porto Pequene, Porto Grande; Serapure, in Bengala; Serone, Malacca, Molucca Ilands, Malao, and Nangasacke, in Iapan, with other their Conquests; which, besides their Empire ouer these Seas, and Riches by Merchandise, made Portugall the least part of the Portugall Crowne; pars minima est ipsa Puella Sui. And worthy of praise they are, that being so small and poore a Nation, haue thus enlarged their State and Soueraignetie, which they haue brauely defended against all the power of the Saracens in those parts, and the mighty Kings of Cambaya, Deccan, and the Great Turkes Forces, in strong Sieges. But whiles they sought a Monopoly of Indian Merchandise, and as Neptunes Minions, would engrosse all Sea-fauors to themselues; not onely (I know not with what right) forbidding the Indians to Trade their owne Seas, but those Europæan Courages, which gloried in as good Neptunian bloud as themselues; the Hollander steps forth, and borrowing his words and rage together, challengeth the Portugall, Tempus edax. Saturni fab. Veritas Temp. filia.

Non illi imperium Pelagi sævumque tridentem, Sed mihi sorte datum.

Cornel. Houtman Generall.

And for proofe alledgeth Cannon Law, and Steele Arguments, making Prize of all hee can get from them. And so haue they preuailed within these twentie yeeres (for in the yeere 1595. were their first Ships sent from Amsterdam) that now, besides many mischiefes executed on the Portugalls in Africa and India, by Land and Sea, they had thirtie seuen Factories, and twentie Forts and Castles in the East Indies, long since mentioned in Nicolas Bangams Iournall: and since haue further [b] preuailed in Iacatra, Banda, and other places, and scarcely could brooke the English their old friends, that new Indian neighbour-hood.

§. II.

Of the English Trade there; many arguments in defence of it.

NOw, if that this Collaterall Line of that Sea-Soueraigne may promise thus much of his fauours to themselues, how much more may the English? Hee but kisseth Them in passing by, but euer embraceth in neuer-vnclasped armes this Brittish Nymph, and long since offered all his Shoares in Dowrie. Yea, let this be added to the English glorie, that Prince Henrie, first Founder of the Portugall Discoueries, was of English bloud, sonne to Philip the daughter of Iohn of Gaunt. And for the Hollanders, I say not their free Nauigation, but that they are a free Nation (I would they did not forget this in the Indies) may be ascribed to English Protection and Assistance. About the beginning of this [e] Secular Account (as in the Ocean Iubilee with largest Indulgence) began the English Societie their Indian Nauigation and Commerce, Sir Iames Lancaster being thither sent, with the Dragon, Hector, Ascention, and Susan: which their Endeuours haue since so well succeeded, that they haue set and sent forth twentie seuerall Fleets or Voyages, planting their Factories, and placing a Trade in Surrat, and other places of the Great Mogoll, in Messulopatan, Bantam, Patane, Siam, Sagadan, Macassar, and as farre as Firando in Iapan; endeuouring a mutuall good both to themselues and the Indian, without spoyling Portugall or Flemming.

[e] An. Dom. 1600.

True it is, that many open their mouthes wide in traducing this Trade, and detracting our Traffique this way: nor am I entertained, or once inuited, to plead their Case against calumnious Aduersaries: nay, they need not such a Defender, nor feare such Quarrellers. But, becausse euen honest Minds are possest with Scruples and Doubts, raysed by Ignorance, or malignant imputations of busie Braines; for their sakes, if I say somewhat, I shall not erre from my Geographicall Historie; this Studie receiuing principall supportation by the aduenturing Souldier and Merchant, Honor and Gaine breaking through all Obstacles, and opening all parts of the World to euery part. As obliged therefore to the Iournalls, which (borrowed of that Societie) haue led mee alongst the Indies; Gratitude thrusteth me forth an Orator and Patron, not so much for their Persons, or personall Actions, which I know not (and can wee know any, either Men, or Societies, free from personall Euills? or is it so rare, that in Merchants of all sorts, Couetousnesse and priuate Ends should haue place? yet herein I doe not, I cannot accuse, no more then excuse them:) but for the Societie, and iust Grounds of this Indian Aduenture (which some affirme gainefull to the Aduenturers, but with publike detriment to the State), I haue aduentured on this Stage, and opposed and exposed my selfe to Imputation.

[d] The Indian Societie commended by the 1. Equitie.

For [d] the Generall Equitie thereof, it is consonant to all kindes of Lawes; to the Law of GOD, who hath giuen the Earth to the Sonnes of Men; each Man being by naturall Inheritance Κοσμοπολιτης hauing an [e] vniuersall Tenure in the Vniuerse: of Nature; which by mutuall Offices insinuateth a Generall Good: of Nations; which flourish most in communicating their Superfluities, by Exchange for Necessaries: and concurreth with the Lawes of this Kingdome; which being placed in the bosome of the Ocean, hath enacted many Prouisions for the maintenance of Nauigation, which yeelds vs woodden Walls, and moueable Fortresses, in defending our Selues, or offending the Enemie.

Admirable (almoſt miraculous) are his Armes, who without Armies poyſeth and ballanceth the Weſterne World in an euen Counter-poyſe; like herein to that OMNIPOTENT MAIESTY which being vnmoueable moueth all things. But alas, why doe I eclipſe ſo brightſhining Prayſes with my interceding intercepting prayſings; obſcure Candles before This Sunne (long may he ſhine) in Our, or That Other (deſcended ſhall I ſay to the Lower? no) exalted to the Higheſt Hemiſphere? Neither can the Engliſh bee charged with annoying eyther Chriſtian or Heathen, except in Neceſſarie Defence, or Iuſt Reuenge: Neyther [a] doe they ſhut vp the Seas to the Inhabitants: They plant Factories, not Fortreſſes, on the Land; whereby Others ouer-awe the Natiues, proue vnfriendly to their Friends, ſeeke to eat out other aduenturing Nations, and make prey of Chriſtians and Ethnikes vnprouoked.

And is it not [a] profit to our Nation, to vent Clothes, Iron, Lead, and other Commodities? To ſet on worke ſo many of all Trades and Profeſſions? To employ ſo many Mariners? To build ſo many, ſo able, ſo capable Ships? To enrich the Kings Coffers and publike Treaſurie, in Cuſtomes, Impoſts, and other Duties? Yea, that by enriching the priuate Aduenturers, the State hath ſo many more ſeruiceable Members for the good of the whole Bodie?

And is it not for the Honor of our Nation, that the Engliſh Name hath pierced the remoteſt Countries, and filled the Indians with admiration of the Engliſh? That Aſia clothes vs with her Silkes, feedes vs with her Spices, cures vs with her Drugges, adornes vs with her Iewels, and almoſt adores the Engliſh Valour? That Turkie is made ſo neere, whiles our Indian Ocean makes our way to the Perſian, the Mogoll, the Iapan Monarchs, Awfull Names of Greatneſſe, not heard of by our Anceſtors, now delighting in our new Amitie, Theſe and other mightie Eaſterne Potentates entertaining Commerce of Letters, and Embaſſies, with Great Britaines Greateſt Soueraigne? And is it not for the Honor of our Nation, that the Mariner, Merchant, and Souldior, here together conſpire the Engliſh Glorie? Euery one in this Action as it were trayned in all three Functions, and becomming at once a Mariner (in ſo long Nauigation) a Merchant (where a little Stocke promiſeth great Gaine) and (in neceſſarie Defence by Sea and Land) an exerciſed Souldior? Oh, how doth my Soule honour thoſe glorious Exploits in the Indian Ocean; by thoſe two worthie Generalls, Beſt and Downton, in the yeares 1612. and 1614. the Sea becomming an Amphitheatre; where the Eaſterne World might bee Spectators of the Weſterne Worth; the Aſian Shores filled with Troupes, to behold the Tragicall Euent of thoſe Terrible Fights: which all, with all the Numbers, Gallantrie, Malignitie, Subtletie, Iniquitie, Indignation, Reſolution, Preparation, and ſtrength of the Countrey, ſerued to encreaſe the engliſh Victory and Glory. The [h] Storie is fitter in another place: but the Honor which there was gayned by our Nation, hath filled the Mogols huge Dominions with Admiration, pierced to the Perſian Court (where our Nation hath ſince procured Priuiledges) and extended beyond the large Extents of India. Yea, the Perſian Gulfe hath beene awed, and the Arabike or Red Sea tamed, in requitall of the Turkes and Buluches Trecheries; not by inuading Violence, but Chriſtian Iuſtice. GOD [i] Himſelfe hath honored this Action alſo with proſperous ſucceſſe, rewarding the Engliſh with Honor and Profit, their Aduerſaries with Loſſe and Confuſion: beſides, farre fewer Caſualties by ſhipwrack, or other Diſaſters, then Other aduenturing Nations haue ſuſtained. Neither [k] are we able only with theſe Nautike long Armes to reach the Worlds remoteſt parts, but at home alſo are more dreadfull to all daring Attempters: where, to the Nauie Royall, ſuch Succenturiatæ Copiæ are adioyned; the Ships of the Societie continually encreaſing, and being able to furniſh a puiſſant Armada of themſelues; which but few (if a few) forraine, of Ships Royall, can equall. I adde, that in the preſent eſtate of Things, [l] Neceſſitie may bee alledged for a Vertue. For doe wee not ſee want of Trade? The Merchant wanting Traffique, and conſequently, the Mariner employment, whiles Barbarie is many yeeres together trodden vnder foot by barbarous Ciuill vnciuill Warres; the Straits brought into ſtraits, by looſeneſſe and abundance of Turkiſh Robbers, and Chriſtian vnchriſtian Rouers; the Spaniard and Portugall forbid Trade to both the Indies; the Ruſſian Warres bereaue vs of Ruſſian Wares; ſhould I adde Diuiſions of our Merchants at home? Or ſhould I not rather [m] fixe mine eyes on Others neere our home; which can preoccupate our Mariner by cheaper Seruice; haue followed our Trade into Turkie and other places, by vs frequented; take more libertie in remote Seas, making prize and ſpoyle of Portugalls, and others; by their Trade into the Indies, haue weakened our Turkie, and wakened this Indie Trading (selling their Spices at cheaper rates then the Turkie Merchant could afoord:) yea, haue haunted vs euen into Greene-land, and followed English Examples round about the World? Let none traduce me as a deprauer of their Actions; whose Noble Attempts I honour: but I speake in defence of the Indian Traffique; without which, our needie Mariner must haue sued to serue them at Sea, no lesse then our needie voluntary Souldior hath done on Land; which, without the profits now reaped, would haue procured the inconueniences, so much quarrelled.

§. III.

Answer to obiections made against the Indian Trade and Societie, with other Arguments for it.

1. n 11. Euils 2. else to 3. Mariners. 4.

FOr must not our Mariner n either die at Wapping, or other dismall place of Iustice, for Iniustice? Or else liue to the Death, or losse of Honest men, thriuing in vnthristinesse and Pyracies? Or else (most of them) want employment? Or bee forced to serue Forreiners? Better a death at Bantam, then in other places more infamously fatall: and better this bad Aduenture there, for Englands Wealth, then Forreiners. And yet with due sobrietie and temperance (not wracking themselues on their o Rack, a very Rock; or on their Quick-sands, filthie diseased Women, extreamely both deare and vile) how many of those dying many, might escape? Better that our Men should carrie forreine p Siluer q into Those parts, to bring Money and Wares for the publike benefit, then all this Money to be intercepted by strangers (for it growes not in England) Europe no lesse disfurnished, and we to buy those Wares with more expence of Money at a worse hand. Non est lauis ista hominis sed temporum, said Tully r of Attilius Regulus, his returning vpon Oath to the Punike Tortures: Non est fraus ista hominum sed temporum. I may answere touching these losses of Men and Money, which in Dutch, or other Employments, and Transporting, would happen, though England held no Commerce with India. And yet if our Mynts lacke worke, let vs examine our store of Plate, encreasing with our Pride, our Clothes of Siluer, Gold, Tissue, and rich-metalld Stuffes, our Laces and Embroideries, from the Hat-band to the Shoo-strings, exhausting so much Siluer and Gold in the Materials, that I speake not of the communicating it to Others, now happily vnited vnto Vs; which all cannot but diuert worke from the Mint, especially since our Men of Warre haue had so little out of American spoyles. And for Men, how prosperously hath Captain Newport made two Returnes from the Indies? If Mariners are lost, are not Mariners made and bred in this Employment? Must wee not disarme our selues s of shipping, and leaue our Ilands waterie Walls destitute of their Mouing Bulwarkes, if our Sea-Trade faile, which without Gaine and Glorie (Honos alit Artes) must faile and fall too? SAVL and IONATHAN onely may bee armed (the Kings Royall Nauie royally furnished) but (for Merchants ships wonted Assistance) not a Sword nor a Speare found in the hands of any of the people: they might sharpen their Mattockes, Weeding-Hookes, and Axes, amongst the Philistims. But a SMITH in Israel doth far far better, that can fit vs with Weapons of Warre, that wee shall not need borrow of strangers. And long so (and not on other Conditions, but Israels flourishing) may our SMITH flourish in our Israel. If any thinke these feares fantasticall, let him but looke on the face of Things before this Trade was well settled; how many, in little space, of the best Merchant-ships were alienated into Spaine and Italy; the Alcedor, the Bonis, the Royall Merchant, the May-Flower, the Prosperous, the Susan Parnell, the Gold Noble, the Consent, the Concord, I know not with what Concent, nay Discord rather to our Sea-Concent and Harmonie. If Fluxes and Diseases pursue vs in the Indies, haue they not so done (I name not Kentish and Essex Marishes, and other vnwholesome English Habitations) in Ireland? O Ireland, the Land of ire indeed, in the death of so many Commanders and Souldiers, by Warre and Diseases, in the late Rebellion: yea, euen still, neither salo, solo, cœlo, gente, nor mente, like our owne Homes, which yet how many are glad to leaue, there to trie their fortunes? There? Where not prodigall t of their best bloud, in Dutch, Danish, Sweden, Poland, Russian Warres? For small stipends voluntarily aduenturing more certaine Deaths, then in this Indian Aduenture; no lesse (perhaps more then some of the former) iustifiable to a scrupulous conscience. What should I speake u of the highest Worke of Conscience, in propagating Christian Religion, and warring vpon the Regions and Legions of Infernall Powers, captiuating silly soules in Ethnicke darkenesse? And O that our Merchants would mind this Merchandise, the gaine of soules; settling learned Ministers in their Factories, to bee Factors for Christ; then might we looke for a Blessing: Yea, now wee haue great x Hopes, that that Iapan may yeeld siluer; and if men proue better in soule, their bodies may lesse miscarry. How euer, my prayers shall be to GOD ALMIGHTIE, for His Blessing vpon their Endeuours. For my selfe, I haue beene bold to say this in their Defence, as a most indifferent looker on, lesse then others (more able, more interested) haue, or can, and not more then Reason and Religion may admit: which I would haue interpreted with the same Equitie, with which, for which, it is written; not imputed to itching busie fingers, sicke of the Scribling disease; nor to base insinuating Flattery of Ours; nor to malicious Intimations, and barking against Forreiners (whose worthy Exploits I honour:) but let Themselues (the prouoking Portugall, and not-prouoked Flemming) be Iudges, that I call not the Admiring Ethnike to honour the English Worth, if our Trade hath not beene the farthest from first offering, from suspition of iniurie, and therefore neerest to Innocence and Iustice; the true cause of (that which they need not) this ruder, but iust and true Apologie. As for other Obiections, they are friuolous, and either ridiculous, or meerely accidentall: and it is Puritanisme in Politie, to conceit any great Good, without some Euills attendant, in any Enterprise whatsoeuer; where the Heauens Great Lights are subiect to Eclipses; the longest Day hath a Night, the Summer yeelds vicissitude to Winter, all Bodies are mixed and compounded, and in the greatest Lustre make an apparant Shadow. Apparant Shadowes are, the obiected expence of Victuall (as if these mouthes would not exceed farre more in quantitie and qualitie at home;) of Timber (as if this be not the most honourable vse thereof, though Ireland yeeldes supply in this kind;) of eclipsing or sinking other Trades (sic inter Stellas argentea Luna minores; will they be angrie, that so few Starres appeare, when Aurora is preparing the Sunnes Chariot?) They adde, Oppressions, and Dealing cruelly; I know not whether this be a cruell lye: and many other, alledged against these Indian Nauigations, bee but English Knauigations. This I know, that the Wisest hath forbidden, to answere a foole according to his foolishnesse, lest thou also bee like him. Easie it is for fooles, to moue Scruples in the Actions of the Wisest; and not hard for euill mindes, to make that, which they find not, euill. But Christians are to imitate Him rather, which commanded the Light to shine out of Darkenesse; with a candide Mind (the true Image of GOD) alway construing doubtfull things to the best; which the best will doe: to whom, and for whom, this is intended. As for Cauillers, they haue their Dos here, according to Salomons Prescipt, Answere a foole according to his foolishnesse, lest he be wise in his owne conceit.

The Conclusion with commendation of the Mariner, &c.

NOw that I haue after my ability answered the obiections, and produced so many Arguments (the most of which are Store-houses, and Heads of many) Let this be the last argument, which to me was not the least, and here was placed first, the Increase of learning and knowledge by these worthy Discoueries of Marine Worthies. How little had we knowne of the World, and the Wonders of God in the World, had not the Sea opened vs a Passage into all Lands. Pegasus the winged Horse, which (the Poets fained) with the stroke of his foot, first made Helicon the Muses Well to spring, was the issue of Neptune, and that snaky-headed Monster Meduſa. The Mariner seemes rough-hewen and rude, according to the Ocean that breeds him; but hee that can play with those dangers which would transforme others into stones, and dares dwell within so few inches of death; that calls the most tempestuous Elements his Parents; Hee (I say) is the true Pegasus that with his wing-like Sailes flies ouer the World; which hath helped to deliuer Andromeda (Geography) before chained to the Rockes, and ready to bee deuoured of that Monster Ignorance; and out of whose salt waters wisely distilled, Clio, Urania, and the best of the Muses, drinke their sweetest and freshest liquors. Howsoeuer Others, My Selfe must confesse, and this Booke will witnesse, that My Helicon hath in great part flowne from the footing of this Pegasus. And let it be the Honour of Our [k] Honourable SMITH, that His hand hath fitted this Foot of Pegasus to this Indian Iourney, whither he is now carrying you: at Whose Forge and Anuill haue beene hammer'd so many irons for Neptune; not like Xerxes his Arroganee, which proudly cast Fetters into the Hellespont, but with true effects of Conquest. Mee thinkes I here see the Sterne that with little locall stirring Stiereth so many Ships to so many Ports visited by your Pilgrim.

Of the Indian Prouinces next adioyning to China.

§. I.

Of Cauchin, China, Cambola and the Laos.

CAuchin-China [a] is an Indian Kingdome, situate betweene the Prouince of Canton on the North, and Cambola on the South, in the bottome of a great Bay, diuided into three Prouinces, and as many Kings, but one of them is Paramount. It [b] aboundeth with Gold, Siluer, Aloes, Porcelane, and Silke. They are Idolaters and Pagans, and [c] haue had some deuotion to the Popish Christianity, moued thereto by certaine Pictures of our Lady, of the last Iudgement, and Hell (a new kind of preaching) and haue erected many Crosses amongst them, of which the Friers report (after their fashion) some miracles. Their Religion seemeth little to differ from that of the Chinois, to whom they are also Tributaries, and vse their Characters.

c Gi. Bot. Ben.

Richard Cocke. One Richard Cocke Englishman, in a Letter dated December, the tenth, 1614. from Firando in Iapan (where hee was left in Factory by Captaine Saris) writes of an vnhappy accident which befell Master Tempest Peacocke, who with Walter Caerwarden arriued not long before with our Kings Letter, in Cauchin-China, with a Present also, and goods to the Value of of seuen hundred and thirty pounds. But whiles hee with some principall Hollanders (who were there likewise entertained) was passing by water, they were set vpon and slaine with harping irons, together with their interpreters and followers, Iapanders: neither had they heard further what became of the rest of the Company. The cause was reported to bee a quarrell against the Hollanders for fraud and violence, deceiuing them with false money, and burning a Towne. Here is much of the wood called Palo Daguilla, and of the most sweet wood Calamba, with other merchandize of China. Betweene this and the Ile Aynao tenne miles from the land is a fishing for Pearles. Linschot. c. 22.

To the South of this Kingdome is Champa, the name of a Kingdome, and chiefe Citie thereof, of great Traffique, especially of Lignum Aloes, which groweth there in the Mountaines, prized at the weight in Siluer, which they vse in Bathes, and in the Funerals of great Princes. In Religion they are as the former. This Tract beares also the name of Camboia.

Camboia on the North abutteth on Cauchin China, on the South the Kingdome of Siam, on the East the Sea. It is a great and populous Countrey, full of Elephants and Abada's (this Beast is the Rhinoceros:) Here also they begin to honour the Crosse, as Frier Siluester (a man, as they say, much reuerenced by the King, and honoured of the people) hath taught them. When the King dieth, [d] his women are burned, and his Nobles doe voluntarily sacrifice themselues in the same fire. The women are generally burned with their husbands at their death. The Camboyans dealt treacherously [e] with the Hollanders, Anno 1602. whom they inuited to the shore, with promise of certaine Buffolos, and then cruelly slew them. They detained the Admirall on shore, to be redeemed with some of their Ordnance. When they intend a iourney, they vse diuination with the feete of a Henne, to know whether it will be luckie, or no; and as the Wizard shall answere, they dispose of themselues, either to goe or stay.

e Nauigatio. Iac. Neccij per Cornel. Nicolai.

This Land hath much of the sweet Wood Calamba, which being good, is wayed against siluer and gold. Through this Kingdome runneth the Riuer Mecon into the Sea, which the Indians name Captaine of all the Riuers: for it hath so much water in the Summer (their Winter) that it drowneth the Countrey as Nilus doth. The people of Camboia beleeue that all Creatures, both Men, and Beasts of all sorts doe here receiue reward for their worke, whether it be good or bad. Vpwards in the Land are the Laos, a great and mighty people, the Auas and Bramas also, which dwell further vp by the Hills; and the Gueos vpon the Hills, which liue like wilde men, eate mans flesh, marke all their bodies with a hote iron, in gallant brauery. Linschot. vbi supra.

Gaspar de Cruz mentioneth that People called Laos, Northwards from Camboia, which come thither downe [f] a Riuer, which hath his beginning in China, and is of eight, fifteene, and twenty fadoms depth: it passeth thorow desarts, where are Elephants and Bados, or Rhinocerotes, the males of which beasts haue a horne arising out of their snowt, accounted good for the Piles. This Riuer comming to Cudurmuch, twelue leagues from the principall Citie of Camboia, makes a passage to another Riuer, which descendeth from a great Lake, in the midst of which one cannot see Land. When the great waters come downe from the Laos Riuer, they enter that other Riuer with such violence, that it reuerseth and turneth backe the streame, with a swift current, and ouerfloweth all Camboia, leauing no passage for Trauellers, but by Boat, their houses also being in the lower roomes ouerflowen, themselues remaining in the higher roomes, with their houshold. This Riuer runneth vpward from Iuly to September. The Portugals shewed our Author a great Hill, ouer which a ship had sailed, being of sufficient burden to haue passed from India to Portugall. These Laos bring Musk from Camsi, being the flesh and blood (as he saith) of a certaine beast. They goe naked from the waste vpwards, trussing vp their haire like a cappe. Their Priests weare yellow cloaths and yellow Copes, with certaine folds and seames: Their Religion is as in Siam. Gasp. de Cruz.
f This seemeth to be Mecon the riuer before mentioned.

Iarric writes of these Laos or Laios, that they liue about the springs of Mecon, in Cottages of Timber, and in open boats, neere the banks and Lakes of the Riuer, which is said to extend foure hundred Leagues within the Land, neere the Tartarian and China confines. These Laios about the yeare 1578. descended the Riuer in great multitudes, with an army of two hundred thousand, which all were slaine, drowned, or captiued in fight with the Camboyans. In this battell the King of Camboia was slaine also. He left behind him a yong sonne, which became vassall to the King of Siam. This Kingdome hath great Townes, and many Temples, which haue Bonzij, Priests or Religious Men after the maner of Iapan and China, but lesse superstitious then the Iaponians. As for the Laios, they are rude and barbarous, but rich in Gold. The King of Camboia in the yeare 1598. sent to the Iesuites for some of their Society, to liue and preach amongst his people, and bestowed vpon Iames Veloso a Portugall which had serued him in the warres against the Siamites, a Peninsula stretching three *P. three Leagues into the Sea, which hee offered to the Portugall subiection, vpon condition of conuerting the Inhabitants. There are not (as in other Maritime parts of the Indies) any Saracens amongst them, they are courteous and milde people, and haue trade with the Iaponians.

§. II.

Of the Kingdome of Siam.

g Maginus. G. Bot. Ben.

IN this side of Camboia, is g Siam, Sion, or Silon, Mother-City of a Kingdome bearing the same name, in which are reckoned thirty thousand families of Moores, besides the Naturals. In these parts are huge Woods, harbours of Lions, Tigres, Ownces, and (they tell also) Mariches, which haue Maidens faces and Scorpions tailes. Here runneth Menan out of that huge Lake Chiamay, which yeeldeth this and other Riuers of like Nature to Nilus in Egypt.

Gas. B, cap. 35. For this cause, Balbi affirmeth, that they build their houses in Silon (so hee termeth it) very high, and euery house hath a boat belonging thereto for passage and transportation of the familie in that their Winter-time, or annuall deluge. And some poore persons haue slight houses of Reed, or timber set vpon plankes tied together, or Liters, which they can remoone whither they please, as moueable shops to buy and sell; which is there done most by the women. This name of Sion, Silon, or Siam, may worthily mooue a Quære to Geographers, whether this bee not the Sinæ mentioned by Ptolemey, Marcianus, and other Ancients: the rather because China is a name vnknowne to the Chinois, and their Countrey abutts on the Sea Eastward, and the Cities thereof haue more Northerly Situation, then those by them ascribed to the Sinæ; which name is heere little altered, and in other things this seemeth rather to agree thereunto. But let the curious enquire, and the learned iudge.

h Discourse of China, p. 390.

They haue amongst them many Religious h Men, which leade an austere life, and therefore had in great reputation of Holinesse. These liue in common: they may not marrie, nor speake to a Woman (which fault is punished with death) they goe alway bare-foot, in poore array, eating nothing but Rice and greene herbes, which they begge from doore to doore. They craue it not, nor take it with their hands, but goe with a wallet at their backes alwayes, with their eyes modestly fixed on the ground, and calling or knocking, stand still, till they receiue answere, or some thing be put in their wallets. Many times they set themselues naked in the heate of the Sunne: notwithstanding that himselfe, with such direct beames, together with his frie (whole armies of Gnats) doe their vtmost malice on them. They rise at midnight to pray vnto their Idoles, which they doe in Quires, as the Friers doe. They may not buy, sell, or take any Rents, which, if they should doe, would bring on them the imputation of Heretiques. Some Merchants of Siam being at Canton, and hearing that Frier Martin Ignacio and his companions, were there imprisoned, 'for entring that Chinian Kingdome withou License, they visited them, and seeing their poore Friers Weedes, they, besides other almes, offered to pay their ransome, if money would doe it.

i G. Bot. Ben. lib. 2. part. 3.

The Siamites i commonly hold, that God created all things, rewardeth the good, punisheth the bad: That Man hath two Spirits; one good, to keepe; and the other euill to tempt, continually attending him. They build many and faire Temples, and place in them many Images of Saints, which sometime liued vertuously, and now are in Heauen. They haue one Statue fifty paces long, which is sacred to the Father of men. For they thinke that he was sent from aboue, and that of him were borne certaine persons that suffered Martyrdome for the loue of God. Their Priests are clothed in yellow long garments. (This colour is esteemed holy: and euery yellow thing, for the resemblance which it hath with Gold, and with the Sunne, is hallowed to God.) Besides that which is before said of their strict orders, they may not nourish Hennes, because of their female Sexe. To drinke Wine, is punished in their Priests with stoning. They haue many Fasts in the yeare, but one especially, in which the people frequent the Temples and their Sermons. They haue their Canonicall houres by day and night for their holy things. They hold, that the World shall last eight thousand yeares, whereof sixe thousand are passed, and then it shall be consumed with fire: at which time shall bee opened in Heauen seuen eyes of the Sunne, which shall drie vp the Waters, and burne vp the Earth. In the ashes shall remaine two Egges, whence shall come foorth one Man and one Woman, which shall renew the World. But there shall be no more Salt, but fresh Riuers and Lakes, which shall cause the Earth, without mans labour, to abound in plenty of good things. The Siamites are the sinke of the Easterne Superstitions, which they deriue to many Nations.

Gasper de Cruz [k] testifieth that the Bramenes in Siam are Witches, and are the Kings principall seruants. They worship one god called Probar Missur, which (say they) made Heauen and Earth: and another called Pralocussur, who obtained of a third, named Prassur, that power vnto Probar Missur. Another called Praput Prasur Metri. Hee thinketh the third part of the Land to be Priests or Religious persons. These Religious are proud, the inferiour worshipping their superiours as gods, with prayer and prostrating. They are reuerenced much of the people, none daring to contradict them: so that when our Frier Gasper preached, if one of those Religious came, and said, This is good, but ours is better, all his Auditors would forsake him. They number in their opinion, seuen and twentie Heauens, holding that some of them are (like Mahomets Paradise) fraught with faire women, with meates also and drinkes; and that all liuing things which haue soules goe thither, euen Fleas and Lice. And these lousie heauens are allotted to all secular persons which enter not into their rule, and habit of Religion. They haue higher heauens for their Priests which liue in wildernesses, ascribing onely this felicitie to them, there to sit and refresh themselues with winde. And according to the higher merits they assigne other higher heauens among their gods, which haue round bodies like bowles, and so haue these that goe thither. They hold also that there are thirteene Hells, according to the differing demerits of mens sinnes.

k G. de Cruz. See my Pilgrims, To. 1. l. 2. c. 10.

Of their Religious men, some are supreme and sit aboue the King, called Massauchaches: a second Order they entitle Nascendeches, which sit with the King, and are as Bishops: a third and lower ranke sit beneath the King, named Mitires, which are as Priests, and haue the Chapuzes and Sazes, two inferior degrees, vnder them: all reuerenced according to their place. Except the Priests and Religious, all are slaues to the King, and when they die, their whole state deuolueth to him, how hardly soeuer the wife and children shift: which was caused through a rebellion against the brother of the King, which then reigned when the Frier writ this.

In the yeere 1606. Balthasar Sequerius a Iesuite, landing at Tanassary, passed from thence partly by goodly Riuers, partly ouer cragged and rough Hills and Forrests, stored with Rhinocerots, Elephants, and Tigres, (one of which tare in pieces one of their company before his eyes) vnto Odia. Conferring with the Talipoies or Religious men, he learned their conceits; That there was now no God in the world to gouerne it: Three had beene before, now dead, and a Fourth is expected, which deferreth his comming. In the meane while, lest this huge Frame should want a Ruler, it is ordered by a certaine [l] Bubble or Brooch which some of the Former Gods had left. The vulgar people heare these bubbles, bables, and fables with great reuerence and silence, holding vp their ioyned hands. They obserue their Festiualls, according to the course of the Moone; and then open their Temples, whither the people resort to doe their deuotions. These are built strong and stately, with Art and Beautie: hauing their Porches, Cloisters, Quires, and lower Iles, great Chappels being annexed on both sides and large Church-yards. In one of these hee saw a Statue of eighteene Cubites length, dedicated to the great God. They are of marueilous abstinence, and thinke it a great sinne to taste wine. In their Quires, they haue singing men, which after the Europæan fashion sing there, especially in the shutting in of the Euening, and about midnight. Very early in the morning, warning is giuen for them to goe to beg from doore to doore. They haue their funerall Holies and Obits for the dead. The carkasses are burned, being put into painted Coffins, with great solemnitie (if they be great men) with Musicke and dances, and great store of victuals to be bestowed on the Talipoys. Thus farre Sequerius.

The Inhabitants of this Kingdome are much giuen to pleasure and ryot: they refuse the vse of Manuall Arts, but addict themselues to Husbandry. They haue [m] publike Schooles, where they teach Lawes and Religion in the vulgar Language: other Sciences they learne in a more learned Tongue. They worship innumerable Idols, but especially the foure Elements; according to which his Sect, each man maketh choise of his buriall. They which worshipped the Earth, are therein buried: the Fire burneth the dead carkasses of them which obserued it: in the Ayre are hanged (to feast the airy-winged people with their flesh) those which adored the Ayre, being aliue. The Water drowneth those which had aliue beene drowned in that Waterie Religion. Euery King, at his first entrance to the Crowne, erecteth a Temple, which hee adorneth with high Steeples, and innumerable Idols. In the Citie of Socotay is one of mettell, fourescore spans high.

coast, compassing from Champa to Tauay. But of this space the Arabians, or Moores, haue vsurped two hundred, with the Townes of Patane, Pahan, Ior, and Malacca (now in possession of the Portugals) and the Kingdomes of Aua, Chencran, Caipumo, and Brema, haue shared also therein. Odia [c] is the chiefe Citie thereof, containing foure hundred thousand housholds, and serueth the King with fiftie thousand Souldiers: and to the Riuer Caipumo (on which it standeth) belong two hundred thousand vessels. This King hath nine Kingdomes subiect to him, and thirtie thousand Elephants, whereof three thousand are trained to the warres: His Nobles hold their Lands in a kinde of Knights-seruice, like the Turkish Timars (yet onely for terme of life) without the Kings pay serue him, whensoeuer hee appointeth, with twentie thousand Horse, and two hundred and fiftie thousand Foot. The Country is compassed with the high Hills of Iangoma, Brema, or Brama, and Aua, and is it selfe plaine, in situation and fertilitie (caused by inundation) like to Egypt. The Lai are tributaries to Siam, for feare of the Gueoni, Caniballs, and Man-eaters, liuing in the Mountaines adiacent; against whom the Siamite defendeth them, and inuaded those Gueoni one time with twentie thousand Horse, two hundred and fiftie thousand Footmen, and ten thousand Elephants, for Carriages and Warre.

Cæsar [d] Frederike reporteth, That in the yeere 1567. the King of Pegu besieged the King of Siam his chiefe Citie, with an Armie of one million and foure hundred thousand men, and lay before it one and twentie moneths, and had fiue hundred thousand fresh Souldiers sent him in supply, end yet had not preuailed, if treason had not more furthered his designes then force. The gates were one night set open, and the Peguans entred; which when the Siamite perceiued, hee poysoned himselfe, leauing his children and Kingdome a prey to the Conquerer: whose triumphall returne, Fredericke (then in Pegu) beheld. Since that time the Kings of Siam haue been tributaries to Pegu. After this Peguan had reigned seuen and thirtie yeeres, he left his Kingdomes, but not his fortunes, to his sonne: who taking displeasure against the Siamite, his vassall, sent for him to come to him, which hee refused. And thereupon he entred into his Country, with nine hundred thousand men, and besieged him in his chiefe Citie: which hee, seeking politike delayes, made semblance still to deliuer, vntill in the third moneth after (which was March) the Riuer ouerflowed the Countrey sixe score miles about, after his yeerely custome, and partly drowned, partly committed to the Siamites (attending in Boats for this booty) to be slaughtered, that huge Army; of which, scarce threescore and ten thousand returned to Martauan, and those without Elephants and Horses. And when the King of Pegu proceeded in his attempts with like successe, the Siamite at last besieged him in Pegu, his royall Citie, Ann. 1596. But hearing a rumor of the Portugals comming to helpe him, hee raised his siege. These are the reports of Franciscus Fernandes, a Iesuite. Of the Peguan we shall speake more in the next Chapter.

Peter Williamson Floris a Dutchman, which liued long in the East Indies, employed first by his Countrey-men, afterwards by the English; hath giuen vs the latest intelligence of these parts. When Siam (saith he) was tributarie to Pegu, the two brothers sonnes to the King of Siam, brought vp in the Court of Pegu, made an escape home. Where the eldest (called in the Malaya tongue Raia Api, that is, fierie King, by others, the blacke King) had such successe against Pegu, as yee haue heard: and Pegu falling, raised himselfe to high fortunes, subiecting the Kingdomes of Camboia, Laniangh, Lugor, Patane, Tenesary, and diuers others. This victorious King deceased Ann. 1605. and dying without issue, left the Throne to his brother, which was termed the White King, of peaceable and milde disposition. He lying on his death-bed, Anno 1610. by the instigation of Iockrommeway, one of his principall Lords, (who sought to deriue the succession vpon himselfe) caused his eldest sonne to be slaine, being a young man of great hope. Yet his brother, the second son succeeded, and gaue Iockrommeway his desert. This man had besides other slaues, two hundred & eightie Iapanders, which to reuenge their masters death ran in ioynt furie to the Court, and possessed themselues of the young King, whom they compelled to commit vnto their massacring hands foure chiefe men, as the authors of their masters death: and after many other abuses, forced Him to subscribe to a composition of their owne making, and to giue them some of the chiefe Palapos or Priests for hostages, and so departed with a great treasure; vsing much violence at their departure, the Siamites as meere spectators daring nothing to the contrary. (The King of Siam sent to the Iapanian Emperour to complaine of this insolence, who promised to send these Iapanians to Him, there to receiue their due punishment. Generall Saris then in Iapan saw the men going to the Court as hee came from thence.)

Countrey still intangled with the Iaponian slaues; but was met by the King of Siam, and forced to retire. But the report was (saith hee) that the two Kings had combined in league against the Siamite to dispossesse him, being then of two and twentie yeeres, which yet without intestine rebellion, they are not able to effect.

On August the fourth, 1612. the English arriued at Siam, the town being thirty leagues vp the riuer: Septemb. seuenteenth, they had audience of the King, who granted them free trade, and a faire house. The Country at this time of raining was couered with water, October the twentie six, they had such a storme, that old folkes had not seene the like, which besides other harmes, blew downe the Kings fathers faire Monument. Their ship was neere a wrack, but by great care and paines was saued, fiue of the company being drowned, of which they supposed one to be deuoured of a Whale. The Kings in the Indies are all Merchants: none at Siam might buy any commodities till the King had first serued his owne turne.

Of the Kingdome of Malacca.

MAlacca is now subiect to the Portugals (if not since our last intelligence taken from them by the Kings of Achin and Ior, who held it in siege, as the fame went, conquered by Alphonsus Albuquerke, or [f] Albiecher (so King Emanuel in his Letter to Pope Leo, containing all this exploit, termeth him) who was their greatest Conquerour in the Indies, subduing more to that scepter then all before him or since. Iohn de Barros relates at large the founding and proceeding of this City, who writes that some two hundred and fiftie yeeres before the Portugals arriuall in the Indies, it was first founded. Anciently Cingapura was the chiefe place of trade & habitation in all that coast, which lies in the most Southerly point of all Asia, about halfe a degree North from the Æquinoctiall; then resorted to by the Merchants of China, Camboia, and the rest of the continent, & many Ilands to the East and West, which they called Dibananguin and Atazanguin, that is Leuant and Ponent, or, vnder the winds (West) and beyond the winds (East) all the Nauigation in those parts being by the Monsons or certaine winds which obserue their set seasons of the yeere. In those times reigned in Cingapura, one Sangesinga, and in the neighbouring parts of Iaua one Pararisa, who dying, left to the care of his brother his two sonnes: which slaying the eldest, & making himselfe King, by his tyrannies caused diuers of the Iauan Nobilitie to forsake their Country. Amongst the rest Paramisora fled to Cingapura, who with his many followers was entertained kindly by Sangesinga, whom not long after he vngratefully slew, and by the helpe of his Iauans possessed himselfe of the state. The King of Siam (whose tributary and son-in-law Sangesinga had bin) forced him to leaue his ill gotten throne, and to seek new habitation one hundred and fortie miles thence, where he settled himselfe at the riuer Muar with two thousand followers, some of which were called Cellati, men that liued on the Sea by fishing and pyracie: these he would not receiue into his new fortresse of Pago, as not well trusting them, though before they had made him lord of Cingapura. These therefore seated themselues fifteene miles from Muar, in the place neere which Malaca now standeth, ioyning with the Natiues, halfe Sauages, whose language is called Malayan. The place growing strait, they remoued three miles vp the riuer, where was a Hill called Beitan with a large plaine, the commodiousnesse whereof inuited Paramisora to leaue Pago, and to ioyne with them in this new foundation, which was after called Malaca, signifying a banished man, in remembrance of this Iauans exile. In succeeding times the merchandize and Merchants too remoued from Cingapura to Malaca, Saquem Darsa then succeeding his father Paramisora, who subiected himselfe as vassal to the King of Siam, which assigned to his obedience all the Country from Cingapura on the East to Pulo Zambilan, which is to the West of Malaca one hundred and twentie miles, all which space of coast is two hundred seuentie miles by Sea. The Monsons or winds in these parts continue West and Northwest, from the end of August to the end of October: Nouember begins Northerly winds and Northeasterly, which blow till the beginning of April. From May till the end of August, the South and Southwest beare sway, according to which the Mariner must direct his course, and take his proper season.

The Monsons.

The situation of Malaca is vnwholsome, by reason of the marishes and neerenesse to the line (little aboue two degrees to the North) else it would haue bin the most populous Citie in the Indies. The successors of Saquen Darsa by little and little eased their shoulders of the Siam subiection, especially after the Moores, Persians, and Guzurats had conuerted them to Mahomets sect, and at last vsurped absolute Souereigntie. But the King of Siam nine yeeres before the Portugall conquest, sent a Fleet of two hundred saile, and therein fixe thousand men against Mahumet King of Malaca, the General of which Fleet was Poioan his Vice-roy of Lugor, to whom the Gouernours of Patane, Calantan, Pan, and other Coast-cities were to pay their tributes for the King of Siam. From Lugor to Malaca is six hundred miles saile alongst the coast, much subiect to tempestuous weather, which diuided this Fleet; some of which fell into Mahumets hand by treachery, to the ouerthrow of the rest. The Siamite in reuenge prepared a great Armie by Land, and Armada by Sea, foure hundred Elephants, and thirtie thousand men: but without expected euent, by the insolencie of some of his Souldiers in Rapes and Robberies, which raised the Country against them, whiles Poioan was in the siege of Pan or Pam, another Citie in rebellion. The King of Siam further enraged, sent two Armadas, one by the way of Calantan, the other by the way of Tenaz-zary, one on the East side, the other on the West of this long tract of land, but before Mahumet could be punished by the Siamite, the Portugall had preuailed against him.

King Emanuel had sent Diego Lopes de Sequeira from Lisbone, Anno 1508. who came the next yeere to Malaca, and there vnder faire colours of traffique, Himselfe and his whole Fleet were in danger of betraying and murthering, by this perfidious King and his Bendara or chiefe Iustice. This ruled all cases Ciuill, the Lacsamaua or Admirall, all Marine, and the Tamungo or Treasurer all the Reuenue, and these three the whole gouernment; which treachery in the yeere 1511. was requited by Albuquerke, who by his proper valour, and wonted Fortunes, with secret intelligence amongst the Malayans, conquered the Citie, expelled the King (who in few dayes vomited His soule after this pill) and built there a Fortresse and a Church, establishing the Portugall Lawes, but so as both the Ethnikes and the Moores had their owne Magistrates, appeale reserued to the highest. The most remarkable things in this exploit were, the Chaine which one Nuodobequea (one of the principall conspirers against Sequeira, now encountred in a Sea-fight by Albuquerke in his voyage to Malaca) ware on his arme, with a bone of a Iauan beast called Cabal therein, by vertue whereof, notwithstanding many and wide wounds, he lost not one drop of blood, till that Chaine being taken off, his veines suddenly and at once emptied themselues of blood and life: the store of artillery of which they tooke three thousand Peeces, of eight thousand, which the Portugals affirmed had beene there: their venomed Arrowes, and Calthrops strowed in the way, the poyson whereof once touching the blood, made them mad, with other symptomes, as in the biting of a mad dog, which they learned after to heale by chewing the leafe of a certaine hearbe growing in the Countrey: the vndermining the street of the Citie to blow it vp together with the Portugals: the disaduantage of the fight with Elephants, which being here enraged with wounds, would not be ruled, but brake the ranks of their owne side: the treacherie of this people first to the Portugals, then to their King, after that to the Portugals againe: the prey and spoile (besides all that the King and they which fled carried away, and all the Gold, Siluer, prouision of warre and concealements excepted) amounted to two hundred thousand duckets for the Kings due, which was the fifth part.

The bone of the Cabal.

Abdinus the sonne of King Mahomet busily bestirred himselfe, but in vaine, to recouer his lost Patrimonie, neither the Ile Bintam, which he fortified, as he did also Pagus, nor force nor fraud being able to defend him from his fathers fates and fortunes. The Moores haue enuyed this successe to the Portugals, and often haue attempted to depriue them of Malaca. The Hollanders also vnder Cornelius Mateluius, Anno 1608. laid siege thereto, whiles the Portugall was seeking new conquests at Achen, who in their returne might easily haue defeated them, had they not beene vnaduised in too long aduising. When the Portugals went to Malaca, the King of Pans marriage with the daughter of Mahomet was to bee solemnized, a banquetting house of timber couered with silke, sumptuously prepared to this purpose on thirtie wheeles, to be drawne with Elephants, the Principals of the Citie being therein. But this Kings affection was soone cooled by these disasters.

From Cingapura to Pulo Cambilan, there is no other habitation of any reckoning, but a few Puts where Fisher-men dwell, and a few Villages within Land. This is the Centre of the Easterne Traffique. They are proud of their language (which some say was deuised by the founders:) wherein they deuise many Sonnets and amorous Poesies. The Malayos, or Country-people, goe naked, with a cloth about their middle, and a little roll of cloth about their heads. Lodouico Barthema (who was there before the Portugals knew it) supposed, that here arriued more ships then in any Citie in the world. The Riuer Gaza neere thereunto, is more after his reckoning, then fifteene miles ouer. The people in the Countrey lodge in Trees, for feare of Tygres.

Linschot. R. Fitch.

It is strange that g Barros writes of these Tygres, that in the height of eight yards they will reach and deuoure men: their chiefe preseruatiues against them are their night fires: the multitude is such that many enter by night into the Citie for prey, of which hee tels that after the Portugals had taken it, that a Tygre leaped ouer a high wall, and carried away three slaues tied to a piece of timber, together with the wood, leaping againe vpon the wall with admirable lightnesse. The Countrey being barren, the Citie abounded neuertheless with plentie of necessaries, exceeding those places whence they were brought.

After that [f] Alphonsus Albuquerke had conquered Malacca; the Moores dispossessed there, seated themselues in diuers places along the coast, & some of them vsurped the title of Kings.

Of Patane and the neighbouring petie Kingdomes.

PAtane [g] is a Citie Southwards from Siam, chiefe of that Kingdome, whereto it giueth name, in the height of seuen degrees. The buildings are of Wood and Reed, but artificially wrought. The Mesquit (for many of them are Mahumetanes) is of Bricke. The Chinois are more then the natiue Inhabitants. They are of an Ash-colour. They vse [h] three languages; the Malayan (which to them is naturall) the Sian, and Chinan. The first is written like the Hebrew, from the right hand; the second, like the Latine from the left, and almost in like Characters; the third, from the right to the left, with a descent from the top to the bottome. The Chinois haue Idolatrous Temples, and so haue the Sians, wherein are many golden statues; the Priests which attend them are clothed in yellow. They haue sacred youths which are their Oracles. The people when they enquire of them, sit a conuenient distance from the Images, and obserue the young mans gestures (who with his haire disheuelled lyeth prostrate before the Idoll) singing and playing on Instruments, vntill he arise, and standeth vp. For then, as possessed of the Deuil, he runneth vp and downe with a terrible countenance, and maketh a stirre, as if he would kill himselfe, and them that stand by, with a sword which he hath in his hand. Then the people prostrating themselues, request him to declare the Deuils Oracle, and he answereth as pleaseth him; his lies being accounted Oracles. Adulterie is here a capitall offence, the father of the malefactor being the Executioner, or his next kinsman, if he be dead: yet is this vice common (notwithstanding this rigor) by reason of the womens vnbridled lust.

h Nauig. Iacob Neccij.

The Kingdome hath bin gouerned many yeeres by a Queene, who gaue good entertainment to the Hollanders. Iames Neccij and his fellowes, An. 1602. after their double misfortune and madnes, which had befallen them, the one in iest, the other in earnest; this at Macao in China, where they were, and knew it not, and setting twentie men on [i] shoare, neuer saw them againe, but heard, that the Portugals had caused fifteen of them to be hanged: the other at Auarella Falca, in 11. degrees and an halfe, where they found the Tract of Carts, and footings of beasts, but could not see a man, nor shoot a beast. They ghessed that the people liued as the Tartars, wandring in Carts and Tents, without any settled dwelling. The place was by them called Sotternym, by reason that many of their company had lost the vse of reason, and became mad with eating a certaine fruit there growing like to Plums, with a tender stone, which continued till they had slept. Had they knowne then the easinesse of the cure, it had bin better then any Comedie to haue tickled their Splene, and prouoked [k] laughter, to see one fighting against the enemies, which assaulted him at his Cabbin: to heare another with piteous shrikes crie out on the multitude of Deuils and Hobgoblins, which affrighted him: a third sees strange sights, and cries out, The ship is full of strangers: and whiles one, in more pleasing distraction, enioyeth (and inyeth in that distracted pleasure) the sight of God and his Angels, another (transported by this humoured Charon) with dreadfull and gastly lookes, and trembles at his supposed sights of the Deuill, and his hellish associats. It were a madnesse to relate how exceedingly this their madnesse was diuersified, and how many Acts this Tragicall Commedie had, till sleepe had dispersed those fumes, wherewith that fruit had distracted their braines. From thence (as is said) they came to Patane, where the Queene entertained them in good sort, and to their contentment.

i The Hollanders saw many men & women of China in their boats, which were Fishers, and dwelt in them: but saw not a Portugall, nor could procure any of the other, at any sum, to deliuer them a letter on shoare. After, 1603. the Hollanders tooke a rich ship of the Portugals at Macao, laden for Iapan. Cornel. de Vena.

k A merry madnesse of Euery one in his humour.

As the difference of their writing, in such neerenesse of dwelling, is very much; so no lesse is found in their Religions. The Pataneans are Mahumetanes. The Chinois and Siamites are Ethniks, in that diuersitie of Rites which you haue heard. Whiles the Hollanders were there, one of those youths, in that Prophetical distraction before mentioned, warned them to depart from thence; for a great fire would otherwise consume them: whereupon many forsooke their habitation, and yet no fire happened. They also saw the execution of their seuere Law against Adulterie, on two noble Personages, whose lewd familiaritie being detected, shee chose to bee strangled, and hee to bee stabbed (the Law permitting them their choice of the kindes of death) which by the fathers of the parties was executed on them. In single persons it is accounted no crime. And if a forreine Merchant come to trade there, they vse to 1 Orbells. The Siamites that liue here, weare two or three [1] balls of Gold or Siluer, as bigge as a Tennis-ball, in their yards, as we shall after obserue in Pegu. The Mahumetans weare them not. The Queene keepes her selfe close at home among her women; of which some may not marry (but yet may doe worse) others may, hauing first obtained the Queenes licence. It is seldome that shee is seene; yet sometimes she rideth on an Elephant in Progresse, for her recreation. And for Elephants, they haue a deuice to take them in this sort. Some ride into the [m] woods on a tame Elephant, and when they espie a wilde one, they prouoke him to fight. Whiles these are fastned in the encounter by the teeth or tuskes, each striuing to ouerthrow the other, some come behinde the wilde Elephant, and fasten his hinder feet, and so either kill him for his teeth, or by famine tame him.

Peter Williamson Floris. Anno 1612. Iune the two and twentieth; Some of the English came to Patane, with a Letter from His Maiestie to the Queene, accompanied with a present from the Merchants, of six hundred Rialls of Eight. This Letter was deliuered in great pompe, being laid in a bason of Gold, carried on an Elephant, furnished with many little Flags, Launces, and Minstrels; The Queenes Court also being sumptuously prepared to this businesse. They obtained grant of a Trade on like conditions to the Hollanders, who had their Factory their ten yeeres before that time, and their House in that space twice burned.

The Iaponites had twice destroyed Patane by fire in fiue or sixe yeeres space. The Countrey adioyning was also full of warres: the King of Ior ouer-runne, and burned in September that yeere, all the Suburbes of Paan: those of Camboya, Laniam and Iagoman, ioyning their force against the King of Siam. On the one and thirtieth of December, the Queene of Pantanie went to sport Her selfe, accompanied with sixe hundred Prawes, where wee (saith Floris) saluted Her, being a comely old woman, about sixtie, tall and full of Maiestie, such as they had seene few in the Indies. Shee had in company Her sister, which is Heire apparant, commonly called the young Queene, vnmarried and about fortie sixe yeeres of age. The Queene had not beene forth of her house in seuen yeeres before, and now intended to hunt wild Bulls and Buffes, of which there is great abundance. The waters this yeere were extraordinarily high, carrying away many houses. The Queenes younger sister was married to the King of [n] Pahan, whom Shee had not seene in twentie eight yeeres, notwithstanding Her often Embassies to that purpose. At last, prouoked with the Kings dallying and delaying to send Her, Shee sent out a Fleet of seuentie Sayle, with foure thousand men to Pahan, to bring her Sister by force, in April 1613. Hee (being distressed by warres which the King of Ior had made on him, burning his Houses, Barnes and prouisions; and the Queene of Patanie making stay of all Iunkes of Rice laden for Pahan) arriued there, Iuly the twelfth, with the Queenes Sister, and her two sonnes: and all the Dogs were for his sake killed, because he can indure none. August the second, hee was entertained with a feast, at which the English were inuited guests, where they saw a Comedie played all by women, after the manner of Iaua, with antique apparell, very pleasant to behold. Once before, in the Queenes presence they had seene twelue women and children dance very well, after them the Gentlemen, and last of all the Hollanders and the English were requested to doe it. This Queene is well monyed, both the English and Dutch tooke vp money of Her at vse: this and merchandise, being in the Indies the practice of Kings.

His Iauan Slaues seeing this, would haue taken him, but by rescue of his other Slaues, hee escaped. They nouertheless slew all that came in their way, and presently set the houses on fire. Laxmanna's Iauan Slaues could not by any threats be detained from ioyning with them, and set all on fire as they went, so that the whole Town, except the Queenes Court, the Meskit, and some few houses, were burned. The Iauans tooke such Bond-women, as they best liked, away with them, and fled into the Countrey. Few of them could be taken.

Achin Armada came to this Siege, so that twenty three of their men were taken. The rest came October the one and twentieth to Patanie. Master Copland then at Achin with Generall Best, writes, that the Kings Armada returning, arriued Iuly the third, Gallies and Frigats a hundred and twenty, or more, with which Laxaman the Generall had subdued the Kingdomes of Ioar and Siak, bringing with him both the Kings and two of their brethren, which he saith, were honourably sent backe, and remained tributaries to Achin.

The [p] Hollanders haue had much trading at Patane; and the King of Iohar or Ior moued with their good successe against the Portugals, ioyned his Nauie to theirs, to chase them out of those parts. Yea, they haue braued the Portugals euen before Goa, the Seat of their Vice-Roy; and in Nouember, 1604. at Calecut [q] entred into solemne league with the Samaryn, (at least offered it Iarric denies the acceptation) against them: and the next yeere they wonne from the Portugals, the Castles of Amboyne and Tidore, not to mention many other Prizes taken from them by the Hollanders at Maçao, one ship worth a Million; at Sincapura, &c. at sundry times. In the yeere 1605. Cornelius Mateliuius was sent to the Indies with twelue Ships; and the next yeare after Paulus à Caerden, with twelue more. And Mateliue [r] besieged Malaca, as before is said. But in this attempt they had not successe answerable to their desire: and yet not so ill as was likely. For the [s] Portugals vpon this newes returning from Achin, vpon espiall of a Flemish Saile, called a Counsell, and made it the next day before they came vp; in which space the Hollander had leisure to bring all his Ordnance (then on shore for battery) aboord his Ships, and to prepare himselfe for fight, which he held two dayes with the Portugall with two Ships losse on each side, the Portugall giuing way. So little counsell is sometimes in consultation, and easily is opportunity lost in the very seeking.

Iarric writeth that the Hollanders hauing taken the Fortresses of Amboin and Tidor, entred League with ten neighbour Kings, enemies to the Portugals, and with eleuen Ships, seuen [t] Barkes, came before Malaca in the end of Aprill 1606. The Kings Confederate had of all sorts of Shipping, three hundred twentie seauen, with foure thousand men. The Iapanders which were then in Malaca vpon affaires of Merchandize, did performe good seruice for the distressed Portugal. The Siege continued almost foure moneths, in which the citie endured fiftie thousand great shot, before the Vice-Roy Alphonsus Castrius freed the same: He leauing the charge of Goa to the care of Menesius the Arch-Bishop, with a great Armada set forth in the beginning of May, ignorant of this Siege: and set vpon the Acheners by the way, where hee got blowes and shame. Sixe leagues from Malaca the Hollanders fought with him August the eleuenth. The first day was little difference, the next day one Holland Ship was burnt, and the Admirall fired; two Portugall ships burned, one of them the Admirall. On the third and fourth the Portugall had the better: but so as neither part were absolute Conquerours. Hee that will not onely reade, but in manner see, the most of these exploits of the Hollanders, with other rarities of the Indies, may resort to Theodoricke [u] and Israel de Bry, who haue in liuely stamps expressed these Nauigations; with the obseruations of Linschoten, and others.

They haue in the Easterne Ilands done much harme to the Portugalls and Spaniards. Captayne Schot tooke the Castle and Iland of Solor, with a great quantitie of Sandelwood, and sent the Portugalls to Malacca.

He mentioneth one Fleet of theirs in the Moluccos of two and twentie saile, and that they expected the next yeere (1614.) fourteene saile more. Bangam nameth seuen and thirtie Factories, and twentie Forts and Castles of theirs all beyond the Cape Comori. In some places where they haue Castles, hee saith, They threatned to carry such (as Prisoners) to their Fort, that should sell their commodities to the English. In some places where the People are poore, and haue nothing but their Cloues to liue on, the Hollanders buy it at a cheap rate (as fiftie Ryalls of Eight the Bahar) which they seldome giue in mony, but in Rice, Clothes, and Commodities, so that eight Ryalls of Eight well employed on the Coast of Coromandel, may here yeeld a Bahar, which is sixe hundred twentie fiue pound of Cloues. Hee addeth, That they will not suffer the Malayans and Iauans to haue Cloues but of them, at sixtie sixe Ryals readie money. Richard Cock from Iapan writes, That the Spaniards feare the losse of the Philippina's by their force: which is sufficient to do in those Seas what they list. The Spaniards succeeded the Portugals in the Moluccos, which the Hollanders tooke from them: and the Vice-roy of Mexico, with the Gouernor of Manilla, haue ioyned in their endeuors against them: the Countrey people also better affect the Spaniard, as more Liberall and Bountiful. The Spaniards haue in these Easterne parts besides Manilla, the Castles of Gamalamma in Ternate, of Tidore, Gelola, Battachina, as Bangam obserueth. Thus much haue I thought thought to speake here of the Hollanders, who haue worthily sought & found much Honor, especially by their Marine exploits, round about the world; which if it bee attended with some vnneighbourly quarrels with Ours, and other soyle of couetousnesse, in this humaine frailty, and their proper thriftinesse, is no great wonder.

Balbi mentioneth an Iland on this Coast called Carnalcubar, the Inhabitants whereof goe from one Iland to another (as the Caribes were wont) to hunt men for their cruell diet. For the most part they liue on fish, goe naked, without Law, and had almost seized on him and his company. Dauid Middleton [x] affirmeth the like of another Iland called Seran, which prouoked by wrongs from the Portugals, eate all Christians they can get, rosting them aliue, without regard of any ransome.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the Kingdome of Pegu, or Brama, and the subiect and neighbouring Kingdomes.

§. I.

Of the Greatnesse of the King of Pegu.

OF the Kingdome Brema, or Brama, the Citie Royall is a Pegu, the Nation where began the greatnesse of the late Kings. These Bramans inhabited neere the Lake Chiamay, among whom the King of Pegu had his Lieutenants or Viceroyes: one whereof (the Deputy of Tangu) about threescore and ten yeares since, rebelled against him, and surprised the Kingdomes of Prom, Melintay, Calam, Bacam, Mirandu, Aua, all peopled with the Bramans, trending Northwards a hundred and fiftie leagues. Hee after attempted Siam with an Armie of three hundred thousand, and spent three moneths in making way through the huge Woods and inaccessible Places, but atchieued not his purpose. After his returne hee assayled Pegu, and conquered it; and then returned the second time 1567. as in the former Chapter is mentioned. [b] Hee subiected to his Seignorie twelue Kingdomes, which Fernandes thus rehearseth: The Kingdome of Cauelan, where are the best Rubies and Saphyres. Secondly, that of Aua, the bowels whereof are filled with Mines of Copper, Lead, and Siluer: The third Bacan, enriched with Mines of Gold: Tungran, the fourth aboundeth with [c] Lac and Lead: such is Prom, the fifth: the sixth is Iangoma, stored with Copper, Muske, Pepper, Silke, Siluer, Gold: Lauran, the seuenth, hath Beioin enough to lade ships: the eight and ninth are the Kingdomes of Trucon, Staples of China-Merchandize: the tenth and eleuenth are the Diademes of Cublan, betweene Aua and China, powdred with precious stones: Siam, whence wee last came, is the last of the twelue; in the inuasion whereof hee armed a million and threescore thousand men (which number is short of [d] Fredericks reckoning, except wee ascribe that surplusage to Victualers, Voluntaries, and Seruants and Attendants on the baggage;) which Armie (saith Fernandes) hee tythed out of his people, taking one only of ten.

d Fredericke saith, he had 26 crowned Kings at command, and that no King in the world was of greater power. Cæs. Fred.

Fredericke then in Pegu saith he had fiue hundred thousand, sent him in supply of those which were slaine and lost of the first Armie, which consisted of [e] foureteene hundred thousand men: after one and twentie moneths siege, hee preuayled by Treason of the Siamites, which opened one of their Gates in the night, and receiued his Forces into the Citie: whereupon the King of Siam poysoned himselfe, leauing a rich bootie to the Conqueror. Hee saw at the Kings returne the Elephants ordered in a triumphall square, laden with Gold, Siluer, Iewels, and with the Great Prisoners of Siam. This King (saith the same Author) hath no power by Sea, but in the Land, for People, Dominions, Gold and Siluer, hee farre exceeds the Great Turke. He hath diuers Magasons full of Treasure, which is euery day encreased without diminishing, besides that hee is Lord of the Mines of Rubies, and other Iewells. The King in his Feasts vsed to ride on a triumphall Chariot all guilded, drawne by sixteene Horses, it was high with a goodly Canopy ouer it, twentie Lords attended the same, holding in their hands a Rope, fastned to this Chariot, to keepe it vpright. The King sits in the middle, and about him stand foure of his chiefe Fauorites. Before marcheth the Armie, in the midst, all the Nobilitie, and round about the Chariot, exceeding pompously and orderly. The King hath one principall Wife, three hundred Concubines. The voyage from from Saint Thomee vſed by the Portugals, is by Negrais, where on the left hand ſtood a Varella all guilded, ſeruing for a Sea Marke, the Sunne ſhining thereon cauſing it to bee ſeene farre off: Neere thereto is the Iland of Flies, ſo called of the ſtore of Flies, cauſed by the multitude of Fiſhes there ſalted. Thence Balby paſſed to Coſmi, the Territory whereof is full of Woods, and theſe full of Tygres, wild Swine, Parrats, Apes, and other Creatures. Coſmi is in ſixeteene Degrees one third part, the Houſes are of Canes, couered with thatch, much annoyed with Tygres, which enter often into the Towne and deuoure Men or Beaſts. From hence they paſſe in Paros or Barkes by diuers Villages alongſt the Riuer to Iaccubel a great Citie, and a little beyond to another called Tegiatden. Dian is a great Towne a little further, where they make Barkes or Veſſells as bigge as Galeaſſes, hauing on both ſides quite through, roomes for Merchandize, and in the midſt a kinde of dwelling-houſe, where they trade: they paſſed further by Bedagiamana, Lagapala, Purdabin, Gungiebin (where they anchored in the midſt of the ſtreame, for feare of the Tygres, which in the water ſometime aſſault men.) Coilan a Citie foure ſquare, each ſquare three miles; Tuuagnedan another Citie full of Varellas or Temples and Images; Leuagon a pleaſant Citie full of Palme-trees; Siluanpedi, where many victualling Barkes are made, and ſerue for dwelling and victualling downe to the Sea; Dala, where the Kings ſtables for his Elephants were; Dogon, the moſt Religious; Meecao, where they vn-laded their goods to paſſe by Land to Pegu. All this way is by freſh Riuers with ſwift Tides, the houſes on both ſides, many, built vpon Timbers aſcended by Ladders, to preuent Tygres, for which cauſe alſo ſome keepe Buffals in their houſes, the ſent of whom the Tygres cannot endure. All this way they vſe Manini in ſtead of mony, made of glaſſe. The Vatellas or Temples in this way, are innumerable, of diuers faſhions. This King held himſelfe the greateſt King in the World, and cauſed himſelfe to bee entituled, The liuing God vpon earth: which the LIVING GOD in heauen auenged on him, as you ſhall heare. Caplan is the place where they find Rubies, Spinels and Saphires, digged out of high Hils, to which none may haue acceſſe but by leaue. It is ſix dayes iourney beyond Aua. The Buffals in theſe parts are of Aſh-colour, ſo great that they are like Elephants. In any great ſolemnitie thefoure white Elephants went before the King with furniture all of gold, their teeth alſo in a iewelled ſheath. Hee hath much artillery, but wants men to manage them; much materialls for ſhipping, but wants Shipwrights and Mariners. His iewells are ineſtimable. Balby ſaw him weare two Rubies, each as bigge as two Dates, but not ſo long, of admirable luſtre. Hee ſo abounded with wealth, that a hundred ſhips, fraughted with Rice, ſeemed to diminiſh nothing of the plentie. The fields are ſaid to yeeld three haruеſts in a yeere: and of Gems the ſtore is beyond eſtimation, and almoſt maketh them there ſhort of the eſtimation of Gems. But this wealth, then wanting no ſtore, had, when Fernandes writ this 1598. a contrary viciſſitude, of no ſtore, but of want, euen of thoſe things which Nature exacteth, as neceſſary props of life. Scarcely of ſo many millions were left ſeuen thouſand perſons, Men, Women, and Children, to participate in the Kings impriſonment, or ſiege, in his Tower, and thoſe feeding on mans fleſh, the Parents requiring of the Children that life which before they had giuen, to ſuſtayne their owne, and now layed them not in their boſome, but in their bowels; the Children became liuing Sepulchres of their ſcarce-dead Parents. The ſtronger preyed vpon the weaker: and if their fleſh was eaten vp before by their owne hunger, leauing nothing but skin and bones to the hungrie aſſault of theſe Raueners, they ripped the belly, and deuoured their inward parts, and breaking the skull, ſucked out the braynes raw. Yea, the weaker ſexe was by the ſtrength of famine, armed with no leſſe butcherly deſpight, againſt whomſoeuer they could meet in the ſtreets of the Citie; with their kniues, which they carryed about them, as Harbengers to their teeth, in theſe in-hoſpitall inhumane-humane banquets.

G. Balby, cap. 34. R. Fitch. Cities in the way from Negrais to Pegu.

And thus did the beſieged Citizens, while the King endured in his Tower no ſmall part of like miſery, beſides the indignitie, ſo to bee by his owne Vaſſals ſtraitned, and after ſlaughtered. But ſuch is the iuſt hand of the King of Kings, who regardeth not perſons, but as Hee ſheweth Mercy to the Mercifull, ſo doth He reſerue Vengeance for Crueltie and Tyrannie. Pardon me, Reader, if on this ſpectacle I cauſe thee, with my ſelfe, to ſtay a while and wonder. The Sunne, in his daily iourney round about this vaſt Globe, ſaw Few equall (that I ſay no more to this Peguan Greatneſſe, and yet in a ſmall ſpace He that is higher then the higheſt, hath abated and abaſed this Magnificence lower then the loweſt of his Princes.

§. II.

Of the destruction and desolation of Pegu.

AFter the death of that Braman Conqueror, his sonne, in the second moneth of his succeeding reigne, hearing that the King of Aua, his Tributarie and Vncle, was plotting some Conspiracie, committed to prison fortie of his Nobles, Partners in that new Proiect, & bringing them al, with their Parents, Wiues, Children, Friends, and Acquaintance into a Wood, set y fire thereon, commanding to cut them in pieces, whosoeuer escaped out of the flame. This kindled another fire in the hearts of his discontented Subiects, which was not quenched but with his ouerthrow. Hee warred on his Vncle, the King of Aua, with no great aduantage, till they both agreeing to trie it by single combate on Elephants, Pegu obtained the Conquest. Their fight was first with Harquebusses, after with Darts, lastly with Swords. By the helpe of his Elephant Pegu preuailed, yet so as their perished aboue two hundred thousand of the three hundred thousand hee led forth in this Expedition, and almost as many of the Auan side. Of his Elephants teeth which dyed in this battell, were made little Images or Idols. In the meane time the Siamite with an Army marched to the borders of Pegu, divulging rumors, That he came to succour his Lord against the Auan Rebel. The King enraged hereat, sent presently part of his Forces to take him, and present him Captiue: but the Souldiers refused to follow the Generall in this enterprise, and returned to their owne houses. The King, after his returne, sent to Siam, by faire speeches to perswade him to come to him: he refused his presence, but denied not his wonted Tributes. Hereupon the King, after two yeres prouision for the war, made that vnhappy Expedition in the former Chapter mentioned. And there the waters taking part with the Siamite, he tried once and againe the like fortunes of warre. He sent his brother the King of Iangoma, and his owne Son, twice; which did much harme to the Siamites, and receiued no little themselues; neuer returning without losse of halfe their Armie, & of his own Son, in the last inuasion slain with a shot. Relentlesse he (inflamed rather with his losses) determined another Expedition in his owne person; and therefore laid vp store of prouision in Barnes at Martauan, Murmulan, Tauay, and Tanassarin, three yeeres together, purposing then to employ all the Peguans in this enterprise. But they weary of forreine calamities, hid themselues in Woods and Wildernesses, and some turned Talopoyes: so they call their Religious persons. Many sold themselues slaues. The King persisting, in his Person gaue order to his Vncle Ximibogus, to take a muster of all the People, and to entertaine halfe of them for the warres. But he missing so many, which had by those new courses preuented this seruice, acquainted the King therewith; who enioyneth the late professed Talopoyes to resigne their habit, the young-men to be compelled to warfare, the old men to be exiled to the Bramans, where after he caused them to be exchanged for horses. He caused all the Peguans also to bee branded in the right hand, that they might be knowne. This made them entertaine thoughts of Rebellion, which was first practised by the Cosmians, who set a new King ouer them.

y There were destroyed by this flame and execution 4000. persons, Arthus pag. 326. & Gasper Balby, c. 37. hath the same number, saying, That all the Citizens of Pegu were enioyned to be present at the execution. He cals the place not a Wood, but a Prison. He was then at Pegu.

The Peguan sent an Armie against them, with charge to burne or bring away all they could find amongst them, which they did, together with many of the People of both sexes, which he (after his manner) setting wood about them, burned. And when the rest (not able to warre against their King and Famine at once) submitted themselues, with exquisite z torments he slue them all. He then sent to his Son, the King of Aua, to transplant those People of euery Age and Sexe, to people these forlorne desolations of Pegu. They, vnacquainted with this ayre, brake forth in diseases, wherwith they infected also the naturall Inhabitants: which plague made such hauoke, that many in impatience cast themselues into the Riuer. The Murmulans with helpe of the Siamites, seised on their Castle, whom the King besieged a yeere together, and then was forced from thence by the Siamites sudden irruption, with losse of the most of his People, the Horses, Elephants, and Country it selfe remaining their recompence. And the Peguan Captaines also, fearing their Masters tyrannie, became subiects to the Siamite, whose whole Families this tyrant with Fire and Water destroyed; so that all the Tract from Pegu to Martaua and Murmulan was made a Wilderness. These things done, hee sent for his younger Sonne, the King of Prom, and commanded him to the siege of Murmulan; who, vtterly misliking the attempt, conueyed himselfe in the night homewards, with purpose of rebellion.

z The cruell tyrannie of the King of Pegu.

The King of Siam not ignorant of this Peguan estate, inuaded the country in Harueste time, and therefore that which they could they conueyed into Barnes, the rest was fired. Hee proceeded and laid siege to Pegu; in which at that time was a hundred and fiftie thousand Men, and three thousand Peeces of Ordnance, a thousand whereof were Brasse: but

(as is said) for feare of the Portugalls, which were reported to haue entred into Siam by the way of Camboia, hee departed, leauing Famine behind, as Lieutenant of his Warres, which caused the Forreigners, then in Pegu for the defence thereof, to get them to their owne homes. Those few which remained, liued with prouision from Tangu. The King sent to his Deputie in Tangu, to come to him with all the Inhabitants of the Countrey and their store, leauing his Wife, and some few to guard the Citie. He answered, That he would send halfe, and to demand all were vnreasonable. The King sends foure Noble-men, with Souldiers to force him hereunto. But he slayeth the Leaders, and seizeth on their Followers. Thus the Famine encreasing, and the People eating one another, the King numbreth the Citizens, among whom hee findeth seuen thousand Siamites, whom he commanded to bee slaine, not leauing aboue thirtie thousand of all sorts in the Citie. His sonne, the King of Prom, which had now stood out three yeeres, began to relent and sue for pardon, with promise to bring the Promans (to the number of fiftie thousand) to the Citie, whereat his Father reioyced, and sealed his pardon, which hee sent him with many gifts. But his chiefe Counsellor, Author of this Rebellion, fearing all the blame would be laid on him, poysoned the Prince; himselfe aspiring to the Kingdome, was within one weeke destroyed: and the Nobles, euery man seeking to seize the State to himselfe, caused that of those fiftie thousand, within two moneths space, whiles euery weeke they had a new Prince, scarce remained fiftie men fit for Warre, which departed to Pegu, three or foure in a ship, leauing their Countrey to the habitation of wild Beasts.

Iudas cannot be secure, till he hang himselfe.

The Natiues of Pegu are not quite extinct, but many of them are fled into other Kingdomes; of whom, and of the Bramans, Iangoma numbreth a hundred and twentie thousand: Oracan, twentie thousand: Siam, a hundred thousand; and the King of Iangoma is able (they say) to arme a million of Men.

The Talapoyes perswaded the Iangoman to depose his brother of Pegu. Hee alledged his Oath vnto his Father, while he liued. They reply, That no Oath might prohibite, if hee placed his brother in a Vahat (or golden Throne) to be adored for a god. And partly with this (I may not call it) Reason: and partly, as Xerxes alledged for himselfe, because that his elder Brother was borne before his Father was King, and because his Mother was the former King of Pegu's Daughter, hee perswaded himselfe that it was lawfull.

And thus was the State of this mightie Kingdome, in the yeere 1598. brought to one Citie, which also was now become a withered carkasse, and well-neere the Sepulchre of it selfe, and (as mischiefe come not alone) besieged by Mogus, King of Orracan.

Andreas [a] Bones (in his Letters the eight and twentieth of March 1600.) thus finisheth this Tragedie. When the King of Pegu saw himselfe in such straits, besieged by the King of Orracan, or Arracan, and Tangu, in his Castle of Macao, in Decemb. 1599. hee yeelded himselfe to the King of Tangu; who dealt treacherously with him, and cut off his head, as he did to the Queene likewise, and the Prince. He then hasted to the Tower of Pegu, where he found as much Gold and Iewels as laded [b] six hundred Elephants, and as many Horses, besides Siluer and other Metalls of smaller price, which he left behinde. The King of Arracan then absent, and angrie that the King of Tangu (contrary to promise) had seized all the treasure to himselfe, purposed to inuade his Kingdome, and to that intent, had the ayde of many Portugalls (amongst whom this Iesuite was one) who saw the wayes and fields, lately so fertile, now full strewed with Dead mens bones and skulls, and in the Riuers all passage of Ships hindered by the carkasses of Men. The King of Arracan found in the Towne aforesaid, three millions of Siluer, with two and thirtie hundred Peeces of Ordnance, and then remained Lord of Pegu. But the Kings of Siam and Iangoma preuented his enterprise for Tangu, which they inuaded, to depriue him of his Treasures. The King of Siam twice assailed Martauan with repulse, whereupon hee caused two of his cowardly Captaines [c] to bee cast into Cauldrons of scalding Oyle: and the third time conquered that Kingdome.

[b] Iarric hath 700. Elephants & 700. Horses.

[c] A cruell punishment of Cowards.

Peter Williamson Floris hath giuen vs later relations. Hee reports that the King of Pegu had in his flourishing greatnesse twentie Kings subiect to him, which fell to the Siamite, Raia Api before mentioned. Hee besieged Vnxa or Pegu two Moneths without effect. Dearth and death made Pegu resigne himselfe to the King of Tangu, that so he might also preuent the King of Arracan, who comming with his power tooke the Citie and the Countrey. The King of Tangu agreed with him to restore certaine Treasures, the white Elephant, and the Kings daughter (both which I saw, saith Floris in Arracan, Anno 1608.) and the King of Pegu, or else that he himselfe would kil him; which he afterwards did with a pilon wherewith they stampe their Rice, as being free (I know not by what Art) against any stabbing. Thus came this Empire, after the destruction of many millions of Peguans, to desolation, that at this day there is no remembrance of it. The King of Arracan gaue the Towne or Fort of Siriangh on the Riuer of Pegu to the Portugals in keeping, especially to Philip de Britto de Nicote,

This King gaue order for the building vp againe of the old Towne, and called together the Peguers, making them many faire promiſes, and ſo went forward to Teneſſeryn, where Banya came to him with fiftie thouſand Peguans, before ſubiect to Siam. Some tell of this white Elephant, (for ſo they ſpeake as if there were but one, whereas *Fitz. It hath beene a diſmall and diſaſtrous Beaſt to fiue or ſix Kings, which had the poſſeſſion thereof, all hauing Tragicall ends. Iarric writes that the King of Pegu yeelded himſelfe, his Wife and thirteene children (three other, the King of Arracan had two ſonnes in hoſtage, and a daughter in marriage) to his ſiſters husband the King of Tangu, truſting the rather to his fidelitie, becauſe when his eldeſt Sonne had forſaken him, and gone to Tangu in hope of the Queene his Aunts fauour, Shee cauſed his loſſe of loyaltie to be puniſhed with the loſſe of his head. Tangu killed all this royall Family.

Martauan.

Martauan, before mentioned, was a goodly Peguan Kingdome, but by wars was brought into like miſeries. The Region was ſo fertile that it yeelded three Haruefts in a yeere, and ſent yeerely fifteene Ships to Malaca, as many to Cochin, laden with Rice: the Woods abounded with excellent fruits, the Hearbes and ſhrubs were generally odoriferous or medicinall: diuers kindes there grew of Rices not like to ours: ſtore of Pines and Tecam, a Wood not ſubiect to rottenneſſe. A Countrey rich in Mines of Iron, Lead, Steele, Braſſe, Siluer, Gold and Rubies, Springs and Riuers, Indian Palmes, and Sugar-Canes. The Forreſts had Buffolos, Harts, Boares, wild: the Hauen open at all times of the yeere, and not choaked with ſand, as vſually in the Indian Winter. The Citie ſtands in 16. degrees; of great trading, a temperate ayre (the Megrim is vnknowne nor Phyſicions.) The King Bannalaius ninetie nine yeeres of age, who with his Heire apparant were chaſed out of the Kingdome, and hid themſelues in the Forreſts, as before that time aboue two hundred thouſand of their Subiects had done, onely three thouſand ſtaying with the King.

Thus haue you heard of the power and ſubuerſion of this great Monarchie: ſo much the more lamentable, becauſe their fall was from ſuch a height. The Countrey is ſo fertile, that at what time ſoeuer corne be put into the ground, the payment is good with increaſe. I haue ſeene with mine eyes (ſaith Cæſar Fredericke) that they haue eaten Serpents, Scorpions, all manner of hearbes and graſſe. Such fertility, and ſuch ſtomackes, as they make credible the reports of their huge Armies, ſo doe they make more terrible the reports of their deſolations. This that I ſpeake of their dyet, I vnderſtand not of their extreamitie and famine, but ordinarily. Maſter Fitch ſaith the ſame, that they eate Roots, Hearbs, Leaues, Dogs, Cats, Rats, and Snakes; they refuſe almoſt nothing.

§. III.

Of the Peguan Rites and Cuſtomes.

IT is aboue a hundred yeeres ſince Vertomannus was there, who in company of a Perſian Merchant went to viſit the King, who then had wars in Aua. They went in a Boat all of one piece of wood, fifteene or ſixteene paces long. The Oares were Canes, and the Maſt was one Cane as big as a Herring Barrell. The King wore as many Iewels as were worth a great Citie, which made him in the night time to ſhine as the Sunne. Hee had a ſacrifice to doe to the Deuill, and the next day the Perſian preſented him with rich Corralls, which hee tooke in ſo good worth, that he gaue him as many Rubies as were worth a hundred thouſand Duckets. Some yeeres [d] before, Hieronymo de Sancto Stephano found him in the ſame warres with Aua, and ſaith of him, that hee had ten thouſand Elephants, and bred or brought vp euery yeere fiue hundred.

Supplications, written in the leaues of a tree, with the point of an yron bigger then a bodkin. These leaues are of an Ell long, and two Inches broad; they are also double. Hee which gineth in his Supplication standeth a little off, with a present; which, if the King granteth his request, he accepteth, if not, he returneth with his present.

They kneele downe thrice, lifting vp their hands, and kisse the ground thrice: this they doe foure times before they come where the King sits, who speakes by an Interpreter, and not immediatly to the Suppliant, who with these Rombees (so they call these kneelings) present their gifts ouer their heads: His Guard lies prostrate to the earth.

Pegu is (or at least in a more vnhappy tense, when they were there, was) a Citie great, strong and very faire, with walls of Stone, and great Ditches round about it, with many Crocodiles in them. There are two Townes; the old, in which the Merchants abide, and the houses are made of Canes, called Bambos: and the new, for the King and his Nobilitie: the Citie is so subiect to fire, that euery day Proclamation is made to take heed to their fire. The Citie is square with faire walls, hauing in each Square fiue Gates, besides many Turrets for Centinels to watch, made of wood, and gilded very faire. The Streets are strait as a line, from one Gate to another; and so broad, that ten or twelue men may ride a-front through them. On both sides at euery mans doore is set a Coco-tree, yeelding a faire shew and comfortable shaddow, that a man might walke in the shade all day. The houses are made of Wood, and couered with Tiles. The Kings house is in the midst, walled and ditched about: and the houses within of Wood, sumptuously wrought and guilded. And the house wherein his Pagode or Idoll standeth, is couered with Tiles of Siluer, and all the walls are guilded with Gold. Within the first gate of the Kings house was a large roome, on both sides whereof were houses made for the Kings Elephants. Among the rest hee had foure white Elephants, a thing rare in Nature, but more precious in his estimation. For this is part of his Royall Title, The King of the white Elephants. And if any other hath any, he will seeke by fauour or force to haue the same, which (some [c] say) was the cause of the quarrell betwixt him and the King of Siam. Great seruice was done vnto them. Euery one of these white Elephants stood in an house guilded with Gold, and were fed in vessels of Siluer gilt. One of them, as hee went euery day to the Riuer to bee washed, passed vnder a Canopie of Cloth of Gold or Silke, carried by sixe or eight men: as many going before playing on Drums or other Instruments. At his comming out of the Riuer, a Gentleman washed his feet in a Siluer Bason. There were of blacke Elephants nine Cubits high. The King was said to haue aboue fiue thousand Elephants of Warre. There was about a mile from Pegu, a place builded with a faire Court in it, to take wilde Elephants in a Groue: which they doe by the female Elephants, trained to this purpose, and anointed with a certaine Oyle, which causeth the wilde Elephant to follow her. When the Hunt's-men haue brought the Elephant neere to the Citie, they send word thereof, and many Horse-men and Foot-men come out and cause the female to take a streight way, which leadeth to the place where shee entereth, and hee after her: for it is like a Wood. When they are in, the gate is shut, and they get out the female. The wilde one seeing himselfe alone, weepeth and runneth against the walles, which are made of strong trees: some of them breake their teeth therewith. Then they pricke him with sharpe Canes, and cause him to goe into a strait house, and there fasten him with a rope, and let him fast three or foure dayes, and then bring a femall to him, with meat and drinke, within few dayes taming him. When they goe into the Warres, they set a frame of wood vpon their backes (bound with great Cordes) wherein sit foure or six men, which fight with Guns, Darts, Arrowes, and other weapons. All Authors agree, that no beast commeth so neere the reason of a man as the Elephant, yea they seeme to goe before some men in conceit, haughtinesse, desire of glory, thankefulnesse, &c.

The Peguans are beardlesse: and carrie pinsers about them to plucke out the hayres if any grow. They blacke their teeth, for they say a Dogge hath white teeth. The men of Pegu, Aua, Iangoma, and Brama weare balls in their yards, which they put in the skinne being cut, and weare for euery childe one, till they haue three, and may take them out at pleasure: the least as bigge as any Wall-nut: the biggest as bigge as a little Hennes Egge. They were inuented to preuent Sodomie, which they vse more then any people in the world: Abusing the Male-Sexe, causeth the women also to weare scant clothes, that as they goe, their thigh is seene bare to prouoke men to lust. Both these were ordained by a certaine Queene for those causes, and are still obserued. If the King giue any one of his Balles, it is a great Iewell accounted: they heale the place in sixe or eight dayes. The Bramans that are of the Kings bloud, pricke some part of their skinne; and put therein a blacke colour, which lasteth alway. If any Merchant resort thither, hee shall haue many maydes (saith [d] Linschoten) offered him by their parents to take his choyse, and hauing agreed with their parents, hee may for the time of his abode, vse her as his slaue, or his Concubine, without any discredit to her. Yea, if hee come againe, after shee is marryed, hee may, for the time hee stayeth there, demaund her in like sort to his vse. And when a man marrieth, hee will request some of his friends to lye the first night with his Bride. There are also among them that sow vp the priuie part of their Daughters, leauing onely passage for Vrine; which, when they marry, passe vnder the Surgeons hand for remedie. Gasper Balby; and Got. Arthus, tell of another custome of their Virgins, if that name may bee giuen them. For, saith hee, e Virgines in hoc regno omnino nullas reperire licet: Puellæ enim omnes statim à pueritia sua medicamentum quoddam vsurpant, quo muliebria distenduntur & aperta continentur: idque propter globulos quos in virgis viri gestant: illis enim admittendis virgines arctiores nullo modo sufficerunt. Their money is called Ganza, and is made of Copper and Leade, which euery man may stampe that will. Gold and Siluer is merchandise and not money. The tides of the Sea betweene Martauan and Pegu by f Cæsar Fredricke are reputed the greatest wonder which hee saw in his trauels; being so violent, that the ayre is filled with noyse, and the earth quaketh at the approach of this watery element, shooting the Boats that passe therewith as arrowes, which at a high water they suffer not to anchor in the Channell, which would betray them to the deuouring iawes of the returning tide, but draw them toward some Banke, where they rest in the ebbe on dry land, as high vpon the Channels bottome as any house top. And if they arriue not at their certaine stations, they must backe againe whence they came, no place else being able to secure them. And when it encreaseth againe, it giueth them their calls or salutations: the first waue washeth ouer the Barke from stemme to sterne: the second, is not so furious: the third, raiseth the Anchor. In Negrais in Pegu g diuers people dwell in Boates, which they call Paroes; the Countrey being full of Riuers, in which they goe to and fro with their Families: as strange is the dwelling here on the Land; their houses being set on high posts, and their going vp on Ladders for feare of Tygres. From hence to Pegu is tenne (as is said before) or eleuen dayes iourney by the Riuers, as before is expressed, where their Markets are (as their dwellings) vpon the water in Boates, with a great Sombrero, like a Cart-wheele, to keepe off the Sunne made of Coco-Leaues. They vse in riding to carry bits in their mouthes, which make them swell: and puffing cheekes. The husbands buy their wiues, and if they mislike, put them away. And if the wiues Parents will take away their daughters, they must restore that which was giuen in price for her. If a man dies without children, the King is his Heire. And if hee hath children, the King hath a third, they the rest. They vse to carrie men somewhat after the fashion of Congo, in a kind of Couerlet of Cotton, called Delingo of diuers colours, made commodiously to keepe off the Sunne, and Raine, and easie to lie on as a bed, carried by foure men, which alway runne from morning to night, resting onely once in the day. The wife, children and slaues of the Debtor are bound to the Creditor: who may carry the Debtor to his house, and shut him vp, or else sell the wife, children and slaues. The Noble and Ignoble obserue one fashion of attire, differing in the fineneſse of the matter, which commonly is bombast. One piece for a shirt, another large and painted, tied vp betweene the legges; On their heads a kind of Mitre, of the same, and some like a Hiue: they goe bare-foot, but the Nobles vsually are carried in Delingos, or on Horse-backe. The women weare a smocke to the girdle, from thence a strait cloth, of purpose to shew that they are Women, in sort before related. They goe bare-foote, their armes laden with Hoopes of Gold and Iewels, and their fingers full of precious Rings, with their haire rolled vp about their heads. Many weare a cloth about their shoulders in stead of a Cloake. In Pegu they vse much Opium. Aracan is mid-way betweene Bengala and Pegu, on the Coast. Hee is able (saith Fredericke) to arme many Austs by Sea, and by Land hath certaine Sluces, with the which, if the King of Pegu his greatest enemy, assaulted his Countrey, hee could at pleasure couer a great part with waters. In Pegu they haue a custome of buying and selling by Brokers, which vndertake for the performance on both sides. Also that others standing by may know what is bidden for commodities, they haue their hands vnder a cloth, and by touching the fingers, and nipping the ioynts (each finger and ioynt hauing his proper signification) they make vp their bargaines.

CHAP. V.

Of the Religion in Pegu, and the Countreys ſometime ſubiect thereto.

THeir Varellaes or Idol-Temples in the Kingdome of Pegu are many. [a] They are made round like a Sugar-Loafe, or a Bell: ſome are as high as a Church, or a reaſonable Steeple, very broad beneath: ſome a quarter of a mile in compaſſe: in the making of them, they conſume many Sugar-Canes, with which they couer them from the top to the bottome. Within, they bee all earth, done about with ſtone. They ſpend thereon much gold, for they be all gilded aloft, and many of them from the top to the bottome: and euery ten or twelue yeeres, they muſt bee new gilded, becauſe the Raine conſumeth off the gold, for they ſtand open abroad. Were it not for this vaine cuſtome, gold would there be good cheape. About two dayes iourney from Pegu, there is a Varelle, [b] or Pagode, which is the Pilgrimage of the Pegues. It is called Dogonne, and is of wonderfull bigneſſe, and all gilded from the foot to the top. This houſe is fifty fiue paces in length, and hath in it three Iles or Walks, and forty great Pillars gilded, which ſtand betweene them. It is gilded with gold within and without. Theſe are houſes very faire round about for the Pilgrims to lie in; and many goodly houſes for the Tallipoys to preach in, which are full of Images, both of men and women all ouer gilded; I ſuppoſe it the faireſt place in the world. It ſtandeth very high, and there are foure waies to it, which all along are ſet with Trees of Fruits in ſuch wiſe, that a man may goe in the ſhade aboue two miles in length. And when their Feaſt-day is, a man can hardly paſſe by Water, or by Land, for the great preaſe of people, which reſort thither from all places of the Kingdome. There are on the ſhoares of Dogon two Statues, which from the head down-ward repreſent young men, but haue the faces of Deuils, and two wings on their backes. In Pegu there is Varelle, or Temple, like to this, which the King frequented to doe his Holies therein, mounting vp ſtaires, at the foot whereof were two Tygers, gaping wide, ſeeming as if they had beene aliue. Beſides the many Magazins (or Treaſuries full of Treaſure) which the late Braman King had, hee had neere vnto the Palace a Court walled with ſtone, the gates whereof were open euery day. Within this Court are foure gilded Houſes, couered with Lead; and in euery of them certaine Idols of great value. In the firſt houſe was a great Statue of Gold, and on his head a Crowne of Gold, beſet with rare Rubies and Saphires, and about him foure little children of Gold. In the ſecond Houſe is another of Siluer, as high as an Houſe, ſet as it were ſitting on heapes of money, crowned, his foot is as long as a man. In the third houſe there is the like Idoll of Braſſe: and in the fourth, of Ganza (which is their Mony-mettall, tempered of Lead and Copper.) In another Court, not farre from this, ſtand foure other Coloſſes, or huge Images of Copper, in Houſes gilded faire, as they are themſelues, ſaue the head. Balby [c] tells of fiue made of Ganza, ſo monſtrous, that the toes of their feeet were as big as a man, and ſitting croſſe-legged, were yet as high as one could hurle a ſtone, and were all gilded. Fernandes [d] relateth of threeſcore and ſeuen Images of Gold, richly adorned with Iewels, and three hundred threeſcore and ſixe Combalengas, or Gourds of Gold, molten by the Kings Father, each weighing a hundred & foureſcore pound, beſides his other Treaſures; to conceale which, he ſlew two hundred Eunuchs his attendants.

Their Tallipoys, [e] before they take Orders, go to Schoole till they be twentie yeeres old, or more: then they come before a Tallipoy, appointed for that purpoſe, whom they call Rowli. Hee (as chiefe and moſt learned) examineth them many times, Whether they will leaue their Friends, and the company of all Women, and take vpon them the habite of a Tallipoy. If hee be content, then hee rideth vpon an Horſe about the ſtreets, very richly apparrelled, with Drums and Pipes, to ſhew, that hee leaueth the riches of the World to bee a Tallipoy. In few dayes after, he is carried vpon a Thing like an Horſe-litter, which they call a Serion, vpon ten or twelue mens ſhoulders, in apparrell of a Tallipoy, with Pipes and Drums, and many Tallipoys with him, and all his friends; which accompany him to his Houſe, ſtanding without the Towne, and there leaue him. Euery one of them hath his Houſe (which is very little) ſet vpon ſixe or eight Poſts, to which they aſcend on a Ladder, of twelue or fourteene ſteps. Theſe Houſes are commonly by the High-wayes ſide, and among the Trees, and in the Woods. They goe ſtrangely apparrelled, with one Camboline, or thin Cloth, next to their bodie, of a browne colour; another of yellow, doubled many times vpon their ſhoulders. Theſe two bee girded to them with a broad Girdle; and they haue a Skin of Leather hanging on a ſtring about their neckes, whereon they ſit, bare-headed and bare-footed, with their right armes bare, and a broad Sombrero, or ſhadow, in their hands, to defend them in f Balby c.37. beards f, and all their bodies. They obſerue perpetuall Chaſtitie, and are modeſt in their going. When one of them dies, his body is kept many dayes with Feaſts, and after is ſet on a high Scaffold, many Tallapoys feaſting about it. Thus it is carried to the place of burning, by a great number of people, where it is conſumed with ſweet Woods to the bones, theſe buried neere their Houſes, and the aſhes caſt into the water. Balby reſembles them in Habite and Ceremonies to their Friers.

They goe with a great Pot made of Wood or fine Earth, and couered, tyed with a broad Girdle vpon their ſhoulders, which commeth vnder their arme; wherewith they goe to beg their Victuals which they eate, which is Rice, Fiſh, and Hearbs. They demand nothing; but come to the doore, and the people preſently doe giue them one thing or other: which they put together in their Pot. They keepe their Feaſts by the Moone; and at a new Moone is their moſt ſolemne Feaſt: and then the people ſend Rice and other things to that Kiack, or Church, of which they be: and there all the Tallipoys of that Church meet, and ate that which is ſent them. They Preach againſt all abuſes, and many reſort vnto them. When they enter into their Kiack, at the doore their is a great Iarre of Water, with a Cocke or a Ladle in it, and there they waſh their feet, and then enter in, lifting vp their hands to their heads, firſt to their Preacher, & then to the Sun, and ſo ſit downe. When the Tallipoys preach, many of the people carry them gifts vnto the Pulpit, where they ſit and preach. And there is one that ſitteth by them, to take that which the people bring, which is diuided among them. They haue none other Ceremonies nor Seruice that I could ſee, but onely Preaching.

G. B. B. l. part. 3. They imagine, that fiue haue gouerned this preſent World, whereof foure are paſſed aboue 2090. yeeres agoe. Now they are without a God, and expect the fifth many Ages hereafter: after whoſe death, they conceiue, that the World ſhall periſh by fire, and then another World ſhall follow, and others Gods to rule it. They recken likewiſe in the number of their Gods certaine Men, which yet haue firſt paſſed into Fiſhes, Beaſts, and Birds, of all ſorts. After death they beleeue three Places; one of Pleaſure, Scuum, (like the Mahumetane Paradiſe;) another of Torment, Naxac; the third of Annihilation, which they call Niba. The Soules, after their phantaſie, abide in the two former places, whence they returne ſo often into this life, till at laſt they be holden worthy that Niba. Hee addeth, that they haue Couents or Colledges of Prieſts, which liue three hundred together, or more, in one place, haue no vſe of Women, are harbourers of Strangers, and liue ſome of Almes, ſome of Rents. They haue like Nunneries alſo for the Women. There is ſuppoſed to be in one Idol-Sanctuary (whereof they haue many) 120000. Idols. They faſt thirtie dayes in the yeere; in which they eat nothing till night. They are of opinion, That he which in this world robbeth another man, ſhall in the next world bee his ſeruant for recompence. They hold it a ſin alſo to kill a liuing creature, although this be not ſtrictly obſerued amongſt them. Some Iewes are of opinion, That this people deſcended of thoſe Iſraelites which Salomon ſent to Ophir, which they place in this Kingdome. g But the Peguans themſelues aſcribe

They entertaine him alſo with diuerſitie of Muſicke, and appoint him a Prieſt, whom they call the Deuils Father, which procureth his Rites and Muſicke. Some, as ſoone as they riſe from their beds, bring a basket of Rice, and meates, and a burning Torch in their hands, running vp and downe in the ſtreets, openly profeſſing to feede the Deuill to preuent harme from them that day. And if Dogs follow them, they hold them to be ſent of the Deuill, to deuoure thoſe meates in his name. Some will not eate till they haue firſt caſt ſomething behinde their backes to the Deuill. And in the Country Villages ſome of the richer inhabitants leaue their houſes furniſhed with ſtore of food three moneths ſpace to bee inhabited of him, keeping meane while in the fields: that ſo the other nine moneths they may bee out of his danger. They haue many Feasts very solemnly obserued. k One Feast (called Sapan Giachie.) is kept twelue leagues from the Citie; whither the King rides in a triumphall Chariot, with his Queene in exceeding pompe (so adorned with Iewels, that the eye cannot endure their shining) his Nobles attending. Another l is kept in Pegu, against which day all the Courtiers prouide them certaine Pillars or Images of diuers formes; kept closely, that none may see what others haue prouided, till the Day. These are made of Indian Reedes, carued and gilded, and on the Festiuall presented to the King, who praiseth the most artificiall of them. All that night huge lights of Waxe are burnt in honor of their Idoll, whose Feast it is, that all may see to haue accesse to him; to which end the Citie gates are left open. But none may approach vnto him emptie-handed. They haue m a Feast of Watering celebrated in the old Citie, where the King, Queene, and his Children, with Rose-water sprinkle one another. And all the Captaines likewise besprinkle each other, that they seeme as wet as if they came out of a Riuer. It is said of the last Kings Father, that when the people were thus washing, he would send amongst them an Elephant, which slew many of them, whereat he laughed; the people lamented. Another Feast n they haue, wherein they haue a triall of their Ships, which can saile best: this Feast lasteth a moneth. A fifth Feast o is called Giaitnosegienon, in honor of a certaine Idoll. They haue many other Feasts, but these the most solemne. Antony Correa a Portugall, concluding a league with the King of Pegu, the Kings Deputie, caused the Articles of accord, written in Portugall and Pegu-languages with golden Letters, to bee read aloud, and then rent the scrole, and with a few leaues of an odoriferous tree, caused the same to bee burned to ashes, vpon which hee laid both hands of the Priest, who in the Name of the King, sware to those Articles. These things being done with great attention and silence, Correa, loth in a superstitious fancie, to defile Holy Writ, with confirmation of an Oath to a Gentile, sware on a Booke of amarous Sonnets to keepe inuiolable the said Articles.

In the yeere of our Lord 1585. the King of Aua rebelling (as is before shewed) the King of Pegu, by single combate, slew the Traytor. The fight was on Elephants: in which, the Peguans Elephant, and the Auan Prince, died. The liuing Elephant was preferred to the place of the former; but in fifteene dayes space (let the beastlinesse of Men imitate the humanitie of a beast) hee sorrowed so p for his Master, that nothing might comfort him. And although hee had continually two seruants attending him, and telling him of his amended estate vnder a mightier Master, yet would he scarce cease to weepe, or begin to eate, till his fifteene dayes exequies were finished.

p Gasper Balby was there with other Merchants, which saw him weeping.

Bomferrus, a Franciscan, spent three yeeres in learning the Pegu's Language, and Mysteries, that hee might preach the Christian Religion amongst them; but was soone forced to giue ouer, and returne into India: For they could not endure to heare any better Knowledge then they had. This was Anno 1557.

Crocodiles and Apes q are accounted holy and sacred creatures: for which cause, Apes multiply exceedingly; none taking them, except for the vse of their Varelles, or Temples, where they tye them, and keepe them with diligent respect. And though the Crocodiles in the Town-ditch deuoure men daily, yet in a blind zeale they will drinke no other water, accounting this holy, and account their soules certainly saued, whose bodies are thus certainly lost and deuoured of those Beasts, which sometimes are thirtie foot in length; one of which, Balby saw draw in a woman: and not a day, but some were said to be deuoured, till the King caused one of those, which was obserued to be most manslaying, to be slaine.

q G. Balby.

The Kings, subiect to the King of Pegu, did their homage, and presented themselues before him, kneeling; yea, they not only kneeled to him, but to his white Elephants also. When the King dyeth, they make two Ships, with golden couers, and betwixt them erect a golden Theatre; in which they place the corpes, applying thereto Musk, and the most sweet Woods, with other things; and so set forth the same to Sea, setting that Theatre or Pageant on fire. In one of the Ships or Tallapois, which sing till they thinke the bodie to bee consumed to ashes. Then doe they make a masse or lumpe of these ashes and milke, and commit the same to Sea in the Hauen of Sirian, at an ebbing water. The bones which remaine, they carrie to another place, and there erecting a Chappell, doe burie the same therein. After this, they returne to the Palace, and, according to the accustomed Rites, inaugurate the new King. The father of that King (whose Tragedie yee haue heard) had his bones buried in Dogon.

In Iamahey, or Iangoma, (fiue and twentie dayes iourney from Pegu) when the people be sicke, they make a vow, to offer meat vnto the Deuil, if they escape: and when they be recouered, they make a Banquet, with many Pipes and Drummes, and many other Instruments, and dancing all the night. Their friends bring them presents, Cocos, Figges, Arrecaes, and other Fruits; and with great dancing and reioycing, they offer to the Deuill, and say, They giue the Deuill to eate, and driue him out: and to this end, in their dancing, they crie and hallow very loud. Likewise, when they be sicke, a Tallipoy, or two, euery night doth sit by them, them, and ſing, to pleaſe the Deuill, that hee ſhould not hurt them. When one is dead, hee is carryed vpon a great Frame (as is ſaid before of the Tallipoys) made like a Tower, with a couering all gilded, made of Canes, carried by fourteene or ſixteene men, with great Minſtrelſie, to a place out of the Towne, and there is burned. He is accompanied with all his friends and neighbours, all Men: and they giue to the Tallipoys, or Prieſts, many Matts and Cloth; and then returne to the houſe, where they feaſt it two dayes: which being expired, the Women accompanie the wife to the place where hee was burned, and there ſpend a while in mourning: Then doe they gather the pieces of bones, which bee left vnburned, and burie them, and then returne to their houſes. The neere of kindred doe alſo ſhaue their heads, both men and women.

Of Bengala, and the parts adioyning: and of the holy Riuer Ganges.

§. I.

Of Bengala.

a Magin. Gio. Bot. Ben. Got. Arthus hiſt. Ind. Orient. pag. 282.

THe Kingdome of Bengala [a] is very large, and hath of Coaſt one hundred and twentie leagues, and as much within Land. Francis Fernandes meaſureth it from the Confines of the Kingdome of Ramu or Porto Grande to Palmerine, ninetie miles beyond Porto Pequene, in all ſix hundred miles long. The Riuer Chaberis (which ſome call Guenga, and thinke to bee the ancient Ganges) watereth it: it is plentifull in Rice, Wheat, Sugar, Ginger, Long-pepper, Cotton and Silke; and enioyeth a very wholſome ayre. The Inhabitants neere the ſhoare, are (for the moſt part) Mahumetans, and ſo alſo was the King, before the Great Mogore (one likewiſe of his owne Sect) conquered Him. Gouro the ſeat Royall, and Bengala are faire Cities. Of this, the Gulfe, ſometimes called Gangeticus, now beareth name Golfo di Bengala. Chatigan is alſo reckoned amongſt their Cities. They are [b] a moſt ſubtile and wicked people, and are eſteemed the worſt ſlaues of all India: for that they are all Theeues; and the Women, Whores; although this fault is common through all India, no place excepted. They haue a cuſtome, neuer to dreſſe or ſeeth meat twice in one pot, but haue euerie time a new one. Whenſoeuer they are found in Adulterie, they haue their [c] Noſes cut off, and are thence forwards narrowly looked to, that they keepe not each others company. The Portugalls haue here Porto Grande, and Porto Pequino, but without Forts and Gouernment; euery man liuing after his owne luſt: and for the moſt part, they are ſuch as dare not ſtay in their places of better Gouernment, for ſome wickednеſſe by them committed.

In Bengala are found great numbers of Abdas or Rhinocerotes, whoſe horne (growing vp from his ſnowt) Teeth, Fleſh, Blood, Clawes, and whatſoeuer he hath without and within his bodie, is good againſt poyſon, and is much accounted of throughout all India. The skinne vpon [d] the vpper part of this Beaſt, is all wrinkled, as if hee were armed with ſhields. It is a great enemy of the Elephant. Some thinke that this is the right Vnicorne, becauſe as yet there is no other by late Trauellers found, but onely by heare-ſay. Onely Lodouicus Vertomannus [e] ſaith, he ſaw a couple of thoſe other Vnicornes at Mecca; one whereof had a horne of three Cubits, being of the bigneſſe of a Colt of two yeeres and a halfe old; the other was much leſſe: both ſent to the Sultan of Mecca, for a rare preſent out of Æthiopia. Geſner in his Booke of Foure-footed Beaſts, citeth this teſtimony, and ſome others, whereby he perſwadeth, that there are diuers ſorts of theſe Vnicornes: but it cannot ſeeme otherwiſe then ſtrange, that in this laſt hundred of yeeres, wherein the World hath vn-veyled her face more then euer before; none of credit (that I haue heard) hath affirmed himſelfe to haue ſeene this Vnicorne, but in picture. And in picture they haue lately abuſed M. T. Coryate, who writing that he ſaw Vnicornes at the Mogors or Mogols Court (which, as ſome that were there, told me, were Rhinocerotes) they haue publiſhed the ſame with picture of the Painters Vnicorne, with a long horne out of his forehead, whereas this groweth out of the middle of the Noſe and is but ſhort, the length of a mans hand being a large Hornes meaſure. That which is reported of their vertue againſt poyſon, proceedeth from the hearbs which Bengala yeeldeth: for in other places they are not neer the price of theſe. There are here alſo certain wild goats, whoſe hornes are in account againſt venome: as I my ſelfe (ſaith Linſchoten) haue proued.

The Kings [f] of Bengala, in times past, were chosen of the Abassine or Æthiopian slaues, as the Soldans of Cairo were sometime of the Circassian Mamalukes. Northward from Bengala lyeth the Kingdome of Arracan, before mentioned. The great Can subdued these parts and the Kingdome of Mien, about the yere 1272. while Marcus Paulus liued there. Arracan, Chandican, and Siripur are by Fernandez placed in Bengala, as so many Kingdomes: Patane or Patenau by Fredericke and Fitch reckoned to another Bengalan Kingdome: which our Country-man Master Fitch, calleth the Kingdome of Gouren: so that vnder this name, Bengala, are comprehended many Seigniories; all, or the most part now subiect to the Mogor.

§. II.

Of Ganges, and the Superstitions there obserued.

OVr Maps seeme not to describe the Riuer Ganges (so will wee here terme it with Ortelius, Castaldus, Barrius, and all our later Trauellers, both Merchants and Iesuites) according to the due course thereof. For Chaberis they bring from the North, enclining to the East, Guenga from the West; but Master Fitch, which continued fiue months in passing downe first in Iamena from Agra, which falleth into Ganges, and then in Ganges it selfe to Bengala (although he confesseth it may be done in shorter time) saith, it commeth from the North-west, and runneth East into the Sea. Some call Chaberis, Ganges; and some hold Guenga to be Ganges; and some make but one Riuer of them both: and hence may happily arise in part, that seeking of Ganges so farre off. Both Ganga and Ganges are in sacred account (saith [g] Barros) and therefore the Mahometan Kings, will not suffer the superstitious washing of the Ethnikes therein without a Custome or Imposition.

[g] Bar. Dec. 1. l. 9. c. 1.

There is in Ganges [h] a place called Gongasagie, that is, the entrie of the Sea, in which are many Fishes called Sea-Dogs. They which are weary of this World, and desire to haue a quicke passage to Paradise, cast in themselues here to bee deuoured of these Fishes; perswading themselues, that the next and readiest way thither, is by their jawes.

[h] Balby, cap. 42.

Ganges [i] ouerflowing his bankes, in times past drowned many Villages, which so remaine; and hath changed his wonted channell: the cause that Tanda (a Citie of trafficke, where the people goe naked to the waste) standeth now a league from the Riuer. It watereth a fruitfull Countrey and populous, and (as the Oceans high Collector) receiueth into him many Riuers by the way, some no lesse then it selfe, so that in the time of raine you cannot see from the one side of Ganges to the other. The superstitious opinion conceiued, in those parts, of this Riuer, appeareth by the reports of all. [k] Emanuel Pinner at Cambaia obserued many to resort thither on Pilgrimage, sometime out of that Citie foure thousand; and was told by the Gouernour of Bengala, vnder the Mogor then at Labor, that there came thither sometime three hundred thousand, or foure hundred thousand Pilgrims. And addeth, That not long before his comming to Cambaia there assembled there, to this deuout iourney, fiftie thousand people. Happy they esteeme that man which washeth himselfe therein, and secure of saluation, if at the point of death hee may drinke of this water. Hee conferred with one Gedacham, a great man, which had been on this holy voyage, and had there weighed his Mother three times; first, by her weight in Siluer; secondly, in Gold; thirdly, in Pearles, all which he gaue to the poore. A brother of his, called Ran, being to goe to the great Mogor, offered one hundred and fiftie thousand [l] Pardaws, that his [m] Pagods or Idols should send him good successe. They make an Image also to this Riuer, whereunto they doe diuine honor. The King of Calecut, and the other Kings of Malabar keepe a solemne feast euery twelue yeeres, in honor of this Riuer; because that long since a certaine Brachmane (falsly accused) fled vnto Ganges, & there led an austere life twelue yeeres, worshipping that Streame and his Idoll, to whom, when hee purposed to returne home, after those twelue yeeres expired, that Image of Ganges appeared, and said, That on the last day of February he would appeare in a Riuer of his owne Countrey, and cause the Waters thereof to arise, and run backward in witnesse of his innocencie, and bade him assemble all the Lords of Malabar to the sight, which accordingly came to passe, and the memorie thereof is by this Feast solemnized.

Bannaras [n] is a great Towne on Ganges, to which the Gentiles out of farre Countries come on Pilgrimage. The men are shauen all but the crowne. Alongst the water-side are many faire Houses, in which stand Images of euill fauor, made of stone, and wood, like Leopards, Lyons, Monkeys, Men, Women, Peacocks, and Deuils, with foure armes and hands, sitting close-legged, and holding somewhat in their hands. There are diuers old men, which on places of earth, made for that purpose, sit praying, and they giue the people (which by breake breake of day, and before, come out of the Towne, to waſh themſelues in Ganges) three or foure ſtrawes which they take, and hold them between their fingers where they waſh themſelues: and ſome ſit to marke them in the foreheads, and they haue in a cloth a little Rice, Barley, or Money, which they giue to theſe old men. After that, they goe to diuers of their Images, and giue them of their ſacrifices, thoſe old men in the meane while praying, which maketh all holy. They haue one Idoll called Ada, with foure hands and clawes. On certaine great carued ſtones alſo they powre Water, Rice, Wheat, &c. They haue a great place like a Well, with ſteps to goe downe, wherein the water ſtandeth foule, and ſtinketh, by reaſon of thoſe many flowers, which they continually throw there into. Many people are alwayes therein, with imagination of pardon for their ſinnes, becauſe GOD (as they blaſpheme) waſhed himſelfe therein. They gather vp the Sand in the bottome, as a holy Relike. They pray not but in the water, and waſh themſelues ouer-head, lading vp water with both their hands, and turne themſelues about, and then drinke a little of the water three times, after which they go to their gods in their houſes. Some of them will waſh a place which is their length, and then pray vpon the earth, with their armes and legs at length out, and will riſe vp and lye downe, and kiſſe the ground twentie or thirtie times, but wil not ſtirre their right foot. Some vſe fifteene or ſixteene Pots, little and great, ringing a Bell, while they make their mixtures, ten or twelue times; and make a circle of water about their Pots, and pray: others ſitting by, one of which reacheth them their Pots. They ſay ouer theſe Pots diuers things many times, which done, they goe to their gods and ſtrew their Sacrifices, which they thinke are very holy, and marke many of them, which ſit by, in their foreheads, eſteemed as a great gift. There come fiftie, and ſometime an hundred together, to this Well, and to theſe Idols.

About their Idols, in ſome houſes, ſitteth one in warme weather, to blow the winde with a Fan vpon them. And when they ſee any company comming, they ring a little Bell, and many giue them their almes. None of theſe Idols haue a good face. Some are blacke, and haue clawes of braſſe; and ſome ride on Peacocks or other Fowles. One there is alwayes attended with his Fan, to make winde, which (they ſay) giueth them all things, both food and rayment. Here ſome are burned to aſhes, ſome ſcorched in the fire, and throwne into the water, when they are dead: the Foxes preſently eat them. The Wiues doe burne with their Husband when they dye: if they will not, their heads are ſhauen, and neuer any account is made of them after. If a Man or Woman be ſicke, and like to die, they will lay him before their Idols all night: and that ſhall mend or end him. And if hee doe not mend, that night his friends will come and ſit a little with him, and crie, and after will carrie him to the water ſide, and ſet him vpon a little raft made of reeds, and ſo let him goe downe the Riuer. The chiefe Idols are very euill-fauoured, their mouthes monſtrous, their eares gilded, and full of Iewels, their teeth and eyes of gold, ſiluer, glaſſe, coloured blacke, with Lampes continually burning before them. Into their Houſes or Temples you may not enter, with your ſhooes on. When the ſcorched Indians are throwne into Ganges, the Men ſwim with their faces downwards, the Women with their faces vpwards; which I had thought they had by ſome meanes cauſed, but they denied it. The people goe all naked, with a little cloth about their middle. Their Women are exceedingly on their necks, armes, and eares, decked with Rings of Siluer, Copper, Tinne, and Iuorie hoopes: they are marked with a great ſpot of red in their foreheads, and a ſtroke of red vp to the crowne, and ſo it runneth three wayes. Their marriages are in this ſort: The Man and the Woman come to the water-ſide, where ſtandeth a Bramane or Prieſt, with a Cow and a Calfe, or a Cow with Calfe: theſe all goe into the Water together, the Bramane holding a white cloth of foure yards long, and a basket croſſe bound with diuers things in it. This cloth he layeth vpon the backe of the Cow. And then he taketh the Cow by the tayle, and ſaith certaine words. Shee hath a Copper or a Braſſe pot full of water. The man holdeth his hand by the Bramans hand, and the wiues hand by her husbands, and all haue the Cow by the tayle. Then they powre water out of the pot vpon the Cowes taile, which runneth thorow all their hands, and they lade vp water with their hands, and then the Brachmane tyeth their clothes together. After this, they goe round about the Cow and Calfe, and giue ſomewhat to the poore there attending, leauing the Cow and Calfe for the Bramans vſe, and offer to diuers of their Idols mony: then lying downe vpon the ground, they kiſſe it diuers times, and go their way. Betweene this and Patanaw are diuers Theeues, like the Arabians, without certaine abode.

The manner of their Marriages.

Of Patane, Couche, Orixa, Botanter, Candecan.

PAtane or Patanaw is a great Towne and long, with large ſtreets, ſimple houſes of earth, couered with thatch, the people tall and ſlender, many old; ſometimes a Kingdome, now ſubiect to the Mogor. They haue gold, which (as in America) they dig out of the Pits, and waſh the Earth in great Bolls. The Women here are ſo decked with Siluer and Copper, that it is ſtrange to ſee, and by reaſon of ſuch Rings vpon their Toes, they can weare no ſhooes. Here I ſaw a diſſembling Prophet, which ſate vpon an Horſe in the Market-place, and made as though hee ſlept, and many of the people came and touched his feet with their hands, and then kiſſed their hands. They tooke him for a Great Man, but I ſaw he was a lazie Lubber: and there I left him ſleeping. The people here, are great Praters and Diſſemblers. As I came from Agra downe the Riuer Iemena, I ſaw alſo many naked Beggars, of which the people make great account; they call them Scheſche. Here I ſaw one, which was a monſter among the reſt, wearing nothing on him, with a long beard, the hayre of his head couering his priuities. The nayles of ſome of his fingers were two Inches long: for he would cut nothing from him o. Neither would he ſpeake, but was accompanied with eight or ten which ſpake for him. When any man ſpake to him, hee would lay his hand vpon his breſt, and bow himſelfe, but ſpeake he would not to the King. The King of Patanaw was Lord of the greateſt part of Bengala, vntill the Mogoll ſlue their laſt King. After which twelue of them ioyned in a kinde of Ariſtocratie and vanquiſhed the Mogolls (it ſeemes this was in the time of Emmaupaxda) and ſtill notwithſtanding the Mogolls Greatneſſe, are great Lords; ſpecially he of Siripur, and of Ciandecan, and aboue all Maafudalim. Nine of them are Mahumetans. Thus Fernandes. Theſe Pataneans ſeeme by the Ieſuites report, to come of the Tartars.

o A right niggard.

In thoſe parts they had many ſtrange Ceremonies. Their Bramans or Prieſts come to the Water, and haue a ſtring about their necks made with great Ceremonies, and lade vp Water with both their hands, and turne the ſtring firſt with their armes within, and then one arme after the other out. Here alſo about Iemena, the Gentiles will eate no fleſh, nor kill any thing. They pray in the Water naked, and dreſſe their meate and eate it naked: and for their penance they lye flat vpon the earth, and riſe vp and turne themſelues about thirtie or fortie times, and vſe to heaue vp their hands to the Sunne, and to kiſſe the earth, with their armes and legs ſtretched out along, their right leg being alwayes before the left. Euery time they lye downe, they ſcore it with their fingers, to know when their ſtint is ended. The Bramans marke themſelues in their foreheads, eares, and throats, with a kinde of yellow geare which they grinde; euery morning they doe it. And they haue ſome old men which goe in the ſtreets with a boxe of yellow powder, and marke them which they meet on their heads and necks. And their Wiues doe come, ten, twentie, and thirtie together to the water-ſide, ſinging, and there doe waſh themſelues, and vſe their ceremonies, and marke themſelues on the fore-heads and faces, and carry ſome with them, and ſo depart ſinging. Their Daughters bee marryed, at, or before the age of ten yeeres. The men may haue ſeuen wiues. They are a craftie People, worſe then the Iewes. The way from Bannaras to Patanaw is a faire and fertile Countrey, beautified with many faire Townes.

I went p from Bengala into the Countrey of Couche, which lieth fiue and twentie dayes iourney Northwards from Tanda. The King was a Gentile, named Suckel Counſe: his Countrey is great, and lyeth not farre from Cauchin-China. All the Countrey is ſet with Canes made ſharpe at both ends, and driuen into the Earth; and they can let in the water, and drowne the Countrey knee-deepe. In time of Warre they poyſon all the waters. The people haue eares which be maruellous great, of a ſpan long, which they draw out in length by deuices when they bee young. They are all Gentiles, and will kill nothing. They haue Hoſpitalls for Sheepe, Dogs, Goats, Cats, Birds, and all other liuing Creatures. When they be old and lame, they keepe them till they dye. If a man catch or buy any quick thing in other places, and bring it thither, they will giue him mony for it, or other victuals, and keepe it in their Hoſpitals, or let it go. They will giue meat to the Ants. Their ſmall money is Almonds, which oftentimes they eat. We paſſed thorow the Country of Gouren, where we found but few villages, and almoſt all Wilderneſſe (for wee choſe this Deſart way for feare of theeues) and ſaw many Buffes, Swine, and Deere: graſſe longer then a man, and very many Tygres.

Orixa is the next Countrey, which hath beene a Kingdome, but conquered by the King of Patanaw, and both ſince, by Echebar. Orixa ſtands ſixe dayes Southweſt from Satagan. There is much Rice, cloth of Cotton, and cloth made of graſſe, called Yerua like ſilke. (They ſpeake speake of the like in Virginia.) Through this Kingdome (Fredericke writes) a man might haue gone with Gold in his hand without danger, while the old King reigned, who so befriended Merchants that he tooke no custome of them. And there were laden in the Port of Orisa yeerely, fiue and twentie or thirtie Ships, with Rice, Lacca, long Pepper, Ginger, Mirabolins, and the Yerua aforesaid, made of an herbe growing in the Woods wild, then gathered when the boll is growne round, as bigge as an Orange. In the Hauen of Angeli are yeerely many Ships laden with many kindes of commodities. Satagam is a faire Citie (for a Citie of Moores) and very plentifull, sometime subiect to Pataniaw. In Bengala such is the estimation of Ganges, that they will fetch of it a great way off, though they haue good water neere: and if they haue not sufficient to drinke, they will sprinkle a little on them, and then they are well. From Satagam I trauelled by the Countrey of the King of Tippara, with whom the Mogor hath continuall warre. The Mogores, which be of the Kingdome of Recon and Rame, be stronger then this King of Tippara. Foure dayes iourney from Couche is Botanter, and the Citie Bottia: the King is called Dermaine: the People are tall and strong: the Countrey great, three moneths iourney, and hath in it high Mountaines, one of which a man may see, sixe dayes iourney off: Vpon these Mountaines are people with eares of a span long; otherwise they account them Apes. Hither resort many Merchants out of China, and Tartaria. From Chatigan in Bengala, I went to Bacola, the King whereof is a Gentile; thence to Senepare, and after, to Simergan, where they will eate no flesh, nor kill no beast; and thence to Negrais in Pegu and Cosmin. Thus farre hath our Countrey-man led vs in the view of so many superstitions of these Bengalans, and their Northerly Neighbours.

p Histor. Relatio de Rege Mogor.

In that part of Botanter, which is next to Lahor, and the Mogor, the People p are white, and Gentiles. Their garments are close girt to them, that a wrinkle or pleit is not to be seene, which they neuer put off, no not when they sleepe, as long as they are able to hang on: their head attyre is like a Sugar-loafe, sharpe at the top. They neuer wash their hands, lest, say they, so pure a Creature, as the Water, should be defiled. They haue but one Wife; and when they haue two or three children, they liue as brother & sister. Widdowers and widdowes may not marry a second time. They haue no Idols, nor Townes, nor King, in those parts of Batanter. They haue their Sooth-sayers, which they aske counsell of. When any is dead, they resort vnto these Wisards, to know what is to be done with their dead. They search their Bookes; and as they say the word, they burne them, or bury them, or eate them, although they vsually feed not on mans flesh. They also vse dead mens skulls in stead of dishes; as in Thebet, wee haue obserued the like custome. They are liberall Almes-giuers. They liue on Weauing and making Clothes, which they sell at Calamur and Negariot in Summer, for in their Winter they cannot passe for Snowes. They are like in colour and haire to men of these parts.

q Linschot.

The Bengalans q haue a Tradition or Fable amongst them, That this Riuer commeth out of Paradise, which was proued by one of their Kings, who sent men vp the streame, till they came to a pleasant Ayre, still Water, and fragrant Earth, and could row no further. Hence happily grew this conceit, That this Water should wash away sinne, and that without it they cannot be saued. This Riuer hath in it Crocodiles, which by water are no lesse dangerous then the Tygres by land, and both will assault men in their Ships. There is also a little small Beast, which by his barking maketh the Tyger to run away.

The King of Candecan (which lyeth at the mouth of Ganges) r caused a Iesuite to rehearse the Decalogue: who when he reproued the Indians for their polytheisme, worshipping so many Pagodes: Hee said, That they obserued them but as, among them, their Saints were worshipped: to whom how sauoury the Iesuites distinction of λατρία and δουλία was for his satisfaction, I leaue to the Readers iudgement. This King, and the others of Bacala and Arracan, haue admitted the Iesuites into their Countries, and most of these Indian Nations.

§. IIII.

Of Arracan, and the Warres betwixt them and the Portugals.

BEtwixt the King of Arracan and the Portugals haue beene late warres, not vnworthy Relation, because they serue for better knowledge of all the Countries adiacent. The King of Arracan or Rachim (so Fredericke cals it) had giuen to Philip de Britto the keeping of Syrian, as before is expressed, which he fortifying, became suspicious to the King: this was one cause of war; and another the Portugals surprisall of the Ile Sundiua, sixe leagues distant from the Continent of Bengala, ouer-against Siripur. This Iland, Fredericke admires for the cheapnesse and plentie of necessaries, where he bought two salted Kine for a Larine, which is twelue shillings and sixe pence, very good and fat; foure wilde Hogs ready dressed at the same price; a fat Hen for a peny (and yet the People said they paid twice the worth) & other commodities at like price. It belonged to the Kingdome of Bengala; distant a hundred and twentie miles from Chatigan, the people Moores. It is thirtie leagues in compasse, so strong by Nature, that they may hinder any from landing. Porto Grande.

Two hundreth Ships are yeerely laden from hence with salt. The Mogols with the Conquest of Bengala had possessed Sundiua, Cada-ragi still continuing his Title, vnder colour whereof Carualius and Mauis, two Portugals conquered it, An. 1602. Heereat the King of Arachan was angry, that without his leaue they had made themselues Lords of that which hee challenged to belong to his protection; fearing that by this meanes, and the fortification of Sirian, he should finde the Portugals vn-neighbourly Neighbours. Hee sent therefore a Fleet of a hundred and fiftie Frigats or little p Galleys, with fifteene Oares on a side, and other q greater furnished with Ordnance: and Cadaray (which they say was true Lord of it) sent a hundred Cossi from Siripur to helpe Him. The Portugals preuailed and became Masters of a hundred and nine and fortie of the Enemies Vessels.

q Catures.

In this time Britto had built his Fort at Sirian, and founded a Towne for the dispersed Peguans, which had here assembled to the number of 15000. The Saracens enuying hereat, proferred the King of Arracan a great reuenue to commit this Hauen to them; Britto obiected, That so the Mogol would swallow all. (Manasingua the Gouernour of Bengala hauing promised to King Achebar to bring Him the White Elephant in Arracan) adding great gifts to the King and his Councellors. At the same time a Peguan Bagua (that is, a Great Man or Ruler) by the Kings Command and Letters commendatorie to Britto kept in Pegu; But Britto fearing the Peguans would cleaue to their Countrey-man, An. 1603. besiegeth and taketh his Fortresse, slayeth three hundred of his Companie, Captiuing nine hundred. Whereupon the Peguans which had followed him reuolted to Britto, viz. two hundred Ships r, twentie Horses, and great store of prouision, with the Harueſt which the Bagua had sowne, then on the ground. Hee with fifteene of his Company escaped: perhaps the same which before out of Floris wee haue t mentioned. Britto now grew great, and in the Portugall name made League with the Kings of Tangu, Iangoma, Siam, and Prom, for their ioynt ayde against Arracan, if he should be besieged. He went also to Goa to acknowledge fealtie to the Crowne of Portugall for the Kingdome of Pegu, whence he brought with him sixteen Gallies, and three hundred Portugals, to the defence of Sirian, with which and a hundred others of the Portugals (threescore at Sundiua, thirtie at Arracan, and ten at Chatigan) he easily thought to become Master of those Seas. A matter of great consequence, where they might haue all matter for shipping (which caused the Great Turke once to prouide here, at an easier charge carried from hence to u Sues, then from Alexandria) and here they might both build their Fleets, and be furnished of sustenance, might send at any time to all places in the South (which from Goa cannot be done but with the Monsons) and might cause that no Ship of Moores should lade Pepper, Cinamon, or other commodities at Martauan, Reitau, Iuncalao, Tanassarin, and Queda, for Surat or Mecca, but with custome to them and passe from them.

r Indian ships are generally smal, and of no great force for warre, especially with such souldiers: you may call them Boats.
u Sues in the bottome of the Red Sea.

The King of Arracan foreseeing such a storme, prouided a Nauie of a thousand saile, the most Frigats, some Greater, Catures and Cosses, and assailed the Portugal Fleet at Sundiua vnder Carualius, who had but sixteene of diuers sorts of shipping which staid by him, and yet got the victorie, neere two thousand of the Enemies being slaine, a hundred and thirtie of their Vessels burnt, with the losse but of six Portugals. Which so vexed the King of Arracan, that he put many of the Captaines in Womens habit, vpbraiding their effeminate courages, which had not brought one Portugall with them aliue or dead. Yet were the Portugall Ships so torne, that they were forced for feare of another tempest, to forsake the Iland, and to transport that which there they had to Siripur, Bacala, and Chandecan in the Continent, and thus Sundiua became subiect to Arracan: Carualius staid at Suripur (where he had thirtie Fusts or Frigates) with Cadary Lord of the place, where he was suddenly assaulted with one hundred Cosses, sent by Manasinga, Gouernor vnder the Mogol, who hauing subiected that Tract to his Master, sent forth this Nauie against Cadaray, Mandaray a man famous in those parts being Admiral: where after a bloudie fight Mandaray was slain, & Carualius carried away the honor. From thence, recouering of a wound in the late fight, He went to Golin or Gullum, a Portugall Colony vp the streame from Porto Pequino, where hee won a Castle of the Mogors kept by foure hundred men, one of that company onely escaping. These exploits made Carualius his Name terrible to the Bengalans, insomuch that one of the Arracans, Commander of fiftie Arracan Ships, dreaming in the night that hee was assaulted by Carualius, terrified his fellowes, and made them flie into the Riuer; which when the King heard, cost him his head. Ialea. Iarric. l.6. c.33

But this Day had an end, and this Sun was set in a Cloud. For whiles the King of Arracan hauing hauing lately atchieued ſo great matters in Pegu, and added Sundiua; and the Kingdome of Baccala, intended to annexe Chandecan to the reſt of his Conqueſts: the King of Chandecan thought to purchaſe his peace with Carualius his head; which hee treacherouſly accompliſhed, ſending for Him, that they might ioyne together againſt Arracan, and watching his oportunitie, tooke Him in his Palace with others of his companie, after that inuading and ſpoyling his ſhip.

Britto remayned in his Fort at Sirian, againſt whom in the yeere 1604. the King of Arracan ſent a fleete of fiue hundred Frigats, and fortie Caturs, vnder the conduct of his eldeſt ſonne, with fifteene thouſand men. The Portugals had eight ſhips well prouided, and one hundred and eightie Souldiers in the Fort. Neere to Negrais the Armadas met, the Portugall obtayning the victorie, ſlaying and drowning almoſt one thouſand of the enemies. This at Sea; and waiting a better oportunitie in the Riuer, they left not one Veſſell to carrie newes thereof to Arracan. The Prince with his Souldiers ſought to returne by land, but Penurie purſued him, ſeparated his companie, and betrayed Him to two hundred and fiftie Portugals and Peguans, which to theſe ſtraights had added the locall ſtraights of a certaine paſſage, where the Prince with ſome of the chiefe yeelded; redeemed at a great ſumme, (as before is mentioned) and couenants of Peace on both ſides ratified by Oath. Sup. cap. 3. § 2. One of the Articles was the deliuerie of Sundiua, for the performance of which Britto ſent his ſonne Marke with two Captaines to take poſſeſſion, which all were treacherouſly diſpoſſeſſed of their liues, and three thouſand Portugals captiued. Hee prepares for a new ſiege, but in the midſt of theſe deſignes, that part of his Palace where the white Elephant ſtood, and his chiefe Oratorie were fired with lightning: which ſome Talipois interpreting of Diuine vengeance for breach of Oath, went to the King, and told him theſe things preſaged further diſaſters. It ſo preſaged indeed to Them, who for this preſage were preſently, to the number of thirtie of the chiefe of them ſlaine. Twelue hundred ſhips (ſo wee call them all by a generall name, though not comparable, for the moſt part, to our Europæan) the King of Arracan ſet forth in this new expedition; of which ſeuentie fiue were of greater burthen, each hauing twelue Peeces of Ordnance, and well furniſhed; the reſt Fuſts, or Frigats. In this Fleete were thirtie thouſand Souldiers and Sea-men, Pataneans, Perſians, and Malabars; of them eight thouſand with Hand-gunnes, and three thouſand fiue hundred greater Peeces of diuers ſorts. The King himſelfe, his ſonne, and beſt Souldiers, were therein, accompanied with the King of Chocor. Britto ſent forth that Nauie which hee had (but twelue ſhips in all) vnder the command of Paulus Regius, a famous Sea-Captaine; which meeting them at the Cape of Negrais, the Admirall of Arracan, Marucha, was with his Fuſt, taken and ſlaine: and the Night parted the Fight, or rather renewed the Fight; many of the Arracan ſhips miſtaking and warring vpon their fellowes, to the loſſe of diuers ſhips, and (in the whole fight) of almoſt two thouſand men. 1607. Foure dayes after, the fourth of Aprill, they encountred the ſecond time, and the Portugall Admirall runne her ſelfe vpon pyles vnder the water; whence ſhee could not bee freed: and when another Portugall ſhip came to relieue them, Rhegius would not bee perſwaded to ſtirre, till fire entring the Gunners roome, blew vp him and his companie, and the other Captaine, which moued him to remoue. The Portugall ſhips betooke them to their Fort: whither the King of Tangu had ſent his ſonne, with ſixe hundred Horſe, eighteene Elephants, and ſixteene thouſand Men, to beſiege it. But both theſe and the Arracan forces doing their vtmoſt, in May following were forced to depart without effect, leauing the Towne and Fort in a deformed caſe, and moſt of the people wounded. Yet greater was Arracans loſſe: onely twelue greater, and two hundred and fiftie leſſer of thoſe twelue hundred ſhips remayning, the reſt drowned, forſaken, or burnt, partly by the Portugals, partly by themſelues wanting men to guide them. Moſt of the Ordnance they buried in the Sands. Ten thouſand men they loſt in the ſiege. The Portugals loſt of their Nation (beſides helpes) eightie ſixe, ten Captaines, and the Admirall. The next yeere their Fort was fired, and their dwelling Houſes, Temple, Houſehold, and 1608. Prouiſion. Britto himſelfe eſcaped hardly with his wife. His courage yet remayned, and reſolued to build it in an higher and ſtronger place. Eaſily had Arracan with this aduantage effected his deſignes, had not the Portugals elſewhere moleſted him, and taken Dianga. And thus farre haue wee followed the Ieſuite Iarric, in theſe Arracan affaires: If with iarring from truth in any place, I haue named my Author, nor can accuſe, or excuſe him. Further he cannot guide vs.

1613. Britto empaled, and cruelly ſlaine. But where his Intelligence failes, Floris helpes. The laſt Act of this Tragedie was reſerued to the King of Ana, who tooke Sirian (as before Maſter Floris hath told vs) ſlue all the Portugals, and was reported to ſpit this Philip de Britto. He ſettled the affaires of Pegu, and ſought what hee could, to reduce them from their diſperſions to their natiue Habitations.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Great Mogor, or Mogoll.

§. I.

Of the Mogors Countries; and of MELABDIM ECHEBAR.

THe Great Mogor (according to Boterus) hath vnder his subiection seuen and fortie Kingdomes, which lie betweene Indus and Ganges on the East and West, and betwixt [a] Imaus and the Ocean, containing all that which the Ancients called India intra Gangem, or India Citenor. Hee is called of the people the Great Mogor, for the same cause that the Ottoman-Turkes are called Great. The style of him that was King [b], when the Iesuites imparted to vs these Relations, was Mahumeth Zelabdim Echebar, King Mogor, or Mogoll; for so they call him in the Countrey, and not Mogor, as the Iesuites. This Mogoll seemes to argue their Tartarian Origin all from the Moal Tartars; of which, see our Tartarian Relations. The true Mogors, or Mogols, liue on the hither side of Indus, in the Kingdome of Quabul, or Cabul, which is vnder the brother of Echebar; against whom, Anno 1582. hee led a strong Armie, in which the Iesuites say, were fiue thousand Elephants armed. These weare plates of Iron on their foreheads, carrie foure Archers, or else foure Gunners, with great Peeces; and goe not before the Armie, least they should hinder their sight, or (being hurt) disturbe the rankes; and therefore are set in the Rere, a Sword bound to their trunke, and Daggers fastened to their great teeth. King Echebar was borne in the Prouince of Chaquata, which hath Indostan on the South, Persia on the West, the Tartars East. Their Language is Turkish; but the Courtiers to this day speake Persian. Baburxa his grand-father chased the Parthians vnto Bengala, before possessors of the Region of the Mogors; after whose death, the Parthians, or (as they are now called Pataneans, of Patanau before mentioned) recouered themselues, and warred on his sonne. Their descent is from [c] Tamerlan, whose third sonne was Miromcha, grandfather to Abusayd, who slue Abdula; successor to Abdelatife which had slaine Oleghbek, the sonne and successor of Mirzah Charrok, the fourth sonne and first successor of Tamerlan. Sultan Hamed, sonne of Abusayd, obtayned Maurenahar, and after him Babor his sonne, which in the yeere 1500. was dispossessed by the Vsbechs, yet still possessed Gaznehen, and some parts of India; succeeded by his sonne Homayen, the father of this Achabar. Thus Mirkand. The Iesuites say, they are Parthians, descended of Cingis (therefore rather to be called Tartars;) Achabars grandfather they call Baburxa, which by his sword entred Industan, and chased those Tartars into Bengala. But they againe preuailed after his death: insomuch, that Achabars father Emmaupaxda (as the Iesuites report) being driuen to great straights by the Parthians, Tartars, or Pataneans, was driuen to aske aide of the Sophi, or Persian King; which he obtained, with condition of submitting himselfe to the Persian Religion. The Mogors speake the Turkish language. The Empire of this Mogor is exceeding great, containing the Countries of Bengala, Cambaya, Mendao, and others, comprehended by some vnder the name of Industan. This Mendao is said to be ten leagues in circuit, and that it [d] cost the Mogor twelue yeeres siege. Agra and Fatipore are two Cities in his Dominion, great, and full of people, much exceeding London; and the whole space betweene, is as a continuall populous Market. Many Kings he hath conquered, and many haue submitted themselues and their States voluntarily to his subiection. Twentie Gentile Kings are numbred [e] in his Court, which attend him, equalling the King of Calecut in power. Many others pay him tribute. In his Countries are many Spices, Pepper, Ginger, Cassia, and others: many precious Stones, Pearles, Metals of all sorts, Silkes, Cotton, Horse, and other Commodities, which yeeld him many millions yeerely beyond his expences. About the yeere 1582. the Iesuites first entred there; after whose report, his Dominions were then as followeth since much more enlarged. Eleuen great Riuers run through his Dominions: Taphi, Haruada, Chambel, Iamena, Ganges: the other fiue, are Indus, or Schind (as they call it) and Catamul, Cebcha, Ray, Chenao, Rebeth, tributaries to Indus. The whole Mouarchie enuironeth nine hundred leagues. King Echebar hath many Lords; each of which is to maintayne eight, ten, twelue, or fourteene thousand Horse in readinesse for the warre, besides Elephants; of which, in the whole Kingdome are said to bee fiftie thousand. Himselfe can further bring of his owne into the Field fiftie thousand Horse, and Foot-men innumerable. To those Lordes hee alloweth certaine Prouinces, for such Militarie seruice; for hee is Lord of all: nor hath any else possession of any thing, but at the will of the King. Once a yeere they appeare before the King, where they present a view of those their enioyned Forces. Many millions of Reuenue doe besides accrew vnto his Coffers: yet his Port and Magnificence is not so great, as of many other Princes, eyther for Apparell, Diet, or the Maiestie of his Court-seruice. Hee cannot write or reade, but heareth often the Disputations of others, and Histories read before him, being of deepe iudgement, piercing wit, and wise fore-cast. In execution of Iustice hee is very diligent; insomuch, that in the Citie where hee resideth, he heareth all Causes himselfe: neither is any malefactor punished without his knowledge; himselfe giuing publike Audience twice euery day: For which purpose, he hath two wide Halls, or rather open Courts, and in them Royall Thrones, where hee is attended with eight Councellors, besides Notaries. Yet doth hee stand, and not sit: and at other times sit on Carpets, after the Turkish manner, notwithstanding his Chayre of Estate standing by. He hath twelue Learned men alway about him, which ordinarily reason and dispute in his presence, or relate Histories. Hee is a curious discourser of all Sects. Hee is both Affable, and Maiesticall, Mercifull, and Seuere; delights himselfe in diuers Games, as fights of Buffals, Cockes, Harts, Rammes, Elephants; Wrestlers, Fencers, Dances, Comedies, and in the Dances of Elephants and Camels, thereto instructed. In the midst of these Spectacles he dispatcheth serious affaires. He delights in Hunting, vsing the Panther to take wild Beasts. Hunting Dogs hee had none. They vse tame Harts to take the wild, with Nets fastened to their hornes; wherewith they intangle the other. When hee goes to warre, hee will cause a whole Wood to bee round beset with men, hand in hand; sending others in, which raise the Beasts, and driue them into the others armes; which, if they let them goe, are punished, to make sport that way. He was skilfull in diuers Mechanicall Trades; as, making of Gunnes, casting of Ordnance, hauing his Worke-house in the Palace for that purpose. But we haue obserued, that this is common to all Mahumetan Priests and Princes, the Great Turke, yea, the Great Chalifa himselfe (as Tudelensis writes of his Times) practising some Mechanicall Mysterie. Theeues and Pyrates He punished with losse of the hand; Murtherers, Adulterers, Robbers by the high way, with empaling, hanging, or other deaths; not executed, till the Sentence had beene thrice pronounced: Loued and feared of his Owne; Terrible to his Enemies; Affable to the Vulgar; seeming to grace them and their Presents, with more respectiue Ceremonies then the Grandes; of sparing Dyet, scarce eating Flesh aboue foure times in the yeere, but feeding by Rice, Whit-meats, and Electuaries; sleeping but three houres in the night; curiously industrious.

a Or Cumaus, on which dwel Gentils, called Cumai. This mountaine seperates the Mogols and Tartars.

This King detesteth the Mahumetan Sect, which, as you heard, his Father embraced for his aduantage; and therefore hath ouerthrowne their Moschees in his Kingdome, razing the Steeples, and conuerting the rest to Stables, and more trusteth and employeth the Gentiles in his affaires then the Moores: whereupon many of them rebelled against him, and stirred vp the Prince of Quabul, his Brother, to take Armes: against whom Echebar opposed himselfe (as is said) and caused him to retire into his owne Countrey. It is vncertaine [d] what Religion hee is of, some affirming him to bee a Moore, some a Gentile, some a Christian, some of a fourth Sect, and of none of the former. Indeed it appeareth that he wauereth, vncertaine which way of many to take, able to see the absurdities of the Arabian and Gentile professions, and not able to beleeue the high mysteries of the Christian Faith, especially the Trinitie and Incarnation. Hee hath addmitted the Iesuites there to preach, and would haue had them by miracle to haue proued those things to him, which they (elswhere so much boasting of Miracles) wisely refused. For hee demanded that the Mulla's, or Priests of the Mogores, and they, should by passing thorow the fire, make tryall of their Faith. Hee hath many Bookes and Images; which the Christians there doe vse, and seemeth to haue great liking to them, vsing the same with great reuerence. But his Religion is the same (it seemeth) with that of Tamerlane his predecessor, to acknowledge One God, whom varietie of Sects and Worshippings should best content. Hee caused [e] thirtie Infants to bee kept (like that which is said of Psammetichus, King of Egypt) setting certaine to watch and obserue, that neither their Nurses, nor any else, should speake vnto them, purposing to addict himselfe to that Religion which they should embrace, whose Language these Infants should speake; which accordingly came to passe. For as they spake no certaine Languge, so is not hee setled in any certaine Religion. Hee hath diuers Idols sometime brought before him: among which, is one of the Sunne; which early euery morning, and three other times a day, d The vncertaintie of his Religion, Balby tels of reports amongst the Portugals, of the conuersion of this King, and of the Kingdome of China also to Christianitie: both with like truth, and fitting Popish reporters.

day, at noone, euening, and in the night, he worshippeth. He worshipped also the Image of CHRIST, and our LADY, which hee set on the crowne of his head, and wore Relikes about him. He is addicted to a new Sect, as is said, wherein he hath his followers, which hold him for a Prophet. The profit which they haue by his gold, addicteth them to this new Prophet. [c] Hee professeth to worke Miracles; by the water of his feet curing diseases. Many Women make Vowes vnto him, either to obtaine children, or to recouer the health of their children; which if they attaine, they bring him their vowed Deuotions, willingly of him receiued: yea, euery morning, as he worshipped the Sunne, so he delighted to be worshipped himselfe of the people: to whom hee made shew of himselfe at a window; and they kneeling, performed like Ceremonie to him, as to their Idols: and he was thought to entertaine men skilfull in diuers Sects and Religions, that of euery one he might take somewhat to the constitution of a new one. He hath three sonnes; Sciec the eldest, which is honoured with the title Gio, and called Sciecigio, that is, the Soule, or Person, of Sciec; he much fauoureth the Iesuites: the second, Pahari: Dan, or Daniel, is the youngest. Some call them by other names. His Presents are exceeding, besides his Tributes and Customes. [d] Hee mentions One, which in their presence offered his Vassalage, and withall a Present, valued at two hundred thousand crownes and more; a Horse with furniture of Gold and Iewels; two Swords, and the Girdles of like worke; Camels, Carpets, &c. taking himselfe dignified in the acceptation of his Present. Himselfe after often bowings, and touching the ground with his head, comming neerer, was searched, whether hee had any weapons, and then was admitted to touch his foot, Echebar laying his hand on his necke, and allowing him to stand with his other Nobles. The Kings sonne, Sultan Morad, at the same time offered a Present of fiftie Elephants, worth a hundred and fiftie thousand Duckats; one Chariot of Gold, another of Siluer, others of Mother of Pearle, with other things of great value. The Vice-Roy, or Gouernour of Bengala, followed with another Present, esteemed worth eight hundred thousand Duckats, viz. three hnndred Elephants. Almost dayly hee receiueth such Presents, especially at a certaine Feast, called Neroſa; in which, one Great Man was thought to present him with neere the worth of one Million of Gold.

§. II.

Of the Conquests and death of ECHEBAR, and of his Sonne and Successour SELIM, now reigning.

OVr Relations of Echebar or Achebar, his Rites, Humane and Diuine, as also of his Possessions and Greatnesse, wee haue alreadie seemed long; yet cannot be so satisfied, without further satisfaction to the Reader, if he be (such as he of whom wee write) curious and desirous to know remote Affaires and farre distant Occurrences. Great Echebar added vnto that Greatnesse which his Father left him, the Kingdome of Caxemir, of Sinda, of Guzzarat, of Xischandadan, and a great part of Decan, with all the Tract of Bengala. Such was his felicitie, that it grew into a Prouerbe, As happie as ECHEBAR; seldome attempting any thing, without prosperous successe: I speake of worldly happinesse. Euen in Natures treasures hee was rich, both Wit and Memorie: this so happie, that of many thousands of Elephants which hee had, hee knew the names; yea, of his Horses (to each of which hee gaue names) of his wilde Beasts and Harts, that hee kept in a place appointed; and euen of his Pigeons, which hee kept for sport. Yet, was not this happinesse so perpetuall, but that he had some, especially domesticke, Crosses. His second sonne, Sultan Morad, being sent into Guzzarat, against Melic King of Decan (sometime Lord of Chaul) was slaine, with many other Commanders: which newes was then brought to Echebar, when hee was celebrating their New-yeeres Festiuall (the day that the Sunne enters into Aries) whereupon hee sent thither another of his sonnes. Another time, when hee was solemnizing the Sunnes Festiuall, on Easter day, 1597. (about which time the King of China sustained the like Casualtie) Fire fell from Heauen vpon his Tent, richly adorned with Gold and Iewels, and consumed it to ashes, with all the Tents adioyning, together with his Throne of solide Gold, valued at 100000. Duckats, consumed or melted: from whence it proceeded to the Palace; which being of Timber, was for the most part brought into ashes. Some millions of Treasure there reserued, could not bee there preserued from this flame; which made a Streame of Gold and Siluer, mixed with other Metalls, runne alongst the streets. For this cause hee forsooke Lahor (where hee had built the Iesuites a Church, and where hee kept his Court, as hee did before at Fatepore, and sometimes at Agra) and went to Caximir, or Cascimir, a Kingdome which a little before he had ſubdued. This yeelds not to any Indian Region, in goodlineſſe and wholeſomeneſſe, being encompaſſed with very high Mountaines, couered moſt part of the yeere with Snow: the reſt a delicate Playne, diuerſified with Paſtures, Fields, Woods, Gardens, Parkes, Springs, Riuers, euen to admiration. It is coole, and more temperate then the Kingdome of Rebar, which adioyneth to it on the Eaſt. Three leagues from Caximir is a Lake, deepe, and beſet round with Trees, in the midſt thereof an Iland, and thereon hee built a Palace. The Countrey hath ſtore of Rice, Wheat, and Vines, which they plant at the foot of the Mulburie, the ſame Tree ſeeming to beare two Fruits. Had they not beene at Contentions amongſt themſelues, hee could neuer haue conquered ſo ſtrong a Kingdome. In times paſt they were all Gentiles; but three hundred yeeres before this, the moſt of them became Mahumetane. This Countrey he left when Summer was paſt, and returned to Lahor, loſing many Elephants and Horſes in the way, both by Famine then oppreſſing the Countrey, and the difficultie of the Paſſages; the Elephants ſometimes, in the aſcent of Hils, helping themſelues with their Trunkes, leaning and ſtaying themſelues, being burthened, thereon, as on a ſtaffe. The Prince, which is now King, was aſſaulted by a fierce Lioneſſe, as he rode on a Female Elephant, which yet hee wounded firſt with a Dart, then with a Shot, and laſtly, ſmote her with the hand-Gun it ſelfe; wherewith being ouerthrowne, a Souldier came in and ſlew her, but with loſſe of his owne life.

Elephants trunke as a ſtaffe to them. I haue obſerued of this yong Elephant now in London, ſent out of Spaine to his Maieſtie, that in riſing vp when he is laid on the ground, hee raiſeth himſelfe on his two great teeth

The next yeere, 1598. Echebar went to Agra, chiefe Citie of a Kingdome, which hee had alſo conquered, a hundred leagues from Lahor towards the South, paſſing that way to Decan. Hee had eight hundred Elephants, and ſeuen thouſand Camels, to carrie his Tents and Prouiſions: yea, his Secretarie had at the ſame time ſeuen hundred Camels, and ſeuentie Elephants for his owne furniture; and therefore it is leſſe maruaile of the Kings. The King conducted in this Expedition aboue a thouſand Elephants, inſtructed to fight, and a hundred thouſand Soldiers. Hee paſſed the Mountaines of Gate, by almoſt impaſſable Paſſages, ſpending ſometimes a whole day, in paſſing the ſpace of a Musket-ſhot. One of his Captaines went before with fiftie thouſand, who tooke one of the Decans ſtrongeſt Holds, and made eaſie way to the Conqueſt of the reſt of Melics Dominions, which hee left in the Gouernment of his ſonne. Brampore fell into his hands, being deſtitute of defence. This was Anno 1600. Miram the King thereof had forſaken it, and betaken himſelfe to Syra, a ſtrong Hold both by Nature and Art. It was ſeated on the top of a Hill, which reacheth fiue leagues, enuironed with a triple Wall, ſo built, that one might bee defended from the next. Within, was a Well of running Water, and all neceſſarie Prouiſions for threeſcore thouſand perſons, for many yeeres. It had three thouſand great Peeces of Ordnance. In this Caſtle (according to the Countrey cuſtome) the next of the Bloud Royall were kept, with their Families; nor might depart, except (the Throne emptie) the next Heire was hence deliuered, much after that which is written of Amara, in the Abaſſens Countrey, and it ſeemes borrowed from thence; ſo many ſlaues of thoſe parts being here entertained, and ſome in the higheſt Employments. At this time, beſides King Miram, there were ſeuen of theſe Princes. The Gouernour was an Abaſſine, with ſeuen other Vnder-Commanders, all renegado-Mahumetanes. The Mogoll layde ſiege thereto, with almoſt two hundred thouſand men: but more preuailed (as before in Melics Countrey) with Bribes and Promiſes, then Force. Thus inuiting Miram to a Conference, ſwearing, By the Kings head (accounted an inuiolable Oath, as is that, By their Fathers head) that hee ſhould bee permitted ſafe returne: Some of his Councellours perſwaded him to goe; hee went, with a kinde of Stole on his necke, hanging to his knees, in token of ſubiection: And comming before the Mogoll, bowed himſelfe, but was caſt to the ground by ſome of his Captaines, and forceably detained. The Abaſſine Gouernour ſent his ſonne to demand performance of Achebar his promiſe, who being queſtioned of his Father the Abaſſen, and the hopes to obtaine the Caſtle, freely anſwered for his Fathers fidelitie, and that if Miram were not reſtored, they ſhould not want a Succeſſour; with which libertie he prouoked the Mogol to cauſe him to be ſlaine: which his Father hearing, ſtrangled himſelfe. And the wals were ſoone after battered (at leaſt entred, and a breach made through the open gates) by golden ſhot; none of theſe ſeuen for feare of treaſon, daring to take the Royall Soueraigntie. Theſe with the King, were diſperſed into diuers parts of his Kingdome and maintenance allowed them. Thus remained Echebar Lord of theſe parts, and longed to adde the reſt of India, whatſoeuer is betwixt Indus and Ganges euen to the Cape Comori, to his Dominion.

Man for Gouernment amongst all the Princes of the World, His Ambassage to ARIAS DE SALDAGNA, &c. The ninth day of Frauard (the first moneth of the yeere beginning at the Æquinoctiall Vernall) in the fortie sixe yeere, viz. of His Reigne.

At this time dyed the Gouernour or Vice-Roy of Lahor, which left to the King (who is Heire Generall, and Successour of euery mans wealth) three millions of Gold coyned, besides other Gold, Siluer, Iewels, Horses, Elephants, furniture and goods almost inualuable. This also for a taste of the meanes accrewing to this Kings Treasure. Echebar returning to Agra, gaue libertie to the Iesuites to conuert as many as would to Christianitie.

The King of Candacar or Candahar, not able to defend himselfe against Abduxa King of the P Vsbechs, surrendred himselfe and his Kingdome to Echebar. The particulars of his other Conquests I cannot relate: His last victory I know not whether to impute to his happinesse or not. It was against his Sonne, in which the griefe to haue such an enemy could not but be more then the glory of the exploit. This happened, Anno 1602. Echebar, being forced to giue ouer his Decan Conquest, by his Sonnes vntimely challenge of the Scepter, who weary of his Fathers long life, stiled himselfe King, and his Father the Great King. Armies were gathered on both sides; on both sides were sent Letters and Messengers. The Mother of Echebar, being nintie yeeres old, laboured a peace, but not preuailing, fell sicke, which caused him to returne from this expedition against his Sonne. But her body not able to ouercome the disease, yeelded to death. Her Sonne shaued his head, beard, and eye-browes, and mourned after the Country fashion in blue, his Nobles doing the like three dayes. Her huge Treasure which shee had bequeathed to her children and Nephewes, the King seized on. The Prince was perswaded to come to his Father without an Army, which he did, and after some rebuke, was reconciled, and remained content with the Kingdome of Cambaia or Guzzerat. He seemed much addicted to the Iesuites, and obtained his Fathers Licence for a Temple at Agra, to the building whereof hee gaue a thousand pieces of Gold.

Blue, a mourning colour.

On the twentie seuen of October, Anno 1605. Echebar dyed in the Climactericall yeere (63.) of his age, and fiftie of his reigne. In his sickenesse, Selim the Prince (whom some suspected of dealing as the Turkish Selim had done with his Father Baiazet) came not into the Presence; and much consultation was amongst the Great ones to conferre the Succession vpon Cussero his sonne. But the issue was, that vpon his Oath to maintaine the Law of Mahomet, and of full pardon to his Sonne and all his Partakers, hee was brought into his Fathers presence. Echebar was past speech, but made signes that hee should take the Royall Diademe, and gird himselfe with the sword hanging at his beds head. The Prince performed the solemne Iordam, or Rite of Adoration, with the head bowed to the Earth, and, his Father signing with his hand that hee should depart, did so: as did his Father presently after out of the world. His body was carried on the shoulders of his Son and Nephew out of the towre where he lay, the wall being broken (after the fashion) for passage, and a new gate there erected: and being brought into his Garden a league from thence, was interred with small attendance, neither the King, nor his Nobles (except Cossero and a few others) wearing mourning habite. So little was He in his West, a little before the great Terrour of the East.

Selim poysoned Baiazet.

Eight dayes after Echebars death, the Prince entred the Palace, and seated himselfe in the Throne, the people crying Padiausa, or Padasha lamat, GOD saue the King. His first endeauours were to giue contentment to the Mahumetans; causing their Moschees to bee purged, and their Rites to bee established: yea, hee tooke a new Name, NVRDIN MOHAMAD, IAHANVIR, that is, the Splendour of MAHOMETS Law, Subduer of the World. And by this Name IAHANVIR, or (as our Countrey-men, lately come from thence, pronounce it) IAHANGERE, hee is vsually called, and not by his ancient Name SELIM.

M. Clarke, and M. Withington.

In Aprill after, his sonne rebelled, and (taking the Title of SVLTAN IA, that is, Sultan the King) brought into his partie two Great Men, and so went to Lahor, which (not being admitted entrance) hee besieged eight dayes; or (as others say) presented himselfe with his Forces (about twelue thousand) before it, without any great hostilitie offered him. His Father in person pursued him, which being rumor'd, so dismayed the sonne that he fled, hauing euen then put some of the Kings men to rout. For by a notable stratageme hee lost the day, the aduerse Generall sending many with flying tales into the Princes Armie, buzzing the neerenesse and Greatnesse of the Kings power, and seconding the same (like GIDEONS Policie) with multitude of Trumpets and Drummes, scarred them, and notwithstanding the Princes gaine-saying, hee was by his owne almost compelled to flight. Hee tooke his way towards Cabul, and being to passe a Riuer, the Captaine of the place caused all Boats to be taken away, and commanded the rowers, that if the Prince came, they should fasten the Boat (as by mischance) on a Shelfe or Iland of sand in the middle of the Riuer, which being done, they should seeme to call for helpe, and so giue notice.

This was done, and the Gouernour came, and after due reuerence (promising all fidelitie and securitie, wherein hee was vnfaithfully faithfull) brought Him into the Castle, and sent the King word thereof, who sent presently and brought Him in fetters, together with his company. The King bitterly checked him, committed him to prison. Some adde, that hee sealed vp his eyes: Others say, that his eyes were put out. But their eyes were not put in (onely eares put on) that say so; for hee hath lately beene freed, and hath the vse also of his eyes, as I haue beene tolde from the eyes of diuers. His two great Captaines had a strange punishment, the one sowed vp close in an Oxe-skinne, the other in an Asse-skinne, both new flayed, that drying they might withall straightly pinch in their Prisoners in a close and narrow Little-ease. The next day they were carried through the Citie on Asses, their faces to the taile-wards, the one conspicuous with his Oxe-hornes, the other with his Asses-eares: The shame and ignominy so pierced one of them, that hee fell downe dead; his head was cut off, and the pieces of his dismembred bodie were set vp in diuers places. The other by way of fauour, was permitted to haue water powred on his hide, which brought a worse euill, by the heate of so neere a Sunne, causing a filthy stinke, and multiplication of Vermine, till at last his pardon was procured. Two hundreth of the Princes Souldiers were set on both sides the way, as hee should passe to be executed. He caused his second Sonne to be proclaimed Prince, as his Father had before transferred the Title from him to This his Son.

There was a famous Prophet of the Ethnikes, named Goru, esteemed there of his Sectaries as the Romish Pope is of the Popish Romanists: with him, as a man famous for Sanctimony did the Prince consult, who in adulation adorned his head with a Diadem, which in an Ethnike to a Mahumetan was strange: but hee coloured it with the Gentilisme of the Princes Mother. Vpon this Goru was committed, but vpon promise by an Ethnike of 100000. pieces of Gold to bee payd to the King, hee was pardoned. Hee that vndertooke this, hoped on the Kings pardon, or that Goru would procure this summe, which failing, hee seized, on all hee had, not sparing his wife and children: adding tortures also to extort money from him, and taking away his meate, thinking him rather a miser then a begger. Thus in varietie of misery the flattering Prophet lost his life: and his Suretie also thinking to escape by flight, was taken and slaine, his goods all confiscate.

This King at first made great shew of zeale to Mahomet, which since is cooled, and his Religion seemes to bee the same with Eobebars. Contrary to the Mahumetan practice, hee delighteth much in Images, as of CHRIST, the Virgin, and other Saints, with which his chambers and publike roomes are stored: and to all his Letters and Charters, besides the Kings Seale, addes the Images of CHRIST, and the Holy Virgin, engraven in a paire of tongs (as it were) of Emeralds, with which hee seales his Letters on both sides the pendent waxe. The last newes that wee haue from the Iesuites (of whom wee haue borrowed almost all the former Relations) is of Captaine Hawkins comming to the Court, and kind entertainment of the King, who made him (say they) a Gentleman of foure hundred Horse, and assigned him thirtie thousand Rupies stipend: adding other reports of his pride, obstinate heresie, and supplantation by the Portugals; with other things of Him, and those of the Ascension, were wracked, partly true, partly false. I haue thought good to set before you in the next seruice, some of Captaine Hawkins obseruations whiles hee staied there, and after of other our Countrey-men, which now haue a settled trade in these vast Dominions. Obserue by the way that the Iesuites to the last, doe accuse Captaine Hawkins of his obdurate heresie, contrarie to the calumnies of some that say hee became deuoutly Popish at their perswasion.

They say hee presented the King with the worth of 25000 crownes, one iewell being worth 10000.

§. III.

The Relations of Captaine HAWKINS, Embassador there.

MAster William Hawkins [a] being Captaine in the Ship called the Hector, after a long and tedious voyage (from March 1607. to the foure and twentieth of August 1608.) arriued at Surat, subiect to the Mogor or Mogol (so he calleth him) and after much kindnesse offered, and indignities suffered, by reason and treason of the Portugals (who had by bribes and slanders wrought the Vice-Roy or Deputie, called Mocreb Chan against him) passed thence to Agra, to the Court, as Embassadour, with a Letter from the King of England. Peniero a Iesuite, before in this Booke mentioned (obserue the Conuersions and conuersations of that Societie in those parts) like a wothy Factor for his Nation, had proferred to Mocreb-Chan fortie thousand Rials of Eight, to send them to Daman, that so hee might become their prisoner, and the English negotiation might bee hindered:

hindered: and now, when the name of an Embassadour had protected him from such courses, plotted with him to ouerthrow his iourney, both by detraction of necessarie forces to assist him in a way so full of Out-lawes and Rebels, and suborning his Trudge-man and Coach-man, to poyson or murder him by the way; which was not farre from effecting. The Portugals had also dealt with the Lord of Cruly, to bee readie with two hundred Horsemen to assault him in the way: so that hee was forced to hire a strong conuoy for the securitie of his person. Being come to Agra, hee was brought with great State to the King, who kindly entertained him, and sware by God, and by his Fathers soule, to performe the Kings Maiesties request, in the Letter contained, notwithstanding the depravation thereof by the Iesuite, to whom the King had giuen it to reade. He promised also to allow him three thousand and two hundred pound a yeere, or foure hundred Horse (for so they reckon all their fees, much like the Turkish Timariots) and caused him to take a wife of the Countrey, the daughter of an Armenian Christian, called Mubarikesha, sometimes a Commander in the warres of Ekbar Padasha, [c] Father to this present Mogor, or Mogol, whose name is Selim. This King is so fickle and inconstant, that what hee had solemnly promised for an English Factory, was by the Portugals meanes reuersed, and againe promised, and againe suspended, and a third time both graunted and disanulled: so that the second of November, 1611. Captaine Hawkins departed from Agra, and the last of December came to Cambaya, where hee heard of English shipping, in which hee passed first to the Red Sea, after to Sumatra and Bantam, [d] and dyed on the Irish shoare in his returne homewards. Whiles he kept at Agra, his liuing assigned him by the King was much impaired by the Officers, who appointed to him such places where Out-lawes and Rebels liued, so that hee neuer receiued aboue three hundred pound. His attendance whiles hee was in fauour, was honourable and neere the King; so that the Mahumetans enuying a Christian such dignitie, became his priuie enemies, and assistants to the Portugals: which was increased by a Present the King sent him publikely, being a wilde Boare, killed in his hunting-Progresse, and by him and his eaten. The insolencies of the Guzarates, if they may bee suffered, and as much baseneese of their deiected cowardly courages, being kept in awe (which is also the disposition of all the Indian Ethnikes, both white and blacke) the Portugals pride and treachery; the fittest places for our Indian traffique, whether wee follow the colours of Mars or Mercury: and other his diligent obseruations I omit. But so I cannot, the rarities of the Mogols Court, customes, puissances, wealth, and gouernment (notwithstanding our former Discourse) hauing met with so rare a guide. For the greatnesse of his State; hee reporteth that his Empire is diuided into [e] fiue great Kingdomes, the first named Pengab, the chiefe Citie whereof is Lahor: the second, Bengala, and Sonargham the mother Citie: the third, Malua, the chiefe Seat Vagain: the fourth Deckan, in which Bramport is principall: and so is Amadauer in the fifth Kingdome, which is Cambaya. Hee hath sixe principall Castles for the keeping of his treasure, at Agra (which is in the heart of all his Kingdomes) Guallier, Neruir, Ratamboore, Hassier, Boughtaz. There are three Arch-Rebels, which with his forces hee cannot call in, Amber [f] Chan in Deckan; in Guzerat, the sonne of Muzafer, sometime their King, called Bahador; and Raga Rahana in Malua. Hee hath fiue sonnes, Sultan Cussero, Sultan Peruis, Sultan Chorem, Sultan Sharier, Sultan Bath; two young daughters, and three hundred wiues, of which foure are principall. None hath the title of Sultan, but his sonnes. Mirza is also ascribed to his brother and children; Chan, as a Duke. Their degrees and titles are according to their proportion of Horses allowed them: foure are of the fame of twelue thousand, the King, his mother, eldest [g] sonne, and one of the blood Royall, called Cham Azam. Of the fame of nine thousand Horse are three; these are as Dukes; Marquesses of fiue thousand, of which are eighteene; Earles of three thousand; Vicounts (so may wee paralell them with our titles of honour) two thousand; Barons of one thousand Horse: Knights, foure hundred; others fewer, to twentie: all which are called Mansibdars, men of liuing or Lordship, of which are three thousand. Of Haddies, which receiue monethly pay, from sixe Horse to one, are [h] fiue thousand. Officers of Court and Campe, sixe and thirtie thousand, as Gunners, Porters, Water-men, Cookes, Gardiners, keepers of Horses, Elephants, &c. whose wages are payed them monethly, from ten to three Rupias. A Rupia is two shillings [i] of our coyne. His Captaines or Mansibdars are to maintaine vpon their allowance, and haue in readinesse at a seuen nights warning, three hundred thousand Horse.

The Kings reuenue of his Crown-land, is fiftie Crou of Rupias: euery Crou is one hundred Leckes, and euery Lecke a hundred thousand Rupias: all which in our money is fiftie millions of pounds: a summe incredible, and exceeding that which is said of [k] China. His daily expences are fiftie thousand Rupias, for his owne person, as apparell, victuals, and other houshold expences, with the feeding of sundry sorts of beasts, and of some few Elephants: his expences on his women by the day amount to thirtie thousand Rupias.

[c] Padasha is a Persian word, and signifieth King.

In

In his Treasurie of [1] Agra are in Gold, of Scraffins Ecberi (which are ten Rupias a piece) threescore Leckes. Of another sort, which are one thousand Rupias, each twentie thousand pieces: and ten thousand of another sort, halfe the value. Of Toles (euery Tole is a Rupia of Siluer, and ten of those Toles is the value of one of Gold) thirtie thousand. Of another sort of ten Toles, fiue and twentie thousand. Of another sort of fiue Toles, fiftie thousand.

In Siluer, of Rupias Ecberi thirteene Crou. Of a kinde of coyne worth a hundred Toles a piece, fiftie thousand. Of another halfe as much, one Lecke. Of thirtie Toles a piece, fortie thousand pieces. Of twentie Toles a piece, thirtie thousand pieces. Of ten Toles a piece, twentie thousand pieces. Of fiue Toles a piece, fiue and twentie thousand. Of Sauoys (each of which is a Tole and a quarter) two Leckes. Of Iagaries (whereof fiue make sixe Toles) one Lecke.

In Iewels of Diamants one Batman and a halfe: a Batman is fiue and fiftie pound weight English: these are rough, and of all sorts and sizes, but none lesse then two Carrets and an halfe. Of Ballase Rubies, two thousand. Of Pearles, twelue Batmans. Of Rubies of all sorts, two Batmans. Of Emeralds of all sorts, fiue Batmans. Of Eshime, which stone comes from Cataya, one Batman. Of stones of Emen, a kinde of red stone, fiue thousand. Of all other sorts, as Corall, Topazes, &c. the number is innumerable.

Of Iewels wrought in Gold, two thousand and two hundred Swords, the Hilts and Scabberds set with rich stones: two thousand Ponyards. Of Saddle Drums of Gold, set with stones, vsed in Hawking, fiue hundred. Of rich brooches for their heads, in which their feathers are set, two thousand. Of Saddles of Gold and Siluer, set with stones, one thousand. Of Tuikes, fiue and twentie. This is a great Launce couered with gold, and the fluke set with stones: and are carried when the King goeth to warres in stead of colours. Of Kittasoles of State to shadow him, twentie. None else in his Empire may haue any of any sort carried for his shadow. Of Chaires of State, fiue, and of other sorts which are of siluer and gold, one hundred. Of rich glasses, two hundred. Of Vases for Wine set with Iewels, one hundred. Of drinking Cups, fiue hundred, of which are fiftie very rich, as of one stone, &c. Of Chaines of Pearle, and other Chaines, of Rings with Iewels, &c. are infinite, which the Keeper onely knowes. Of all sorts of Plate wrought, as Dishes, Cups, Basons, &c. Two thousand Batmans. Of gold wrought, a thousand Batmans.

Of Beasts: twelue thousand Horses: as many Elephants, fiue thousand with teeth, the rest female and young. Camels, twentie thousand: of Oxen for seruice, ten thousand. Of Moyles, a thousand. Of Deere for game, three thousand. Ounces for game, foure hundred. Hunting-Dogs, foure hundred. Lyons tame, an hundred. Buffles, fiue hundred. Hawkes, foure thousand. Pigeons for sport, ten thousand. Singing-Birds, foure thousand. Hee hath also Armour to arme fiue and twentie thousand men at an houres warning.

All this concerning his Treasure, expences, and monethly pay, is in his Court or Castle of Agra: and euery one of the Castles, aboue named, hath a seuerall treasure: and so hath Lahor also, which was not mentioned. And if any censure this Story for want of truth, and Mee for want of iudgement, in relating such fulnesse so fully: for it, I must leaue it to the Authors credit; for my selfe, I was induced by the raritie of the subiect (not easie in this distance to be knowne, nor by Trauellers, except such as this Author, whose Embassage, and exceeding grace with the King, for the greatest part of his residence, might further his Intelligence herein) besides the rareneſſe of the Copie, whereof I know but one, and that written by himselfe. Time may make further triall. Nor may any measure those parts of the Indies for wealth in these kindes, with our Europæan, or any other: and that which so many Kings and States had in many ages stored together, by the euent of warre became Ecbars, the father of this Selim: of which you haue heard of the incredible wealth of the King of Cambaia [m] alone. Besides, if you obserue his customes, it makes it so much neerer credite. For when any Noble-man dies, all deuolueth to him: and well is it with the wife and children, if he bestoweth the Land, and what he pleaseth, on them, and the fathers Title on the eldest sonne. One dyed in my time (saith our Author) named Raga Gaginat, on whose goods the King seized, which besides Iewels and other treasure, amounted to threescore Maunes in gold, euery Maune is fiue and fiftie pound weight. None likewise may come before the King with any Petition emptie-handed: and on certaine Festiuall dayes they bring him rich Presents, as before is said. India, besides Mines, must needes be rich in money, for all Nations bring it, and carrie commodities for it: so that once in twentie yeeres it commeth to the King. All Lands in his Monarchy are his, giuen and taken at his pleasure. Escheats are many by reason of his seueritie. And of those lands which hee giueth in Fee, the third part still remaines to the King; and of the Crowne Lands two thirds, the rest to the Occupiers. For Presents and Mortuaries, wee haue before giuen diuers instances. And my iealousie hath made mee verie inquisitiue of such as haue liued there in the Ministerie, nisterie, Factorie, Souldiorie, all which affirme that Captaine Hawkins hath written with the least.

Of all sorts of his wealth (except Coyne) is brought daily a certaine quantitie before him, for which purpose his Beasts, and all things of value, are diuided into three hundred and threescore parts: so that the same things come but once in the yeere to his view. Hee hath three hundred Elephants royall for himselfe to ride on, which are brought with pompe, richly couered; twentie or thirtie men going before with Streamers, his female with her yongling or yonglings following, besides foure or fiue other yong ones attending as Pages. These are dispersed amongst the great ones to ouer-see them, the King allowing them for it, but scarcely sufficient, and they dare not make shew of them in euill plight. One of them eats ten Ropias euery day in Butter, Graine, Sugar, Sugar-canes, &c. they are very tame. I saw one take vp the Kings owne son by his appointment, being a child of seuen yeeres. There are thought to be in this Empire fortie thousand Elephants, [n] of his, and his Nobles; of which, twentie thousand are trained for warre. n M. Clarke saith 50000.

When the King rides in progresse, his Tents are in compasse about as large as London, two hundred thousand people vsually following his Campe. This King is esteemed the greatest Emperour in the East. Hee hath many Dromedaries, whose swiftnesse auailed his Father much in his sudden Expedition of warre. Those valiant Captaines which Ecbar had, Selim hath by tyranny much diminished. Fiue times a weeke hee commands his Elephants to fight before him, which often in their comming in, or going out, kill many: & if any be but wounded, and might escape, yet hee commands him to bee cast into the Riuer, saying, Hee will curse him as long as he liues, and therefore best to dispatch him: Hee delights to see men executed, and torne with Elephants. Of these tyrannies he reckons many particulars which he saw: and some for no fault, but for his lust set to fight with the Lyon, and one valiant man to buffet with a very fierce Lyon, without any weapon offensiue or defensiue. If any of his subiects haue any precious stone of value, and make not him the offer of it, it is death to him: hee must haue the refusall of all, and yet giues not the worth by a third part. That Iewell hee weareth this day, is not worne againe till that day twelue-month: all his Iewels being proportioned to such a course. All his seueritie and tyranny cannot cleere (perhaps this causeth them) his Countrey of Out-lawes. There is one betweene Agra and Amadauar, which commands as much Land as a good Kingdome; he is strong, twentie thousand Horse, and fiftie thousand Foot, and keepes on the Mountaines. Men can scarcely trauell for Out-lawes. The often shifting of men from their lands, makes them exact more cruelly in the time they hold them, grinding the face of their poore Tenants in ruefull manner. If they continue but fiue yeeres, they raise a great state; sometimes they hold not halfe a yeere: If any be employed in warres or businesses in another place, he must forgoe his land here, and be assigned to there. The Kings allowance otherwise is exceeding, as for euery Horse twentie Ropias a moneth for the warres, and for so many more which hee hath of Fame, hee is allowed two Ropias a moneth for the maintenance of his Table.

Selims Religion and Customes.

Concerning the Kings Religion and behauiour, it is thus. In the morning about breake of day, hee is at his Beades, his face to the Westwards, in a priuate faire roome, vpon a faire Iet-stone, hauing onely a Persian Lambe-skinne vnder him. Hee hath eight Chaines of Beades, euery of which containeth foure hundred: they are of Pearle, Diamants, Rubies, Emeralds, Lignum aloes, Eshen and Corall. At the vpper end of this Iet-stone, are placed the Images of Christ and our Lady, grauen in stone. Hee turneth ouer his Beades, and saith so many words, to wit, three thousand and two hundred, and then presenteth himselfe to the people to receiue their Salames or good morrow, for which purpose multitudes resort thither euery morning. This done, hee sleepeth two houres more, then dineth and passeth his time with his women: at noone, he sheweth himselfe again to the people, sitting till three or foure a clocke to view his pastimes, by Men and Beasts, euery day sundry kindes. At three all the Nobles in Agra, whom sickneſse detaineth not, resort to the Court: and the King comes forth in open audience, sitting in his Seat-Royall, euery man standing in his degree before him; the chiefe within a Red raile (which was allowed to our Author, hauing but fiue before him) the rest without. This Red raile is three steps higher then the place where the rest stand. Men are placed by Officers: there are others to keepe men in order. In the middest, right before the King, standeth an Officer, with his master Hang-man, accompanied with fortie others of the same profession, with hatchets on their shoulders, and others with whips. Here the King heareth causes some houres • euery day: and then departs to his house of prayer; which ended, foure or fiue sorts of well dressed meates are brought him, whereof hee eateth what hee likes, to stay his stomacke, drinking once of his strong drinke. After this he comes forth into a priuate roome, where none may come, but such as himselfe nominates. Two yeeres together our Author was one of the Attendants.

tendants. In this place he drinkes other fiue cups, which is the portion that the Phyſicians allow him, after which he eateth Opium, & then layes him downe to ſleep, euery man departing home. When he hath ſlept two houres, they awake him, and bring his ſupper to him, thruſting it in his mouth, not being able to feed himſelfe. This is about one of the clocke at night; and ſo hee ſleepeth the reſt of the night. In this cup-ſpace he doth many idle things: but nothing without writing, be he drunken or ſober. For he hath writers by courſe, which write all, not omitting his going to the ſtoole, or how ought he lieth with his women, and with whom: to the end, that when he dieth, thoſe writings may be brought forth, and thence what is thought fit may be inſerted in their Chronicles.

When any poore men come to demaund Iuſtice of the King, they goe to a certaine rope faſtened to two pillars, neere where the King ſits: this rope is full of Bels, plated with gold, and with ſhaking the rope, the King hearing the ſound, ſends to know the cauſe, and doth Iuſtice accordingly.

While our Author was with him, hee made his brothers children Chriſtians, not for zeale (as the Ieſuites thought) but in policie (to diſappoint a Prophecie of certaine learned Gentiles, which fore-told their ſucceſſion in the Kingdome) to make them odious to the Moores. God take the wiſe in his craftineſſe, and conuert this peruerſe policie to their true Conuerſion.

One of his ſonnes, Sultan Sharier, of ſeuen yeeres, could not by diuers cruelties purpoſely inflicted on him by his father, be forced to cry, pretending his Nurſes inſtructions to the contrary.

Feaſts. Hee keepes many Feaſts in the yeere, but ſome principall: one called Nourous, or New-yeeres day. Then hath he a rich Tent pitched, curiouſly and coſtly wrought, two acres of ground in compaſſe, ſo richly ſpread with ſilke and gold Carpets, and preciouſly hanged, as is more admirable then credible. There are roomes alſo for his Queenes to ſee vnſeene, round about, ſo that in all it may bee fiue acres. Euery Noble-man makes his roome, each ſtriuing to excell other in coſt. The King will come, to which of them he effects, and is ſumptuouſly feaſted and preſented: But becauſe hee will not receiue any thing as a Preſent, he allowes as much as the Treaſurer values it, which is halfe the worth: Thus all prouide and preſent. At this Feaſt commonly euery mans ſtate is augmented: it beginneth at the beginning of the Moone in March. Some foure months after is the Feaſt of his Birth-day, which euery one ſtriueth to honor with his richeſt Apparel and Iewels: after many Palace-paſtimes, hee goeth with the greateſt pompe to his Mothers, to whom euery Noble-man preſents a Iewell. After banket ended, hee weigheth in a ballance of gold againſt himſelfe in one ſcale, other things of diuers ſorts to the worth of ten thouſand pound, which is giuen to the poore: but his richer Subiects preſent him that day tenne times as much. On his Fathers Funerall-day is ſolemnized a Feaſt at his Sepulchre, where himſelfe meaneth to bee buried with all his poſteritie: at which time much meate and money is giuen to the poore. It hath beene fourteene yeeres in building, and is thought will not bee finiſhed in ſeuen yeeres more; notwithſtanding three thouſand at leaſt be daily at worke thereon. But one of our workemen will diſpatch more then three of them. It is by his deſcription three quarters of a mile about, made ſquare, hath ſeuen heights each narrower then other, till the top, where his Hearſe is. At the vtmoſt gate before you come to the Sepulchre is a ſtately Palace in building; the compaſſe of the wals ioyning to the gate, &c. may be at leaſt three miles: it is foure miles from Agra.

Mogols Sepulcher. Couert ſaith, the matter is fine Marble, the forme nine ſquare, the compaſſe two Engliſh miles about, & nine ſtories high, and that the King proteſted he would beſtow thereon one hundred millions.

The Kings cuſtome is euery yeere to make a hunting progreſſe of two moneths: but when hee comes forth of his Palace, if he mounts on a horſe, it is a ſigne of his going to the war: if on an Elephant or Palamkin, it is but a hunting iourney.

§. IIII.

Of the ſetling of the Engliſh Trade in theſe parts, and of the two Sea-fights betwixt ours, and the Portugals.

Iarric. Theſ. rer. Indic. l. 5. c. 23. WE haue heard how by the Portugals working the Engliſh trade was diſanulled in the Mogols Dominion, Captaine Hawkins deſpairing of any good that way, and leauing the Countrey. The Ieſuites had cloſely wrought Mocrab Chan againſt him, with other great men; and one of them (Pinnerus) was employed in publike Embaſſage betwixt the Vice-Roy of Goa and the Mogoll, to the ſame effect: The Portugals alledged the league was broken, becauſe the Engliſh were entertained; Neither could the Mogol eaſily loſe their friendſhip, becauſe they were then Maſters at Sea: and could haue hindered him and his from all Marine trades. Andreas Hurtadus de Mendoſa, the Vice-Roy had forbidden the Merchants their Cambayan trade, and alreadie hoſtilitie had begun on both ſides: both ceaſing with the departure of the Engliſh. Sir Henry Middleton came to Surrat, after his Red-Sea-diſaſters an expectation of trade, but found nothing but diſſembling, ſo that after much loſſe of time, he was driuen with his Ships to ſeeke new aduentures, to repaire the loſſes which by Turkiſh treachery, & the Mogols inconſtancie and falſehood he had ſuſtained. Hereupon he returned to the Strait of Aden, and intercepted the Ships that came from the Mogols Country to this Turkiſh Trade, eaſily ſtopping the mouth of the Turke, and cutting off the Mogols Nautike hands in hindring the mutuall Traffike of their Subiects: ſo weake in thoſe Seas are theſe Two, iuſtly called GREAT, the Greateſt indeed, and moſt puiſſant Princes (all things conſidered) in the Vniuerſe. Yet did not the Engliſh make prize of them, only they ſet prices to them of their Engliſh commodities, and exchanging them at their prices for ſuch Indian goods as they had brought thither (both eſtimated as they were worth in India) [n] making them further allowance of two in the hundreth. One Ship of this company, called the Rehemee, had one thouſand fiue hundred perſons in her. Many haue cauilled this forced trade, not conſidering that they had firſt found both fraude and force at the Turkes handes, and at the Mogols much expence and loſſe of time and goods contrary to Couenant, which I ſee not how the Law of Nature and Nations might not warrant them to make good; the King himſelfe being wronged, and they armed with the Kings Commiſſion, and their owne power. And perhaps others would haue taken all without any goods giuen in exchange. Certaine it is, that the euent (which thoſe Mahumetans make the rule of equitie) was good, the Cambayan Merchants ſo terrified, that when Gen. Beſt (ignorant of theſe paſſages) not long after came to Surrat with the Dragon, he was promiſed good dealing; Mill Ieffee, one of the chiefe Merchants of Surrat affirming, that they muſt elſe burne all their ſhips, and giue ouer their trade by Sea. So true was that obſeruation of Captaine Hawkins (an Actor, perhaps Author, in this buſineſſe) of theſe people, inſolent, if ſuffered, and baſe, if curbed.

n Nic. Bangam. They had money of theſe Ships, ſome 32000. rials of eight, where of the Rehemee payd 15000. M. Downton ſaith, They had goods for goods to a halfe-penny. Nic. Withington.

On the third of October, 1612. Sheke Suffe, Gouernour of Amadauaz, chiefe Citie of the Guzzurats came to Surrat, and thence to Swally, and on the one and twentieth, concluded vpon certaine Articles, with the Engliſh Generall, which I haue read in his owne Relations, too tedious to bee here inſerted. Not ſo the famous fights betwixt him and the Portugals, who had alreadie in their inſulting inſolent hopes ſwallowed the Engliſh, but Dragons are harſh morſels, and of ill digeſtion. Maſter Canning, an Engliſh Merchant had beene priſoner with the Portugals, but in a confident brauery, the Vice-Roy commanded to ſet him on ſhoare at Surrat, that hee might goe helpe his Country-men fight, and then wee will take their ſkip, and the reſt of them altogether. But not altogether, nay, not at all, could hee performe this, with all his great Fleet of foure huge Gallions, with fiue or ſixe and twentie Frigates: the Dragon being aſſiſted onely with the Oſiander a little Ship (ſcarcely a Ship, I had almoſt called her a little Pinnaſſe) but of great performance in this Fight. Nunno d' Ancuna was Admirall of the Portugals, who by the Sabandore or Treaſurer vnder the Mogoll in thoſe parts, an experienced Man, who had a little before come aboord the Engliſh to ſpie out their ſtrength, was counſelled not to aduenture preſent fight, with ſuch preſent courages, but to keepe betwixt them and the ſhoare, to hinder them from watering, and ſo (like another Cunctator) to weary the Engliſh, and force them from thence. But Ancunas high pride diſdained ſtratagems, and ſcorned (forſooth) to ſpend a weekes prouiſion on his Men in hindring Ours, whom hee could force in an houre. Thus, on the nine and twentieth of Nouember, came hee in ſight with his Fleet, with Red colours diſplayed, where he receiued an vnwelcome welcomming by the Dragon, which after the Generals encouraging ſpeech, went to meet them, and when he came betweene the Admirall and Vice-Admirall, opened his fierie mouths, and in a thundering Dialect gaue them the firſt ſalutation. The other two were not yet come vp, nor could the Oſiander get cleere of her Anchor. But the next morning the fight was renewed, and three of the Gallions driuen on ground, not a man of them daring to looke aboue Hatches, and had beene their left but for the Frigates; the Oſiander danced the Hay (ſaith one) about them, or played like a Salmon (my friend Mr. Nathaniel Salmon, was Maſter and Commander in her) ſwimming, friſking lightly (but not with light effect) leaping about theſe huge Whale carkaſſes, which in the afternoone got a-flote, and continued the fight till night. In the night they [o] manned a Frigate, with ſixe or ſeuen-ſcore of their beſt men, thinking to haue fired the Engliſh, but found both Fire and Water conſpire againſt themſelues to their deſtruction: the Oſiander keeping diligent watch, and with a ſhot ſinking them, there were eightie foure of them taken vp drowned. The ſhallowneſſe of the Bay gaue occaſion to the Dragon, which drew much water, to remoue to the other ſide, neere vnto Mendofrobag, or Medhafrabadh, ſometime a faire Citie, and walled, ruined by the Mogols gols warres. Here was a Caſtle of the Razbooches (ſome call them Reisbuti) which haue beene the Native Lords of that Countrey, now as it were out-lawes, ſpoyling and robbing, beſieged by Sarder Chan, a Great Man of the Mogols, who had many thouſands in his Campe, which all became witneſſes of the Engliſh valour, Spectators of the Portugals confuſion. Sarder Chans Tent was ſtately and ſpacious, couered aboue with Cloth of Gold, on the floore with Turkie Carpets. Hee ſent a Horſe, and two Veſts wrought with Silke and Gold to the Generall, and foure Veſts for foure other of his company. Himſelfe would not ſtirre out of his Tent, till he had taken the Caſtle, but gaue them licence to take view thereof. But the Portugals approaching with their force, the Mogols by many Arguments dehorted the Engliſh from the fight, which yet they preſently made good before many thouſand gazing, admiring, aſtoniſhed Eyes, the Portugals being forced to cut their Cables, and to eſcape by flight, being ſwifter of ſayle then the Engliſh. Thus the Portugals wanted a Hercules for this Dragon (more watchfull then the Heſperidan, more terrible then the Lernæan) or, a Medæa to Charme this, as ſometimes the Colchian (theſe three Dragons the Poets faine Monſters, begotten of Typhon, and Echidna, but none of them breathing Fire, nor roaring Thunders, like this fell Indian Dragon here ſpoken of.)

In theſe fights, after Maſter Salmons reckoning, the Dragon ſpent ſixe hundred thirtie nine, and the Oſiander three hundred eightie ſeuen great ſhot, beſides three thouſand ſmall. The Great Mogoll, which before thought none comparable to the Portugall at Sea, much wondred at the Engliſh reſolution, related to him by Sardar Cham. The Portugals loſt by their owne Confeſſion, one hundred and ſixtie, by others report, fiue hundred men (the Sabandar reckoned three hundred and fiftie) in theſe fights: the Engliſh three men, and the arme of another ſhot off. The Articles agreed on before by the Gouernour, were confirmed by the Kings Firma, which they receiued Ianuary the eleuenth, Captaine Beſt, returned to Swally, December one and twentieth, and ſent Letters of this ſucceſſe for England by land, but the Meſſenger [p] with his Indian, were both poyſoned by two Friers in the way homewards: another Letter ſent by a Mariner, came to the Companies hands in very good ſeaſon: and they ſent forth foure ſhips hither, beſides three to other places, vnder the Command of Generall Downton, viz. The New yeeres Gift, the Hector, the Merchants Hope, and the Salomon.

Theſe leauing England in March, on October the fifteenth following, 1614. anchored at South Swally, not farre from Surat, where they found the Countrey in Armes againſt the Portugals, which had a little before taken a Ship of the Mogols, in which was ſaid to bee three millions of Treaſure, and two women bought for the Great Mogol. They alſo tooke a [q] Guzzarate Ship worth one hundred thouſand pounds, with ſeuen hundred perſons therein, at the barre of Surat (notwithſtanding their owne Paſſe granted them) and ſent them to Goa. The Decanims laid ſiege to Chaul, and Mocrob Chan was to doe his vtmoſt for his Maſter the Mogol. The Moores on all hands, ſought their Deſtruction; and they were driuen to ſend away many hundreths of the Banyans out of their Townes, to free themſelues of vnprofitable Mouths; three Barkes of which came to Surat, others to Cambaya. Mocrob Chan laboured very earneſtly with the Generall, to ingage himſelfe in that warre againſt the Portugall, which becauſe he could not doe (except in a defenſiue quarrell) by his Commiſſion, the Nabab (ſo they call this Mocrob Chan, then Vice-Roy or Gouernour of the Countrey about Surat: the Ieſuites interprete Nabab, ſupreame Iudge) was ſtrange to the Engliſh, and offered the Merchants ſome hard meaſure; yea, the Ieſuites which were with Mocrob Chan, tooke occaſion from this refuſall to counterfeit a Letter from the Vice-Roy, threatning that except they yeelded to peace, He and his friends the Engliſh would ioyne againſt Surat: which ſuſpition Maſter Aldworth, one of our Merchants, furthered, ignorant of the former; but threatning that their abuſes would cauſe the Engliſh to ioyne with the Portugall. Thus tickliſh were the termes on which they ſtood. December the ſixteenth, the Generall receiued a Letter, that the Portugals had burnt [r] Goga, with many Villages thereabouts, and ten great Ships, one of which was the Rehemee, with one hundred and twentie ſmall veſſels: hee read the Letter of a Ieſuite, in which the King of Spaine commaunded the Vice-Roy to burne Surat, if they receiued the Engliſh. On December the ſeuen and twentieth, two and twentie Portugall Frigates ſought to lay the Hope aboord, but by force of ſhot were put off. The Vice-Roy ſent offer of Friendſhip to Mocrob Chan, on condition that hee would turne the Engliſh out of Surat, and ſuffer him to build a Fort at Swally, otherwiſe threatning bloudie warres. And ſo on Ianuary the fourteenth, came two Fleets of Frigates, and on the eighteenth, ſixe great Gallions, with three leſſer Ships. Two Gallies were yet behinde. The Frigates were threeſcore, ſome adde fifteene more. This great force made Mocrob Chan to feare, whereupon hee ſent a Preſent to the Vice-Roy, with ſome Treatie of peace, whereof the Vice-roy made light account, thinking firſt to ouercome vs (a thing not not hard in his conceit) and then to treate of peace on his owne termes. Much policie was vsed on both parts; the Nabab complementing and sending Presents to the Vice-Roy, and our Generall also; the Vice-Roy promising much to himselfe, but reckoning without his host: and therefore when after the fight hee would haue concluded vpon the conditions that Mocrob had offered, hee was then refused with a scoffe, that hee would not make peace with so weake an enemy, that could not preuaile against foure Merchants Ships.

On the twentieth of Ianuary, their three smaller Ships had thought to haue Stemmed the Hope, then riding at an Anchor, neere the Barre of Swally, some distance from the rest; these laid her aboord on the Star-boord side; and one Gally, and fiue and fortie sayle of Frigates on their Lar-boord: the Gallions followed as farre as the Sands would permit. The Admirall made to their helpe, and for the better speed cut their Cable; but the Enemies had alreadie entered (with great shew of resolution) without feare or wit (saith one of the Hopes men) thirtie or fortie were entered on the Fore-castle. But the Gift in this fatall Moneth answered her Name, and gaue them for a New-yeeres-Gift, such Orations (roarations yee may call them) that they were easily perswaded to leaue the Hope, and all hopelesse to coole their hote blouds with leaping into the Seas cold waters, where many for want of a Boat, made vse of Charons: those that were of most hope and courage, held still their possession of the entered Hope, but with enterred hopes, and dispossession of their liues. Masham.

I know not what Salmoneus, Dum flammas Iouis & sonitus imitatur Olympi, Ære imitans nimbos, & non imitabile fulmen;
or what Prometheus hath taught these later Ages to steale Iupiters Fires, and instructed so many Cyclopean Artificers to imitate those heauenly, in hellish Thunders, and sulphurous lightnings; these Mettall-Deuils, as Angels of Death, with Brazen sides, and Iron Mouths, proclaiming Destruction and Desolation to the World. These Bullets are the true fire-breathing Buls (such the Poets fained at Colchos) and this Ordnance the fire-foaming horses of Diomedes feeding on the flesh of men: which yet I know not whether very crueltie haue made sparing, whiles the Terror hath made men sparing in the vse of it; this Age for this cause yeelding fewer pitched battels, and in them fewer slaine numbers, then the former, which neuer heard of this cruell-mercifull Engine.

Inuention of Ordnance first vsed by the Venetians against the Genuoas An. Dom. 1378. who besieged Fossa-Clodia, a towne of theirs: inuented by a German Alchymist a Monke called Bertholdus Swartus: Others say Constantinus Anklitzen. Printing was also first inuented by a German: the first Printed booke being Tullies Offices, at Mentz, by one Iohn Fust, which some thinke to be the same with Gutemberg, who had made triall of this Art before, without any perfection. This Booke is still at Augsburg printed. 1466. Ram. P. Verg. Pancirol. Salmuth, &c.

But let vs leaue this Parenthesis. The Portugals, whether themselues by casualtie or industry, set fire on their ships, or that the fire which Master Mullineux, the Master of the Hope cast into one of them, after that by helpe of Fresh-men sent in the Pinace, they were got cleere of them; certaine it is, that all three driuing away vpon the ebbe (the English had entered before and killed all they found) fell on fire, and running on the Sands, there offered vp themselues at once to all the Elements, the Sayles still standing embracing the Ayre, the Keele kissing her Mother Earth, till their more churlish brethren, the Fire and Water, put them out of possession, and shared all betwixt them. One of the Gallies lost her Nose with a shot, and was content after that, with their Other to looke on. The Gallions rode beyond the Sands. The Frigates could not but participate in their fellowes disaduentures: many of them, saith Leman, were sunke and torne in pieces. Masham, another [d] of the Hopes Company, numbreth fiue and twentie thus perishing. The Hope lost three men, and had fourteene wounded, the Hector lost two. One shot of stone, which the Hope receiued, was measured seuen and twentie Inches about: but the hurt was by fire in her tops, by one of her owne men there slain, whiles he sought to fire the Enemy. The Portugals losse is vncertaine: three hundred and fiftie men were said to be carried to Daman to be buried, besides all that the Sea and Fire had shared betwixt them, which were thought to make vp fiue hundred, some report of eight hundred, and yet themselues gaue out, not aboue fortie or fiftie, whereas the tide cast vp at one place eighteene drowned carkasses.

After this they tried experiments: First by poyson, and this was the Iesuites Iesuitisme (I cannot call it Christianitie) who sent to the Muccadan of Swally, to entice him to poyson the Water of the Well, whence the English fetched for their vse: but the Ethnike had more honestie, and put in quicke Tortoises, that it might appeare by their death, if any venemous hand had beene there. But when Virtus & virus wanted vires, Dolus is added, and the Vice-Roy hauing two ships sent him for supply, two Iunkes, eight or ten Boates, these, or the most of them were employed with great secrecie and subtiltie to fire our ships by night: two full of fiery entrailes on the ninth of February, the next night two others chained together and towed with Frigates, and after that in the same night foure other chained together, one of which being fired with an English shot, burnt her selfe and her fellowes, they put fire to all the rest which deuoured them all, without harme to the English. They tooke some of these Fire-workers, & one of which being examined, confessed after M. Prings Relation thus.

I omit the names of the Captaines..

The Admirall, called Todos los Santos, a ſhip of eight hundred tuns, had ſixe hundred men, eight and twentie Peeces, moſt braſſe. The Saint Benito, Vice-Admirall of ſeuen hundred Tuns, three hundred and threeſcore men, twentie Peeces. Saint Lorenzo, a Ship of ſixe hundred Tuns, three hundred men, twentie Peeces. The Saint Chriſtopher likewiſe. The Saint Ieronimo of fiue hundred Tuns, three hundred men, and twentie three Peeces. Saint Antonio, foure hundred, two hundred men, and fifteene Peeces. Saint Pedro, two hundred, a hundred and twentie men, and eight Peeces. Saint Paulo as many. A Fly-boat of a hundred and fiftie Tuns, foureſcore men, and foure Peeces. The two Gallies had fiue and twentie Oares on a ſide, and in both a hundred Souldiers. Threeſcore Frigates, with eighteene, and twentie Oares on a ſide, in each fifteene Souldiers. So great their forces, and (bleſſed be God) ſo little their force. The [c] Vice-Royes name was Don Ieronimo de Sauecko, ſometimes Captaine of Moſambike, after that of Zeilan eighteene yeeres, and now Vice-Roy, by the Kings ſtrait command, and others importunitie drawne into this action. Euery day was hee braued with the Engliſh Ordnance, but neuer aduentured any other triall by fight: the Engliſh riding neere his great Fleet, and diſpatching all their other affaires of Merchandiſe, and mending the Hope, which they ſent home with this Newes when they departed from thence; they ſeemed to ſtay for them in the way, yet let them paſſe without any blowes.

[c] Ben. Day. Another hath Sauedo.

This won them much glory among the countrey people, Mocrob Chan giuing ſtately entertainment to the Generall, in his Tents on ſhoare, which one ſaith were a quarter of a mile about, in the midſt, his owne of Crimſon Sattin richly embroidered with Gold and Pearle, and couered with Cloth of Gold; he had many Elephants: he gaue the Generall his Sword, made (ſaid hee) in his owne houſe, the Hilts of maſſie Gold: (this is their cuſtome to deſeruing Captaines) and He gaue him his Girdle, Sword, and Dagger, and Hangers of as faire ſhow, but leſſe worth.

Becauſe I haue mentioned the Ieſuites Arts in theſe parts, let this alſo be added, that Maſter Canning chiefe Merchant, and Agent for the Company, writ to Surat for ſome others to aſſiſt him, being in great feare of poyſoning by the Ieſuites at the Court, and before any could bee ſent, hee was dead, May the nine and twentieth, 1613. One Engliſh-man dying a little before, was buried in their Church-yard, whom they tooke vp and buried in the high-way, but were compelled by the King to lay him in his former place, threatning to turne them out of his countrey, and their buried bodies out of that Church-yard. But this later warres brought them into further miſeries: being denied their ſtipend, and therefore forſaken of their new Conuerts, who bringing them their Beades, did vpbraid them the want of their pay, one of the beſt Arguments (though no great miracle) wherewith they had perſwaded them to their Religion. A French Ieſuit at Amadabar begged reliefe of the Engliſh, wanting neceſſary ſuſtenance. Before, the King allowed the Superior ſeuen Rupias a day, and the reſt three. But now this and their faire Church alſo is denied them, and they ſay their holies in their chamber. Iohn Mildnall, an Engliſh Papiſt, had learned (it is reported) the Art of poyſoning; by which he made away three other Engliſh-men in Perſia, to make himſelfe Maſter of the whole ſtock; but I know not by what meanes himſelfe taſted of the ſame cup, and was exceedingly ſwelled, but continued his life many moneths with Antidotes, which yet here left him at Agra, where hee left the value of twentie thouſand Dolars, after through the Kings Iuſtice recouered by the Engliſh.

Many other Sea-fights haue ſince happened in diuers parts of the Indies, betwixt Our men and the Portugals, as that by Captaine Ben. [f] Ioſeph (in which he was ſlaine, and Captaine Pepwel ſucceeded in the place and quarrell) with Manuel de Meneſes, whoſe Carrack was conſumed with fire by themſelues (as was thought) rather then ſo great Treaſures ſhould be made Engliſh ſpoyles: alſo in the Perſian Gulfe, [g] by Captaine Shilling (ſlaine therein) Captaine Blithe and others, which chaced the aſſayling Portugals, Ruy Freire de Andrada their Commander, called the Pride of Portugall getting a fall; and ſince that Ormus [h] it ſelfe taken by the Perſians; diuers other Portugall prizes, and that eſpecially of the [i] Richard, a ſmall Pinnaſſe of about twentie Tuns, which tooke a Portugall Ship ſuppoſed of two hundred and fiftie; that hauing about fourteene men and boyes, this two hundred and fiftie: Theſe and other fights with them, and more vnfortunate with the Dutch, in [k] thoſe parts I haue deliuered at large in my Pilgrims, or Bookes of Voyages, which now together with this commeth to the publike view of the World.

§. V.

Of the Trauels of diuers Engliſh-men in the Mogols Dominions.

OF the Trauells of Maſter Fitch in theſe parts, wee haue alreadie ſpoken: and of Captaine Hawkins. In the yeere 1609. the Aſcenſion by wilfulneſſe of the Maſter (as is reported) foundred in the Sea, twentie leagues from ſhoare, which yet they attained, being fiue and fiftie perſons, in the Riuer of Gandeuee, from whence they trauelled twelue Courſe, or eighteene Miles to Sabay, and twelue Courſe more to Surrat: from thence to Daytaotote, which Citie, hee ſaith, could not bee conquered by the Mogol, and yeelded vpon compoſition, hauing ſtill a Banyan King. Sixe and twentie Courſe further is Netherbery, a great Baſar or Market of Brazen wares, Armour and Beaſts. Eight and twentie Courſe beyond is the Towne Saddiſee on the Riuer Tyndee, which runs to Surrat, and diuideth the Bannians and Guzurats. Thence they trauelled twelue Courſe to a Monaſterie, and the next day came to Bramport, where the Great Generall called Can Cannawe liueth, who on the twelfth of October returned from the Warres, with fifteene hundred Elephants, thirtie thouſand Horſes, ten thouſaud Camels, three thouſand Dromedaries. This Citie is farre bigger then London, of great Trade, and faire. From hence they went fifteene Courſes to Caddor, fourteene to Sawbon, and thence with the Carauan many daies, leauing which they ioyned with a Can of the Countrey bound for Agra, trauelling fixe daies through a Deſart, wherein are ſtore of wild Elephants, Lions, Tygres, Cat of Mountaines, Porpentines, and other wild Beaſts innumerable; but theſe they ſaw, and were forced to make fires in the nights about their Tents to guard them. Theſe Deſarts are a hundred Courſe long, each Courſe being a mile and halfe. They had in their way after they were paſt this Deſart, the Citie Handee, where the King hath a Caſtle and Houſe cut out of the maine Rock, and wrought with carued worke round about, in it fiftie Peeces of Ordnance, a Fort impregnable, and made a Priſon for great Men. Heere were alſo two Hoſpitals for Captaines maymed in the Warres. The next day they came to Tamlico, which runneth into Indus, and two daies after to Agra. Rob. Couert.

He tells of Elephants fighting before the Mogol, parted with Rackets of wilde fire, made round like hoopes, which they runne in their faces: ſome fight with wild Horſes, fixe Horſes to an Elephant, which he kills with claſping his trunke about their necks, and pulling them to him, breakes their necks with his teeth. Hee hath alſo Deere, Rams, Veruathoes, or Bezors, Lyons, Leopards, Wolues, that fight before him. Condemned perſons may craue the combate with the Lyon: one he ſaw that at the firſt encounter felled the Lyon with his Fiſt, but was ſoone torne in pieces, before the King. Hee ſaw alſo Allegators or Crocodiles kept in Ponds for like purpoſe, one of which killed two ſtoned Horſes at one time. Agra.

There are foure great Markets euery day, where things are very cheape, a Hen for two pence, a Sheepe for two ſhillings, a good Hog ſold by the Bannians for two ſhillings, and other things proportionable. They craued the Kings Paſſe for England, who grantiug it vnder his Hand and Seale, the Secretary went with them to the Third Queene (of which he is ſaid to haue ten, and a thouſand Concubines, and two hundred Eunuchs) which was Keeper of the Great Seale. Hence they paſſed fiue in number to Fetterbarre [a] twelue Courſe, and twelue more to Bianie, which is the chiefe Place for Indico in all the Indies, where are twelue Indico Mills. Indico growes on ſmall buſhes, like Gooſe-berry buſhes, and beares a ſeed like a Cabadge-ſeed, and being cut downe lies on heapes for halfe a yeere to rot, and then brought into a Vault to bee trodden with Oxen from the ſtalkes, and ſo is grownd fine at the Mils, and laſtly, boyled in Fornaces, refined and ſorted, the beſt there worth eight pence a pound.

[a] Fatipore, a Citie as bigge as London, Ioſ. Salbank. Indico.

Thence they paſſed to Hendown, fiue and twentie Courſe, an ancient faire Citie, to Mogol, a ſmall Market Towne fourteene, to Halſtot twelue, to Chatſoe twelue, to Ladanna twelue, to Moſabad eight, to Bandaſon twelue. Thence to Paddar, a Riuer that runnes into the Perſian Gulfe, and parts the Indoſtans and Hendownes. Twentie Courſe beyond, Roree, Buckar, and Suckar, in the Riuer of Damiadee which runnes into the ſame Sea. At Buckar lyes Allee Can, Vice-Roy of the Bulloches, a ſtubborne People: this Towne ſtands like an Iland in the Riuer. Sucker is a clothing Towne, the firſt of the Bulloches, and Roree the laſt of the Moltans, which are Mahumetans. Here they ſtaid foure and twentie daies for a Caliſa or Carauan (a great company of Merchants trauelling together) becauſe the Countrey was full of Theeues. Seuenteene Courſe from Sucker is Gorra, a Towne of the Bullochees, which (he ſaith) worſhip the Sunne, and are Man-eaters, of Gyant-like proportion. ment, Aprill the first, 1610. they were beset with Theeues, twelue Fiddlers first meeting them, but their Musicke cost deere by bribes and composition, the Mogols passe hindering further outrage. Seuenteene Course they trauelled to Daddor; foure and thirtie ouer the Mountaines to Vachesto; from thence seuen and fiftie ouer the Mountaines to Candahar, a great Citie of the Puttans, where Sauder Can resided as Vice-Roy, where are continually seuen or eight thousand Camels occupied in Trade to and fro. The Gouernour hath [b] fortie thousand Horses in redinesse for Warre.

b 12000. or 15000. within the Citie, Still, R. Still or Stell, and I. Crowther.

Richard Still and Iohn Crowther, were lately sent from Azmere, Asimere or Agimere, where the Mogoll now resides to Spahan in Persia, to obtaine Trade for the English, by Sir Robert Sherlies meanes, which was effected. They passed by the way of Lahore, and therefore I would desire You to beare Them company, for better knowledge of the Countrey. Their way was first towards Agra, and Fetipore, which is a faire Citie, and hath in it a goodly House of the Kings, built by Echebar, with many spacious Gardens: now it goes to ruine, much of the stone carried to Agra, much ground sowne within the Wals. April the ninth, 1614. they came to Dillee, a very great and ancient Citie, where many Kings lye buried (and as some say the Rites of Coronation are still solemnized) many Nobles and Captaines haue their Houses of Pleasure, and their Sepulchres: the vulgar sort beggarly, most Banians. On the seuenteenth, they came to Sinan an ancient Citie. On the one and twentieth to the old Citie Sultanpoare. Sixe Courses from it they passed a Riuer as broad as the Thames called Viau, which runnes West into Sinda or Indus. Here was Pitchte Can his Tents pitched like a little Citie: he was Embassadour into Persia. On the foure and twentieth they came to Lahore. Their Report of this agrees with Master Coryats, whose Relation thereof is lately published. They say it is the best of India, plentifull of all things, or in Master Coryats words, such a delicate and euen Tract of ground as I neuer saw before (and hee hath seene a great deale, besides his Europæan sights at Venice, & since at Constantinople, hauing added more Asian Titles to his before [c] Admired Name, then the ancient Roman Scipio's or Cæsars dreamt of, yea more then Iustinian in the Proœme of his [d] Imperiall Institutions hath marshalled and mustered together; the furthest foot English-Traueller that our dayes haue had, and the longest English stile which our eares haue heard, with many rests for your wearied breath by the way, a stile indeed so high you can hardly get ouer, HIEROSOLYMITAN--SYRIAN--MESOPOTAMIAN--ARMENIAN-MEDIAN-PARTHIAN-PERSIAN--INDIAN LEGGE--STRETCHER OF ODCOMB) Euen this our Odcombian Foot-Pilgrime, which makes your Pen-Pilgrime in I know not what liking or likenesse, at the very mention of his Name to sympathize, and his braines to fall in Trauell as learnedly mad, scarsly able to containe wonted words and wits, in this extaticall gaze and maze of that Propatetike Foot: ready to admire, adore and kisse, and yet (O braines, No braines) to enuy that his lowest part: For who is able to know his better parts? He doubts whether the like be to be found, within the whole Circumference of the habitable World. A row of Trees extends it selfe on both sides the way from the Towns end of Lahore, twentie dayes iourney, to the Townes end of Agra: most of them bearing (saith [e] Still) a kinde of Mulbery. The way is dangerous by night for Theeues, by day secure. Euery fiue or sixe Course there are faire Seraes of the Kings or Nobles, for beautifying the way, memory of their Names, and entertainment of Trauellers, where you may haue a Chamber and a Place to set your Horses, with store of Horse-meat; but in many of them little prouision for Men, by reason of the Banian Superstition. When a man hath taken vp his lodging in one of these, no other man may dispossesse him. About day-breake all make readie to depart together, and then the Gates are opened, till then shut for feare of Theeues. After the Sun hath beene vp two houres, the heat makes trauell irksome.

e R. Still. Lahore.

Lahore is one of the faireſt and ancienteſt Cities in India, ſtanding on Indus: It containeth at the leaſt (M. Coryat tells you) ſixteene miles in compaſſe. Twelue daies before hee came there, he paſſed Indus, there as broad as the Thames at London. In the mid-way betwixt Lahor and Agra, ten miles out of the way on the left hand, a Mountainous people, are ſaid to haue but one Wife to all the Brethren of one Family, as wee haue elſewhere ſpoken of the Arabians. Merchants reſort to this Citie out of all parts of India, imbarking their goods here in great Boats for Tutta, the chiefe Citie in Sinda, a Trade of much importance in times of Peace to the Portugals, which by this way Traded to Ormus and Perſia, and this way alſo furniſhing India with Pepper. Twelue or fourteene thouſand Camels lading yeerely paſſeth from hence to Perſia by Candahar, before the Wars with the Portugalls but three thouſand; this mountainous way, being in Winter cold, in Summer hot. The Carauans ſpend ſixe or ſeuen moneths betwixt Lahor and Spahan. Spices are deere in Perſia by reaſon of the long land-carriage from Meſulapatan this way. Still and Crowther departed from Lahor, May the thirteenth, and on the two and twentieth came to Multan, a great and and ancient Citie, within three Course of Indus, but poore; for which cause they detaine the Carauans there diuers dayes, eight, ten, or twelue, to benefit the Citie. They entred the Mountaines, the second of Iune, where they had brackish water: the third and fourth daies they trauelled all night, climing high Mountaines, and following water-courses, and so continued till they came to Chatcha on the tenth. In all these eight dayes trauell, is no sustenance for Man or Beast, except in some places a little grasse, and therefore at Lacca in the beginning of this way they hyred an Oxe to carry Barly for their Horses. On the nineteenth, they came to Duckee, another Fort of the Mogols, and the seuen and twentieth passed the Durwas, or straits of the Hils, dangerous narrow wayes on both sides menaced by high Rocks, from whence a few with stones may stop great multitudes, and diuers Carauans are thus cut off. For the Agwans or Puttans, the Mountaine Inhabitants are a theeuish people. The second of July, they came to Pesimga another Fort, and passing thence ouer a mightie Mountaine, on the seuenth came to Candahar. The Agwans are white, stout, strong, rob Carauans, sell all stragglers: but now with feare, and the gaine they get by selling their Cattell to the Carauans, they are more tractable.

Chatcha, a Fort.

Couert saith, they weare their beards long, are not Mahumetans: their Priests weare Sack-cloth, with great chaines about their middles, falling downe and praying in Sack-cloth and Ashes. At Candahar they hire Camels for India, or Persia: hence into Persia the Countrey is barren, and therefore they go in smaller companies, sometimes in two or three dayes trauell not seeing a greene thing: at their lodging-places, water, but often brackish and stinking. Hence they departed, Iuly the three and twentieth, and on the fiue and twentieth came to Cushecunna, the vtmost Garrison in the Mogols Frontiers, thirtie Course from Candahar. On the seuen and twentieth they came to Grees, a Castle of the Sophies, a Course from the Riuer Sabba, which separateth the Persian and Mogoll Confines. The people of Grees are Theeues, and the Captaine little better then a Rebell.

From hence they reckon their way by farsangs (parasangæ) fiue of which make two Courses. They trauelled [m] August the sixth, to Farra, a Towne walled with Sun-dryed Brick, and stored with Water, without which here is no store, and therefore they carry it in some places, if there be good ground, three or foure miles vnder ground. Heere they vse men kindly as they goe into Persia, for feare of complaint, but in their returne to India very hardly, searching them to the skin for Gold, which to carry out, or any Siluer coyne but the Kings, is death. On the twelfth day, they were faine to dig for water. On the two and twentieth, they came to Deuzayde, where they pretend all to be Religious people. On September the fifteenth (I still follow Still) they came to Spahan, where they found Sir Robert Sherly, then dispatched in Embassage for Spaine from the King of Persia [n], by the way of Ormus for Goa, and thence to Lisbon. Hee procured the Kings Great Seale to all his Gouernours of Sea-Ports, kindly to entertaine the English at Iasques, &c. dated September the thirtieth, 1615. the same day that Sir Robert and his Lady departed with great pompe to Siras.

m Still. Coverts Trauels are extant in his Booke.

n Hee saith, that he hath put to death his own sonne, and done 1000 other tyrannies.

Iohn Crowther returned October the twentieth, towards Lahor, and he on December the second, towards Bagdat, and thence by Aleppo for England.

William Nicols, one of the Ascensions company, trauelled the Mogols Countrey Eastward to Mesulopatan, where the Hollanders had then a Factorie. Iohn Mildnall in his Letters, dated from Casbin in Persia, 1606. October the third, testifieth, that he had beene at Lahor and at Agra, where hee presented the King with nine and twentie great Horses, at fiftie or threescore ponnds a Horse, with diuers Iewels and Rings, and obtained Articles of Trading. Of his comming since into those parts, is before mentioned from Master Withingtons Relations. And his Trauells are the next Trauells of our Pen: first, from Surrat to Amadabar, by Poriano, Columbay, Barocho (a Citie walled, on a high Hill, a Riuer running by as broad as the Thames, where are the best Calicoes in the Kingdome) Saringa, Carron, Boldra (a City fairer but lesse then Barocho, where Mussaf Chan hath three thousand horse) Niriand a great Towne where they make Indico. These are in the way from Surat to Amadabar, chiefe Citie of Guzerat, neere as great as London, strongly walled, situate in a plaine by the Riuers side, much frequented by Merchants, Christians, Moores, and Ethnikes. The Gouernour is Abdala Chan of fiue thousand Horse pay. From thence hee went to Cambaya. At Serkesse three Courses from Amadabar, hee saw the Sepulchres of the Kings of Guzerat, very faire and well kept, much visited from all parts of the Kingdome. Their Temple is very faire. A Course from hence is a goodly House by the Riuers side, and a Garden a mile in compasse. It was built by Chon Chonnaw, the chiefe of the Mogol Nobilitie, in memoriall of a great Victorie there obtained on the last King of Guzerat there captiued, and his Kingdome subdued, the battell was fought in this place. They lodged one night in this House, where none dwelleth. Only poore men are appointed to looke to the Garden. 1601. (commonly called Tutta) chiefe Citie of Sinda, hee was sent thither, and December the thirteenth, came to Cassumpauo, and thence with a Caphilo trauelled on the fourteenth to Callitalowny a faire Castle, and the fifteenth to Calwalla, a prettie Village, which Echebar gaue to a company of Women and their Posteritie for euer, to bring vp their children in dancing, &c. They practised this in the Caruan, euery man giuing them money, and then impudently asked if any man wanted a bed-fellow. The next day they came to Carrya, a well-manned Fortresse, and staying a day for more company because of Theeues, came the next to Deceanaura, losing one Camell stolne from them, and a Man slaine. Thence to Bollodo, a Fort kept by Newlock Abram Cabrath, which that day came with a hundred and threescore and nine heads of the Cælies, a robbing Nation. The next day to Sariandgo another Fort, and on the one & twentieth to Radempoore, a great Town with a Fort, where they staid to make prouision of Water, & other necessaries for their iourny through the Desarts.

Calwalla, a Towne of filthy Women.

Desart.

On the three and twentieth they went seuen Course, lay in the Fields, and met a Caruan which came from Tutta, robbed of all their goods: on the foure and twentieth, twelue: on the fiue and twentieth, fourteene, lodged by a Well of water so salt that their Cattell could not drinke it: the six and twentieth ten Course, to such another Well; and their gaue their Camels drinke, not hauing drunke before in three dayes: the seuen and twentieth fourteene course. The eight and twentieth ten, and came to a Village called Negar Parkar. In this Desart they saw great store of wilde Asses, red Deere, Foxes, and other wilde Beasts. At Parkar they met another robbed Caruan. This Towne payes Tribute to the Mogol. From hence till you come within halfe a dayes iourney of Tutta, they acknowledge no King, but rob and spare whom they please. When the Mogol sends any Armie against them, they fire their Houses (which are made of Straw and Mortar, in forme of Bee-Hiues soone rebuilded) and flye into the Mountaines. They take for custome what they please, and then guard Passengers and Merchants, loth any should rob them but themselues.

From hence they went sixe Courses, and lay by a Tanke or Pond of Fresh-water, and on the last of December, eight Courses, and lodged by a brackish Well, Ianuary the first, they trauelled ten Courses to Burdiano. The Water is brackish, and many were sicke of it; yet they were forced to make prouision thereof for foure dayes, the space of fortie Courses; and on the fifth they came seuen other Courses to three Wels, of which two were salt, the third not perfectly fresh: the next day ten Courses to Nauraquemire a prettie Towne, where their Raddingpore Cafila forsooke them. He and two other Indian Merchants, with their nine Seruants, ten Camels, and fiue Camel-men remained to goe for Tutta, whither they had now three dayes iourney.

From this Paradise (so it seemed after so tedious a Desart) they departed, Ianuary the eight, hauing hired one of the Ragi, or Gouernour his kindred for twentie Laries (which make about twentie shillings) to conduct and conuoy them, and went ten Courses to Gundayaw, where they had beene robbed, but for their Guard. The next day were twice assaulted, and forced each time to pay fiue Laries, came to Sarruna, a great Towne of the Razbootches with a Castle: whence it is fourteene Courses to Tutta. Ragi Bouma the Gouernour, is eldest Sonne to Sultan Bulbull, who had beene lately captiued by the Mogoll, and spoiled of his eyes, and two moneths before our comming had made an escape to these Mountaines, animating his kindred to reuenge that losse of his sight. This Ragi was kinde to our Author as a stranger, and made him sup with him: the occasion that they hired him for fortie Laries, with fiftie Horse-men to conduct them to the Gates of Tutta. Hereunto they were the rather perswaded by aduice of a Banian, which had then come from Tutta, who also told Master Withinton, that Sir Robert Sherly had beene much abused by the Portugals, and the Gouernour at Lowribander, his House fired, and his Men hurt in the night: and arriuing at Tutta thirteene dayes after, was there vnkindly vsed by Mersa Rusto the Gouernour. This Ragi led them fiue Courses, where they lay by a Riuer side, and at two of the clocke in the morning they departed, but were led a contrary way, and about breake of day brought into a Thicket, where he made them vnlade, tooke away their Weapons and bound them; suddenly with their Camell ropes drawne close with a Truncheon, hanged the two Merchants and their fiue Men, stripped and buried them. Mee (as a farre Countrey-man, not knowing the language) hee spared with my Pions or Seruants, but tooke my Horse (giuing me a Iade) and fourescore Rupias from mee, sent mee twentie Courses with my men vp to the Mountaines to a brother of his, where I continued two and twentie dayes a close prisoner, and then order was sent to conuey mee to Parker: but in the way was robbed of my clothes and all that I had: so that I and my men were forced to liue vpon the charitie of people by begging: onely my Horse, as not worth taking, was left me, for which I could get but foure mamoodees (foure shillings) but chancing on a Banian whom I had knowne at Amadabar, I was relieued and sold not my Horse. Wee came to Radingpoore

May

May the nineteenth, and April the second, to Amadabar: thence to Cambaya, and (passing the Riuer seuen Courses broad, yeerely drowning many) to Saurau, a Towne and Castle of the Razbootches, and fiue and twentie Courses further to Borocho, and passing that Riuer, to Cassimba, and thence to Surat. In all this Countrey of Sinda, no Citie of greater Trade then Tutta; the chiefe Port thereto is Lowribander, three dayes iourney from thence, where is a faire Roade without the Riuers mouth, cleere of Wormes, which about Surat, and other places of the Indies infest the ships, so that after three or foure moneths riding, if it were not for sheathing, they were not able to returne. The Ports and Roades of Sinda are free of them. In two moneths they passe from Tutta to Lahor, and returne downe the streame in one. And from Agra goods may bee conueyed on Camels in twentie dayes, which is on Sinda Riuer, and thence in fifteene or sixteene dayes aboord the Ships at Lowribander, as soone as to Surat, if Theeues did not make it lesse seeure.

Wormes dangerous to ships

May the fourth, 1614. Master Withington went from Surat to Brampore, where Sultan Parnise lyes. It is situate in a Plaine by a great Riuer, hauing a large Castle; and thence to Agra: all which way is seuen hundred Courses. From Surat to Brampore is a pleasant and champaigne Countrey, full of Riuers, Brookes, and Springs. From Brampore to Agra very mountainous, hardly passable for Camels by Mando the neerest way: there are many high Hils and strong Castles in the way, Townes and Cities in euery dayes iourney well inhabited, the Country peaceable and cleere of Theeues. Betweene Agimere or Azmere and Agra, are a hundred and twentie Courses: at euery Course end a great Pillar erected, and at euery tenth Couse a Seraglia or Place of lodging for Man and Horse, with Hostesses to dresse your Victuall (if you please) three pence will pay for your Horse and Meate-dressing: there are also at euery teuth Course faire Houses erected by Echebar for his Women, and none else may lie in them. The reason heereof is reported, that Echebar wanting Children went on Pilgrimage on foot to Asmere for that purpose, at euery Course end saying his prayers, and lodging at the tenth. Agra is a huge Towne, situate by the great Riuer Geminie or Iamena. The Castle is the fairest thing in it, compassed with the fairest and highest Wall that I haue seene, two miles about, well repleniſhed with Ordnance: the rest, except Noble-mens houses (which are faire and seated by the Riuer) ruinous. Fatipore is decayed, but hath a very stately Temple built by Geometry; as Echebars Sepulchre, the faireſt thing that euer I saw. I went to Ganges, two dayes iourney from Agra, the Water whereof is carryed a hundred miles by the Banians for deuotion, which say it will neuer stinke, how long soeuer it bee kept. From Agra Master Fitch went to Satagam in Bengala by Water. So that if you obserue all these Trauels of [o] Fitch, Couert, Still, Withington, and the rest of our Countrey-men, and adde thereto the iourney of Goes from thence to China, with other Relations of the Iesuites before expressed, you shall haue a better Corographie of this Countrey, then any of our Maps haue yet deliuered. And their want hath made me thus full and tedious. I might adde the Trauels of [p] William Clerke, one of the Ascensions Company, which serued the Mogol in his Warres diuers yeeres (and returned in the last Ship, whiles these things are publishing) against the Rasboots and Decans, hauing two Horse pay, which is neere sixe pounds a moneth, and had some moneths pay allowed him before-hand, that so hee might furnish himselfe: for they must buy and maintaine their Horses.

Master Walter [q] Payton was Master in the Exepedition, and carried Sir Robert Sherly, whom they had thought to haue landed at Gauder or Guader in Masqueranno, in fiue and twentie Degrees, and six and twentie Minutes, but the people were then in Rebellion against the Persian, and by damnable treachery had possessed themselues of the Ship and all the goods, had not one Hoge Comal, a Surgeon amongst them reuealed this mysterie of their iniquitie: they had thus betrayed three ships before. By this villany of the Bulloches, they were forced to goe further to the mouth of Sinde, which is East and by North, in foure and twentie Degrees, and foure and thirtie Minutes. They landed the Embassador, September the nine and twentieth, 1613. at Diul, in the Mols Dominion, fifteene miles from the ships. The Portugals reported them to be Theeues, according to their custome. And when they sought for Trade in Sinda, the Gouernour had yeelded but for the Portugals, which threatned to depart if the English were admitted, whose custome hee was loth to lose, being worth, hee said, a Leck of Rupias, ten thousand pound English and more (which shewes the exceeding Trade of Sinda) by the yeere.

But this Countrey, and the disposition of their King, are most amply described to vs together, with the remarkable Rarities of those parts, by the Hon. industry of Sir Thomas Roe, Embassadour for his Maiestie with the Mogoll, whose Map of those parts wee heere present you; as likewise by his learned Chaplaine, Master Edward Terry: both whose Obseruations wee haue presented in our first Tome of Voyages. To them I referre the industrious Reader, for more ample relations of these parts, then in this Worke were conuenient to insert.

Amongst other things, the Reader shall see the true course of Indus (which all Moderne Geographers haue exceedingly falsified) and of Ganges. William Finch hath also written of those parts. I thought good heere to adde that which Master Steele and his wife told me of the Women of those parts. Master Steele hauing a proiect of Water-works, to bring the water of Ganges by Pipes, &c. carried fiue men with him to the Mogol, who gaue them entertainment with large wages by the day, and gaue to each an Arabian Horse. One of these was a Painter, whom the Mogol would haue to take his picture; and because hee could not speake the language, Master Steele (who could speake the language of the Court, which is Persian) was admitted (a thing not permitted to Men) into the Mogols lodgings, where he did sit for the said Limner. At his entrance, the chiefe Eunuch put a cloth ouer his head, that he should not see the Women (which hee might heare as hee passed, and once also saw them, the Eunuch purposely putting on a thinner cloth ouer his head) there being of them some hundreds. His wife had more accesse at Chan Channas Court, whose daughter (sometimes wife to the elder brother of this Mogol, and liuing still a widdow) had a desire to see the English-woman, and Chan-Channa intreated her husband to permit it. Shee was fetched in a close Chariot drawne by white Oxen, attended by Eunuchs; and was first brought into an open Court, in midst of which was a Tanke or Well of Water, where sate many women, slaues to Chan-Channas daughter, of diuers Nations and complexions; some blacke, exceeding louely and comely of person notwithstanding, whose haire before did stand vp with right tufts, as if it had growne vpward, nor would ruffling disorder them; some browne, of Indian complexion; others very white, but pale, and not ruddy: many of them seemed goodly and louely, all sitting in their slight, but rich garments on the floore couered with carpets. The Lady came forth in meaner attire, whereat they all arose and did her reuerence, with their faces to the ground. Mistresse Steele made her three courtsies, after the English fashion (being also in English attire) and deliuered her a Present (without which there is no visitation of great persons) and the Lady caused her to sit by her, and after discourse, entertained her with a Banket; and began familiaritie with her, continued and increased with often visitations, and rewarded with many gifts, as of womens vestments of of those parts; some of which I saw, the vpper garment like a smocke, of thin Calico, vnder which they weare a paire of breeches close aboue, the neather parts very long and slender, loosely ruffling about their legs, of thin stuffe also; the mans garment differing from the womans, by the fastning on the side vnder the arme, whereas the womans is fastened before, both tyed with ribbands. Chan Channa caused his Taylor to take view of Master Steele, and without other measure hee made him a cloake of cloth of gold, after the English fashion very comely, which I also saw.

§. VI.

Of the Rasboots, and other people subiect to the Mogol, and of their Countries, Religion, and Rites.

THus haue we delineated this huge Giantly Body of the Mogol Empire. The Soule or Religion thereof, is more inuisible. What lurking places and labyrinths the breasts of the Kings haue had in their vnknowne, curious, vncertaine Faith, yee haue heard, and may thereby guesse at the rest. As the people are manifold, so are their Rites; some of which, about Ganges, and in other parts, haue alreadie beene touched: and some hereafter, as the People and their Rites are diffused and dispersed in diuers Tracts of India, we shall elsewhere mention. Besides Christian Forreiners, the principall Religion is Ethnike, though that of the Prince be Mahumetan.

The Reisbuti, Rasbootes, or Rasbooches, the ancient Inhabitants of the Countrey of Sinda, are Gentiles. How strong one of them is, you haue heard Captaine Hawkins report. His name, as I haue since learned of Mr. Rogers, Mr. Clarke, and Mr. Withington, is Ranna; some of them affirming, That hee is lately come in, and hath sent his sonne a pledge to the Mogols Court, who for this cause, and his sake, hath beene so long resident at Azmere. But Mr. Clarke, employed in these wars, saith, That it is not a subiection, but voluntarie friendship and neighbourhood, with acknowledgement of himselfe the Inferior. A Rebell or Outlaw he cannot be called, because hee was neuer subiect; accounting the Mogoll Superior in power, but not his Lord. There are of these many Casts, or Tribes, each of which haue supreame and independent Lords: Nature building them, with little helpe of Art, impregnable Fortresses, or inaccessable Hils. One of which, called Dewras, is said to haue very many populations; able on the Hill tops to gather sufficient prouisions for themselues, and the neighbour-bour-Markets; impoſſible without corruption to be conquered. When any of theſe Caſts, or Tribes, diſagree, the Mogoll interpoſeth himſelfe, profeſſing to take part with the right. Their Countrey lies in the direct way from Surat to Agra, the wayes by Amadauar, or by Brampore, both much about, yet frequented by Merchants, for feare of them. The Countrey people [b] are rude, naked from the waſte vpwards, with Turbants differing from the Mogol faſhion. Their Armes are Sword, Buckler, and Launce. Their Buckler is great, in faſhion of a Bee-hiue, in which they will giue their Camels drinke, and Horſes prouender. Their Horſes are good, ſwift, and ſtrong, which they ride vnſhod, and back at a yeere old. A reſolute people; which the Mogoll ſaith, knowes as well to die, as any in the world. They eate no Beefe nor Buffolo, but haue them in ſuperſtitious reſpect. The Rasbutche husband dying, the wife is burned. The manner is this: The wife accompanies the dead bodie of her husband in her beſt array, pompouſly attended with her friends and kindred, and with Muſick. The fire being made, ſhe compaſſeth the ſame twice or thrice: firſt bewayling her huſbands death; and then reioycing, that ſhe ſhall now liue with him againe; and then embracing her friends, ſits downe on the top of the pyle, taking her husbands head in her lap, and bids them kindle the fire. This done, her friends throw Oyle and other ſweet Perfumes on her, ſhee enduring the fire with admirable patience, looſe, and not bound. I haue ſeene many (it is M. Withingtons report) the firſt at Surat, the woman being but ten yeeres old, and not yet a woman hauing not knowne her husband, who was ſlaine in the wars, and his clothes brought home. Yet would ſhe needs burne with his clothes: and the Gouernour not permitting, becauſe ſhee was a Virgin, her friends intreated and bribed him thereto, ſhee ſeeming impatient of that delay, and ſaying, her husband was a great way before her, with much blind ioy entring into endleſſe ſorrowes. The kindred of the deceaſed husband doe not force this vnkind kindneſſe, but the wiues owne kindred; holding it a diſgrace to their family, if ſhee refuſe; which ſhe hath power to doe: but few will; and then ſhee muſt ſhaue her haire, and breake her iewels, and is not ſuffered to eate, drinke, ſleepe, or company with any bodie, till her death. If, after purpoſe to burne, impatient of the flame, ſhe leapes out, her father and mother will bind and burne her perforce. But ſuch weakneſſe ſeldome happens. In ſome places they obſerue it, with Rites a little differing: carrying the woman in great pompe on a Pageant, and binding her to a ſtake, all her kindred kneeling round about her, and praying to the Sun, and their other Idols. Shee hath betwixt her legs, and vnder each arme, a bag of Gun-powder; the fire made all of ſweet Woods. Wee ſhall mention other Rites in other places.

The Hendownes poſſeſſe the Countrey North from Aſmere toward the Multans: degenerate Gentiles, and refuſing no manner of Fleſh or Fiſh. They pray naked, dreſſe and eat their meat naked; and where they dreſſe and eate their meat, make a Circle, within which, none muſt enter during that time. Their women are brought vp from their child-hood with ſhackles, ſome of Siluer, ſome of Braſſe, and ſome of Iron, on their legges, and Rings in their eares; all which encreaſe with themſelues, being made bigger, as they grow; ſo that in time a man may thruſt his hand through the holes of their eares. Alſo they weare Bracelets of Elephants teeth about their armes, from the wriſt to the elbow. Wee haue alreadie ſpoken of the Bulloches, their Northerly neighbours, Sunne-worſhipping, Giantly bigneſſe, and Inhumane humanitie, in eating mans-fleſh (and likewiſe of the Puttans or Agwans.) The Bulloches in Sinda, and vpon the Perſian Gulfe (it ſeemes of this generation) are Mahumetans, Robbers by Land, and Pyrats by Sea, whereto they adde the murther of thoſe they rob. Their treachery to Sir R. Sherly, and the Expedition, is before mentioned: which had it had expedition according to their plot, they had murthered all but the Surgeon, the Muſician, the Boyes, and the Women. When I was in Sinda (ſaith M. Withington) they tooke a Boat, with ſeuen Italians, and one Portugall Fryar, this ripped vp by them, to ſeeke Gold in his entrailes, the reſt ſlaine in the fight. Yet there are very honeſt men of them in Guzerat, and about Agra.

Touching other Superſtitions of this Kingdome, thus writeth Ioannes Oranus, in the Narration of this Kingdome [c]. Not farre from the Citie Lahor is an Idoll, reſembling a woman, which they call Nazar Coto, framed with two Heads, & ſix or ſeuen Armes, and twelue or fourteene Hands; one of which brandiſheth a Speare, another a Club. Hereunto reſort many Pilgrims to worſhip; and hereof they tell many miracles: as, that many cut off their tongues, which are againe reſtored whole vnto them, but remaine mute. Some thinke our breath to bee our Soule. Some affirme, That all things are the ſame thing. Some, that God onely hath a being, other things are ſhadowes and appearances. Some thinke all things, and ſome, the round Circle of the World; and ſome, themſelues, to bee God. Almoſt all doe hold the commigration of Soules into the bodies of Beaſts. They ſay, the World ſhall laſt foure Ages, or Worlds; whereof three are paſt. The firſt laſted ſeuenteene Laches (euery Laches contained an hundred thousand yeeres) and eight and twentie thousand yeeres. Men in that World liued ten thousand yeeres, were of great stature of bodie, and great sincerities of minde. Thrice in this space did God visibly appeare on the Earth: First, in forme of a Fish, that hee might bring out the Booke of the Law of Brama, which one Causacar had hurled into the Sea: The second time, in forme of a Snaile, that he might make the Earth dry and solid: Lastly, like a Hog, to destroy one that said he was God; or as others of them as truely say, to recouer the Earth from the Sea, which had swallowed it. The second World lasted ten Laches, and ninetie two thousand and six yeeres; in which, men were as tall as before, and liued a thousand yeeres. God did appeare foure times: First, in a monstrous forme, the vpper part a Lion, the lower a Woman, to represse the pride of one, which gaue out himselfe for God: Secondly, like a poore Bramane, to punish a proud King, that would by a new-deuised Art fly into Heauen: The third time, to be reuenged of another King, which had slain a poore Religious man, he came in the likenesse of a Man, named Parcaram: and lastly, like one Ram, the sonne of Giocorat, which had slaine Parcaram. The third World continued eight Laches and foure thousand yeeres, wherein men liued fiue hundred yeeres; and God appeared twice in Humane likenesse. The fourth Age shall endure foure Laches, whereof are alreadie passed foure thousand sixe hundred fourescore and twelue yeeres. They say God will also appeare in this Age. Others imagine, That he hath alreadie appeared, and that Echebar is hee. Some hold, That those ten Appearances were but creatures, which had receiued Diuine power. They themselues easily perceiue the vanity of these Chimera's, and monstrous opinions, but will not leaue them, lest they should (at the same cast) lose their Wealth and Superstition together.

f R. Fitch. In the Countrey of the Mogor they haue [f] many fine Carts, carued and gilded, with two Wheeles, drawn with two little Buls, about the bignesse of our great Dogs in England, and they will runne with any Horse, and carry two or three men in one of those Carts. They are couered with Silke, or fine Cloth, and be in vse as our Coaches in England.

T. Coryat. But we will shut vp this too great discourse of the great Mogols Greatnesse, in the words of the Worlds Greatest Foot-post. He tels vs, from the very Mogols Court, That this present Prince, is a man of three and fiftie yeeres of age, of complexion middle, betwixt white and blacke, in a more expressiue Epitheton, Oliue; of a seemely composition of bodie, of stature little vnequall to Mine, but much more corpulent (Hee neuer trauelled so much on foot, nor ten moneths together with fiftie shillings expence.) His Dominion is little lesse then foure thousand English miles: which, if it come short of the Turke in Geometricall dimension of ground, it is with a great pleonasme supplied by the fertilitie of his Soyle, and in the vnion of all his Territories. Againe, hee exceedeth him in Reuenue (a great deale more then M. Coryats reckoning) hee presenteth himselfe thrice euerie day: at the rising of the Sunne, which hee adoreth by the eleuation of his hands; at noone, and at fiue of the clocke in the euening: but he standeth in a roome aloft, alone by himself, and looketh from a window that hath an embroidered sumptuous Couerture, supported with two siluer Pillasters, to yeeld shadow vnto him. In feeding of his Beasts, hee spendeth at the least ten thousand pound sterling a day, and keepeth a thousand women for his owne body, whereof the chiefe is Normal. I haue bin in a Citie in this Country, called Detee, where Alexander ioyned battell with Porus, & in token of his victory, erected a brasse Pillar, which remaineth there to this day. There arriued foure English ships at Surat, and in the same Sir Thomas Rowe, the English Embassador to the Mogol: the newes whereof came to Asmere, October. 8. 1615. and did much refocillate M. Coryats spirits (as did M. Brownes verses from Amadavars) and so I hope will yours.

CHAP. VIII.

Of Cambaya, Decan, and the neighbouring Nations.

§. I.

Of the Cambayans.

ALthough we might seem to haue spoken sufficiently of the Cambayans alreadie, in our former Mogol-Relations; yet, both as better knowne, and because such was our Order in the former Editions, wee haue allowed them a Chapter here by themselues. Cambaya is also called Guzarat [a], containing in length, from the Riuer Bate to Circam, a Persian Region, fiue hundred miles of Sea-coast, being on other parts enuironed [b] with the Kingdomes of of Dulcinda and Sanga, on the North; Mandao, on the East; on the West, Nautacos, or the Gedrosians. The Sea, and the Confines of Decan are the Southerly bounds. It hath in it, by estimation, threescore thousand Populations, or inhabited Places, watred with many Streames, the chiefe whereof is Indus, which diuideth it in the middle, running from Caucasus, or Naugrocot, and after nine hundred miles iourney, with two nauigable mouths disemboquing it selfe into the Ocean. This Countrey is very fertile, not yeelding to any other in India, in the fruits which the Earth and Trees bring forth, besides their store of Elephants, Gems, Silke, Cotton, and such like. The people are of an Oliue-colour, and goe naked, except about their priuie parts. They eate no Flesh, but Rice, Milke, Barley, and other life-lesse Creatures. The Inhabitants are, for the most part, Gentiles; and so were their Kings, vntill the Mahumetan Superstitions preuailed. There are [c] vp within the Land, People called Resbuti, which are the natural Nobles of this Kingdome, chaced by the Moores to the Mountaines, whence they make often excursions and spoyles in the Country; and the Cambayans pay them tribute, that they might liue in peace: of these is spoken alreadie. Their chiefe Sea-Townes are Daman, Bandora, Surate, Rauellum, Bazuinum; and within Land, Cambaya, Madabar, Campanel, Tanaa, &c. Surat (now an English Factory) hath a Castle of [d] Stone, with good Ordnance: The Houses are faire, of Stone and Brick, square, with flat rooses: they haue goodly Gardens, with Pomegranats, Pome-Citrons, Melons, Limons, Figs all the yeere long, curious Springs of fresh Water. The people neat, tall, louing, graue, iudicious, clothed in long white Calico, or Silke.

[d] Pat. Copland.

Cambaya hath bestowed the name on the whole Kingdome, which they call the Indian Cairo, for the excellencie thereof: it standeth three miles from Indus. The Tides here [e] encrease not, as with vs, at the full, but in the decrease of the Moone they are at the highest. Of this Riuer Indus, Ptolomey and Arrianus in his Periplus of the Erythrean Sea, reckon seuen Mouthes or Entrances into the Sea; and Thenet (I know not with what Friar-like, and Lyar-like boldnesse) nameth seuen at this day: but Arrianus saith, in those times six of the seuen were ouer-growne, and but one nauigable. But Dionysius, Pomponius, Strabo, and the other Arrianus, which writ the life of Alexander, ascribe but two vnto it; which is confirmed by the Portugals. Arrianus hath in his eight Booke largely described the Voyage of Nearchus and Onesicritus, from this Riuer, about the Coast into the Persian Gulfe, employed by Alexander the Great. It is not 160. yeeres since Machamut, a Moore, expelled the Guzarat King.

This Machamut deserueth mention for one thing, wherein the Sunne hath scarce beheld his like. Hee so accustomed himselfe to poysons, that no day passed wherein hee tooke not some; for else hee himselfe had dyed, saith Barbosa; as it fareth with Amsian or Opium, the vse whereof killeth such as neuer tooke it, and the disuse, such as haue. And beyond that which we reade of Mithridates in the like practice, his Nature was transformed into so venemous a habit, that if hee did meane to put any of his Nobles to death, hee would cause them to be set naked before him, and chewing certaine fruits in his mouth, which they call Chofolos and Tambolos, with lime made of shells, by spitting vpon him, in one halfe houre depriued him of life: if a Fly sate vpon his hand, it would presently fall off dead. Neither was his [f] loue to be preferred to his hatred, or with women was his dealing lesse deadly. For he had three or foure thousand Concubines, of whom, none liued to see a second Sunne, after hee had carnally knowne them. His Mustaches (or haire of his vpper lip) was so long, that hee bound it vpon his head, as women doe with an haire-lace; and his beard was white, reaching to his Waste. Euery day when he arose, and when hee dined, fiftie Elephants were brought into the Palace, to doe him reuerence on their knees, accompanied with Trumpets and other Musicke.

[f] Od. Barbosa.

Cœlius Rhodiginus [g] mentions the like of a Maid, thus nourished with Poysons, her Spettle (and other Humours comming from her) being deadly: such also as lay with her carnally, presently dying. Auicenna hath also a like example of a Man, whose Nature, infected with a stronger Venome, poysoned other venomous Creatures, if any did bite him. And when a greater Serpent was brought for triall, he had by the biting thereof a two-dayes Feuer; but the Serpent dyed: The other did not harme him.

[g] Cœl. Rhodig. lib. 11. cap. 13.

Mamudius, the Successor of King Machamut, was a great enemy to the Portugals. Badurius succeeded in state and affection, and exceeded in greatnesse and ambition. Hee inuaded [h] Mandao, and Sanga, where hee besieged Citor: then gouerned by a warlike woman: which not able to hold out longer against him, fled, and left the people in forlorne plight; who in a desparate resolution (like Sardanapalus) heaping vp their Treasures, set fire thereto, and then cast themselues therein. This fire continued three dayes, and consumed threescore and ten thousand persons.

[h] Maff. lib. 12.

Hence Badurius triumphantly marched against the Mogor, whom Maffeus calleth Miramudius, with an Army of an hundred and fiftie thousand Horse, whereof thirtie thousand were barded; and fiue hundred thousand Foot-men: of great brazen Ordnance, a thousand; whereof foure Basiliskes were drawne (such was their weight) by so many hundred yokes of Oxen: with Shot and Powder hee laded fiue hundred Waynes, and as many with Gold and Siluer, to pay his Souldiers. These Forces, with this prouision, might rend the Ayre with Thunders, might make the Earth to shake with Terror, might dry and drinke vp Riuers of Water, might frame another fiery Element, of Arts inuention; but could not either terrifie the Mogor, or saue Badurius from a double ouerthrow; first, at Doceri; next, at Mandoa, where hee loseth his Tents and Treasures; and shauing his beard, flyeth disguised to Diu: in which, that the Portugalls might be engaged in the same warre, hee gaue them leaue to erect a Fortresse: A thing of such moment vnto them, that Iohn Botelius (confined before vnto India, for crimes obiected) thought, by being the first Messenger thereof in Portugall, to purchase his libertie: whereof he might well bee reputed worthy, who in a little Vessell, scarce eighteene foot long, and sixe wide, with vndaunted courage contemning that wide, long, and tempestuous Ocean, arriued with his small companie, great newes, and greater admiration, at Lisbone. Badurius after altering his minde, and therein entertaining a treacherous Proiect against the Portugalls, coloured the same with kindnesse, and he (which feared all [i] men, no lesse then hee was feared, as guiltie to his owne Tyranny, which sometime made Dionysius of a King, a Barbar, and now this, a King of others, and his own Cooke, trusting no man to dresse his meat) aduentured to visit the Portugall Vice-Roy in his ships, professing great friendship, with great dissimulation, and by a meane Mariner, at his returne, was slaine; whereupon the whole Iland submitted it selfe to the Portugall yoke. And because we haue in this Chapter mentioned so many Wonders, let this also haue place among (if not aboue) the rest, which presently happened [k]. Whiles the Portugalls were busie in their Buildings, a certaine [l] Bengalan came to the Gouernour, which had liued, as hee affirmed, three hundred thirtie fiue yeeres. The old men of the Countrey testified, That they had heard their Ancestors speake of his great age, and himselfe had a sonne fourescore and tenne yeeres old, and not at all Booke-learned, yet was a speaking Chronicle of those passed times. His teeth had sometimes fallen out, [m] others growing in their places; and his beard, after it had beene very hoarie, by degrees returned into his former blackenesse. About an hundred yeeres before this time, he had altered his Pagan Religion into the Arabian or Moorish. For this his miraculous age, the Sultans of Cambaya had allowed him a stipend to liue on; the continuance of which he now sought; and did obtaine of the Portugals. Friar Ioano dos Santos [n] tells a long story of one yet aliue, Ann. 1605. of whom the Bishop of Cochin had sente men to inquire, who by diligent search found that hee was then three hundred eightie yeeres old, and had maried eight times, the father of many generations. They say his teeth had thrice fallen out, and thrice renewed: his haire thrice hoary, and as oft black againe. Hee could tell of nineteene successiue Kings, which reigned in Horan his Countrey in Bengala. He was also borne a Gentile, and after turned Moore, and hoped, he said, to dye a Christian, reioycing to see a picture of Saint Francis, saying, Such a man when he was twentie fiue yeeres old had foretold him this long life.

But to returne: Mamudius, successor to Badurius, sought with all his forces to driue these new Lords out of Diu, as Solyman had done before, by a Nauie and Armie sent thither; but both in vaine: of which Wars, Damianus à Goes [o] hath written diuers Commentaries. But this whole Countrey is now subiect to the Mogor. It was, in Alexanders time, peopled by the Massani, Sodræ, or Sabracæ, Præstæ, and Sangadæ, as Ortelius hath placed them; where Alexander (as in diuers other places he had done) erected a Citie of his owne name, called Alexandria. Daman, another Key of this Bay, and entrance of the Riuer Indus into the Sea, fell to the Portugals share.

The Land of Cambaya [p] is the fruitfullest in all India; which causeth great traffique of Indians, Portugals, Persians, Arabians, Armenians, &c. The Guzarates, or Cambayans, are the subtilest Merchants in all those parts. They haue [q] amongst them many Histories of Darius and Alexander, which sometime were Lords of this Indian Prouince. The Portugals [r] haue at diuers times conquered diuers of the chiefe Townes in this Kingdome, some whereof they keepe still. The women in Diu, by Art dye their teeth black, esteeming themselues so much the more beautifull, and therefore go with their lips open, to shew the blacknesse of their teeth, drawing away the couer of their lips, as if they were lip-lesse, giuing the prize of Beautie to a double deformitie, Blacknesse, and a Mouth O Hellish wide. When a Cambayan dyeth, they burne his body, and distribute the ashes vnto the foure Elements (of which man consisteth) part to the Fire, part to the Ayre, to the Water also and Earth their due portions, as Balby hath obserued.

M. Patrike Copland (Minister in the Dragon, with Captaine Best) writes, that hee rode in this Countrey, from Medhaphrabadh to Surat, in a Coach drawne with Oxen, which is the most

§. II.

Of the Kingdomes of Decan.

OF the Decans we haue ſpoken before, in the Mogol conqueſts. Decan is the name of a Citie, ſixe leagues from which is a Hill, out of which the Diamond is taken. This Hill is kept with a Garriſon, and walled about. Of the Decan Kingdomes, Barros hath reported, That about the yeere 1300. Sa Noſaradin reigned in Delly, or Delin, and inuaded the Kingdome of Canara (which reacheth from the Riuer Bate, North of Chaul, vnto the Cape Comori) and wonne much from the Anceſtors of the King (now termed) of Biſnaga. At his returne, he left Habedſa his Lieutenant, who added to the former Conqueſts, gathering a Band of all mixtures, Gentiles, Moores, Chriſtians. His ſonne was confirmed in the Gouernment, therefore called Decan, and the people Decanins, becauſe of this confuſion of ſo many Nations, of which, his Fathers and His forces conſiſted: for Decanins ſignifies Baſtards. He ſhooke off alleageance to his Lord, and acknowledged none Superiour. Hee alſo much encreaſed his Dominions. His name was Mamudſa. Hee appointed eighteene Captaines or Commanders, allotting to each, ſeuerall Prouinces. Theſe Captaines hee made, were but ſlaues, that ſo hee might the eaſier hold them in ſubjection. He commanded, that each of them ſhould build a Palace at Bedir, his chiefe Citie, and there reſide certaine moneths in the yeere; his ſonne remayning there in perpetuall hoſtage. Theſe, in proceſſe of time, grew fewer, and therefore greater; the King holding nothing but his Royall Citie; all the Empire being in the hands of theſe ſlaues: which, when the Portugals came thither, were no more, but Sabay, Niza-Malucco, Madre Malucco, Melic Verida, Coge Mecadam, the Abeſſine Eunuch, and Cota Malucco. The mightieſt of them was Sabay, Lord of Goa: His ſonne was Hidalcam. Thus Barrius. Garcias ab Horto writes, That the Mogors had poſſeſſed the Kingdome of Delly: but a certaine Bengalan (rebelling againſt his Maſter) ſlue him, vſurped his State, and by force of warre added this of Canara alſo to his Dominion; he was called k Xaholam. This King made his ſiſters ſonne l his Succeſſor, who was much addicted to Forreiners. He diuided his Kingdome into twelue parts, or Prouinces, ouer which, he ſet ſo many Captaines: Idalcam, from Angidaua to Cifarda: from thence to Negatona, Nizamaluco: Ouer Balaguate, or the vp-hill Countrey (for Bala in the Perſian language ſignifieth The toppe, and Gunte a Hill) Imadmaluco, and Catalmaluco, and Verido, &c.

k Xaholam, that is, Lord of the World, a Title, and not a proper name.

l Daquem.

Theſe all rebelled, and captiued Daquem their King at Beder, the chiefe Citie of Decan, and ſhared his Kingdome amongſt themſelues, and ſome Gentiles, partners in the conſpiracie. They were all forreiners, but Nizamaluco. This, and the other names, before mentioned, were Titles of Honour, giuen them, with their Offices, by the King, corrupted by the vulgar in pronouncing. Idalcam, is Adel-ham; Adel in the Perſian language, ſignifieth Iuſtice; Ham is the Tartarian appellation, ſignifying a Prince, or King (which name might well be the Reliques of the Tartarian conqueſts in thoſe parts) ſo Adelham, is King of Iuſtice. Neza in the Perſian (which Scaliger m ſaith is of like extent in the Eaſt, as Latine in the Weſt) is a Lance: Maluco ſignifieth the Kingdome. Neza, or Nizamaluco, the Speare or Lance of the kingdom. So Cotamaluco the Tower of the kingdom, Imadmaluco the Throne of the Kingdome, &c. Nizamaluco is alſo called Nizamoxa: which Xa, or Scha, is a Perſian title (ſignifying n as Monſieur in France, Don in Spaine) and giuen by Iſmael the Sophi, and Tamas his ſonne, to all thoſe Kings that would communicate in their Sect, which Nizamoxa only yeelded to, Other of them made ſhew, but ſoone recanted. Thus farre Garcias.

n Ioſ. Scal. Caſt. Iſag. lib. 7.

The Decan • Kings being now ten or twelue, make joynt warre againſt the Mogoll, hauing one Lieutenant Generall, which is Amber Chapu an Abaſſen ſlaue (before mentioned, out of Captaine Hawkins) who hath many Lecks of Rupias in ready money, and is Protector of the Kingdome of Amdanagar, the titular King being a childe. One Robert Iohnſon an Engliſhman turned Moore, and was entertained with much reſpect of one of the Decan Kings, but died eight dayes after his Circumciſion. So were Robert Claxon, and Robert Tralley, voluntarily robbed of that which they neuer had (Faith and Religion) and turned Moores. The Decans dominians reach from the West Sea to that of Choromandel, or very neere thereto. The chiefe reason of their Mahumetan Religion was that Conquest by Nosaradin, and his successors Moores: that there are so many Kingdomes proceed from that diuision before mentioned.

§. III.

Of the Banian and Cambayan superstitions.

Banians. M. Withington.

THe Religion in Cambaya is partly Mooriſh, partly Heatheniſh. The Banians are many, in Sinda and other Countries of the Mogol. There are ſome thirty Caſts of them in Sinda (this is the Countrey which Indus laſt forſaketh, inhabited by Boloches, and Rasbooches, and Banians, the great Townes and Cities gouerned by Mogols.) Theſe are of thirty different Sects, which may not eate with each other. They muſt alſo marry in their owne Caſt, Tribe and Sect, and which is more, in the ſame trade, as the Sonne of a Barber with a Barbers Daughter. Theſe marriages are made when they be yong, ſometime almoſt before they be. For when two women are pregnant, the Parents will make a match betweene their Children, if death or the ſexe diſappoint not. When they are three or foure yeeres old, the Parents which haue agreed on a match betweene their Children, make a great feaſt, and ſet this young couple on horſebacke (a man behind each of them to hold them) in their beſt clothes, accompanied with the Bramenes or Prieſts, and many others according to their ſtate, and ſo leade them vp and downe the Citie where they dwell, and then to the Pagode or Temple. After Ceremonies there done, they come home and make feſtiuall cheere certaine dayes, as they are able. At ten yeeres of age they lie together. The burning their dead is common to all their Sects. They are of the Pythagorean, or he was rather of their fancy, which he learned of the Indians. When the husband dies, the wife ſhaues her head, and weares her jewels no more, ſo continuing till death. Thus farre Maſter Withington. M. Couert relateth that they haue God in pictures of ſtone, hanging their Beades on the heads of the pictures, and then with their faces towards the Sunne doe worſhip it, ſaying all their comforts proceed from it. I ſaw a Kow adorned with Iewels and a Veſt of gold, her head bedecked with garlands & flowers, and then being brought to a burial place, where they vſe to make Sermons, they kiſſe her feet and teats and worſhip her. I asking why they did ſo? they anſwered that ſhe was the mother of beaſts, & brought them milke, butter, cheeſe, and the Oxe to till the ground, and laſtly, her Hide did make leather to make them ſhooes. Moreouer they ſay, ſhe is bleſt by the Mother of God to be honored aboue all beaſts.

Marriages ſolemnized betwixt infants.

R. Couert.

Anonimus.

Another writes that theſe Banians are the wiſeſt Merchants in the Eaſt, exceeding the Iewes, very rich, ſome worth 2. or 300000 li. He addes that they pay a great ſumme to the Mogol to preuent killing of Oxen: and when our men had ſhot a Turtle-doue through the wings, they will giue a Riall of eight to redeeme and preſerue it. P Generall Downton in his laſt Iournall writes, that when they would haue obtained a Bazar or Market by the ſhoare: anſwere was made that they might, but not for Bullocks. For the Mogol had granted his Firma to the Banians for a mighty ſumme yeerly to ſaue their liues. For Souldiery theſe are but ſhadowes of men, all their Fortitude ſmoking out in theſe ſuperſtitious ſpeculations, and therefore an eaſie prey to any Inuader. So true a μεταμψύχωσις haue they ſuſtained, being metamorphoſed and tranſanimated from men to blockes, and liuing ſtatues, or to ghoſts. Benjamin Day nameth one of their Sects called Aſh-men, whoſe bodies being moſt part naked, are couered with aſhes, whereby they looke like ghoſts or dead men. They liue idlely on reliefe not ſo much as begging. One of theſe was in great account, with haire hanging to his feet platted together, his nailes fiue or ſixe inches long. Vertomannus q is Author, that they worſhip not Idols, or Pagodes. Others report, That this way, and others, they are exceeding religiouſly deuoted. They obſerue a ſtrict kind of r faſting, which laſteth with ſome eight dayes, with others fifteene, twenty, or thirty dayes: in all which ſpace they eate not a bit; onely, when they thirſt, drinke water. One could not ſee when to make an end of this his penance, till his left eye fell out of his head, as both had done before out of his heart. In Cambaia they had one Bramene in ſuch reputation of holineſſe and honour, that they would ſalute him before they meddled with their worldly affaires. One affirmed to this Ieſuite, That if his Bramene ſhould command him to diſtribute all his goods to the poore, he would doe it, yea, he would lay downe his life at his command.

their Bramenes affirmed) the Sunne departed from Sur to Horte. Of their Pilgrimages is ſpoken before; ſome Eaſtward to Ganges; ſome Weſtward to Mecca, to wit, the Moores; not men alone, but women alſo: and becauſe Mahomet hath forbidden all vnmarried women this holy Iourney, they will marrie before they ſet forth, and diſſolue the ſame marriage againe, after their returne. Hereby they thinke to purchaſe merit with God.

I went one day (ſayth Pinnerus) to the publike Hoſpitall, which the Citizens of Cambaia had founded for all kindes of Birds, to cure them in their ſickneſſe. Some Peacockes were there incurable, and therefore might haue beene expelled the Hoſpitall. But (alacke for pitie of ſo rufull an accident) a Hawke had beene admitted thither for the cure of his lame legge, which being whole, hee inhoſpitally ſlue many of theſe co-hoſpitall weaker Fowles, and was therefore expelled this Bird-Colledge by the Maſter thereof. For Men they had not an Hoſpitall, that were thus hoſpitall to Fowles.

They haue certaine Religious perſons, called Verteas, [k] which liue in a Colledge together, and when I went to their Houſe, they were about fiftie in number. They ware white cloth, were bare-headed, and ſhauen; if that word might bee applied to them, who pull off their haire on their heads and faces, leauing onely a little on their crowne. They liue on almes, nor receiue they but the ſurpluſage of the daily food of him that giueth them. They are wiueleſſe. The Orders of their Sect are written in a booke of the Guzarates writing. They drinke their water hot, not for Phyſike, but deuotion, ſuppoſing that the water hath a Soule, which they ſhould ſlay, if they dranke the ſame vnſodden. For the ſame cauſe they beare in their hands certaine little bruſhes, with which they ſweepe the floore, before they ſit downe, or walke, leſt they ſhould kill the ſoule of ſome Worme, or other ſmall creature. I ſaw their Prior thus doing.

k The Religious in Cambaia. Pinner.

The Generall of this Order is ſaid to haue an hundred thouſand men vnder his canonicall obedience, and is newly choſen euery yeere. I ſaw amongſt them little boyes, of eight or nine yeere old, reſembling the countenances of Europe, rather then of India, by their parents conſecrated to this Order. They had all in their mouth a cloth foure fingers broad, let thorow both their eares in a hole, and brought backe againe thorow their eares. They would not ſhew me the cauſe; but I perceiued it was, leſt ſome Gnat or Flie ſhould enter thither, and ſo bee ſlaine. They teach that the world was made many hundred thouſand yeeres agoe: and that God did then ſend three and twentie Apoſtles, and now hath ſent the foure and twentieth in this third age, two thouſand yeeres ſince, from which time they haue had writing, which before they had not.

The ſame [l] Author in another Epiſtle ſaith, That the moſt of the Inhabitants of Cambaia are Banians. They eat no fleſh, nor kill any thing, yea they redeem the beaſts and birds maymed or ſicke, and carry them to their Hoſpitals to be cured. In Guzarat he had ſeene many Gioghi, a religious Order of Monks, which yeeld to none in Penance and Pouertie. They go naked in cold weather: they ſleep on the dung-hils vpon an heape of aſhes, with which they couer their head and face. I ſaw the place where one of theſe Gioghi kept in the middeſt of the Citie Amadeba, to whom, in conceit of holineſſe, reſorted more numbers of people then to the ſhoares of Lisbon at the returne of the Indian Fleet. This Gioghi was ſent for by the Prince Sultan Morad, ſonne of the Mogor, and refuſed to come, [m] bidding that the Prince ſhould come to him: It is enough that I am holy, or a Saint to this end. Whereupon, the Prince cauſed him to be apprehended, and (being ſoundly whipped) to bee baniſhed.

This people killeth not their Kine, but nouriſheth them as their mothers. I ſaw at Amadeba, when a Kow was ready to die, they offered her freſh graſſe, and draue the Flies from her: and ſome of them gaue this attendance two or three dayes after, till ſhee was dead. A league and a halfe from this Citie, I ſaw a certaine Cœmiterium or burying-place, then which I had neuer ſeene a fairer ſight, wherein had beene buried one Cazis, the Maſter of a King of Guzarat, who had erected this fabrike, and three other were buried in another Chappell. The whole worke and pauement was of Marble, containing three Iles; in one whereof I told foure hundred and fortie pillars with their chapiters and baſes of Corinthian worke, very royall and admirable. On one ſide was a Lake, greater then the Rozzio at Lisbon; and that building was curiouſly framed with faire windowes, to looke into the Lake.

Balbi telleth of a certaine Temple at Cape Bombain, not farre from Chaul, which is cut out of a Rocke: ouer the ſaid Temple growe many Tamarinds, and vnder it is a Spring of running water, whereof they can finde no bottome. It is called Alefante, is adorned with many Images, a receptacle of Bats, and ſuppoſed the worke of Alexander the Great, as the period of his Peregrination. And hereto agreeth the report of Arrianus in his [n] Periplus of many memorials and monuments of Alexanders Expedition to theſe Parts, as old Chappels, Altars, Camping-places, and great Pits. Theſe hee mentioneth about Minnagara, which Ortelius in his Map placeth here-away.

Linſchoten u affirmeth the ſame things of their Pythagorean errour, and addeth that they ſometimes buy Fowles or other beaſts of the Portugals, which meant to haue dreſſed them, and let them flie or runne away. In the High-wayes alſo and Woods they ſet pots with water, and caſt Corne or other graine vpon the ground, to feed the Birds and Beaſts. and (to omit their charitable Hoſpitals before mentioned) if they take a Flea or a Louſe, they will not kill it, but put it in ſome hole or corner in the wall, and ſo let it goe: and you can doe them no greater iniurie, then to kill it in their preſence, which with all intreatie they will reſiſt, as being a hainous ſin, to take away the life of that, to which God hath imparted both ſoule and body: and where words will not preuaile, they will offer money. They eate no Radiſhes, Onyons, Garlike, or any kind of Herbe, that hath red colour in it, nor Egges, for they thinke there is bloud in them. They drinke not Wine, nor vſe Vinegar, but only Water. They would rather ſtarue, then eat with any, but their countrey-men: as it happened when I ſailed from Goa to Cochin with them in a Portugall Ship, when they had ſpent all their ſtore, the time falling out longer then they made account of; they would not once touch our meat. They waſh themſelues euery time they eate, or eaſe themſelues, or make water. Vnder their haire they haue a ſtar vpon their foreheads, which they rub euery morning with a little white Sanders tempered with water, and three or foure graines of Rice among it, which the Bramenes alſo do as a ſuperſtitious ceremony of their law. They ſit on the ground in their houſes, vpon Mats or Carpets, and ſo they eate, leauing their ſhooes (which are piked and hooked) at the doore: for the which cauſe the heeles of their ſhooes are ſeldome pulled vp, to ſaue labour of vndoing them.

The Moores x amongſt them will ſometimes abuſe the ſuperſtition of theſe Cambayans to their owne couetouſneſſe, bringing ſome Worme, Rat, or Sparrow, and threatning to kill the ſame, ſo to prouoke them to redeeme the life thereof at ſome high price. And likewiſe if a malefactor be condemned to death, they will purchaſe his life of the Magiſtrate, and ſell him for a ſlaue. The Moores will ſometimes make ſemblance, as if they would kill themſelues, that theſe fooliſh Guzzarates may ſee them in like ſort. They will go out of the path, if they light on an Ant-hill, leſt they might happily treade on ſome of them: they ſup by day-light, leſt their candle-light ſhould occaſion the death of ſome Gnat or Fly. And when they muſt needs vſe a Candle, they keepe it in a Lanthorne for that cauſe. If Lice doe much annoy them, they call to them certaine Religious and holy men, after their account; and theſe Obſeruants y will take vpon them all thoſe Lice which the other can find, and put them on their head, there to nouriſh them. But yet for all this louſie ſcruple, they ſticke not at coozenage by falſe weights, meaſures, and coyne, nor at vſury and lies.

y The likelowſie trick is reported in the Legend of S. Francis, and in the life of Ignatius, of one of the firſt Ieſuitical pillars, by Maffæus.

Some are ſaid z to be ſo zealous in their Idol-ſeruice, as to ſacrifice their liues in their honour; whereunto they are perſwaded by the preachings of their Prieſts, as the moſt acceptable deuotion. Many offer themſelues, which being brought vpon a ſcaffold, after certaine ceremonies, put about his neck an Iron coller, round without, but within very ſharpe: from which hangeth a chaine downe his breſt, into which, ſitting downe he putteth his feet, and whiles the Prieſt muttereth certaine words, the party before the people with all his force ſtretcheth out his feet, and cuts off his head: their reward is, that they are accounted Saints.

orders, and eſtabliſhed Statues of Nature, a at the ſame time, vnder the ſame eleuation of the Sun, diuiding to Summer and Winter, their ſeaſons and poſſeſſions. For whereas cold is baniſhed out of theſe Countries (except on the tops of ſome Hils) and altogether prohibited to approach ſo neere the Court and preſence of the Sun; and therefore their Winter and Summer is not reckoned by heate and cold, but by the faireneſſe and fouleneſſe of weather, which in thoſe parts diuided the yere by equall proportions: at the ſame time, when on the Weſt-part of this Peninſula, betweene that ridge of Mountaines and the Sea, it is after their appellation Summer, which is from September till April, in which time it is alwayes cleere skie, without once or very little raining; on the other ſide the hils, which they cal the coaſt of Choromandell, it is their Winter; euery day and night yeelding abundance of raines; beſides thoſe terrible thunders; which both begin and end their Winter. And from April till September in a contrary viciſſitude, on the Weſterne part, is Winter, and on the Eaſterne, Summer; inſomuch that in little more then twentie leagues iourney in ſome place, as where they croſſe the Hills to Saint Thomas, on the one ſide of the Hill you aſcend with a faire Summer, on the other you deſcend attendant with a ſtormy Winter. The like, ſaith Linſchoten, hapneth at the Cape Roſalgate, in Arabia, and in many other places of the Eaſt.

Their Winter alſo is more fierce then ours, euery man prouiding againſt the ſame, as if he had a voyage of ſo many moneths to paſſe by Sea, their ſhips are brought into harbour, their houſes can ſcarce harbour the Inhabitants againſt the violent ſtormes, which choake the Riuers with Sands, and make the Seas vnnauigable. I leaue the cauſes of theſe things to the further ſcanning of Philoſophers; the effects and affects thereof are ſtrange. The Sea roareth with a dreadfull noyſe: the Windes blow with a certaine courſe from thence: the people haue a Melancholike ſeaſon, which they paſſe away with play. In the Summer the Wind bloweth from the Land, beginning at Midnight, and continuing till Noone, neuer blowing aboue ten leagues into the Sea, and preſently after one of the clock vntill midnight, the contrary winde bloweth, keeping their ſet-times, whereby they make the Land temperate, the heate otherwiſe would bee vnmeaſurable. But this change commonly cauſeth diſeaſes, Fluxes, Feuers, Vomitings, in dangerous (and to very many, in deadly) manner, as appeareth at Goa, where, in the Kings Hoſpitall (which is onely for white men) there die fiue hundred in a yeere. Here you may ſee both the North and South Starres; and little difference or none is found in the length of day and night throughout the yeere.

Dely, is the next Kingdome to Camboia, now not the next, but the ſame; the Mountaines which before diuided it, not prohibiting the Mogors Forces to annexe it to his Crowne. Of it is ſpoken before in the Chapter of Cambaya, as alſo of Decan, which lyeth along the Coaſt, betwixt the Riuers Bate and Aliga two hundred and fiftie miles. Here b was, as is ſaid, ſometimes a Moore King; who, leading a voluptuous and idle life, by his Captaines was diſpoſſeſſed of his State: the one of theſe was called Idalcan: whoſe Seat-Royall is Viſapore, who in the yeere 1572. incamped before Goa, which the Portugals had taken from him, with an Army of ſeuenty thouſand Foot, and fiue and thirty thouſand Horſe, two thouſand Elephants, and two hundred and fiftie peeces of Artilerie. The other was Nizzamalucco, which reſideth in Danager, & beſieged Chaul (now belonging to the Portugals) with not much leſſe forces, againſt a Captaine of the Venazarie, which are a people that liue on ſpoyle, as the Resbuti in Cambaia, the Belemi in Delly. Canara or Concam, ſeemeth to haue beene a part of Decan, but is poſſeſſed by the King of Narſinga, whoſe ſtate is on the Eaſt ſide of the Mountaines. It hath in it the Coaſt-townes of Onor, Baticalla, Mayander and Mangalor, c famous for trafficke, but eclipſed by the Portugals neighbourhood.

The Religion of theſe parts is partly Mahumetan, partly Heatheniſh. Theſe haue their proper Iolatries, as wee haue before noted, peculiar Idols and Sects to peculiar Tribes and Trades. They haue alſo more common Rites, worſhipping the Images of diuers Beaſts, Elephants, Kine, Apes, and the like, to which they dedicate Pagodes or Temples. They haue other common deuotions, & haue appropriated to War, to Seed, to Fortune, to Life, to Death, ſeuerall Deities. §. II.

Of Goa, the Heathens and Christians liuing therein, and the Countrey about.

GOa [o] is the Seat of the Vice-Roy, and of the Arch-Bishop, and of the Kings Counsell for the Indies, and the Staple of all Indian commodities. It standeth in a little Iland, in nineteene degrees, called Tizzuarin [p] nine miles long, and three broad, in circuit one and twentie. Bardes on the North, and Salzette are both in like subiection to the Portugalls; the King letting them to Farme, and employing the Rents to the payment of the Arch-bishop, Cloysters, Priests, Vice-Roy, and other his Officers. Salsette is nine miles from Goa, being a Peninsula twentie miles about, containing sixtie sixe Villages or Townes, and about fourescore thousand Inhabitants. Antonius Norogna the Vice-Roy, destroyed therein two hundred Temples, some of them sumptuous, 1567. and many Pagodes, which caused them to rebell, and afterwards they slew some of the Iesuites and their company.

Barros [q] relates, that the King of Bisnaga, hauing warres with the Moores of Decan, and being then Lord of the Ports of Batecala and Onor, where hee had store of Horses out of Arabia, and Persia, brought thither by Merchants, seruiceable for his Warres: the Moores in those parts forestalled the Market, and sold the Horses to the Decans his Enemies. Whereupon he commanded the King of Onor his Vassall, to kill all the Moores in the Countrey, which was effected to the death of ten thousand Moores. The rest that escaped gate them to the Iland of Tizuarin, and first peopled this Citie of Goa, translating the Mart from Onor thither: but the King of Onor by a power at Sea forced the trade to be kept still at Onor, till the Portugals came into those parts. This murther of the Moores was done, An. 1479. The Founders name was Mellique Hocen. This is to be vnderstood of this New Towne, for of the Ancient there is no memory. It seemes by a Crosse there found, that it had beene inhabited by Christians. It stands in that part which is reckoned to the Kingdome of Canara. Sabaius (one of those Decanine Captaines, which shared their Masters state, as before is deliuered) when he died, left his sonne Idalcan very young; whereupon his Subiects rebelled, and the King of Narsinga warred vpon him, to dispossesse him of his Dominion. Abulquerke taking that opportunitie, besieged, and vpon composition, tooke Goa with the Iland. Which was soone after recouered by Idalcan, comming with a strong Armie thither, the Portugals flying away by night. But when the King of Narsinga againe inuaded Idalcan. He was forced to resist the more dangerous Enemy, leauing a strong Garrison at Goa, which yet Albuquerk ouercame, and sacked the Citie. Euer since, as standing in the midst of that Tract of land, from Cambaia to Comori, it hath beene thought the fittest Staple for Merchandize, and Seat for the Vice-Roy, the Chiefe of the foure chiefe Cities in the Indies. The three other, Ormus, Diu, and Malaca.

There dwell in Goa of all Nations and Religions. The Gouernment is as in Portugall. Onely publike vse of forraine Religion is forbidden them: but in their houses priuately, or on the maine land, they may practise the same. The Portugals many of them are married with Indian women, and their posteritie are called Mestices, and in the third degree, differ nothing in colour and fashion from naturall Indians. Of the Portugals they reckon two sorts, married Men, and Souldiers, which is a generall name to all Batchellers, although they are at their owne command. Of these are many Knights, and are called Canalhiero Fidalgo: for if a man doe any thing worth reckoning, presently his Captaine imparteth this honor to him; whereof they much boast themselues, albeit that this Knight-hood hath descended to Cookes boyes. Many of the Portugals liue onely by their slaues. They vse great Ceremony or Pride (whether you will call it) in their behauiour: the particulars whereof let [r] Linschaten, that there liued amongst them, teach you.

Besides both Abassine and Armenian Christians, Iewes, and Moores, here are many Heathens. The Moores eate all things, but Swines flesh, and dying, are buried like the Iewes. The Heathens, as Decanijns, Guzarates, and Canarijns, are burnt to ashes, and some women aliue are buried with the Gentlemen or Bramenes, their husbands. Some will eate nothing that had life; some all but the flesh of Kine, or Buffles. Most of them pray to the Sunne and Moon: yet all acknowledge a God that made al things, & ruleth them after this life, rendring to all according to their works. As for the Idols or Pagodes, they worship them, saith Balby, euen euen as wee adore in the Images that which they repreſent vnto vs. A good Argument for Image-worſhip.

But they haue Pagodes, which are Images cut and framed moſt vgly, and like monſtrous Deuils, to whom they pray and offer: and to Saints which here haue liued holy, and are now Interceſſours for them. The Deuill often anſwereth them out of thoſe Images, to whom alſo they offer, that he ſhould not hurt them. They preſent their Pagode (when a marriage is to be ſolemnized) with the Brides mayden-head; two of her neereſt kinſ-women forcing her vpon the Iuory pin or member of ſtone (leauing the bloud there for a monument) of that Deuiliſh Idoll; the husband herein applauding His happineſſe. Not much vnlike the beaſtly cuſtome of the Romane Dames, [f] which being newly married were cauſed to ſit on Priapus his! But who can honeſtly name that which they diſhoneſtly doe? They haue for the moſt part, a cuſtome to pray vnto the firſt thing they meet withall in the morning, and all that day they pray vnto it; be it Hog, or any other thing. But if they firſt meet with a Crow (whereof there are great ſtore) they will not for any thing ſtirre out againe that day, after ſo vnlucky a ſigne. They pray likewiſe to the New Moone, ſaluting her firſt appearance on their knees. They haue Iogos or Hermites, reputed very holy. Many Iuglers alſo and Witches, which ſhew deuiliſh tricks. They neuer goe forth without praying. Euery Hill, Cliffe, Hole, or Den, hath his Pagodes in it, with their Furnaces hard by them, and their Ciſternes alwayes full of water, with which euery one that paſſeth by, waſheth his feet, and then worſhippeth and offereth Rice, Egges, or what elſe their deuotion will affoord: which the Bramene eateth. When they are to goe to Sea, they will feaſt their Pagode with Trumpets, Fires, and hangings, fourteene dayes before they ſet forth, to obtaine a good voyage: and as long after their returne; which they vſe to doe in all their Feaſts, Marriages, Childbirths, and their Harueſt and Seed-ſeaſons.

When the woman is ſeuen yeeres old, and the man nine, they marry, but come not together till the woman is able to beare children. To leaue Goa with this Iland. The Canaras and Decanijns weare their beards and haire long, without cutting, as the Bramenes. They except from food, Kine, Hogs, and Buffles. They account the Oxe, Cow, or Buffle to be holy, which they haue commonly in the houſe with them, and they beſmeere, ſtroke, and handle them with all friendſhip in the world; feed them with the ſame meat they eate themſelues; and when the beaſts eaſe themſelues, they hold vnder their hands, and throw the dung away: they ſleepe with them in their houſes, hereby thinking to doe God ſeruice. In other things they are as the Bramenes. For thoſe are the Laitie, theſe are the Spiritualtie. When they take their oathes, they are ſet within a circle of aſhes, on the pauement, and laying a few aſhes on their heads, the other on their breaſts, ſweare by their Pagodes to tell the truth.

The Canarijns and the Corumbijns are the ruſtickes, and Countrey-husbandmen, the moſt miſerable people of all India: their Religion is much as the other. They couer onely their Priuities, and eate all things, except Kine, Oxen, Buffles, Hogs, and Hens fleſh. Their women binde a cloth about their Nauell, which reacheth halfe way the thigh: they are deliuered alone by themſelues, without other helpe: their children are brought vp naked, till they be ſeuen or eight yeeres old, without any trouble about them, except waſhing them in a little cold water, and liue to be an hundred yeeres old, without head-ache or loſſe of teeth. They nouriſh a tuffe of haire on their crownes, cutting the reſt. When the man is dead, the wife breaketh her glaſſe-jewels, and cutteth off her haire; his bodie is burnt. They eate ſo little, as if they liued by the ayre: and for a penny would endure whipping.

In Salſette are two Temples, or holes rather of Pagodes, renowned in all India: one of which is cut from vnder a hill, of hard ſtone, and is of compaſſe within, about the bigneſſe of Village of foure hundred Houſes: with many Galleries or Chambers of theſe deformed ſhapes, one higher then another, cut out of the hard Rock. There are in all three hundred of theſe Galleries. The other is in another place, of like matter and forme. It would make a mans haire ſtand vpright to enter amongſt them. In a little Iland called Pory, there ſtandeth a high Hill, on the top whereof is a hole, that goeth downe on the Hill, digged and carued out of the hard Rocke; within, as large as a great Cloyſter, round beſet with ſhapes of Elephants, Tygres, Amazons, and other like worke, workemanly cut, ſuppoſed to be the Chinois handy-worke. But the Portugals haue now ouerthrowne theſe Idol-Temples. Would God they had not set new Idols in the roome; with like practice of offerings and Pilgrimages, as did these to their Pagode.

u Linschot.

I once u went into a Temple of stone, in a Village, and found nothing in it, but a great Table that hung in the middle of the Church, with the Image of a Pagode thereon painted, hellishly disfigured with many hornes, long teeth out of the mouth downe to the knees, and and beneath his nauell with such another tusked and horned face. Vpon the head stood a triple crowne, not much vnlike the Popes. It hung before a wall, which made a partition from another Chamber, like a Quire, close without any light: in the middle whereof was a little doore, and on each side of it a furnace within the wall, with certaine holes, thereby to let the smoake or sauour of the fire to enter into that place, when any offering should bee made. Whereof wee found there some Rice, Corne, Fruits Hens, and such like. There issued thence such a filthy smoake and stinke, that it made the place black, and almost choaked such as entred. We desired the Bramene to open the doore, which with much entreatie he did, offering first to throw ashes on our fore-heads; which wee refused, so that before hee would open vs the doore, we were forced to promise him not to enter beyond the doore. It shewed within like a lime-kill, being close vaulted, without hole or window: neither had the Church it selfe any light but the doore. Within the the said Cell hung an hundred burning Lampes, and in the middle stood a little Altar couered with Cotton Cloth, and ouer that with Gold; vnder which, as the Bramene told vs, sate the Pagode all of Gold, of the bignesse of a Puppet.

Hard by the Church without the great doore, stood within the earth a great foure square Cisterne, hewed out of freestone, with staires on each side to goe downe into it, full of greene, filthy, and stinking water, wherein they wash themselues, when they meane to enter into the Church to pray. In the euening they carried their Pagode on Procession, first Ringing a Bell, wherewith the people assembled, and tooke the Pagode out of his Cell with great reuerence, and set it in a Palamkin, which was borne by the chiefe men of the Towne; the rest following with great deuotion, with their vsuall noise and sound of Trumpets, and other Instruments; and hauing carried him a prettie circuit, brought him to the stone Cisterne, washed him, and placed him againe in his Cell, making a foule smoake and stinke, and euery man leauing his offering behind him, intended to the Pagode, but consumed by the Bramene and his family. As we went along by the wayes, we found many such shapes vnder certaine couertures, with a small Cisterne of water hard by, and halfe an Indian Nut hanging thereby, to take vp water withall, for the Trauellers to wash and pray. By the said Pagodes doe stand commonly a Calfe of stone, and two little Furnaces; before which they prese t their offerings. My fellow leaping on one of those Calues in the Church, the Bramane called out, and the people came running, but we stayed their fury, by gentle perswasion of the Bramene before. And thus much of these deformed formes, and misshapen shapes, with their woshippings and worshippers sutable. Like lips, like lettice. Vaine Rites, stinking sinks and smoakes, vgly Idols, conspiring with Internall Darkenesse of the Mindes, and Externall Darkenesse of their Temples, to bring an Eternall Darkenesse to the Followers, that all may shut vp (as they are begun) in an hellish period.

I haue seene in Mr. Hakluites hands a large Treatise, written by Don Duart de Menezes of the Customes, Courts, Officers, Expences, and other remarkeable obseruations, for knowledge of the Portugall State and affaires, in the East Indies. He saith, that the Iland Tisoare (so he writeth it) in which Goa standeth, hath thirtie two Townes and Villages therein. The Iesuits Colledge in Salsete enioyeth x the Rents before belonging to the Pagodes, being two hundred and fiftie pound yeerely, besides their Glebe-lands of Rice grounds, and other commodities: also the Parishes subiect to them are worth two hundred ninetie eight pounds, and sixteen shillings. In Goa they receiue seuen hundred and fifteene pound, twelue shillings and sixe pence per Annum, and their yeerely Presents amount to three hundred seuentie fiue pound. In Cochin also they haue three hundred thirtie seuen pound. The Monastery of Saint Francis in Goa hath Rents sixe hundred and thirteene pound and ten shillings, and one hundred fortie three pound twelue shillings and sixe pence in other duties. The Dominicans receiue fiue hundred pound, and fourescore and ten pound in other rights. The Friars of Saint Augustine fourescore pound twelue shillings and sixe pence. The Inquisition one hundred three pound and ten shillings (besides the Rents of the Hospitall, one thousand eight hundred seuenty fiue pound, and an Almes-house for Widowes and Orphans two hundred and fiftie pound.) These things I thought worthy relation, not so much to satisfie the curious, as to answere the ordinary brags of that World-wandring Generation, pretending Mortification to the World, strictnesse of their Vow, loue to Religion, and compassion to the poore Pagans; when as they haue such Golden chaines to draw them thither. Whereunto if wee adde the bountie of Christians in those parts vnto these pretended holy Fathers, their gaines from the pearle-fishings, the vowes y of such as become of their Societie, and many other wayes accruing to their Coffers, together with those nouelties and rarities, wherewith euery sense in varietie is here presented; wee may see the World a sufficient argument to lead them about the world, whatsoeuer other pretences notwithstanding. But this hath beene learnedly handled against them by others already: amongst others and before others, Our most Reuerend and learned Metropolitan, in vnmasking the reasons of Hill for Popery, hath shewed both this our Hill to be an ignorant Mountebanke, and our Iesuites in India rather enrichers of their owne Societie in Europe with Gold, Pearle, Spice, and other Indian wares, then of those Asian Proselites with sound Europæan Christianitie; besides that, they seeme necessary to their Nation for the establishing of their Trading and ciuill affaires, vnder colour of Religion; winning estimation with the Pagans, and remaining there as well for Intelligencers, and as it were Leeger Embassadours with their Kings, as for Conuersion of the Heathens. For me, what I can shew against this their allegation, belongeth to another taske.

Of the Indian Bramenes, both Secular and Religious.

THE Indian Wisemen may be diuided into two Sects, the Banianes, of whom is already spoken; and the Bramenes. These obserue the Indian Heathen custome, that no man may change his fathers trade, but must succeed in the same, and marry a wife also of the same Tribe. The Brachmanni, or, as they are at this day called, the Bramenes (who haue their shops, as well as other Merchants, throughout the Cities) are the chiefe Tribe, and of best reputation, and weare in signe of their profession (from the shoulder, crosse vnder the arme, vpon their naked body, downe to the girdle) three strings like sealing threeds: which for their liues they will not, nor may by their vow put off. They are naked, sauing that about their middles they haue a cloth bound to hide their priuities. And sometime when they goe abroad, they cast a thin Gowne ouer them. Vpon their heads they weare a white cloth, wound twice or thrice about therewith, to hide their haire, which they neuer cut off, but weare it long, and turned vp as the women doe. They haue commonly hanging at their eares, Gold-rings. They are very subtill in writing and accounts, making other simple Indians beleeue what they will. Whatsoeuer they meet first with in the streets, they pray to all day after.

When the Bramenes die, z all their friends assemble together, and make a hole in the ground, in which they throw much sweet Wood, Spices, Rice, Corne, and Oyle. Then lay therein the dead body; his wife followeth with Musicke, and many of her neerest friends, singing praises in commendation of her husbands life, encouraging her to follow him, which accordingly she doth. For parting her Iewels among her friends, with a cheerefull countenance she leapes into the fire, and is presently couered with Wood, and Oyle, whereby shee is quickly dead, and with her husbands body burned to ashes. And if it chanceth (which is seldome) that any woman refuseth this Fiery Coniunction, they cut the haire cleane off from her head; neither may shee after that weare a Iewell, but is accounted a dishoneſt woman. This custome is (as may appeare) very ancient, and supposed to haue beene ordained because of the libidinous disposition of the Indian women, which for their lusts would poyson their husbands.

z Ceremonies at the death of a Bramene.

The Bramenes obserue Fasting-dayes with so great abstinence, that they eat nothing that day, and sometime not in three or foure dayes together. They tell many miracles of their Pagodes. They hold the immortalitie of the Soule, both of Beasts and Men, and that so often mentioned Pythagorean succession, and remuing of mens soules in beasts; and contrariwise. They by the direction of the Deuill (the author of their miracles) frame such deformed Statues to their Idols.

Botero saith, the Bramenes also worship a one Parabrama, and his three sonnes: and in honour of them weare those three threeds aforesaid. He affirmeth that the Ioghi wander vp and downe through India, abstaining from all carnall pleasure, but at certaine time; which being expired, they are past possibilitie of further sinning, and are then called Abduti, as the Illuminate Elders of the Families, polluting themselues in all filthinesse. The Bramenes b haue Images of the Trinitie, and haue in religious estimation the number of Three. They acknowledge and pray to the Trinitie in Vnitie; but affirme many Demi-gods, which are his Deputies in gouerning the World. They honour the Portugals Images also, as approaching to their owne superstition. They marry but one wife, and admit no second succeeding marriage.

also some that liue as Heremites in Desarts, some in Colledges, some wander from place to place begging: some (an vnlearned kind) are called Sanasses: [1] some contrary to the rest, nothing esteeme Idols, obserue chastitie twenty or fiue and twenty yeeres, and feed daily on the pith of a fruit called Caruza, to preserue in them that cold humour, neither doe they abstaine from flesh, fish, or wine, and when they passe along the way, one goeth before them crying Poo, Poo, that is, way, way, that women especially may auoide: for their vow will not permit the sight of a woman. These weare not the 3. threads which the other Bramenes weare, neither are their bodies burned after death, as of the rest, yea, the King himselfe honoreth them, and not they the King: some liue inclosed in iron Cages all filthie with ashes, which they strew on their heads and garments: some burne some part of their body voluntarily. All are vain-glorious, and seeke rather the shell, then the kernell, the shew, then the substance of holinesse.

Xauerius once in conference with the Bramens, demanding of them what their God commanded to those that would come to Heauen, was answered; Two precepts, one to abstaine from killing of Kine, in whose shape the Gods were worshipped: and the other to obserue the Bramenes, the Ministers of their Gods. But they haue more mysticall learning, which one of them secretly disclosed to the Iesuite. This was of a famous Schoole, College or Vniuersity of those Bramenes, all the Students whereof at their first Admission, he said, were sworne by solemne Oath vnto their Doctors, neuer to reueale any of their secrets: First, that there was one God, maker of Heauen & Earth, who alone, & not the Pagodes, ought to be worshipped: after that, they were instructed in precepts necessary to saluation. Xauerius asking what? he repeated the X. Commandements in order as we do, and that in a mysticall language known to few, which their Doctors obserue in their holy things. But the Bramene pronounced and explained them in the vulgar. Further, that the eight day, or Sunday is to be kept holy, & then often to repeat the prayer Oncery Naraina Noma (the same which before is related and interpreted out of Heurnius) this to be spoken with a lowe voice that they breake not their Oath: likewise that their old bookes foretell of a time when all shall be of one Religion.

The Decalogue.

Fenicius another Iesuite learned of one of their Doctors, other their mysteries contained in their Bookes, that God produced all this world out of an Egge: out of one part thereof the Land, Sea, and inferiour creatures: out of the other, the Heauens for habitation to the Gods: that this World was founded on the end of a Buffals horne, and because this beast leaned on one side ready to fall, a huge Rocke was placed vnder him to support him. But as before, so here also followed some notice of better things. For there was a Malabar Poet which writ 900. epigrams against their Pagodes, each consisting of eight verses; wherein he speakes many things elegantly of the Diuine Prouidence, of Heauen, and the torments of Hell, and other things agreeing to the Christian Faith; that God is present euery where, and giues to euery one according to his estate, that Celestiall blessednesse consists in the vision of God, that the damned in Hell shall be tormented 400. millions of yeeres in flames, and shall neuer die: The bramenes he calls fooles and blockes. By this booke, and by Mathematicall doctrine of the Sphere, which they had scarcely euer heard of, he made way for conuerting the people.

Iacob. Fenicius.

I haue thought good to say thus much together of them, as in one view representing the Bramenes; a name so anciently, so vniuersally communicated to the Indian Priests, although some particulars before haue beene, or hereafter may be said touching some of them in other places, according to the singularitie of each Nation in this so manifold a profession, which they all demonstrate in their singular Superstitions.

Of the Kingdome of Calicut.

MAlabar extendeth it selfe from the Riuer Congeraco to the Cape Comori; which some take to be the Promontory Cory, in [a] Ptolomey: Maginus doubteth, whether it be that which he calleth Commaria Extrema. Main, and Perepatan. From thence to Chatua is the Kingdome of Calicut foureſcore miles in coaſt: therein Pandarane, Colete, Capocate, Calecut in 11. 15. Chale a Portugall Fortreſſe, Patangale. Tanor a Citie Royall, Panane, Baleancor and Chatua. Then followes the Kingdome of Cranganor. Next to that the Kingdome of Cochin: then that of Porca without a good Port in her foure and fortie miles coaſt. Coulan is next, and then that of Trauancor, which the Portugals called the Great King, as being greater in State then the former, ſubject to the King of Narſinga. It is full of people, diuided into many States, by variety of Riuers, which cauſe Horſes to be vnſeruiceable in their Warres, and nouriſh many Crocodiles, enrich the ſoyle, and yeeld eaſie tranſportation of commodities, which are ſpices of diuers kindes. They haue Bats, in ſhape reſembling Foxes, in bigneſſe Kites. The chiefe Kingdomes in this tract are Kanonor, Calicut, Cranganor, Cochin, Carcolam, and Trauancor. About [c] ſeuen hundred yeeres ſince it was one Kingdome, gouerned by Soma or Sarama Perimal, who by perſwaſion of the Arabian Merchants became of their Sect, in which he proued ſo deuout, that he would end his dayes at Mecca. But before his departure he diuided his eſtate into theſe pety Signiories, among his principall Nobles and kindred: leauing vnto Coulam the ſpirituall preeminence, and the Imperiall Title vnto his Nephew of Calicut, who onely enjoyed the title of Zamori, or Emperour, and had prerogatiue of ſtamping coyne. Some exempt from this Zamorin Empire and Allegeance, both Coulam, the Papall See of the high Bramene, and Cananor: and ſome haue ſince by their owne force exempted themſelues. This Perimal died in his holy Voyage: and the Indians of Malabar reckon from this diuiſion, their computation of yeeres, as we doe from the bleſſed Natiuitie of our Lord. He left (ſaith Caſtaneda) to himſelfe but twelue leagues of his Countrie, which lay neere to the ſhoare, where he meant to embarque himſelfe, neuer before inhabited: this he gaue to a Couſin of his then his Page, commanding that in memorie of his embarquing there it ſhould be inhabited, and the reſt to take Him for their Emperour (except the Kings of Coulan and Cananor) whom yet with the reſt he commanded not to coine money, but onely the King of Calicut. For Calicut was therefore here built: and the Moores for the embarquing tooke ſuch deuotion to the place, that they would no more frequent the Port of Coulan, as before (which therefore grew to ruine) but made Calicut the Staple of their Merchandiſe.

[c] Lop. Caſtaneda lib. 1. Od. Barboſa. G. Bot. Ben. Linſchot. G. Arthus, hiſt. c. 26. 27. & ſeq.

Calicut, the firſt in order with them, ſhall bee ſo with vs. The Citie is not walled nor faire built, the ground not yeelding firme foundation, by reaſon of the water which iſſueth if it be digged. This Kingdome hath not aboue fiue and twenty leagues of Sea-coaſt, yet rich both by the fertilitie of the ſoyle, which yeeldeth Corne, Spices, Cocos, Iaceros, and many other fruits: and by the ſituation; as the Staple eſpecially before the Portugals vnfriendly neighbourhood, of Indian merchandiſe, and therefore in her varietie of Merchants, being a Map (as it were) of all that Eaſterne World. The [d] Egyptians, Perſians, Syrians, Arabians, Iudians; yea euen from Catay the ſpace of ſixe thouſand miles journey, here had their trade and traffique. The Palace alſo contained foure Halls of Audience, according to their Religions, for the Indians, Moores, Iewes, Chriſtians. Of their Bramenes or Prieſts we haue already ſaid. They yeeld diuine honours to diuers of their deceaſed Saints, and build Temples vnto beaſts. One of which (dedicated to an Ape) hath a large Porch for cattell, to the vſe of Sacrifice, in which are (ſaith [e] Maffeus) ſeuen hundred marble Pillars, not inferiour to thoſe of Agrippa in the Roman Pantheon. It ſeemeth that the ground in that place is not of ſo queaſy and watery a ſtomacke, but that it can digeſt deepe foundations. To Elephants they attribute like Diuinitie: but moſt of all to Kine, ſuppoſing that the ſoules of Men departed doe moſt of all enter into theſe beaſts. They haue many bookes of their ſuperſtition, neere the Augurall diſcipline of the Hetrurians, and fond fables of the Græcians: and diligently conceale the ſame from vulgar knowledge, except ſome Bramene Proſelyte doe detect thoſe myſteries. They beleeue one God, maker of Heauen and Earth, but adde that he could haue no pleaſure in ſo weighty a charge of gouerning the world, and therefore hath delegated the ſame to the Deuill, to reward euery man according to his workes; Him they call Deumo: they name GOD Tamerani. The King hath in his Palace the Chappell of Deumo, carued full of Deuils, and in the middeſt ſitteth this Image of metall in a Throne of the ſame matter, with a triple Crowne, like the Popes, and foure hornes, with teeth, eyes, and mouth wide and terrible, hooked hands, and feet like a Cocke. In each corner of this ſquare Chappell is a Deuill ſet, in a fiery Throne, wherein are many Soules, the Deuill putting one with his right hand into his mouth, and taking another from vnder him with his left hand. This Idoll is waſhed by the Bramenes with ſweet water, incenſed, and worſhipped euery morning. Somtime in the weeke they ſacrifice on this manner: They haue an Altar ſtrewed with flowers, on which they put the bloud of a Cocke, and coales of fire in a ſiluer Chafing-diſh, with much perfumes incenſing about the Altar, and often often ringing with a little Bell of siluer. They hold in their hands a siluer Knife, with which the Cocke was killed, which they dip in the bloud, and put into the fire with many Apish gestures. All the bloud is thus burned, many Waxe-candles burning meane-while. The Priest hath on his wrists and legs as it were Morrice-bels, which make a great noise, a certaine Table hanging at his necke: and when he hath ended his Sacrifice, he taketh his hands full of Wheat, goeth backward from the Altar (on which hee alwaies fixeth his eies) to a certaine Tree, and then hurleth the Corne vp ouer his head as high as he can: after which he returneth and vnfurnisheth the Altar. The King of Calicut eateth no meate, before foure principall Bramenes haue first offered thereof to the Deuill, which they do lifting both their hands ouer their heads, and shutting their fists draw back the same with their thumbe, presenting of that meate to the Idoll, and then carrie it to the King on a great Leafe, in a Treene Platter. The King sitteth on the ground at his meate, without any thing vnder him, attended with Bramenes, standing foure paces off, with their hands before their mouthes in great reuerence. And after the King hath eaten, those Priests carry the Relikes into the Court, where they clap thrice with their hands, whereat presently certaine Crowes resort thither to eate the Kings leauings, which Crowes are hereunto accustomed, and may not bee hurt of any.

When the King marrieth a wife, * one of the principall Bramenes hath the first nights lodging with her, for which he hath assigned him by the King foure hundred or fiue hundred Ducats. The King and his Gentlemen, or Nayros, eate not flesh without license of the Bramenes. The King committeth the custodie of his Wife to the Bramenes when he trauelleth any whither, and taketh in too honest part their dishonest familiaritie. But for this cause, the Kings Sonne succeedeth not in the Crowne, but his sisters Sonne, as being certainly of his bloud. These sisters of the King choose what Gentleman they please, on whom to bestow their Virginitie; and if they proue not in a certaine time to be with child, they betake them to these Bramene-stallions.

At the yeeres end hee maketh a great Feast, to which resort aboue ten thousand persons to confirme the Prince and his Officers: and then much Almes is giuen. Hee entertaineth tenne thousand Women in diuers Offices in his Palace. These make to the King (after his fasting yeere is out) a Candlemasse Feast, each of them carrying diuers lights from the Temple (where they first obserue many Idoll idle Ceremonies) vnto the Palace with great Musicke and other iollitie.

Of the King of Calicut.

OF the election and erection of the Zamoryn, we haue spoken in the beginning of the Chapter: let vs here adde out of Castaneda b concerning his deuotion. Hee saith, that this King of Calicut is a Bramene, as his Predecessors also. And for that it is a custome that all the Kings die in one Pagode, or Idoll Temple, hee is elected for that cause. For alwaies there is and must be in that House a King to serue those Idols; and when hee that serueth there dieth, then must the King that then raigneth leaue his Empire, and goe serue in that place as the other did; another being elected to succeed him in the Kingdome. And if any refuseth to forsake his Court for the Pagode, they enforce him thereunto

For their Children; the Sonnes inherit not, but the Brother, or if there bee none, the Sisters Sonne. When their Daughers are ten yeeres old, they send out of the Kingdome for a Nayro, and presenting him with gifts, request him to take her Virginitie: which hauing done, hee tieth a Iewell about her necke, which she weareth during her life, as a token that from thence-forth she hath free power of her bodie to doe what she will, which before she might not. After their death [c] these Kings are carried forth into a plaine Field, and their burned with sweet wood very costly, their kindred and all the Nobilitie of the Countrey being present: which done, and the ashes buried, they shaue themselues, without leauing any haire except on the browes and eye-lids, euen on the least child; and for the space of thirteene dayes cease to eate [d] Betele (his lips are cut that doth it) and all that time is an Inter-regnum, wherein they obserue if any will come in to obiect any thing against the new future King. After this [e] hee is sworne to the Lawes of his Predecessor, to pay his debts, to recouer whatsoeuer belonged to his Kingdome being lost; which Oath he taketh hauing his Sword in his left hand, and in the right a Candle burning, which hath a Ring of Gold vpon it, which he toucheth with two of his fingers, and taketh his Oath. This being done, they throw ore powre vpon him a few graines of Rice, with many other Ceremonies and Prayers, and he worshippeth the Sunne three times: after which, all the Caymailes or principall Nobles sweare their fealtie to him, handling also the same Candle. The thirteene dayes ended, they eate their Betele againe, and Flesh and Fish as before; the King except, who then taketh it brought for his Predecessor, and for the space of one whole yeere (as is before obserued in part out of Barbosa) eates not Betele, nor shaueth his beard, nor cutteth his nailes: eateth but once a day, and before hee doth it, washeth all his bodie, and obserueth certaine houres of Prayer daily. The yeere being ended, he obserueth a kind of Dirige for his Predecessors soule, whereat are assembled 100000. persons, at which time hee giueth great Almes, and then is confirmed. All these Malabar Kings haue one speciall Man, which is the chiefe Administrator of Iustice, who in matters of gouernment is obeyed no lesse then the King himselfe. The Souldiers are Nayros, none of which can be imprisoned or put to death by ordinarie Iustice: but if one of them kill another, or else kill a Cow, or sleepe with a Countrie-woman, or speake euill of the King: the King after information giues his Warrant to another Nayro, who with his Associates kill him wheresoeuer they find him, hewing him with their Swords, and then hang on him his Warrant, to testifie the cause of his death. These Nayros may not weare their Weapons, nor enter into combate, till they be armed Knights, although that from the Age of seuen yeeres they are trayned vp in Feates and practice of Armes. He is [f] dubbed or created by the King, who commandeth to gird him with a Sword, and laying his right hand vpon his head, muttereth certaine words softly, and afterward dubbeth him, saying, [g] Haue a regard to keepe these Bramenes, and their Kine. These are the two Great Commandements of the Bramene Law. The King sometimes commits this Ceremonie to their Panicall or Master in the Feats of Armes, whom they euer honour as their Father, and next to the King most reuerence. They teach them to Run, Leape, Fencing, and managing of Weapons, and anoint them with Oyle of Gergelin, to make their sinewes pliant for all winding and tumbling gestures. They begin to goe to Schoole at seuen yeeres olde. In fight they are valorous, and account it no shame to flee, but will doe it in policie, and yet when they yeeld themselues to any mans seruice, they bind themselues to die with him, and for him, which they faithfully performe, fighting till they bee killed. They are great Southsayers, haue their good and bad Dayes, worship the Sun, the Moone, the Fire, and the Kine, and the first they meet in the morning. The Deuill is often in them (they say it is one of their Pagodes) which causeth them to vtter terrible wordes; and then hee goeth before the King with a naked Sword, quaking and cutting his flesh, saying with great cries; I am such a god, and I am come to tell thee such a thing; and if the King doubteth, he roreth lowder, and cutteth himselfe deeper till he be credited. The Portugals haue much eclipsed the greatnesse of the King of Calicut, and caused many other alterations in all the East in this last Age of the World. Of whose exploits, Castaneda, Barrius, Maffæus, Osorius, and others haue written at large. Our English-Indian Societie haue setled a Factory at Calicut, touching the conditions and condition whereof you may reade at large in Roger Hawes his Iournall, deliuered amongst other our Pilgrimes. He telleth of the perfidiousnesse of this people, how hardly they could get in debts, they chusing rather to spend much in bribes then to pay debts. Ours made vse of ther Superstition to Iustice: for vnderstanding that they would neither eate nor wash whiles the English were in their houses, they would threaten not to depart till they were payd; hauing meane while Nayros for their Guard. Thus Iniustice made them iust, and vncharitablenes charitable. For rather then be long troubled with their company, most of them would pay part of their debts, so that they got fifty Fanos (kind of Coine) of one, 100. of another, but one notwithstanding their three dayes abode, would pay nothing: it seemes, equally prophane, superstitious and vniust.

§. III.

Of their differing Sects.

BArbosa reckoneth eighteene Sects that haue no mutuall conuersation, nor may marrie, but in their owne rankes or order. Next to the King and Bramenes, * he placeth the Nayros, which are Gentlemen and Souldiers, and are not professed Nayros (notwithstanding their bloud) till they be by their Lords or by the King made Knights or Souldiers. And then hee must neuer from that time goe without his Weapons, which commonly are a Rapier and a Target, and sometimes Peeces or Bowes. They neuer marry, but lye with such of the Nayros Women or Daughters as like them, leauing his Weapons meanewhile at the doore, which forbid any man else, although it be the goodman himselfe, to enter, till he hath ended his businesse and be gone. And if one of the common people once touch a Nayro, it is lawfull for the Nayro to kill him: and he is also vncleane, and must be purified by certaine washings. And for this cause they cry as they goe in the streets, Po, Po, that the baser Raskalry may giue place. They haue a Pit of standing Water at their doores, hallowed by the Bramenes, wherein euery morning they wash themselues, although it bee greene, slimie, and stinking, imagining thus to be clensed of their sinnes. They are brought vp altogether to Feats of Armes and Actiuitie, from their Child-hood, admirably able to wind and turne themselues, and are very resolute and desperate, binding themselues by oath to liue and die with their King or Lord. No Nayro's women may enter into Calicut but one night in the yeere, when the Citie is full of Lights: and then they goe with the Nayros, to behold and gaze their fill. They intend nothing but their lust, and thinke that if they die Virgins, they shall neuer enter into Paradise.

* Maffæus reckons foure orders. The Caymales, or Nobles, the Bramenes or Priests, the Nayros or Souldiers, the Vulgar.

The Nayros.

The Biabari are another sort, and are Merchants Gentiles, and enioy great priuiledges. The King cannot put them to death, but by sentence of the principall of themselues. They were the only Merchants before the Moores traded there, and still enioy many possessions. These marry one Wife, and their Children inherit, and they may touch the Nayro's. The Cugianem are a Sect of the Nayros, hauing a Law and Idols by themselues, which they may neuer alter. They make Tiles to couer the Temples and the Kings Palace. The Nayro's may lie with their women, but must wash themselues before they goe home.

The Biabari.

Another Sect is called Manantamar, which are Landerers, nor may they or their Posteritie be of other function: nor may they mingle themselues with any other Generation. They haue Idol-ceremonies and Temples by themselues. The Nayros may vse their Wiues (or Women rather.) Their Brethren or Nephewes are their Heires. The Calien are Weauers, and haue a distinct Idolatrous Sect; otherwise are as the former.

Besides these of better condition, there are of baser sort eleuen Sects, which may not marrie nor meddle with others. The first of these are called Tiberi, Husbandmen; the second, Moger, and are Mariners; both hauing their proper Superstitions, and vse their women in common: the third are Astrologers, whom they call Canium. Great men aske their counsell, but may not touch their persons. The Aggeri are Masons and Workers in Metals. The Muchoa or Mechoe are Fishers, dwelling in Villages by themselues; the men Theeues, the women Harlots, with whom they please. The Betua are Salt-makers: the Paerun are Iugglers, Inchanters, and Physicians (if such damnable Deuillish practices may deserue so honourable Name) which, when any are sicke and require their helpe, vse Coniuration to cause the Deuill to enter into some of them, and then by his suggestion declare the euent of the Disease, and what Sacrifices or other things are to be performed. They may not touch or bee touched of other men.

The Renolet are a baser sort of Gentiles, which carry wood into the Citie to sell, and herbs. The Puler are as excommunicate persons, and liue in Desarts, where the Nayros haue no occasion to passe, and when they goe neere any of these Nayros, or any of the better sort, they cry as lowd as they can (as the * Lepers among the Iewes) that others may auoid them. For if any touch them, their Kindred may for such action or passion slay them, and as many of these Puler also, as may make satisfaction for such disparagement. Some nights they wil go of purpose, seeking to touch some of the Nayro women with hand, sticke, or hurling of a stone: which if they effect, there is no remedie for the woman but to get her forth and liue with these Villaines, or to be sold, to escape killing by the hands of her Kindred. These Puler are Theeues and Sorcerers. The Pareas are of worse esteeme, and liue in Desarts without commerce of any, reputed worse then the Deuill. These ten sorts (or eleuen, if you reckon two sorts of the Tiberi, as our Author doth; whereof one are Warriors, distinguished by a certaine cudgell, which they must carry in their hands, from the Nayros; are as well differing in Religions, ligions, as matters of common life: though for their seuerall Rites, it were wrong to the Reader at large to recite them, if we had the particulars to deliuer. But this is common in India, that each Trade and Tribe distinguish a new Sect.

There are besides these Gentiles, Naturall of Malabar, many strangers of Indians, Moores, and Christians. But in other Kingdomes of Malabar, the Heathenish Religion is little differing from that in Calicut.

Cranganor. Cranganor is a small Kingdome: the Inhabitants of the Citie, which giueth name to the Region, are Christians of Saint Thomas profession, about seuentie thousand in number. Cochin is now growne great by the Portugals traffique and friendship. Of the rest there is not much worth the recitall. The Papall honour among the Bramenes, was by ordination of Perimal, which placed there the Supremacie of the Bramens, because He to whom he gaue Coulam, was a greater Man then the rest. This Papall title was Cobritin, a dignity which the King of Cochin still retayneth to be supreme Head of the Bramenes. For the ancient Kings of Coulan remooued their seate to Cochin, which was then in their Territories. But Warres haue since much altered the face of things in those parts. h In these parts are now many Christian Proselites of the Iesuites Conuersion, besides many of the olde Thomas Christians. Both Men and Women in Cochin, account it a great Gallantry to haue wide Eares, which therefore they stretch by Art, hanging Waights on them till they reach to their shoulders.

h Bar. Dec. 1. l. 9.

Porca is a Kingdome Southwards from Cochin, but little we can say of it. In Trauancor betweene Coulan and the Cape were many Christians, if they may be so called, which want Sacraments. For in fifty yeeres together they had not seene a Priest, only they had the priuiledges and name of Thomaan-Christians. These Thomaans are now, as the Iesuites report, reduced to their Catholicisme.

i Coulan. k Od. Bar. The King of i Trauancors Dominion k stretcheth beyond the Cape Comori, (where Malabar endeth) on the East-side fourescore and ten miles, as farre as Cael: which diuers great Lords hold vnder him. Among the rest is the Signiory of Quilacare. In the City of Quilacare is an Idoll of high account, to which they solemnize a Feast euery twelfth yeere, where the Gentiles resort as the Popish Christians in the Romish Iubilee. The Temple sacred to this Idoll hath exceeding great reuenue. The King (for so he is called) at this Feast erecteth a Scaffold couered with silke, and hauing washed himselfe with great solemnity, he prayeth before this Idoll: and then ascendeth the Scaffold, and there in presence of all the people cutteth off his Nose, and after that his Eares, Lips, and other parts, which he casts towards the Idoll, and at last he cutteth his throate, making a butcherly sacrifice of himselfe to his Idoll: He that is to be his Successor, must be present hereat: for he must vndergoe the same Martyrdome, when his twelue yeeres Iubilee is come. Along this Coast dwell the Parani, simple people, and Christians, which liue by fishing of Pearles. The Nayros make such holes in their Eares, that l Cæsar Fredericke sayth, hee thrust his arme vp to the shoulders in one of them. They are prodigal of their liues in the honour of their King. Osorius m telleth of some, which, like the renowmed Decij, had vowed themselues to death, and not to returne from the enemy without victory. Aloisius Goueanus numbreth in the Sea Coast of Coulam three and twenty townes, of which nineteene had Christian Churches.

The Malabars n are generally of one Language, and one kind of writing. This their writing was in leaues of Palme, which they call Olla, two fingers broad, and long as the matter they intended, written on both sides with a stile of Iron, which they binde vp in Bookes betweene two boords in greater or lesser forme as they please. Their writing is from the left hand to the right. They reckoned their times before the Portugals came into the Indies, from the departure of Perimal. There are two sorts of Moores, one Mesticos of mixed seed of Moore-fathers and Ethnike-mothers, called Naiteani, Mungrels also in their Religion: the other Forreiners, which come thither in trading. There are also many Iewes, which haue almost lost their Iudaisme, minding more their merchandize then superstition.

Step. de Brit. 1600. Malcas. Besides those former Sects, Stephanus de Brito speaketh of the Malcas which inhabit small Villages in the Mountaynes, which are Hunters of Elephants: amongst whom are no thefts or robberies, and therefore they leaue their doores open when they goe abroad. They haue no Idoll amongst them; only they obserue their Ancestours Sepulchres. These haue no Commerce with their Neighbours, nor are much subiect to Kings, only pay them a kinde of tribute, hauing Arelli set ouer them as Iudges or Magistrates, vnder each of them fiue or sixe thousand men. Their houses are made of Indian Canes dawbed with earth, and some liue on trees laying beames from one tree to another, and so building them lofty Cottages free from Tygres and wilde Elephants, whereof the Montaynes are full, which they take in Pits couered ouer with leaues. They haue fertile fields and Valleyes, but not diligently husbanded. They are content with one Wife, which they carry with them whithersoeuer they goe, though but a Hunting-voyage. They are as other Malabars naked from the waste vpwards, a long garment hangs thence to the ankles, and on their heads a Turbant as the Mores. Their necke, eares, and nostrils, are laden with gold. For the Malabars weare gold aswell for nose-rings, as eare-rings. These Maleas are of better estimation then the base vulgar, nor is it accounted a pollution to touch them, no more then other Nairos or Thomæan Christians. They haue their Pipes and Tabors on their Feasts. They are also Sorcerers and diuine by familiar Spirits, but vse not to kill or hurt men by Witch-craft, as other Indians and Malabars doe. A witty, docible, honest people, perhaps descended of those Malliani, which Plutarch and Curtius mention in the life of Alexander.

Of the Feast which all the Malabar-Kings hold euery twelfth yeare in honour of the Riuer Ganges, we haue there spoken [o] where we haue discoursed of the Riuer. This Feast lasteth eight and twentie or thirtie dayes with great solemnitie: the Samorin euery day washing himselfe and offering Sacrifices to Ganges: after which hee returnes to his Palace with innumerable troupes of men, riding vpon an Elephant in great pompe: and three dayes after in the morning and euening with greatest Royaltie, makes shew of himselfe in a high Throne, many Lampes of gold and siluer burning about him, many Peeces discharged, with other ceremonie of State. The King prostrates himselfe on the ground, and three times doth reuerence to the People, and they to Him, the Kings Vassals then doing him homage. After this, many Champions exercise their Fencing-skill before him, and at the sound of Instruments, the chiefe Nobles by two and two in a ranke, with their faces to the ground, doe reuerence: the Elephants are likewise to honour Him. Twentie thousand Crownes are spent on this solemnitie by the King. Another more diuellish rite followes. About the yeare 1520. the Zamorin slue a certaine King. In memorie whereof the Successors of that King send a certayne number of their Souldiers to reuenge his death, themselues being sure to be slaine: these are called Amocæ, which are Clients to that King, and are either to come themselues, or to send so many Souldiers, to the number of thirtie, which rush among the People, and kill as many as they can; themselues certayne to be killed of the Kings Souldiers.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Kingdome of Narsinga and Bisnagar.

§. I.

Of their Funerall and Idolatrous bloudie Rites.

FRom those places where our feet last rested (or touched rather) vnto the Cape Guadauerin [a], betwixt that ridge of Mountaines called Gate, and the Ocean (which is there named the Gulfe of Bengala) trendeth the Kingdome of Narsinga, or Bisnagar; those two Royall Cities contending which shall giue name to this mightie Empire, containing two hundred leagues of Sea-coast. The King hath in continuall pay forty thousand Nairos. But as occasion serueth, he can bring into the field many many thousands more: as in that Expedition against Idalkan, specified by Barrius and Boterus; in which, was a world of people (seuen hundred thousand foot, fortie thousand horse, seuen hundred Elephants, twentie thousand harlots.) Hee sacrificed also vnto Idols twentie thousand seuen hundred and threescore head of Beasts and Fowles in nine dayes space, which in Idoll-deuotion were all bestowed after on the poore.

a Magin. Gi. Boter. Ben.

In the yeare of our Lord 1565. Biznagar [b] was sacked by foure Kings of the Mores (as saith Frederike) naming them Dialkan, Zamaluc, Cotamaluc, and Viridy, through treason of two More Captaines, which had seuen or eight score thousand Souldiers vnder them; but being of the same Religion with the Kings of Decan, betrayed their owne King, forsaking him in the midst of the battaile. This was a iust reward of treason to the true King of Biznegar. For three Captaines had kept the King thirtie yeares as prisoner, once a yeare shewing him to the people, themselues ruling the State. When he dyed, then Ramaragio exalted himselfe to the Throne. Temiragio, the second, swayed the gouernment, and the third Bengabe was Generall of the Armie. Onely Temiragio escaped and returned (when the Decans had sacked the Citie, and were gone) to Beznegar, and sent to Goa great promises for Horses, if any Merchants would bring any. Whereupon Frederike went with other Merchants, which carried store of them, but brought no store of money in payment; the Tyrant accepting the Horses, but paying nothing. Temiragio temoued his Court from Bezneger to Penegorde, eight dayes iourney within Land. And his sonne put to death the sonne of that King before mentioned, which had beene imprisoned, as this also had beene, till Death by a murthering hand freed him. Hence grew many broyles, the Nobles refusing to acknowledge this New King: and thus Bezneger being forsaken, remained after this, an Habitation for Tygres and wild Beasts, containing in circuit foure and twentie myles, as our Author (that stayed there seuen moneths) affirmeth. He neuer saw Palace exceeding that of Biznagar. It had nine Gates with guards of Souldiers. Here hee obserued their Rites in burning the women, so often mentioned, which after his and Balby his relations are thus. (I haue declared the like for substance before; this, as in some Rites differing, I adde also.)

e The solemnitie of burning of the wife after her husbands death. The Ancients mention this Rite. Vid Æl. var. Hist. l. 7. c. 18. Hier. ad Iou. l. 1. See the same described in Porchacchi Fun. Antichi Tau. 17

e The woman taketh two or three moneths respite after her husbands death: The day being come, she goeth early out of her house, mounted on a Horse or Elephant, or else on a Stage carried by eight men: apparelled like to a Bride, adorned with Iewels, and her haire about her shoulders; holding in her left hand a Looking glasse; in the right an Arrow: and singeth as shee passeth through the Citie, saying, That she goeth to sleepe with her husband. She is accompanied with her friends, vntill it be one or two of the clocke in the afternoone: then they goe out of the Citie, passing by the Riuers side to the burning-place, where is prepared a great square Caue, full of Wood. Here is made a great Banquet, the woman eating with ioy, as if it were her wedding-day; and after, they sing and daunce, till the woman bid to kindle the fire in the Caue: then she leaueth the Feast, and taketh her husbands neerest kinsman by the hand, and goeth with him to the banke of the Riuer, where she strippeth her of her cloathes and iewels, bestowing them at her pleasure, and couering herselfe with a cloth, throweth herselfe into the Riuer, saying, O wretches, wash away your sinnes. Comming out of the Water, shee rowleth herselfe into a yellow cloth; and againe taking her husbands kinsman by the hand, goeth to the said Caue, by which is erected a little Pinnacle, on which she mounteth, and there recommendeth her children and kindred to the people. After this, another woman taketh a pot with oyle, and sprinkleth it ouer her head, and therewith annoynteth all her bodie, and then throweth it into the Furnace, the woman going together with the same. Presently after the woman, the people throw great pieces of Wood into the Caue, so that with those blowes, and the fire, she is quickly dead, and their great mirth is on a suddaine turned into great lamentation and howling.

When a Great man dyeth, all the women of his house, both his wife and slaues, with whom hee hath had carnall copulation, burne themselues together with him. Amongst the baser sort, I haue seene (saith Master Frederike) the dead man carried to the place of buriall, and there set vpright: the d woman comming before him on her knees, casteth her armes about his necke, while a Mason maketh a wall round about them: and when the wall is as high as their neckes; one comming behind the woman, strangleth her; the workeman presently finishing the wall ouer them: and this is their buriall.

e Lud Vert. l. 6

Ludouicus Vertomannus e relateth the same Funerall Rites of Tarnassari (as in other parts of India) sauing that there fifteene or twentie men, in their idolatrous habit, like Diuels, doe attend on the fire wherein the husband is burned; all the Musicians of the Citie solemnizing the Funerall pompe: and fifteene dayes after, they haue the like solemnitie, at the burning of the woman; those diuellish fellowes holding fire in their mouthes, and sacrificing to Deumo, and are her intercessors to that Diuell for her good entertainment.

f Odoricus.

The cause of burning their wiues, is by some ascribed to their wonted poysonings of their husbands, before this Law; f by others, that the husband might haue her helpe and comfort in the other world.

g Odoricus:

Odoricus g telleth of a strange and vncouth Idoll, as bigge as Saint Christopher, of pure Gold, with a new band about the necke, full of precious stones, some one whereof was of value (if he valued iustly) more then a whole Kingdome: The roofe, pauement, and seeling of the walls, within and without the Temple, was all Gold. The Indians went thither on pilgrimage, some with halters about their neckes, some with their hands bound behind them, some with knives sticking on their armes and legges; and if, after their pilgrimage, the wounded flesh festered, they esteemed that limbe holy, and a signe of their Gods fauour. Neere to the Temple was a Lake, where-into the Pilgrims cast Gold, Siluer, and Gemmes, for honour of the Idoll, and reparation of his Temple. At euery yearely Feast, the King and Queene, with the Pilgrims and People, assembling, placed the said Idoll in a rich Chariot, and with a solemne procession of Virgins, two and two in a ranke, singing before him, and with Musicall Instruments carrie him forth. Many Pilgrims put themselues vnder the Chariot wheeles, where they are crushed in pieces. More then fiue hundred persons vsed thus to doe, whose carkasses were burned, and ashes kept for holy Reliques. Otherwise also they will deuote themselues to such a martyrdome in this manner: The parents and friends assemble and make a Feast to this Votarie, and after that, hang fiue sharpe kniues about his necke, and so carrie him before the Idoll; where he taketh one of his kniues, and cryeth, For the worship of my God I cut this my flesh; and cutting a piece, casteth it at the face of the Idoll; and so proceeding, at the last sayth, Now doe I yeeld my selfe to death in the behalfe of my God; and being dead, is burned as before.

Our Country-man [h] Sir Iohn Mandeuile reporteth the same Historie of their Idoll-Procession, and the ashes of those voluntary Martyrs; which they keepe, to defend them against tempests and misfortunes. He also sayth, That some Pilgrims, in all their peregrinations, not once lifted vp their eye-lids; some, at euery third or fourth pace fell downe on their knees, to worship; some whipped; others wounded themselues; yea, killed themselues (as is before said.) Nicolo di Conti [i] reporteth the same in his time.

h Sir Iohn Mandeuile.

i Nic. di Conti

Neither is this bloudy custome yet left, as Linschoten [k] affirmeth, by report of one of his chamber-fellowes that had seene it. They haue (sayth he) a Waggon, or Cart, so heauie, that three or foure Elephants can hardly draw it, which is brought forth at Faires, Feasts, and Processions. At this Cart hang many Cables or Ropes, whereat all the people hale and pull, of deuotion. In the vpper part of the Cart standeth a Tabernacle, and therein the Idoll: vnder it sit the Kings wiues, playing on Instruments. And while the Procession passeth, some cut pieces of their flesh, and throwe at the Pagode; some lay themselues vnder the wheeles of the Cart, with such euent as you haue heard.

k Linschot. l. 1 cap. 44.

Gasparo Balby [l] relateth the same, and addeth, That the Priests, which haue care of this Idoll, and certaine women, are consecrated to these deuotions from their Cradles, by their Zeale-blind parents. And the women prostitute their bodies, to gaine for the Idoll whatsoeuer they can get ouer and aboue their owne maintenance. This filleth the Citie with Strumpets; there being of this Sacred (you may interpret it Cursed) crue, foure hundred in one place of the Citie. These haue their place in the Idoll-procession, some of them in the Chariot which is drawne by men; euery one accounting himselfe happy, that can touch or draw the same. This he sayth was at Negapaton.

He further affirmeth, That not farre from the Citie of Saint Thomas is the Towne Castaçe, where the the Wife is not burned (as at Negapatan) but a great Graue being made for the deceased Husband, they place the liuing Wife by the dead corps, and their neerest kindred cast earth vpon them both, and stampe thereon. They which marry, wed in their owne degree, as a Smith to a Smiths daughter; and they powre out their prayers at the Image of some Kow, or a Serpent, called Bittia di Capella. Their Bramenes burne Kowes dung; and if they intend any warres with other Nations, they anoint their Nose and Forehead with those ashes, not washing themselues till the euening. They which sacrifice themselues to the Pagode, when they haue wallowed a long time in lustfull pleasures, shoot into the aire pieces of their flesh tyed to Arrowes, and diuersly mangle themselues; at last, cut their owne throats, so sacrificing themselues to the Pagode.

There are also certaine people called Amouchi, otherwise Chiani, which perceiuing the end of their life [m] approach, lay hold on their weapons, which they call Chisse, and going forth, kill euery man they meet with, till some body (by killing them) make an end of their killing. They are loth (it seemes) to come into the Deuils presence empty-handed, or to goe to Hell alone. Some of them worship GOD in the likenesse of a Man; some in the images of Kine and Serpents: some inuoke the Sunne and Moone; others, some Tree or Riuer.

m Desperate dying.

Among many Feasts which they celebrate in the yeere, one in Autumne is most solemne, in which they take some great tree, and fasten it in the ground, hauing first fashioned it like a mast of a Ship, with a crosse-yard, whereon they hang two hookes of iron. And when any one by sickenesse, or other miserie, hath made a vow to their Idoll or Pagode, hee commeth thither, and being first admonished by the Priests to offer his sacrifice, they lift him with those hookes by both the shoulders, and there hold him to the Idoll, till he hath three times saluted the same, with clapping his folded hands to his breast, and hath made some sport thereto with weapons which he hath in his hand. After this he is let downe, and the bloud which issueth from his shoulders is sprinkled on the Tree, in testimonie of his deuotion. Then they draw him vp againe by the middle, to giue thankes to the Idoll: and then giue him leaue to heale himselfe, if he can. They which are in great miserie, or seeke some great matter at the hand of their Idoll, doe this. They haue another Feast, celebrated in the night, continuing eight nights: in which many Candles were seene burning thorow the Citie. Three or foure runne from one end of street to the other, and hurling Rice, and other meates after them, say, they offer it to the Deuill which followes them; not daring to looke behind, lest he should slay them. In other places also they haue those Idol-chariots, like vnto Towers, to the drawing whereof, many thousands of deuout persons put their helping-hand.

erected in the Temple of Cidambacham. This ſigne was a gilded Maſt, with an Ape at the foot thereof. Many Embaſſadors were there about this quarrell; ſome vrging, ſome reſiſting this deed. But the Prince (called the Naicho of Gingi) would haue it ſet vp, notwithſtanding the Prieſts greateſt vnwillingneſſe. The Prieſts therefore, both regular (which are the Iogues) and ſecular Bramenes aſcended vp the roofe of the Church, and thence threatned to hurle downe themſelues, which twenty of the Iogues did, and the reſt threatned to follow. But the Naicho cauſed Gunnes to be diſcharged at them, which ſlue two, and cauſed the reſt to retire and breake their couenant (rather then their necks) with their fellowes. A woman alſo of this faction cut her owne throat for zeale of this new ſuperſtition.

§. II.

Of the Kings and Bramenes in this Kingdome.

THe ſwelling ſtile of this King of Biſnagar, I thought worthie to be here inſerted, which is this. o The Huſband of good fortune, the God of great Prouinces, King of the greateſt Kings, and God of Kings, the Lord of horſemen, the Maſter of them which cannot ſpeake, Emperour of three Emperours, Conqueror of all he ſees, and Keeper of all he conquers, Dreadfull to the eight coaſts of the world, Vanquiſher of the Mahumetans, &c. Lord of the Eaſt, Weſt, North, and South, and of the Sea, &c. Vencapadinus Ragin Deuamaganus Ragel, which now ruleth and gouerneth this world.

o The titles of the Kings of Biſnagar.

Bar. Dec. 1. l. 9. cap. 1. Theſe Kings of Biſnagar haue, as ſayth Barrius, a great part of the Weſterne coaſt ſubiect vnto them, all betweene the riuers of Aliga and Cangerecora: in which ſpace are theſe coaſt Townes, Ancola, Agorapan, Mergeu, Onor, a Royall Citie, Baticala, Bendor, Bracelor, Bacanor, Carara, Carnate, Mangalor, Mangliran, Cumlata, and Cangerecora. From this Citie ſtanding on a Riuer of the ſame name, Southwards vnto the Cape Comori is reckoned the Malabar coaſt. And although Goa and Calecut much hinder thoſe his Ports, yet to ſalute and ſhake hands, with both Seas, argues a great State, ſpecially where the adioyning are ſo ſmall. There are three Naichi or Tributary Kings ſubiect to Him; ſuch in Iarric. l. 6. c. 21. power, but in title Naichi, that is, Deputies or Preſidents, of Madura, Gingi, and Tanaior. The Naicho of Madura is Lord of the Fiſhing coaſt. The people are called Badagæ, and deſpiſe the Portugals, becauſe they drinke Wine, eate Beefe, and ſuffer themſelues to be touched of the Pareæ, and carried on their ſhoulders. For theſe in their Bramene zeale, would not endure to touch or talke with the baſer vulgar, and their Bramenes would die Robert Sforce. rather then eate that which a Bramene had not dreſſed. And therefore Robert Sforce a Ieſuite comming amongſt them, profeſſed himſelfe of the Bramene or Rape bloud, that is, of Noble race, procured a Bramene to dreſſe his meate, abſtained from Fleſh, Fiſh, Wine, and Egges, after their Countrey manner, and attired himſelfe in the habite of a Sanaſſe (one of their votaries) and in pretence of chaſtitie ſtirred not out of his houſe in a whole yeere, nor would be ſpoken with by euery one, alleaging ſomtimes his deuouter conference with God, ſo to winne credite with theſe Ethnikes. He learned by conference with a Bramene, that they maintayned that Philoſophicall axiome, that Nothing could be made of nothing, and held three Beginnings or Vniuerſall Cauſes, the firſt Padi, that is God, the ſecond Paiu, the Matter of which they ſay the Soules are made, the third Paſſan, the Corporall matter. They maintayned alſo the μετεμψύχωσις or Pythagorean paſſage of Soules out of one body into another: for elſe (ſay they) how could there be ſuch diuerſitie of Men, one a King, another a Seruant; one a Bramene, another a Parea? They are alſo Platonikes, holding the Soule not to be the forme of the Body, but encloſed therein as a Bird in a Cage.

Votaries and Doctors. The Bramenes weare aſhes on their heads. It ſeemes they are zealous Baneanes. Their Saneaſſes are Aſſes indeed for literature, only as Hermites, they vow chaſtitie. The Gorupi or Goruſi are the Doctors of their Law. The Ieſuites profeſſed the Doctorſhip of theſe, in the habite of the former; which is a white Garment to the ankle with another of the ſame colour but thinner ouer it, a red cloth caſt ouer the ſhoulders, one like a Cap or Hat on his head: from his necke hangs downe a corde of fiue threeds, three of gold, and two of white ſilke, they eate but once a day.

Their Bramenes haue a proper language and myſticall (as Roman for the Romiſh holies) called Gueredan, which the Ieſuite learned, and thereby out of their books, that there had beene in theſe parts foure Lawes or Sects, three of which the Bramenes ſtill obſerued, to wit, of Veſmu, of Brama, of Rubren; the fourth meerely ſpirituall, partly mixed with others, and partly loſt, tending to the ſaluation of the Soule, which he ſaid that He brought now vnto them; their Almes and Bodily chaſtiſements, without this, not being effectuall to their ſaluation. Any might learne and chooſe a Doctor for any of the other three, but none was able to teach this. When they become Schollers to ſuch Doctors, they doe a triple reuerence vnto the ground, lifting vp their hands aloft, then letting them downe to their heads; and muſt (like the Pythagoreans of old, which was learned of the Indians) reſt ſatisfied with his Maſters bare Aſſertion, without queſtioning or further diſputing. He was once brought before a Conſiſtorie of the Bramenes, and accuſed for his new Doctrine. Some Articles were, That he ſhould affirme that the waſhing in Remanancor and Ganges were to no effect; That the Bramenes are inferior to the Raÿ or Princes; That they ſhould be all damned, notwithſtanding there were of them many Nhanisÿ and Sanaſſes (the Nhanisÿ alſo vow chaſtitie and to forſake the World.) The Preſident of this Councell cleered the Ieſuite vpon the Apologie of another Bramene. For that of Remanancor, it is a corner of the Fiſhing Region, wherein is a Temple famous through all the Eaſt, which hee that ſhall viſit and waſh himſelfe in the Sea iuſt by, ſhall bee cleered from all his ſinnes, aſwell as if it were done in Ganges.

In Madura and the Territorie thereof are numbred a hundred thouſand Bramenes, the chiefe of which is Choçanada, as their Biſhop or Pope: He would haue this Ieſuite expelled the Countrie, for that this Franke (ſo euer ſince the Expedition to Ieruſalem vnder Duke Godfrey of Bullen, all Weſterne Chriſtians are called in all the Eaſt, a name, it ſeemes which the Saracens communicated to the Ethnikes) had eaten with another Franke. Hee meant Fernandes, another Ieſuite, that had not thus acted the Sanaſſe and Gurupi amongſt them. He alleadged alſo that His Temple was built in the ground of His Pagode. But this Ieſuite with Gold ſtopped this Bramenes mouth, and had the ſoyle of the Church granted him in peace, with promiſe of all fauour. One thing that holds them intangled in this errour, is, that they hold it vnlawfull to copie out their Lawes and Religion in writing, ſo that they which will learne them, muſt (like the Druydes) from their youth learne them of ſome Doctour, and commit them to memorie: in which they ſpend tenne yeeres and more. And if any ſhould write them, they would pull out his eyes.

Emanuel Leitanus, another Ieſuite, comming to Madura in the like Sanaſſian Habit, obſerued the Gorupian order, and fell downe before Sferce to the ground, Hee ſitting in a Chaire couered with red; becauſe ſome of the Madurians were preſent. The Bramenes in the Kingdome of Bisnaga are of ſuch power, that nothing is done without them; and of the fiue Counſellours of State, foure are Bramenes: yea, with their face to the earth, all men, and the King himſelfe, adore the Bramen-Pope: nor doth the King admit any to conference in the morning, before hee hath ſeene two Bramenes. In Chandegrin is a Clocke that ſtrikes not foure and twentie houres, but ſixtie and foure, according to their diuiſion of the Night and Day, each into foure parts, and thoſe ſubdiuided into eight. The Ieſuites conceiue that theſe Bramenes are of the diſperſion of the Iſraelites, and their Bookes (called Sameſeretan) doe ſomewhat agree with the Scriptures, but that they vnderſtand them not. They haue ſome propheticall phraſes, and ſome of them affirme that God made Adam the firſt man, and being preſſed acknowledge one God. The King and his Nobles ſpeak the learned and ſacred tongue of the Bramenes.

Anno 1609. One of his Great men rebelling againſt him, and fortifying the Caſtle of Vellur, the King beſieged him, and on his ſubmiſſion pardoned him; but ſo as hee turned his Fort (which had ſtood the Rebell in an hundred thouſand Crownes) into a Palace, beſides twentie Fannes, each worth an hundred thouſand * Pardewes, and innumerable Horſes and Elephants. The ſame yeere did the King write to the King of Spaine in commendation of the Ieſuites, with promiſe to aſſiſt the Vice-roy againſt the Moores and Hollanders, which had obtained to build a Fortreſſe of the Naichus of Tanauapatan, deſiring the ſame friendſhip, that ſince the King of Narſingas dayes had beene betwixt both their Anceſtors, ſubſcribed, King Ventacaxa.

Thus you ſee the ſame King diuerſly entituled according to the Citie Royall, yea I finde him called (of the Caſtle before named) King of Vellur; ſo Floris ſtiles him, ſaying that in Iune 1614. He granted trade to the Engliſh, as likewiſe did Obiana Queene of Paleacatte. One of his Wiues which (it ſeemes) gouerned that Citie: On Iuly the nine and twentieth, his Abeskian was ſent, being a white cloth where his owne hand is printed in Sandall or Saffron, and another the like from the Queene of Paleacatte. The Kings Letter was written vpon a leafe of Gold, wherein hee made excuſe of former wrongs, gaue them libertie to build a Houſe or Fort, with other priuiledges. He gaue Floris the Engliſh Merchant a Towne of foure hundred Pardawes yeerely reuenue, notwithſtanding the Hollanders (his Countrimen) did what they could to hinder it. Wengali (Floris his man) had beene in the Kings preſence, who laid his hand vpon his head. But on the eight and twentieth of October following, newes came that this King was dead, hauing raigned aboue fiftie yeeres. His three wiues, of which Obiana Queene of Paleacatte was one, burned themselues with his corpse, and great troubles were expected. The Hollanders had presented this King with two Elephants of Seilan. Cotubaxa the King of Badaya and Lellengana, his Neighbour, died not long before. Mahumed Vmm Cotubaxa his Brothers Sonne succeeded. Musulipatan is in his Dominion. Golconda is the Metropolitan Citie. But hee is a Moore of the Sophi his Sect. Golconda is the Citie Royall.

With the Naicho or King of Gingi (vassall to the King or Emperour of Bisnagar) the Iesuites found good entertainment. Heere some of the Iogues distributed the water of Ganges out of certaine vessels couered with foule and filthie clothes, which yet the people for deuotion kissed. These Iogues with admirable patience endured the Sunnes heate: and one among the rest enclosed himselfe in an Iron Cage, with his head & feet onely out of the Cage, that he could neither sit nor lie downe at any time: and on the Cage were hanged an hundred Lampes, which foure other Iogues his companions lighted at certaine times. And thus walked he in this his perpetuall Prison, as a Light vnto the World, in his vaine glorious opinion. They reasoned with certaine Bramenes; some of which held the Sunne for God, and yet sometime to haue beene a man, and for his merits so promoted. Some denied a multitude of Gods, onely allowing that priuiledge to Pyrama, Vidhun, and Vmtir, one of which maketh, another keepeth, the third destroyeth all things.

Neere to Madure is an Idoll called Chocanada: which by night appeared in a vision to a Priest, and bade him goe say to the Naicho of Madure, that hee or I must abide in this house: whereupon he would not be corriuall with his Idoll, but resigned the Palace to him. His deuotion is such, that euery day, while hee sitteth in iudgement, a Bramene euer and anon soundeth the name of Aranganassa in his eares: and when one is wearie, another succeedeth in the same Office, neuer ceasing this Idols remembrance, although hee there sitteth fiue or sixe houres.

q Discourse of China, p. 40.

I thought meete to mention one custome q which some report of the Brama, or Pope-like Bramene in these parts, who by his authority dispenseth with many of their Lawes, and dissolueth Marriages: giuing libertie at his pleasure to the woman to marrie another; which his Dispensation is sealed on her right shoulder, with a marke of a hote Iron.

Of many other strange Rites: And of Saint Thomee.

CHandagrin is the Royall Seat of the great King of Bisnagar r. The chiefest Families therein are the Bramenes, Raias, and Cretius. They affirme that their Idoll Perimal did bring foorth the Bramenes out of his head (as the Poets tell of Minerua) the second out of his brest; third out of his belly: and all other inferiour Families out of his feet. The Bramenes haue some opinions, not altogether dissonant from the Scriptures. They say, That God onely by his thought made a man, which they call Adam.

On the tenth day of Iuly, Anno 1600. happened an Eclipse of the Sunne, which the Bramenes said was by meanes of the Dragon (which they make a Celestiall Signe) his byting of the Sunne and Moone: whereupon the King and others neither ate nor dranke that day; deploring their misery, because the Dragon deuoured the Sunne. In the Citie Prepeti, three miles from Chandagrin is the Feast of Perimal, in remembrance of his Marriage: at which the Offerings amounted to two hundred thousand Crownes: and the Chariot of the Idoll was drawne forth a mile and a halfe in Procession by ten thousand men. They haue another Feast of the Kine, because they suppose Perimal to bee the Sonne of a Cow, and then the wayes and streets are full s of that cattle. They haue a Feast in honour of the Sunne, which lasteth eight dayes, solemnized by the Emperour himselfe, and he is iudged a Traytor which is not present thereat. Then they cast lots, the King first, and after the rest, diuining by Arrowes the next yeeres destinie. If an Arrow light on a Tree, and being plucked out, causeth a red liquor to follow, it prognosticateth Warres; if white, Peace. Not farre hence is an Idoll called Tripiti, to which are great Pilgrimages and Offerings; alwayes they goe, some begin, and the rest answere, and so all continue to resound the name of the Idoll Goia. Before they enter into the Temple, they shaue and wash themselues. The Heremites, which they call Sanasses, liue in Desarts, and at sometimes appeare before the people naked. The Gurupi beare a great port, and neuer goe forth on foot. The Idoll Tripiti is seated on a Mountaine, about which are fertile Valleyes, stored with Fruites, which none may touch, as being consecrated.

There are in the Woods great abundance of Apes so tame, that they will take meate out of mens hands: the people esteeme them a diuine Race, and of the familiaritie of Perimal the chiefe God, whom they worship in many colours and shapes, as of a Man, Oxe, Horse, Lion, Hogge, Ducke, Cocke, &c.

Francis [t] Fernandes saith, that Cidambaram is the Mother-citie of their Pagan Rites, wherein are many stately Temples, and the reuenue of the Bramenes amounted to 30000. Ducats, but now they are payd but 12000. yeerely. [t] F. Fernandes Epist. 1598.

Here happened a strange accident, the same day the Iesuits departed, the occasion of which was this. There is in this Citie a Temple of Perimal, wherein they worship an Ape called Hanimant, whom they report to haue beene a God, and (for I know not what) together with many thousands of other Gods, to haue remained there, being all transformed into Apes. Now when this principall Ape was forced to passe into the Iland Zeilan, and wanted a ship, he leaped, and at euery leape left an Iland or heape of Land behind him, so making way for his Apish traine to Zeilan. The tooth of this Ape was kept for a great relike in that Iland, with great resort of Pilgrims thereunto: and in the yeere [u] 1554. was by the Portugals (who made a roade thither, in hope of great bootie) taken away. The Indian Princes offered the Vice-roy three hundred thousand (or as Linschoten telleth, seuen hundred thousand) Ducats, for the ransome of this Apes tooth, but the Archbishop disswaded the Vice-roy; who thereupon burnt the same before those Indian Embassadors, and threw the ashes into the Sea. [u] Linschot. c. 44

Not long after, a Beniane of Cambaya perswaded the Indians, that hee by Diuine Power had taken away that holy Tooth, beeing inuisibly present, and had left another in the roome which was burnt. Superstition is credulous, and the King of Bisnagar gaue him a great summe of Gold for that Apes Tooth, wherewith hee thus Apishly had bitten and mocked them, which was after holden in like veneration as the former. But to returne to our Cidambaran Historie.

They [x] tell, That an holy man, in great penance, had many yeeres held his foot pierced thorow with a piece of Iron; and when he was often by God commanded to leaue that selfe-rigour, he flatly refused, vnlesse that hee might see God dancing about him, which also Hee condescended vnto; and with the Sunne, Moone and Starres, which played the Musicians, he appeared dancing: And as he danced, a Chaine of Gold fel from his foot, whereof this Towne tooke name. For Cidambaran signifieth a golden Chaine. [x] F. Fernand.

As Viega [y] and Rictius, two Iesuites, trauelled to Chaudegrin, they came to Trauilur, where they say their Idoll, with a white Banner on his back, and after him three sacred Kine, with Drummers on their backes, and after them Trumpetters and many Musicians of other sorts. Then followed twentie women dancing, which were also consecrated to the Idols seruice, and might not marry, but yet prostitute their bodies: these were richly attired, and carried Lights. The Priests followed with the Idoll, and were followed by the people with Lights. At their returne they set downe the Idoll, and set sodden Rice before him to eate; others meane while driuing away the flies, and others couering him that hee should not bee seene eating: and at last, one maketh a long Oration of the worthy acts of their God, and then let him againe in his place. This lasted foure houres; and in the meane space many reasoned with the Iesuits, and some held vaine Discourses of the Creation: as that there were seuen Seas; one of Salt-water, the second of fresh, the third of Honey, the fourth of Milke, the fift of Tair (which is Creame beginning to sowre) the sixt of Sugar, the seuenth of Butter that the Earth had nine corners, whereby it was borne vp by the Heauen. Others dissented, and said, that the Earth was borne vp by seuen Elephants; the Elephants feete stood on Tortoises, and they were borne by they know not what. [y] Em. de Viega

When the Naicho of Tangaor [z] died, 375. of his Concubines willingly offered themselues to the fire, to honour his Funerall; so much can Custome harden so delicate and soft-hearted a nature. [z] Melch. Cotig.

The Temples [a] in the Countrey haue great reuenues, which in some places are encreased by the deuotion of women, which prostitute themselues to gaine for their Idols: and many young Girles are brought vp for this purpose. Many are in these parts, of the Sect of the Guzzarates, which kill no quicke thing, as is spoken. [b] Some haue a stone hanging about their necks, as bigge as an Egge, with certaine lines drawne thorow the middle thereof; and this they worship, and call it Tambarane: they keepe euery Friday holi-day. [a] Gi. Bot. Ben. [b] Osor. lib. 4.

The Kingdome of Orissa hath on the Sea-coast 350. miles, betwixt the richer Kingdomes of Bengala and Bisnagar, poore of Ports and Traffique. Frederike writes that before the King of Patane had conquered Orissa, there was great Trade for Oile of Zerzeline, Lacca, Long Pepper, Ginger, Mirabolans, and cloth made of herbs, which grow with a bowle as bigge as an Orange, yeelding silke. The Countrey was so safe, that a man might haue trauelled with his Gold in his hand. The King was a Gentile, and resided in the Citie Catecha, cha sixe dayes Iourney within Land. The King of Patane was soone after subdued by the Mogoll. The Inhabitants (except a few Moores) are Gentiles, little or nothing (that I can learne) differing in Rites from their Neighbours, of which yee haue heard. Some c Summario di Pop. Orient. c ascribe to the Citie Orissa, as the name, so the Principalitie of the other Cities of this Kingdome.

In these parts is the Citie of Saint Thomas or Malipur; where they say Saint Thomas (after he had preached the Gospell to the Indians) was martyred and burned. The Legend which some report of his death, were too tedious to recite: and as litle likelihood of truth is in that d Osorius lib. 3. long tale of the miraculous Crucifixes heere found, related by d Osorius, who likewise declareth the Rites of those Saint Thomas-Christians, of their Chaldean-Pope, Cardinals, Patriarches and Bishops; of which in a another place we shall more fitly speake. On the first day of Iuly Saint Thomas Holiday is celebrated, as well by the Pagans as Christians: and his Sepulchre is had in deuout estimation, both of the Moores, Gentiles, and Christians; each e Od. Barbosa. e pretending the right of his owne Religion to the Church, where this Saint lieth interred, to which the Indian Christians goe on Pilgrimage, carrying with them a little of that earth for a great Relique. A Moore had the keeping of the Church, which was built after our fashion, and begged of the commers for maintenance of it, and of a light continually burning therein.

f Linschoten. The Portugals f now inhabit this Towne almost desolate: the Iesuites also haue heere a Residence. The Church doores (by the Superstition of some) are almost cut in pieces, and carried away to set in Gold and Silver, and to weare about their neckes, as a holy relike; the Portugals herein being exceedingly vaine, and attributing hereunto many Miracles, verifyg Few, Fooles, deuout. ing that Prouerbe which the Spaniards vse, affirming the Portugals to be g Pocos, fotos, deuotos. One sent Linschoten a whole Bead-roll or paire of Beads thereof, the bringer affirming that those Beades had calmed a Tempest miraculously by the way. The Inhabitants in this respect haue driuen their Church-doores full of nailes: but Saint Thomas bones are now remoued to Goa. Those doores are of such renowned holinesse, because they were made of that wood which Saint Thomas drew with his girdle out of the Hauen (which it choaked) and could not before this Miracle by any meanes be remoued.

h Linschot. c. 15 One thing I thought not to omit, that there bee h whole Villages and Kindreds of people, in other things like to other men, but are borne with one of their legs and one foot from the knee downwards; as thicke as an Elephants legge; which the common people imagine to be a curse by Diuine Iustice, inflicted vpon the whole Generation, for that their Progenitors murthered Saint Thomas. Linschoten saith, he hath seene and spoken with them, and could learne no other cause thereof. It is to them a deformitie, but no let or impediment otherwise.

P. Floris. The Gouernour of Musulipatan being of Mahomets posteritie, had agreed for custome to take foure per centum, and exacted twelue, Offering the English there diuers wrongs. Here the Gentiles haue in those parts a Feast when the New Moone comes vpon Munday, and then both Sexes wash themselues in the Sea, as a matter of much Indulgence for their sinnes. And then after much indignitie, the Cape-Merchant Floris, performed a worthy exploit, deseruing still to flourish, though he be dead. The Gouernours Sonne being set ouer the Custome, Nouemb. 24. an. 1614. and at the Custome-house guarded with his Souldiers, Floris entred alone as it were for businesse, and as he had plotted, a few English followed by diuers wayes, which seized on the weapons of the Guard, at the Custome-house doore, and Floris laid hold of the Gouernours Sonne Wencatadra by name, which was suddenly conueyed into their Boat, three thousand people presently running to the shoare. But being vnder their ships protection, they both secured themselues, and for redemption of his Sonne, forced the Father to pay all debts by him detained, with satisfaction for wrongs offered. Yet such was his Superstition, that he almost first starued a shipboord rather then he would eate or drinke with the English. Thus from the foure and twentieth of Nouember till the thirtieth, he kept a strict Bramens Fast, the English pitying his misery, and willing therefore to take pledges in his roome. But after that weeke of cleane Lent without eating or drinking, he was redeemed, the debts being paid by his Father. And hence let the Reader iudge of bodily exercise, and opus operatum without true faith, how little it auaileth.

In Narsapur Peta (a place not farre hence, where they Careened the Globe) happened in August that yeere such ouerflowings of water, that many thousands of men and cattell were drowned, Townes, Fields of Rice and Salt-hils ouerflowne, foure thousand houses washed away, and two Stone Bridges ouer the Riuer, one of nineteene, the other of fifteene Arches, comparable to Rochester Bridge, standing three fadome aboue water. Many Portugals also liue in the parts of Bengala adioyning like Wildmen; and Iarric speakes of 1200. which thus obserue not Christianitie, and therefore may be reckoned amongst these Heathens.

And thus haue we finished our perambulation of the Continent of Asia. Some perhaps will maruell why I haue not handled the Muscouite and Russian in this Asian Discourse: to whom I answere, That of the Tartarians subiect to the Muscouite, I haue already spoken; and the rest of the Muscouites Dominions, especially the most populous, ciuill, wealthy; yea, the Imperiall City it selfe, by most Maps, is ascribed to Europe: that I speake not of the vncertainty of that troubled Estate, now these many yeeres, whereof I would haue more certaine and setled Relations to bestow on our Reader, which I hope with Gods helpe, in our European Discourse shall be performed.

Now let vs ship our selues ouer (for wee are not skilfull of Hanimants leapes) vnto the Ilands: hauing first feasted you with the Fruits and other Rarities of Nature in India.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Creatures, Plants, Fruits, and Drugs in India.

§. I.

Of their Beasts and liuing Creatures.

Of the Elephant and Rhinoceros is already spoken; and of diuers others of their beasts. The Elephant is of great vse, both for warre and peace. When the keeper employeth him in any burthen, he getteth first on his necke, and putteth his feet vnder the beasts eares, hauing a hooke in his hand, which he sticketh aboue betweene his eares, [b] where (hee sayth, I thinke it an errour) his stones lie: they bind the burthen with a rope, which at his keepers bidding hee taketh in his mouth, and windeth it about his teeth, and so draweth the packe after him. The Elephants are said to keepe themselues chastly to one Female, which is thought to bring forth in a yeere and halfe, or (as Aristotle affirmeth) two yeeres. William Clarke, which serued the Mogol diuers yeeres in his warres, saith that he hath seene in one Army twenty thousand Elephants, whereof foure thousand for warre, the rest Females for burthens, young, &c. In the engendring the Female lyes on her backe: some say if any shall be witnesse of that Act, the Elephant will seeke to kill them. Their running mad once a yeere is in their season of lust, nor doe they grow mad till they grow to a certaine age, and those Males. The wild ones keepe in Heards or companies, all of one Males breed keeping together: and sometimes perhaps more. For Andrew Battell liuing nine moneths in the Woods of Afrike, hath seene (he sayd) in a Heard hundreds of them. They beare, sayth Clarke, but three men, one before to guide, another behind to make them goe, the third in the midst for fight, to which end they haue foure Peeces in a kind of Towre on their backe. [c] Christopherus Acosta, Linschoten, and other moderne Authors, as also Aristotle, Plinie, Ælian and others of the Ancient, relate strange reports of the Elephant. For the Readers delight I will mention some. An Elephant being weary, hasted home; his keeper after much entreaty not preuayling, told him it was for the King of Portugals seruice, which hee would haue him doe; the beast answering hoi, hoo (which in the Malabar Language signifieth I will, I will, as Acosta interpreteth) fulfilled his request. The same Elephant wanting his meate; his Master said it was, because his Kettle wherein he vsed to boyle it was broken, and therefore willed him to carry it to the Tinker; which hee did, and brought it againe, but ill mended: whereupon he was sent againe, and the Tinker to try him, amended it worse. The Elephant carryes it to the Riuer which ranne by, to see if it would hold water, and finding it to runne, came backe with great noyse, and anger: the Tinker entreates pardon, and at the third time doth it well, which yet the Elephant would not beleeue, till by tryall hee saw it held water, and then shewing it to the standers by that it would hold, carried it home. A Souldier hurled a Coco shell at an Elephant: which (because he could not then repay it) put the shell in his mouth, and a few dayes after seeing him in the street, at Cochin, he hurled the same out of his mouth at the Souldier againe. Another Souldier iniured the keeper of an Elephant, which would haue reuenged the wrong, but was forbidden by his said keeper: but after espying the Souldier, when his keeper was absent; he tooke him vp in his trunke, and ducked him diuers times in the water, and then set him downe where he had taken him vp. They are very ambitious. One being vpbrayded of lazinesse by his keeper, when as his burthen was to heauy for him to draw, and therefore they had brought another Elephant to help him, a Vid. Arist. & Elian. hist. Animal. Plin. lib. 8. Gesner, &c.

b So Linschot c. 46. but Arist. hist. An. l. 2. placeth them within his body neere the reines.

him; disdayning a companion, thrust him away, and drew him dead in the place. Another in like case fell on his fore-legs, and wept at his keepers chiding, and although he admitted a companion till the greater difficulty was ouercome, yet feeling it then in his owne power to draw, he put away the other Elephant with his head and teeth, to recouer his credit. Plutarch tels of one which learned his Theatricall gestures, practising them alone by Moone-light: another which reuealed his keepers hard vsage, to his Master, with other like Stories. Pliny reports things more incredible. Of the admirable capacity, gratitude, and other qualities of this beast, were tedious to recite. An ample testimony hereof, is the example of the King of Aua his Elephant before mentioned. Plutarch, Pliny and Ælian, adde also Religion, d Plut. de An. comparat. d in washing himselfe, adoring the Sunne, lifting vp his trunke into the Aire: but this was rather the Relaters Superstition, as that which also followes in Plutarch, of Ioues offence with Antiochus, for offering foure Elephants in Sacrifice, in expiation whereof, hee made foure others of Brasse.

Galuanus in his Discoueries mentions a small vermine in Sian, which cleaueth fast to the trunke of the Elephant, and sucketh out his bloud and life: his scull is so hard, that it cannot be pierced with a Hand-gun: he addes, that in his Liuer is said to be the likenesse of men and women, and he which hath one of them about him, is safe from wounds by Iron. Perhaps it is the Cabal, a beast, whose bone did so preuayle in Nahodabegua, that no wounds, so long as his chaine was on, could bring any bloud from him, as is before obserued in our Relations of Malaca.

The mightiest Elephant which euer I read of by many degrees (if not some degrees beyond truth) is that which Eleazar is said to kill, which exceeded his fellowes, and yet each of them bare (sayth the Story) two and thirty fighting men with their furniture, in woodden e Æl. de An. lib. 13. c. 9. Castles, besides the keeper; whereas Pliny and Ælian, e and Clarke speake but of three, and other Moderne Obseruers but of fiue or sixe in those Towres girded (for fight) to the Indian (and therefore the best) Elephants. Of the Rhinoceros is spoken before: the best are in Bengala. It is lesse and lower then the Elephant, snouted like a Hogge, with a horne therein, whence he hath this name. His skin seemeth as it were armed. It is enemy to the Elephant.

As for the Vnicorne we haue before obserued, That none hath beene seene these hundred yeeres last past, by testimonie of any probable Authour (for Webbe, which sayth hee saw of f De Quadrup. Silesiæ. them in Prester Iohns Court, is a meere fabler.) And Casper Swenckfield f a Physician testifieth of the common Vnicornes horne, that it is inferiour to Harts horne in efficacie against poysons: and therefore not likely to bee it. I could bee of opinion that the hornes in Venice and other places kept as Iewels, are of the Sea Vnicorne, a fish which hath a horne in the forehead or nose thereof. Linschoten thinkes the Rhinoceros is the onely Vnicorne. That the Rhinoceros is onely male, and the Vulture onely female, as Bauhinus sheweth, many Authours g Gen. 7. 2. conceit, is not only absurd, but impious g to hold.

Of the Tygers hath beene spoken, and the harme they doe in Pegu. Nicholas Pimenta
h De statu Rei Christ. in Ind. Or. h reporteth, That the Tygers, Crocodiles, and a certaine Lizzard or Newt (Lerius saw the like in Brasile) as great and as cruell as the former, doe wonderfull spoyle in Bengala, both by land and neere the shoares. Hee tels of one strange escape of a man in a vessell neere the shoare, assaulted at once by a Tyger from Land, and by a Crocodile from the water; and the Tyger with more swiftnesse and fury ayming at his prey, passed ouer him into the Crocodiles mouth. The admirable swiftnesse of this beast is recorded by i Pliny. Authours agree, i Lib. 8. cap. 18. k That both in Asia and Africa, they rather prey on black people, then on the white Euro-k Lopes. Scal. Ex. 208. &c. pæans. A certaine Negro dreaming that he was torne of a Tyger, the next night lodged in a safer place of the ship, but there had his Dreame verified. The Bengalans doe not feare them, that superstitiously they giue diuers names vnto them, thinking if they should call them by the right name, they should be deuoured of them. Gods Prouidence hath yet appeared in creating a little beast, not bigger then a little Dogge, which no sooner espieth this beast (the most dreadfull of any in the World) but presently assaults him, and with barking makes him run away, both beasts and men conueying themselues into places of safetie, so that sometimes this rauener dyes of hunger.

l M. Polo. lib. 2. cap. 37. Muske is made of a certaine beast called Gudderi, which liueth, as l Polo sayth, in Thebeth, and hath a kinde of swelling neere the nauell, which once in the Moone sheddeth his

How-euer, our greatest sweete (wee see) is but rottennesse and putrifaction. There bee in Malacca, Sion and Bengala some Goats, whose hornes are esteemed excellent against Poyson, which Linschoten affirmeth of his owne experience.

As for Fowles, they haue Parrots of many kinds: some reckon fourteene, and Noyrot more pleasing in beauty, speech and other delights then the Parrot, but they cannot be brought out of that Countrey aliue. Of Bats they haue as bigge as Hennes, about Iaua and the neighbour Ilands, Clusius [n] bought one of the Hollanders, which they brought from the Iland of Swannes, Ilha de Cerne, newly stiled by them Maurice Iland; it was aboue a foote from the head to the tayle, aboue a foot about, the wings one and twenty inches long, nine broad, the claw whereby it hung on the trees, was two inches, the pisse easily seene, &c. Here [o] they also found a Fowle which they called Walghvogel, of the bigneſse of a Swanne, and most deformed shape.

In [p] Banda and other Ilands, the Bird called Emia or Eme, is admirable. It is foure foot high, somewhat resembling an Ostrich, but hauing three clawes on the feete, and the same exceeding strong: it hath two wings, rather to helpe it running, then seruiceable for flight: the legges great and long: they [q] say it hath no tongue, and that it purgeth out the pisse backwards, as the Cattell: that it deuoureth Oranges and Egges, rendring the same in the ordure, nothing altered. It strikes with the heeles like a Horse, will swallow an Apple whole as bigge as ones fist, yea, it swalloweth downe burning coles without harme, and in a contrary extreme, pieces of Ice.

Of the Birds of Paradise, elsewhere is shewed the falshood of that opinion, which conceiue them to want feet, whereas they goe as other birds, but being taken, the body (for the most part) together with the feet are cut off, and they being dryed in the Sunne, are so hardened and cloſed, as if Nature had so formed them. This is testified by [r] Pigafetta, and the Hollanders, and my kind friend and louing Neighbour Master Henry Colthirst, hath had of them whole. Of this, Clusius in his Auctarium hath a large Discourse, shewing diuers kindes of them, greater and lesse, and sayth that Iohn de Weely of Amsterdam sold one of them, which had feete, to the Emperour, 1605. But I would not herein be tedious. Of the Birds and Beasts of India, Acosta, Linschoten, Clusius, besides Gesner and others, can informe the studious.

They haue Crowes so bold, that they will come flying in at the windowes, and take the meate out of the dish, as it standeth on the Table before them that are set thereat: and are such vexation to the Buffles, that they are forced to stand in waters vp to the necks, that they may be rid of them. Pyrard tels of the like Crowes in the Maldiues both dreadfull and numberlesse, and of great trouble which they haue there by the Gnats, Rats, Mice, Dormice, and Pismires, nay some beyond credit; as also Snakes and Sharkes. Hee tels of Pinguoyn, foules as bigge as Pigeons which so fill the Aire and Earth in some Ilands that they can scarsly set their foot free: their Egges are hatched by the Sands, which are white and subtile like that of an Houreglasse, by reason of the heat. They haue Rats, which the Cats dare not touch, as bigge as young Pigges, which vndermine the foundations of houses in such sort with their diggings, that they sometimes fall to the ground. There are other little red Rats, which smell like Muske. Thoredible is the scathe which they receiue in Goa by the Pismires, which with such huge multitudes will presently assayle any thing that is fatte, or to be eaten, that they are forced to set their cupboords and chists, wherein are their victuals and apparell, with a woodden Cisterne of water vnder euery of their foure feete, and that in the middle of the roome. And if they forget to haue water in the Cisterne, presently these Ants are all ouer, and in the twinkling of an eye (sayth Linschoten) they will consume a loafe of bread. The like Cisternes haue they for their Beds and Tables: and for the Perches whereon they set their Canary birds, which else would bee killed by Pismires, yea though set hung on a string from the roofe of the house. The poorer sort which want cupboords, hang their things in a cloth on the wall, hauing a circle of Charcoales about it; with this wall to keepe out this small creature, and great enemy. There are other Ants almost a finger long, and reddish, which doe great harme to fruits and plants. Great is the harme which Moths and Wormes do in mens Clothes and Bookes, which can very hardly bee kept from them. But more hurtfull is the Barata, which flyeth, and is twice as bigge as a Bee, from which nothing almost can be kept close enough, and are to be esteemed as a plague among them, like to the Pismires, and are commonly in all fat wares and sweet meats, and when they doue vpon apparell, they leaue their stayning Egges behind.

The Salamander is said [s] to be common in the Ile of Madagascar, an Iland of Africa, by which they sayle to India. Of Serpents [t] they haue diuers kinds, and very venemous, besides one other kind as bigge as a Swine, which is destitute of poyson, & hurteth onely by beating. But the superstition of the King of Calicut multiplyeth their Serpents. For he causeth Cottages to be set vp to keep them from the rain, and maketh it death to whomsoeuer that shall kill a Serpent or a Cow. They thinke Serpents to be heauenly Spirits, because they can so suddenly kill men. So much hath that old Serpent, both at first, and since, deluded men by this venemous creature. There [a] are Hogges with hornes in the Molucca's: in Celebes and Mindanao are Hogges, which besides the teeth they haue in their mouthes, haue other two growing out of their snowts, and as many behind their Eares of a large spanne and a halfe in length.

[a] An. Galuano.

Of fish they haue great plenty and variety. They haue of Hayens or Tyburons, which deuoure men, especially such as fish for Pearles. And others bathe themselues in Cisternes, not daring to aduenture the Riuers for them. One Thomas Smith an Englishman, riding before Surate, entring into the water, had the outside of his thigh shaued off by one of them: and though he escaped from the fish, yet not from death, by effusion of bloud. Linschoten tels the like in his ship, that one had his legge bitten off, and putting his hand to the place, was presently depriued thereof: but this is too common. Of fish-monsters like men, and like an Hogge some write: and as monstrous is that, which Maffeus [x] telleth of a Whale, which with the opposition of his huge body, stayed the course of a ship, saylng with eight other ships into India, with so great a noyse and shaking, as if they had fallen on a Rocke. Neyther could the winds, which filled the sayles, further her course. The Mariners, when they saw two Elements of wind and current, so strongly encountred, looked out and saw this Monster, with her fins embracing the sides of the ship, and enterlacing the sterne with her tayle, applying her bodie to the Keele; which contained about [y] eighty foot in length. They thought presently that some hellish Fiend had beene sent to deuoure them; and consulted of remedy, at last sent out their Priest in his holy Vestments, with Crosses and Exorcismes: (who like the greater Deuill) preuailed with these weapons; and the Whale forbore them without further hurt.

There are [z] certaine fish shels, like Scalop shels, found on the shoare; so great, that two strong men with a leauer can scarce draw one of them after them. They haue fish within them. A ship (called Saint Peter) fell vpon sands, sayling from Cochin, and split. The men saued themselues, and of the wood of the old ship built a Carnall, wherein to get the Continent; but in the meanewhile were forced to make a Sconce, and by good watch to defend themselues from certaine Crabs of exceeding greatnesse, and in as great numbers, and of such force, that whosoeuer they got vnder their clawes, it cost him his life, as two Mariners of the ship told Linschoten.

[z] Linsch. cap. 48.

No lesse strange is that which hapned to Captayne Sara in his way betweene Saint Laurence and Zeilon, in a darke night when they could not see halfe the shippes length before them, on a sudden they had a fierie gleame, and shining light from the waters, so that they might thereby see to reade. At the first they were afraid of broken grounds, but after found it to bee nothing but certayne shell fish in those waters, whose shels yeelded so bright a lustre.

Crabs heere with vs haue a sympathy with the Moone, and are fullest with her fulnesse: in India there is a contrary antipathy, for at full Moone they are emptiest.

They haue Oysters, in which the Pearles are found, which are fished for by duckers, that diue into the water, at least ten, twenty, or thirty fathome. These men are naked, and haue a basket bound at their backs, which being at the bottome, they rake full of Oysters and dart together, and then rise vp and put them into Boats. They lay them after on the Land, where the Sunne causeth them to open, and then they take out sometime many, sometime few Pearles, as each Oyster yeeldeth, which is sometimes two hundred graines and more. The King hath one part: the Souldier, a second; the Iesuites, a third; and the fishers themselues the fourth: a small recompence for so great a danger, in which many men euery fishing time lose their liues. The Hollanders found Tortoyses so great, that tenne men might sit and dine within one of the shels.

§. II.

Of the Indian Trees, Fruits, and strange Plants.

OF the Indian Plants diuers haue written, both in their generall Herbals, as Pena and Lobel, Gerard, with other Herbarists, and in peculiar workes of this subiect, Clusius, Garcias da Orto, Christopher Acosta, &c. Some also pretending themselues Natures Principall Secretaries, haue found out in these and the like, not onely temperatures, learned by experience, but [a] Signatures of Natures owne Impression, fitted to their seuerall and speciall vses in Physicke, finding out a strange harmony and likenesse in the greater and lesser World: but leauing these speculations to better leisure, let vs take a little view of the Indian Trees, Plants and Fruits.

[a] Oswald. Crollius de signaturis.

Of

Of their Fruits, Ananas is reckoned [b] one of the best: in taste like an Apricocke, in shew a farre off like an Artichoke, but without prickles, very sweet of scent. It was first brought out of the West Indies hither: it is as great as a Melon; the Iuyce thereof is like sweet Must: it is so hote of Nature, that if a Knife sticke in it but halfe an houre, when it is drawne forth, it will be halfe eaten vp: yet moderately eaten, hurteth not a mah. Iacai are bigger then the former, and grow out of the body of the tree: they are of many pleasant tastes, but hard to digest. b Paludanus.

Of Mangas there are three sorts, they are as bigge as Goose-egges. The first sort hath stones, which the second wanteth: the third is poyson so deadly, that yet no remedy hath beene found against it. Of the like bignesse is the Caions, yellow, of good sauour, full of Iuyce like Lemmons: at the end (as Apples haue a stalke, so) this Fruit hath a Nut like the kidney of a Hare, with kernels thodsome and wholsome. The Iambos exceedeth in beauty, taste, smell, and medicinable vertue: it is as bigge as a Peare, smelleth like a Rose, is ruddie; and the tree is neuer without fruit or blossomes, commonly each branch hauing both ripe and vnripe fruits, and blossomes all at once: Linschoten saith, on the one side, the tree hath ripe fruites, and the leaues falne, the other couered with leaues and flowres, and it beareth three or foure times in a yeere. The Iangomas grow on a tree like a Plum-tree, full of prickles, and haue power of binding. The Papaios will not grow; but Male and Female together: but of these, also the Carambolas, Lamboljns and other Indian fruits, I leaue to speake, as not writing an Indian Herball, but onely minding to mention such things, which, besides their Country, haue some variety of Nature, worthy the obseruation. For the rest, Gracias ab Horto translated by Carolus Clusius, Paludanus, Linschoten, Christophorus Acosta (writing particularly of these things) and others in their generall Herbals, may acquaint you.

Of this sort is the Indian Figge tree: if it may be called a tree, which is not aboue a mans height, and wisht like to a Reed, without any woody substance: it hath leaues a fathome long, and three spans broad, which open and spread abroad on the top of it. It yeeldeth a fruit in fashion of the clusters of Grapes, and beareth but one bunch at once; containing some two hundred Figges at least, which being ripe, they cut the whole tree downe to the ground, leauing onely the root, out of which presently groweth another, and within a moneth after beareth fruit, and so continueth all the yeere long. They are the greatest sustenance of the Country, and are of very good taste, and smell, and in those parts men beleeue that Adam first transgressed with this fruit.

But of greater admiration is the [c] Coquo tree, being the most profitable tree in the world, of which in the Ilands of Maldiua they make and furnish whole ships: so that (saue the men themselues) there is nothing of the ship, or in the ship, neyther tackling, merchandize, or ought else but what this tree yeeldeth. The tree groweth high and slender, the wood is of a spungy substance, easie to be sowed, when they make Vessels thereof, with cordes made of Coco. For this Nut (which is as bigge as an Estridge Egge) hath two sorts of huskes, as our Walnuts, whereof the vppermost is hayry (like hempe) of which they make Ockam and Cordage, of the other shell they make drinking Cups. The fruit, when it is almost ripe, is full of water within: which by degrees changeth into white harder substance, as it ripeneth. The liquor is very sweet, but with the ripening groweth sowre. The liquor extracted out of the tree is medicinable; and if it stand one houre in the Sunne, it is very good Vineger, which being distilled, yeeldeth excellent Aquauitæ, and Wine. Of it also they make, by setting it in the Sunne, Sugar. Of the meate of the Nut dryed, they make Oyle. Of the pith or heart of the tree, is made paper for Bookes and Euidences. Of the leaues they make couerings for their Houses, Mats, Tents, &c. Their apparell, their liuing, and the rest of the Commodities which this tree (more plentifull in the Indies, then Willowes in the Low Countryes) yeeldeth, would be too tedious to recite. They will keepe the tree from bearing fruit, by cutting away the blossomes, and then will hang some Vessell thereat, which receiueth from thence that liquor, of which you haue heard. It is the Canarijns liuing, and they will climbe vp these trees, which yet haue no boughes, but on the top, like Apes. This tree hath also a continuall succession of fruits, and is neuer without some.

c Of this besides Linschoten see Garcias ab Horto, with Clusius notes. Exot. l. 7. c. 2, 6.

No lesse wonder doth that tree bocause, which is called Arbor de raiz, or the Tree of Roots: Clusius calleth it (by Pluies authority) the Indian Figge tree: and Goropius (with more confidence, then reason) affirmeth it to be the Tree of Adams transgression. It groweth out of the ground, as other trees, and yeeldeth many boughes, which yeeld certayne threeds of the colour of Gold, which growing downwards to the earth, doe there take root againe, making as it were new trees, or a wood of trees, couering by this meanes, the best part sometimes of a mile; in which the Indians make Galleries to walke in. The Figges are like the common, but not so pleasant.

d Clusius describeth this tree out of the Relations of Plin. lib. 12. Curt. l. 9. Strabo l. 5. Theophrastus lib. 4. and mentioneth like kinds (if not the same) out of Lopez de Castagneda lib. 7. Oniedo lib. 6. Lopez or Pigafetta of Congo, &c. Clus. Exot. l. b. 1. c. 1.

The Arbor tristis deserueth mention: It growes at Goa, brought thither (as is thought) from * Garcias ab Horto, lib. 2. c. 1. C. Acosta c. 37. Cuyth is growes most in Malabar.

from Malacca: The Hollanders saw one at Achi in Samatra. In the day time and at Sunne-setting, you shall not see a flowre on it; but within halfe an houre after, it is full of flowres, which at the Sun-rising fall off; the leaues shutting themselues from the Sunnes presence, and the tree seeming as if it were dead. The flowres in forme and greatnesse are like to those of the Orange-tree, but sweeter, in Acostas iudgement, then any flowres which euer hee smelled: the Portugals haue vsed all meanes to haue it grow in Europe, but our Sunne hath refused to nourish such sullen vnthankfull Malecontents.

And that yee may know the Indians want not their Metamorphoses and Legends, they tell that a man named Parisatico, had a Daughter, with whom the Sunne was in loue; but lightly forsaking her, he grew amorous of another: whereupon this Damosell slue herselfe, and of the ashes of her burned carkasse came this tree.

Bettele [e] is a leafe somewhat like a Bay leafe, and climbeth like Iuie, and hath no other fruit: neither is any fruit more in vse then these leaues: at bed and boord, and in the streets as they passe, they chew these leaues; and in their gossippings or visiting of their friends, they are presently presented with them; and eate them with Arecca, which is a kind of Indian Nut. It saueth their teeth from diseases, but coloureth them as if they were painted with blacke bloud. When they chew it, they spit out the iuyce, and it is almost the onely exercise of some, which thinke they could not liue, if they should abstaine one day from it.

They haue an Herbe called Dutroa, which causeth distraction, without vnderstanding any thing done in a mans presence: sometimes it maketh a man sleepe, as if hee were dead the space of foure and twentie houres, except his feet be washed with cold water, which restoreth him to himselfe; and in much quantitie it killeth. Iarric cals it Doturo, and sayth that Pinnerus the Iesuite and his Family at Lahor, were by meanes of this herbe (giuen them by a theeuish seruant) distracted, and the goods then carried out of their house. The women giue their husbands thereof, and then in their sights will prostitute their bodies to their lewder louers, and will call them Cornudos, stroking them by the beard: the husband sitting with his eyes open, grinning like a Foole, when he returneth to himselfe, knoweth nothing but that hee hath slept.

f Herba Viua. Acost. They haue the like Plant in Guiana.

Another strange herbe is called Sentida, or feeling, [f] for that if any passe by it, and toucheth it, or throweth sand or any thing else on it, presently it becommeth as if it were withered, and closeth the leaues; so continuing as long as the man standeth by; but so soone as he is gone, openeth fresh and faire: and touching it againe, it withereth as before. The Indians suppose it will procure loue, and restore Virginitie: A Physician amongst them became mad with studying to find out the nature of this herbe. Pigafetta speakes of another sort, as after shall follow.

But the strangest plant (for so may we terme it) is, that at Goa the hornes of beasts slaughtered are throwne together in one place, lest they should bee occasion of indignation and reproach to any; the shewing or naming of a horne being there ominous: These hornes thus cast forth, after a certaine time, take root, and the roots grow two or three spannes in length.

g Discou. Galu.

Galuano [g] telleth of a tree in Mindanao; the one halfe whereof (which standeth towards the East) is a good remedy against poyson: the Westerne halfe yeeldeth the strongest Poyson in the World. There is a stone, on which whosoeuer sitteth, shall bee broken in his body. The Tree of Iapan which thriues best with that which kills other Trees, and (in a Naturall antipathy to Nature) is killed with that moysture which quickens others; and that in Ciumbubon whose leaues are said to haue feete and to goe: in their due places shall bee mentioned. But of all the most wonderfull is that Plant of Sambtero (an Iland not farre from Nicubar and Sumatra) growing on the Sands by the Sea side: which some English (then being there with Sir Iames Lancaster) offering to pull vp, shrunke it selfe into the ground, as hauing sensitiue life and motion; neyther without greater force would it bee brought forth. The cause they found, that the Roote is a great Worme, which (as the Plant growes into a greater tree) dyes by degrees, or exchangeth that sensitiue into a vegetatiue life. The first growth is out of the mouth of the Worme, being then but a small twigge, full of greene leaues as bigge as a Bay leafe; the Worme in processe of the growth turnes into this tall growing Tree. The Reader may smile, as at Virgils Polydorus, or some of Ouids Metamorphosis, thinking this incredible: but yet behold another change. They plucked vp some of these resisting Plants, to bring them home for rarities (as they did many) stripping off the leaues and barke: and thereby (I know not with what naturall horrour) they after found that as it dryed, it died beneath the name of Death, into a hard stone, like white Corall. Thus haue you a three-fold Retrograde in one thing: From that degree of life which hath

Of Spices and Drugges.

PEpper (whereof there are diuers ſorts) groweth at the foot of Arecca, or ſome other Tree, on which it climbeth, as a Betele or [i] Iuie; growing in bunches like grapes, halfe a ſpanne long, and as bigge as ones finger, greene like Iuie when it is gathered, and in fiue or ſixe dayes drying in the Sunne becomes blacke. i Hieron. de S. Stephano.

Cinamon [k] is the inner barke of a Tree as bigge as an Oliue, with leaues like Bay-leaues, and fruit like an Oliue: The drying of the barke maketh it roll together. Within three yeeres after, the tree yeeldeth another barke, as before. In Seylon is the beſt. They of Ormuz call it Darchina, that is, wood of China: and ſelling it at Alexandria, call it [l] Cinnamomum. k Garcias ab Horto. l. 1. c. 15. l Quaſi Amomum ex Sina delatum.

Ginger [m] groweth like young Reedes, or Gladiolus, with a roote like a Lilly: it is plentifull in Malabar. m Ginger.

Cloues [n] grow in the Moluccos on trees, like Bay-trees, yeelding bloſſomes, firſt white, then greene (at which time they yeeld the pleaſanteſt ſmell in the world) and laſt of all red and hard, which are the Cloues. They are ſo hot of nature, that if a payle or tubbe of water ſhould ſtand in the Chamber, when they cleanſe them, or any veſſell of Wine or other moyſture, in two dayes the Cloues would ſucke it out and drie it. The ſame nature is of the vnſpunne Silke of China. n Cloues.

The Nutmeg-tree, [o] is like a Peach or Peare-tree, and groweth moſt in Banda and Iaua. The fruit is like a Peach, the inner part whereof is the Nutmegge, which is couered and interlaced with the Mace or flowre, and ouer that is the fruit like a Peach, as I haue ſeene them conſerued. When the fruit is ripe, the firſt and outermoſt part openeth, as it is with our Walnuts, then the Mace flouriſheth in a faire red colour, which in the ripening becommeth yellow. o Nutmegs.

Cardamomum is of three ſorts; the Indians vſe it in their meates, and commonly chew it in their mouthes, as being good againſt a ſtinking breath, and euill humours in the head: it is much like to Panike.

[p] Lac is a ſtrange drugge, made by certaine winged Piſmires of the gumme of Trees, which they ſucke vp, and then make the Lac round about the branches, as the Bees make honey and waxe. The raw Lac is of a darke red colour, but being refined, they make it of all colours, and therewith verniſh their Beds, Tables, and vſe it for other ornaments, and for hard Waxe. So ſaith Paludanus; they beate the Lac to powder, and ſo mixe all manner of colours vpon it, as they liſt, and make thereof ſuch rolles as are heere ſold for hard Waxe. p Lac.

Indico. Indico or Annil growes on small bushes, like Gooseberry bushes, and beares a Seed like a Cabbage, as is before obserued, cut vp, and after long rotting, trodden by Oxen, and ground. Linschoten sayth, it is sowne as other Herbs, in due time pulled and dryed, and then made wet, and beaten, and then dryed againe, and prepared; first it is greene, and after blue.

q Sanders. Of q Sanders there are three sorts, white, yellow, and red. In Tymor, an Iland by Iaua, are whole Woods of Sanders: the trees are like Nut-trees, with a fruit like a Cherry, but vnprofitable; onely the wood (which is the Sanders) is esteemed.

r Snakewood. Snakewood r groweth in Seylon, and is good against the stinging of Snakes and other poyson, a Medicine learned of the beast Quil, which being in continuall enmity with Snakes, herewith healeth their bytings.

s Calamba. The trees of s Lignum Aloes are like Oliue trees, but somewhat greater: the innermost part of the wood is best, with blacke and browne veines, and yeelding an Oyly moysture: it is sold in weight against Siluer and Gold. There is another t kinde, wherewith they burne their dead Bramenes. The best, which they call Calamba, growes in Malacca, and is vsed much for Beads and Crucifixes. Monsart sayth, the Portugals pay a hundred Crownes a pound for it to make their Beades.

t Pala d'Aquilla

u Opium. u Opium is the Iuyce of the heads of blacke Poppie beeing cut: a dangerous drugge, vsed much in Asia and Africa, which makes them goe as if they were halfe asleepe: they suppose I know not what coniunction and efficacy both of Mars and Venus therein: but being once vsed, must daily be continued on paine of death, which some escaped in Acosta's x company by the helpe of wine. Bangue is another Receit of like vse, especially with slaues and souldiers, makes them drunke merry, and so to forget their labour.

x Acost. de Arom.

Ciuet. y Ciuet or Algalia, is the sweate of the Ciuet Cat, and growes in the outermost part of the Cods, and is hote and moyst.

Benioin. Benioin is a kind of Gumme like Frankinscence and Myrrhe, but more esteemed: it growes in the Kingdome of Siam, Iaua, Sumatra, and Malacca. The tree is high, full of branches with leaues like those of the Lemmon tree; They cut the tree, and from those slits proceedeth this Gumme: which is best when the tree is young, and is called Benioin of the sweete smell. The old trees yeeld white, the young blacke. Of Frankincense wee haue spoken in Arabia: it is also a Gum, the best on those trees that grow on hils and stony places. Myrrhe is a Gumme also brought out of Arabia Felix, and the Abexine Coast.

Manna. z Manna is brought from the Vsbeks Countrey behind Persia, and reckoned to Tartaria, and is a dew that falleth on certaine trees, and hangeth on the leaues, like Ice on the Tyles of houses. It is gathered and kept in glasse Vials, and much vsed in India.

Camphora. Camphora is the Gumme of certaine trees in Borneo and China, as great as Nut-trees, sweating out from the midst of the same.

Tamarind. Tamarind groweth on a tree as great as a Plum-tree, with leaues like Mirtle, the flowers white like Orange flowers. The leaues of the tree turne alwayes toward the Sunne, and when it goeth downe, they shut together and couer the huske. The fruit is about a finger long, crooked, with shels, wherein are kernels as bigge as a beane, couered about with that which they call the Tamarind.

Mirobolanes. Of Mirobolanes are fiue sorts almost like Plummes.

Spiconard. Spiconard is sowne and growes on plants about two or three spannes high like Corne, with great veines, wherein the Spiconard groweth.

Gubebus. a Cubebus growes like Pepper or Iuy against a tree, the leaues like Pepper leaues and the huskes; but euery graine hath a stalke of it selfe: But if I should here recite the Indian Leafe, the Galanga, Canna Fistula, with the rest: I should tire the Reader with an Apothecaries Bill. These (as the rarest or chiefe) I haue chosen so (as it were) to recreate our Reader with a walke, and houres view in this Indian Garden, being before full cloyed with our tedious Narrations of their Superstitions. I might adde heere a Discourse of Gemmes, as Diamonds, Rubies, Emeralds, &c. But it becommeth not my pouerty to talke so much of Iewels. Monsart tels that the King of Bizneger hath a Rock of Diamonds, in which he keepes fifteene thousand men at worke, reseruing all the greater to himselfe, so that none are sold but smaller, except by stealth. Hee sayth, hee saw one with the Great Mogoll as bigge as a Henne Egge, purloyned from this King, and cost the other little lesse then a Million. It waygheth foure score and eighteene Mangelins, euery Mangelin fiue graines. The y Bezar-stones are likewise taken out of the Maw of a Persian or Indian Goat, which the Persians call Pazar. And in the Countrey of Pan, by Malacca, they finde within the Gall of an Hogge a stone, of greater force against Poyson and other Diseases, then that Pazar-stone. It is thought that these Stones doe proceede of the pasture whereon these Beastes feede. The Amber is found as well in other places as in India. z Garcias thinkes it to bee the nature of the Soyle, as Chalke, Bole-armenike, &c. and not the Seed of the Whale, or issuing from some Fountayne in the Sea, as others hold. Clusius tels a probable opinion of D. Marel, that it was an excrement gathered in the Whales belly.

CHAP. XIII.

A generall discourse of the Sea, and of the Seas in and about Asia.

§. I.

Of the true place, forme, greatnesse, and depth of the Sea.

AFter our long perambulation of the Asian Continent, the Sea inuironing doth solliciте our next endeuours, that the Reader might there refresh his wearied sense, with a new succession of Natures varieties, and Humane vanities. And first, while our Barke be made readie to ship vs ouer to some of those Ilands, let vs (as it were on the shore) take view of this, so strong, so weake, so constant, and so vnconstant watery Element. That the Earth and Sea make one Globe, we haue elsewhere shewed in the History of their Creation. In which, the Earth being (as it seemeth) at the first forming of it, more perfectly Spherical, and wholy couered with Waters, by the power of that Almighty Decree & Word (Let the waters be gathered into one place, that the dry Land may appeare) both the Waters (as * some gather) were more condensate, which before were more subtile, and therefore occupied more roome; and the Earth a was in some places lifted vp, in others depressed with deepe Furrowes and Trenches to make roome and conuenient receptacles for the Sea; and withall fit matter yeelded for the eleuation both of Mountaynes aboue the ordinary height of the Earth, and of the Earth and Continent also in the higher places, whence the greatest Riuers deriue their Originall, in comparison of the Lower and Maritime parts, where they empty themselues into the Sea. This is the proper seate of the Element of Water, called Aqua, quasi æqua, of the equall and plaine face and superficies thereof, or as Lactantius with a further fetch obserueth, à qua nata sunt omnia, because hence all things are bred and nourished. Now because Waters are eyther without Motion, as in Lakes; or of an vniforme Motion, as in Riuers; or diuers, as in the Sea; the Heathen c ascribed a Trident or three-fold Scepter to Neptune, their supposed Sea-god.

That the Earth and Sea haue one and the same Centre, both of Grauity and Greatnesse, appeareth by this, that the parts of the Earth and Water falling from a high place, without other impediment, haue the same direct descent: a piece of Earth also falleth perpendicularly into the Water, with equall and right Angles. And that the Water naturally inclineth to a roundnesse, appeareth in the small drops thereof, which gather themselues into that forme, and by the easier discerning things on shore from the tops, then from the hatches of the ship in the d Sea: likewise by the eleuation or depression of the Pole and Stars, no lesse in sayling, then land-trauels, to the North or South: also in preuenting or lengthning the Sunnes light by sayling East or West, as before hath beene obserued in the Spaniards and Portugals, meeting at the Philippina's, and differing a whole day in their reckoning, the Portugals losing by meeting the Sunne in their Easterne course, that which the Spaniards get by following him in a Westerne. Yea, euen in one dayes sayling this may be manifest, as Record instanceth in a ship sayling West from Iseland, in one of their dayes of twenty houres getting halfe an houre, and in the next day returning with like swiftnesse, loseth as much of the Sunne. Yea in Riuers of very long course, besides that descent (before mentioned) from higher to lower passages, some e obserue a kind of roundnesse or circular rising in compassing the Globe, which else must needs be exceedingly difformed in the Riuers of Nilus, Amazones, and others which runne neere an eighth part thereof.

The Sea is great and wide (sayth f the Psalmist: and at first couered the whole earth like a garment, till for mans vse g the dry land appeared, which for mans abuse was againe in the dayes of Noah couered. And had not God h set the Sea a bound which it cannot passe, it would (so some translate it) returne to couer the earth for euer. It is his i perpetuall decree, who commanded, and it was made, that though the waues thereof rage, yet they cannot preuaile; though they roare, yet they cannot passe ouer. And thus many of the ancient and later Interpreters of Genesis ſis doe auerre, that the Earth is indeed lower then the Waters, as in the beginning of this Worke is obſerued; as if God did by a kinde of miracle in Nature, bridle and reſtraine the tempeſtuous force of the Sea, Rerum omnium inualidiſſima (to vſe Baſils words) debiliſſimáq; arena: with Sand the weakeſt of all creatures. Thus held Aquinas, Carthuſianus, Catharinus, and others. Which opinion being granted, how eaſie were it for the Sea to encloſe the Earth in her watrie mantle, and againe to make a Conqueſt of the drie Land, hauing ſuch forces of her owne, and ſuch re-inforcements from the Ayre and the Earth it ſelfe? Her owne powers, euen by order of Nature and proportion of the Elements, cannot but ſeeme dreadfull: in which, as the Ayre exceedeth the Water, and is it ſelfe exceeded of the Fire; ſo the Water to ſome ſeemes no leſſe to ſurmount the Earth, as the loweſt and leaſt of the Elements. And what Armies of exhalations doth the Sunne daily muſter in the great Ayrie plaine, which would ſuccour their Mother in ſuch an attempt? Beſides that, euen the Earth, as it is euery where compaſſed of the Sea, doth compaſſe in it ſelfe ſo many Seas, Lakes, Riuers, in the vppermoſt face thereof, as profeſſed partakers; and the inward bowels thereof haue daily intelligence, and continuall conſpiracie with the waters, by thoſe ſecret pores and priuie paſſages, whereby it commeth to paſſe, that albeit k All Riuers runne to the Sea, yet the Sea is not filled. And were it poſſible that ſo many worlds of waters ſhould daily and hourely flow into this watrie world, and that ſuch a world of time together, and yet the Sea nothing increaſed, but that (as Salamon there ſaith) The Riuers goe to the place from whence they returne and goe? that is, they runne into the Sea, and thence, partly by the Sunnes force, eleuated and reſtored in Raines, and other Meteors, partly by filling the veynes of the Earth with Springs doe both wayes returne againe in Riuers to the Sea. This l appeareth by the Dead Sea, and by the Caſpian, which receiue many Riuers without open payment thereof to the Ocean: and at the Straits of Gibraltar, the Ocean commonly hath a current in at one end, and the Euxine Sea at the other, beſides abundance of other waters out of Europe, Aſia, Africa, and yet is no fuller.

Pſal.107.24. Many indeed are the wonders of the Lord in the deepe, and this concerning the height, depth, and profunditie thereof one of the higheſt, deepeſt, and requiring the profoundeſt skill to ſearch. That the waters are gathered on ſwelling heapes in round forme, compaſſing the Earth, is already proued; which to a vulgar capacitie may ſeeme to enforce a height of the water aboue ſome parts of the Earth: but ſeeing that the earth and waters haue one Center, and height is properly to bee meaſured by diſtance from that Center; it ſeemeth vnlikely that the water ſhould be higher then the Earth: or altogether equall to the height thereof, in whoſe Channels and concauities it is contayned. And though the Sea ſwelleth, and liſteth vp it ſelfe into that forme which beſt agreeth to that Globe which is compact of it and the Earth: yet is it not capable (being a liquid fluible body) in the greateſt depth and wideneſſe, of ſuch eleuations as wee ſee in high and Mountaynous Regions, whereby the Earth ſeemeth to exceed the due and iuſt proportion of her owne Globoſitie, and thereby no leſſe to excell the higheſt eleuation (as wee may tearme it) of the Sea, then the Cliffes and Shores doe thoſe Waters which approach them. And what needs a conceit of miracle in the very ordinary conſtitution and conſeruation of Nature? though all Nature, if wee regard it as a Creation by ſupernall power, bee nothing elſe but miracle. Some indeed dreame of I know not what proportion of the Elements, wherby they would haue the Water to exceed the Earth, as before is ſaid: and it is true that the vpper face and vtter ſuperficies of the Waters (for ought that is knowne to the contrary) is as great m as that of the Earth. But if wee compare the depth of the Waters with the Diameter of the Earth, we ſhall find that in moſt places the one is not ſo many Fathoms as the other is Miles. Yea who euer ſoundeth ſuch depth? And whereas the Diameter of the Earth is by ſome reckoned 6872$\frac{8}{11}$ Miles, and by ſome more, who euer caſt Line and Lead into the Sea to meaſure a thouſand Fathom? Yea, in n Scaligers opinion, the Earth is ſo much greater then the Water, that if the Mountaines were caſt downe into theſe watry receptacles, and the Earth brought into a perfect roundneſſe, there would no place in it be left for the Water. Record o recordeth not ſo much as he, yet holds the Earth almoſt ten thouſand times as great as the Sea and all other waters. And if wee receiue the Iewiſh Tradition, mentioned by our Apocrypha p Eſdras, this may bee more probable: for hee ſaith, that (euen in the vtter face of the Globe) the Waters were gathered into a ſeuenth part, and ſixe parts of the Earth kept drie. Some imagine q a bottomleſſe depth, paſſing quite thorow the Earth, through which the Moone being in the other Hemiſphere, cauſeth the heightning of the Tides, no leſſe then when ſhe is preſent in ours; which gaue no ſmall helpe alſo in their conceit in the generall Deluge: which if it be true, addes a greater proportion to the Sea then wee haue obſerued. But becauſe little reaſon, and no experience can be ſhewed for this Aſſertion, I will not inſiſt in refutation. But that Deluge being cauſed by breaking vp the Fountaines below, and violent Stormes from aboue, confuſe that opinion that the Sea should be higher then the Earth, which then might haue effected the Floud without either of those former causes.

m Scalig. ſaith twice ſo great.

But why doe I drowne my innocent Reader, with my selfe, in these Depths of the Sea? which some measure by the height of Hills; others [r] resemble those extraordinarie Land-heights to extraordinarie Whirle-Pooles: but seeing the Sea is Tenant to the Earth, which hath (as before we haue said) remoued it selfe in some sort, to make way and roome for it; the more ordinarie height and elsuation of the one, may seeme to answere the more ordinary depth and descending of the other. These bottomes of the Sea haue also their diuersified shape and forme, as it were of Hillockes, Mountaynes, Valleyes, with the [f] Accliuities and Declivities of Places, as in the Shelues, Shallowes, Rockes, Ilands appeareth. And as the Land is not onely higher then the Sea at the shore, so is it apparant, that in remote places from the Sea, the Land doth (besides the exorbitant swellings of Mountaynes) in the ordinary leuell exceed the height of Maritime regions, which thence receiue those Riuers which require descent all the way of their passage, which in some is one thousand in some two thousand miles. And therefore is it likely also that the Sea answers in like proportion, it being obserued to grow shallower neere the shoare, and differently deeper in the farther recesse of the Maine.

§. II.

Of the Saltnesse and Motions of the Sea.

THe saltnesse of the Sea some ascribe [*] to the first Creation; some, to the sweat of the Earth, roasted with the Sunne; some, to the saltnesse of the Earth, especially in Minerals of that nature; some, to adust vapours, parly let fall on the Sea, partly raysed from it to the brinks and face thereof; some, to the motion of the Sea; some, to vnder-earth or vnder-sea [a] fires of bituminous nature, causing both this saltnesse and the motion also of the Sea; and some, to the working of the Sunne, which draweth out the purer and finer parts, leauing the grosser and baser behind: as in this little world of our bodies, the purest parts of our nourishment being employed in, and on the body, the vrine and other excrements remaining, doe detaine a saltnesse.

I will not determine this question, as neither that of the Ebbing and Flowing of the Sea; which (some [*] say) is the breath of the world; some, the fires aforesaid boyling in and vnder the water; some, the waters in holes of the earth, forced out by Spirits; some, the meeting of the East and West Ocean; some ascribe it to the [b] Moone, naturally drawing water, as the Load-stone, Iron; some, to the variable light of the Moone: a variable light they all giue vs. They that send vs to God and his Decree in Nature, haue said what is the true cause, but not how it is by Naturall meanes effected. Certaine it is, that the Ocean and the Moone are companions in their motion: vncertaine whether the Ocean hath a naturall power in it selfe, or from the Moone, so to moue: which is made so much the more doubtfull, by reason that they follow not the Moone in all places of the word alike. Vertomannus writeth, that in Cambaia the Tides are contrarie to the course they hold in these parts; for they encrease not with the full, but with the wane of the Moone: and so the Sea-crabs doe likewise. In the Iland of Socotora, Don Iohn of [c] Castro obserued many dayes, and found (contrary both to the Indian and our wont) that when the Moone riseth, it is high Sea, and as the Moone ascends, the Tide descends and ebbeth, being dead-low water when the Moone is in the Meridian, and this operation hee found continuall. With vs also our highest Tides are two dayes after, and not at the very Full and Change. About Vaygats Stephen Borrough found it to flow by fits, very vncertaine. Scaliger [d] saith, that the full-Moones at Calicut cause the encrease of the water, and at the mouth of Indus (not farre thence, in the same Sea) the new-Moones. But what exceeding difference of the Tides doe wee find in the Downes, and other places on our owne Coasts, both for time and quantitie? that at once in the compasse of ones sight, there should bee both floud, ebbe, and these differing in degrees: and that on some places of our Coast it should rise one fathom, in some two, in the Thames three, at, or neere Bristoll ten, and on some part of the French coast, neere Saint Malos fifteene, whereas our shoare ouer against it riseth but two. The like differences may bee obserued betweene the Tyrrhene Sea, and that on the opposite coast of Barbary, the one swelling, the other not at all heightned: in the East and West Indies I could instance the like, not mentioning those currents which hinder all courses of Tides. Further the Floud continueth in some places seuen houres, in some foure, in most sixe. In the Straits of Sunda some haue obserued that it flowes twelue houres, and ebbes twelue. In [e] Negropont it is said to ebbe and flow seuen times a day; and Patritius affirmeth, that himselfe obserued at Auisser in Liburnia in a hand-made Strait of Sea-water, the same to happen twenty times in a day. Againe, wee see these Tide-motions differ, according to their daily, weekely, monethly, and as some adde, halfe yearely and yearely alterations. All which varieties cannot be attributed to one simple cause, neither to any vniuersall, whether Sunne, Moone, or Natiue heat of the Sea, or any the like: although wee must needs acknowledge (which we cannot know) one principall cause, hindred or altred by manifold accidents, and therefore producing effects thus diuersified. Other motions also may be obserued in the Sea, as that namely which is continuall (and if wee call the Tides the breathing, this may be tearmed the pulse of the Sea) whereby the waters alway wash the shore, falling on and off, couering, and presently vncouering the feet of such as stand by, which hath force to expell all Heterogenean or differing natures, as drowned carkasses, wrackes, and the like. This (as that of the Tides) Patritius, Peucerus, Lydiate, and others, attribute to a kinde of boyling, which (as in a vessell of seething water) causeth it thus to rise and fall, and to expell the drosse and things contrary. But the heate which causeth this boyling one ascribeth to the Sunne, another to fires in the Sea, another to the naturall heate of the Sea engendring spirits, and causing rarefaction and motion. Patritius doth not onely auerre this, but that the Sea is as a sublunarie Planet, mouing it selfe, and moued by the superiour bodies to effect the generation of things: for which cause [f] Orpheus calls the Ocean Father of Gods, Men and other things. The saltnesse thereof is (in his opinion) the instrument of this motion, and the neerest inward and most proper cause of marine mouings, as in the two Mexican [g] Lakes appeareth, the one whereof is salt, and ebbes and flowes, which the other being fresh, doth not. This saltnes (saith [h] he) with greater heat ingendreth more spirits in moysture: the cause of greater Tides he thinketh to be the shallownesse, and narrower shores, the force of the Ocean thrusting the same most forwards where it findes interruptions and indraughts: the certaintie of the motions hee ascribes (according to his Philosophie) to the soule of the world, mouing this, as other Planets. For my censure, it shall bee rather on my selfe then these opinions, where silence rather then boldnesse becommeth. [i] Euen a foole, whiles hee holdeth his peace, is accounted wise. And to borrow the words of a subtill Disputer, [k] Quod vbiq; clamare soleo, nos nihil scire, maximè conuenit huic disquisitioni, quæ maris tractat motum. Let this also bee arranged amongst the wonders of the Lord in the deepe, rather to be admired then comprehended.

I might heere speake of other Sea-motions, either particular or accidentall; as that in the open Seas betweene the Tropikes, [l] vncertaine whether it may bee termed an Easterly winde, or some impetuous violence, caused by the superiour motions which draw together with them the inferiour Elements: likewise those currents in diuers coasts, as at Madagascar on the African, and in the great Bay on the American shores. From other accidents arise other motions, caused by the windes in the ayre (which somewhere haue their set seasons) by whirle-poolcs, or rather contrarie currents, meeting in the Sea by Capes, Indraughts, Riuers, Ilands of the land: by the conceptions and trauelling throwes in the waters, in bringing forth some imminent tempest, and the like.

I might speake of strange Currents in many Seas vpon the coast of Africke, neere to Saint Laurence, and Iohn de Noua, and Mayella. Captaine Saris hath related that the currents detayned him a long time, euen almost to desperation of getting out: and one of them so dreadfull, that it made a noise like that at London Bridge, with a fearefull rippling of the water; the more, the further from land, and there where they sounded an hundred fathom depth, as it were proclaiming open defiance to winde and sayle (notwithstanding their puffing threats and most swelling lookes) in foure and twentie houres carrying them a whole Degree and nine Minutes from the course which vnder full sayle with the windes assistance, they intended.

§. III.

Of the Originall of Fountaines, and other Commodities of the Sea.

I Might adde touching the Originall of Fountaines; which both Scripture and reason, finding no other store sufficient, deriue from the Sea, how they are from thence conueyed by secret Channels and concauities vnder the earth, and by what workmen of Nature thus wrought into new fresh waters. Scaligers experiment to proue the Sea-water at the bottome fresh, by bottles filled there by cunning Diuers or otherwise, is by Patritius his experience, as hee saith, found false. And this freshnesse of the springs, not, withwithstanding their salt originall from the Sea, may rather be ascribed to percolation and straining thorough the narrow spungie passage of the earth, which makes them leaue behind (as an exacted toll) their colour, thicknesse and saltnesse. Now how it should come to passe that they should spring out of the earth, being higher then the Sea, yea, out of the highest Mountaynes, hath exercised the wits of Phylosophers; some ascribing it to a sucking qualitie of the thirstie or spungie earth, some to the weight of the earth pressing and forcing the waters vpwards, some to the motion of the Sea continually (as in a Pumpe) thrusting forwards the water, which expelleth the weaker ayre, and followeth it till it finde an out-let, whereof, both by the continuall protrusion of the Sea, and for auoyding a vacuum or emptinesse (which Nature abhorreth) it holdeth continuall possession: some finde out other causes. And Master Lidyate in a Treatise of the Originall of Springs, attributeth the same to vnder-earth fires, which no lesse by a naturall distillation worketh these waters vnder the earth, into this freshnesse and other qualities, then the Sunne and heauenly fires doe by exhalations aboue. Yea, such are his speculations of these hidden fires, that hee maketh them the causes of Windes, Earth-quakes, Minerals, Gemmes, fertilitie, and sterilitie of the earth, and of the saltnesse and motion (as is before said) of the Sea. But loath were I to burne or drowne my Readers in these fierie and watrie Disputes: let vs from these speculacions retire our selues to the experimentall profits and commodities which this Element yeeldeth.

Concerning the commodities [a] of the Sea, as the world generally, so the little models of the world, the Ilands (whereof this of Great Britaine is iustly acknowledged the most excellent of the world, sometime accounted another world) haue great cause to celebrate and acknowledge the same. It is a Wall of Defence about our shoares; Great Purueyour of the Worlds commodities to our vse; Conueyour of the surquedry and excesses of Riuers; Vniter (by traffique) of Nations which it selfe seuereth; an Open Field for pastimes of peace; a Pitched Field in time of warre, disdaining single personall Combates, and onely receiuing whole Cities and Castles, encompassed with walls of Wood; which it setteth together with deadly hatred and dreadfullest force of the Elements, the Fierie thunders, Airie blasts, Watrie billowes, rockes, shelues and bottomes of the Earth, all conspiring to build heere a house for Death, which by fight or flight on land is more easily auoyded (and how did it scorne the Inuincible title of the Spanish Fleet in 88. and effect thus much on our behalfe against them?) The [b] Sea yeeldeth Fish for dyet, Pearles and other Iewels for ornament, Varietie of creatures for vse and admiration, Refuge to the distressed, compendious Way to the Passingers, and Portage to the Merchant, Customes to the Prince, Springs to the Earth, Clouds to the Skie, matter of Contemplation to the minde, of Action to the bodie: Once, it yeeldeth all parts of the World to each part, and maketh the World (as this Treatise in part sheweth) knowne to it selfe. Superstition hath had her Sea-prophets which haue found out other Sea-profits, as for the purging of sinnes: and the Roman Diuines caused [c] Hermaphrodites to be carried to the Sea for expiation, the Persian Magi thought it pollution to spit or doe other naturall necessities therein. But of these in diuers places.

§. IIII.

Of the varieties of Seas, and of the Caspian and Euxine.

THe Sea is commonly diuided into the Mediterranean and Ocean: and vnder that Mid-land appelation are contained all the Seas and Gulfes that are seated within the Land, as the Arabian, Persian, Baltike, Bengalan, and especially such as the Sea of Sodome and the Caspian, which haue no apparant commerce with the Ocean: but principally is that Sea called, Mediterranean, which entring at the Straits of Gibraltar, is both larger then any of the rest (contayning aboue ten thousand miles in circuit) and abutteth not on one onely, but on all the parts of the elder world, washing indifferently the shores of Asia, Africke, and Europe.

The Seas beare also the names of the Countries, Cities, Hills, Riuers, and Lands, by which they passe, or of some other accident there happened; as the Atlantike, or Germaine Ocean, the Adriatike, the redde, white or blacke Seas, the Sea of Ladies, the Euxine, by a contrary appellation, for their inhospitalitie.

But to contract our speech vnto Asia, wee finde the Sea prodigall of his best things, and of himselfe vnto it, clasping, with a louely embrace, all this Asian Continent, saue where a little Necke of Land diuides it from Africa; and no great space, together with Tanais, from Europe. Yea, as not herewith satisfying his loue to this Asian Nymph, in many places he insinuates himselfe within the Land by Gulfes or Bayes, twining his louing armes about ſome whole Countries : otherwhere (as it were) by hoſtile vnderminings hee maketh Seas farre from the Sea ; and hath yeelded ſo many Ilands, as rather may ſeeme admirable then credible.

Of thoſe Seas baniſhed from communitie and ſocietie with the Ocean, are that Sea of Sodome, largely deſcribed in our firſt Booke. Many other Lakes alſo, as of Kitaya, Van, Chiamay, Dangu, Guian, and the like, as great or much greater, doe no leſſe deſerue the name of Seas : but the moſt eminent of all the reſt is the Caſpian [d] or Hyrcan Sea, called in theſe dayes diuerſly of the places thereon ſituate, as the Sea of Bachu, &c. the Moores call it (as they doe alſo the Arabian Gulfe) Bohar Corſun, that is, The Sea incloſed. It hath beene diuers times ſayled on and ouer by men of our Nation, paſſing that way into Tartaria, Media, and Perſia. The firſt of whom was Maſter Anthonie Ienkinſon, 1558. who affirmeth, that this Sea is in length about two hundred leagues, and in breadth a hundred and fiftie, without any iſſue to other Seas : the Eaſt part ioyneth with the Turkemen Tartars, the Weſt with the Chyrcaſſes and Caucaſus, the North with the Nagay Tartars, and Volga (which ſpringing out of a Lake neere Nouogrode, runneth two thouſand miles, and there with ſeuentie mouthes falleth into this Sea) the South hath Media and Perſia. In many places it hath freſh water, in others brackiſh, in others ſalt, as our Ocean. If wee hold the Sea naturally, or by ſelfe-motion or by exhalations, ſalt : then the freſhneſſe may bee attributed to the abundance of freſh Riuers, which all come running with tributes of their beſt wealth to this ſeeming cloſe-fiſted Miſer, which (for ought the world can ſee of his good workes) communicateth with no other Sea, any part of that abundance which the Riuers Volga, Yaic, Yem, Cyrus, Araſh, Ardok, Oxus, Cheſel, and others many, bring into his coffers. And yet is this Vſurer neuer the richer, Nature it ſelfe holding a cloſe conſpiracie to diſpoſſeſſe him of his needleſſe treaſures. Yea the Riuers themſelues (his chiefe Factors and Brokers) in the Winter time grow cold in alleageance, and frozen in reſpect of wonted dutie : or elſe are detayned by a greater Commander, the Generall of Winters forces, Froſt, who then cloſeth and locketh vp both them and him in Icie priſons, till the Sunne taking a nearer view of this incroaching vſurper, by the multitude of his Arrowes and Darts chaſe him out of the field, and freeth this Sea and Riuers from their colde fare and cloſe dungeons, wherewith Ice their hard Gaoler had entertained them. Chriſtopher Burrough relateth that from the middle of Nouember till the midſt of March, they found this frozen Charitie of the Caſpian to their coſt: being forced with great perill and paine, to trauell many dayes on the Ice, and leaue their ſhip in the Sea; which there was cut in pieces with violence of the froſt. And yet is Aſtracan on the Northerne ſhore, (where Volga and the Caſpian hold their firſt conference) in fixe and fortie degrees and nine minutes, from whence this Sea extendeth beyond the fortieth degree Southwards. The freſhneſſe of the Riuers make it thus ſubiect to froſt, which hath no power ouer the ſalt waters of the Ocean, as by moſt Learned [e] men is holden : which appeareth in the Baltike and Euxine Seas, which holding not ſo full commerce with the Ocean, and filled with freſh Riuers, are made an eaſie prey to that Icie Tyrant, whoſe forces the more open Seas, with their ſalt defence eaſily withſtand ; and although from the mouthes of Riuers, Bayes, and Shores, hee brings whole Ilands of Ice into thoſe watrie Plaines, yet euen vnto the Pole, ſo farre as hath beene diſcouered, the Sea with open mouth proclaimeth defiance, and enioyeth his Elementary freedome.

The Euxine Sea which is diuided from the Caſpian by an hundred leagues of land, hath this reaſon of the freezing aſcribed by Diſarius in [f] Macrobius, that the freſh waters which flow from ſo many Riuers, being lighter then thoſe on the Sea, ſwimme on the top, and are ſubiect to froſt, which the Sea-water is not. And this force of the freſh waters is common to moſt great Riuers, as Plata, Zaire, and others ; and in the Euxine it is obſerued of Phaſis by [g] Arrianus. The thawing of thoſe Froſts is the cauſe of thoſe fogges and myſts, which ſo much infeſt theſe Seas, and are ſo great a hinderance in all Northerne Diſcoueries. And hence in likelyhood came the Prouerbe of Cimmerian darkneſſe, rather then from that Hauſem which Haithon mentioneth (a place of a hundred miles, compaſſed with a wall of pitchie darkeneſſe, whence ſometimes the crowes of Cockes and like ſounds are heard, but none dare enter) or other like fabulous [h] conceits of the Poets. From theſe darke myſts the Euxine is called alſo Mare Maurum, or the blacke Sea ; it was in old time called the Sarmatian, Cimmerian, Taurican, Caucaſean, Phaſian, Pontike, and what other titles, peoples, hils, riuers, or ſpeciall occurrents fixed on it. Of the deſcription thereof, Arrianus hath written a whole Treatiſe, and Stuckius hath largely commented thereon, and [i] Ortelius hath beſtowed good paines in that argument ; to whom I referre the Reader. Arrianus was employed in this Diſcouerie by Adrian the Emperour, beginning at Trapezond ; where he ſet vp Adrians Image, and where before that was a Temple dedicated to Mercurie and Phileſius his Nephew. He ſayled from thence, deſcrying and deſcribing the Coaſts, Riuers, Cities, about this Sea. In Phaſis hee hee obserueth the lightnesse of that water, fresh on the top, salt in the bottome, where it is mixed with the Sea, or rather slideth ouer it. They had heere a Law, That none might carrie water into Phasis; and if they had any in their ships, they must at the entrence of this Riuer cast it foorth, otherwise fearing an vnluckie and dangerous Nauigation. The water of this Riuer (hee saith) will last vncorrupt ten yeeres. This Phasis, Æschylus calleth the limite of Europe and Asia. At the left hand of the entrance was set the Image of the Phasian Goddesse, seeming by her Cymball in her hand, and Lyons drawing her Charrot, to bee none other then Rhea. There also (as a holy Relique) was shewed the Anchor of the ship Argo, which because it was of Iron, seemed to our Author to be counterfeit, especially there being the fragments of an Anchor of Stone, which seemed more likely to be that of the Argonautes, so much chaunted by the Poets. Other monuments of Iason he found none. Counterfeit Reliques.

But to looke backe to the Strait or Thracian Bolphorus, hee there nameth the Temple of Iupiter Urius. Dousa and Gyllius report the pleasantnesse and fertilitie of these parts. Heere did Iason sacrifice to the twelue Gods, and built a Temple to them. Apollo had sixe Temples neare the Straits, the most ancient at Chalcedon, giuing place to none of the Oracles, two at Bizantium, and the other neere thereunto. But with these and manifold other antiquities, Gyllius can best acquaint the more leysurely Reader. Of all the Cities along this shore, I cannot but mention Heraclea, where were obserued the deuotions of Iupiter Stratius his Altars, and two Oakes, planted there in his honour by Hercules. This Citie was also made famous by the Legend of Hercules, descending to Hell, of Cerberus, Acheron, and the like. Of this Citie Memnon wrote a large Historie, some parts whereof doe yet remaine. Cotta after a strait siege subduing it to the Romanes, among other spoyle seized vpon the pyramidall statue of Hercules, (whom hee would haue serue him in a thirteenth labour) exceeding in sumptuousnesse, greatnesse, elegance: neere to which was his Club of solid Gold, as was also his Lyons skinne and his Quiuer. Many monuments and offerings he carried out of the Temples. Both Memnon and Ælyan tell of Dionysius sonne of Clearchus King of Heraclea, which grew into so grosse and vnwonted degree of fatnesse, that it made him vnfit, not for State-affaires onely, but for necessarie functions of life, especially in his sleepe. From which to awaken him, this remedy was deuised, to thrust long Needles into his flesh, which whiles they passed thorow that new-come flesh and fatnesse, were no more felt then of a stone, till they came to the more naturall flesh of his body. When he sate in Iudgement, he had a kind of Cupbord which hid the rest of his body, leauing his face onely open to be seene. Marcianus Heracleotes, one of this Citie, had written a Periplus or Circumnauigation of these and other Seas. But least I seeme frozen in these colder Narrations, or to haue lost my selfe in these Cimmerian mists, I will get me out of this Sea, and obserue the principall Ilands adiacent to Asia. For if I should after all these Discourses of the Sea, enter into a new, of the huge Whales and other varieties of Fishes and Monsters, inhabitants of the Sea, which is thought to haue creatures resembling in some sort all those of the Land, both Men and Beasts: I should grow tedious; and Gesner with others haue done it alreadie. I shall finde more due place for the strangest in some other parts of this Historie.

A briefe Survey of the Ilands adioyning to Asia: also, some fancies of the Sabbaticall Riuer, and inclosed Lewes.

§. I.

The Ilands from Iapan to the Persian gulfe.

IF wee should shippe our selues for the Discouerie of the Ilands in the North-east Seas of Asia, wee were like to finde cold entertainment. Sir Hugh Willoughby, with his Company, lost themselues in this, being frozen to death. Stephen Burrough after attempted, and found out (scarse worth the finding) Vaygats and Noua Zembla. As bad or worse hath beene the successe of Pet, Iackman, and others, both Dutch and English. And the Russians reports to Heberstein, are in some things so fabulous (as of their Slata Baba, and of men dying euery Nouember, and reuiuing in Aprill following) that a may well suspend his credite to the rest. See his Naiig. written by himselfe, Hak. Tom. 1. Sigism. ab Herb.

What Balakus in his letter to Mercator, Hessilius in his late Maps of these parts, or any other haue written, will bee but meane Spoke-men, to procure any Reader with vs in this North-east Discouerie. Steering therefore another course, and coasting another way to the East and South parts of Asia; let vs take a briefe surucy of that World of Ilands in those Indian Seas, reseruing a more full Description of the chiefe of them to the Chapters following; and then proceed to a more leysurely view of the Arabian, and some of the Mediterranean Ilands. And first in this course, we are encountred with the Iland, or a Ilands rather, bearing the name of Iapan; the principall whereof are three: of which, more afterwards.

a Of the Ilands of Asia. Benedetto Bordone, and T. Porcacchi haue written large Treatises of this Iland-subiect.

Some mention (beleeue it that list) neere to Iapan, certaine Ilands of Amazons, with which the Iappnites yeerely haue both worldly and fleshly traffique: and when a Ship commeth from Iapan, so many women as there are men, come to the shore, and leaue each a paire of shooes, with her marke; which who so taketh vp, is her Paramour. These are seconded by the Ilands of China, which doe (as it were) hedge and fence it in; of which there is little in Authors worthy mentioning. In Macao, or Amacao, the Portugals haue a Colonie; but the chiefe Iland of China is Anian, in the Gulfe of Cauchin-China.

Lequio.
b P. Bertii tab.

Further from the Continent, from Iapan Southwards, are many Ilands, called by the names of Lequio, the greater, and the lesse, rich in Gold, nigh to the same is Hermosa: and next to these, the Philippinæ, so called of b Philip the second, King of Shaine, by whose charge and charges they were discouered in the yeere 1564, long after that Magellanus had lost his life in the discouerie of these parts. Some make this name hold some proportion to the Spanish Ambition, calling all the Ilands Philippina, which are betweene New Shaine and the Gulfe of Bengala: in all, after their account, eleuen thousand: whereof, onely thirtie are subiect to the Spaniard: as Thomas à Iesu hath obserued. But of all these afterwards: for heere wee but mention them.

Banda.
c G. Bot. Ben.

They begin their reckoning at Noua Guinea, where first wee see Cainam. The next Banda; which name is proper to an Iland so called, and common also to her neighbours, Rosolegum, Ay, Rom, Neyra, in foure degrees to the South, which alone in the world are c said by some, to bring foorth Nutmegs and Mace. The men heere are Merchants, the women attend to Husbandrie.

Moro.
d A. Pigafetta.

The Ilands del Moro abound with Rice and Sagu (the pith of a Tree which yeeldeth Meale) where d are wild Hennes, which sinnot on their Eggs, but burie them a good depth vnder the sand; where the Sunne hatcheth them. They haue no Kine, but a Fish of like lineaments, which they take in their Nets.

Gilolo.

Gilolo hath a Mahumetane Prince, and is a great Iland; the people are Men-eaters.

Amboyna.

Amboyno is the name of many Ilands, rude both in soyle and people, which eate their owne Parents when they are old. Dauid Middleton in a written Discourse of one of his Indian Voyages, mentioneth an Iland amongst or neere these of Amboyno, called Bangaia, the King whereof is a Gentile. A Hollander heere obtayned such sway, that none durst displease him. Hee had two houses full of the Daughters of the Inhabitants which best liked him, besides many Slaues of both sexes. His life is meerely Epicurean: hee will dance and sing and be drunke two dayes together: nor will hee be commanded by any of his Countrey-men. Hee is Collector or Treasurer to the King of Ternate in those parts, and sends him what hee can spare. At Banda the Hollanders would not suffer the English to trade: and euery where else, both East, and West, and North, and South (as may be instanced in the particulars) if force or fraud by slaunders raysed on our people can effect it, they testifie that gaine is more precious to them then the loue of our Nation. Neere to the Ilands last mentioned are the Molucca, fiue in number (others reckon more) Ternate, Tidor, Moter, Machian, and Bachian, famous through the world, as being Natures Store-house of Cloues.

Their worship is directed to the Sunne, Moone, and other heauenly and earthly Creatures. The King of Tidores chiefe Priest came aboord the Consent, of which Ship Dauid Middleton was chiefe. In the Moluccas are found those admirable Birds of Paradise, or as the Portugals call them, fowles of the Sunne. The e Selebes abound with Gold, abandoned of goodnesse, peopled with Idolaters and Men-eaters. The Ilands of f Moratay are more Northerly, where Battata-roots is their Bread, their neighbours fare in the Ilands of Tarrao, Sanguin, Solor, and others.

f Moratay.

In those Ilands, which more properly beare the Philippine title, Mindanao is of very large circuit, and hath diuers famous Cities: Tendaia, for her excellence, was by the first Discouerers called the Philippina. Luzzon iscompasseth a thousand miles, in which the Spaniards haue built a Towne, called Manilla, and haue thither carried Cattle for breed. This Citie standeth in fourteene degrees and a quarter.

Borneo is reputed as bigge as Spaine, richly attended with many Ilands of smaller circuit. It hath a Citie of the same name, founded on Piles, in the salt water, with sumptuous buildings of hewed ſtone, couered with Coco leaues. The King is a Mahumetan. At Sagadana in this Iland, there is an Engliſh Factorie.

of

The greater Iaua is by Scaliger called an Epitome, or Summe of the world; rich in many commodities. The Cabal is a wilde beaſt in this Iland, whoſe bones doe reſtraine the bloud from iſſuing in wounded parties. The South part is Gentiles, as the countries within the land; but towards the ſhore they are Mahumetans. Touching the leſſer Iaua, there is ſome controuerſie which ſhould be it. The Straits [g] of Sincopura are dangerous, not aboue a Muſket ſhot ouer; there are two ledges of Rocks on either ſide at the entrance, and within ſunken rocks.

Betwixt Malacca and Samatra, Nature hath (as it were) ſowed that Field of waters with Ilands; the principall of which is Bintam. Samatra, within the Countrey is Ethnikes: towards the Coaſt are Moores; an Iland large, rich, and populous, diuided into many Kingdomes.

The Gulfe of Bengala is (as it were) guarded with a double ranke of Ilands, which Neptune hath ſet as Garriſons of thoſe Seas. But theſe all are not worthy the honour due to Zeilan, called in old times Taprobana, which name others apply to Samatra. From thence, alongſt the coaſt of India, are ſeene few Ilands of any greatneſſe: but further into the Sea are the Maldiua [h], ſo called of Maldiua, one of their number, whoſe name ſignifieth a thouſand Ilands; (Hieronymo de Sancto Stephano, numbreth them betweene ſeuen and eight thouſand) ſome of which are diuided by larger Seas, ſome by ſmaller armes; the Ocean ſomewhere with his greatneſſe threatning to ſwallow them, and in other places as curious of his delightfull ſearch, ſtealing rather, then forcing a ſeparation, prouoking the paſſengers to communicate in his ſports; who ſometimes, helped with ſome ouer-growing Tree, can leape from one Iland to another. Yet hath not Nature, thus diuerſifying their ſituation, yeelded them diuerſitie of her riches, ſauing that it ſeemeth here ſhee hath choſen her chamber for the Palme, or Coquo-nuts, which in other places ſhee hath, in compariſon, but ſcattered; here, ſtored, that by this ſtore the people might ſupply all their other wants. Yea, beſides the Land-Coquo, there groweth another vnder the water, bigger then the former; a ſpeciall Antidote for poyſon. The Inhabitants are addicted to ſubtletie and ſorcerie: and in the Ilands next to the Continent, Moores beare ſway; in the reſt, Pagans. Other Ilands, of ſmaller reckoning, we reckon not. Diu hath long beene famous for the warres therein, vainly attempted by the Turke and Indians againſt the Fortreſſe of the Portugals.

g Nathaniel Martin.

In our Nauigations you haue the voyage of Francis Pyrard, out of whoſe large ſtorie of theſe Ilands, wee haue not been niggardly to beſtow the principall obſeruations on our Reader of their number (ſuppoſed 12000.) Cuſtomes, Creatures, Cocos, &c. h Pyrard ſaith of Male, the principall Iland, and that Diues ſignifieth a heape of Ilands.

§. II.

The Perſian Gulfe, and of the Paſſage downe Euphrates thither, the Sabbatieall ſtreame, and incloſed Iewes.

THE Perſian Gulfe hath left ſome remnants of Land extant: the chiefe is Ormuz, a famous Mart, which the Moores there maintayned, vnder the gouernment of a Moore, after made tributarie to the Portugall; which Nature hath made barren; Induſtrie, plentifull: the more fertile Element yeelds barrenneſſe and ſands; the barrenner bringeth in a double wealth, Pearles, and Merchandiſe.

Iohn Newbury, which ſayled downe Euphrates to this Sea, and ſo to Ormuz (viſiting Bagdet by the way, which he ſaith is twentie or fiue and twentie miles Southward from old Babylon) teſtifieth of the women in Ormuz, that they ſlit the lower part of their eares more then two inches, which hangeth downe to their chin. This our Countrey-man dyed in his Trauels, hauing trauelled to Conſtantinople, into the blacke Sea, and Danubius, and through the Kingdomes of Poland and Perſia, the Indies, and other parts of the World. But for the deſcription of the paſſage downe the Riuer Euphrates to the Perſian Gulfe, I know it none which hath done it ſo exactly, as Gaſparo Balbi, a Venetian, which that way paſſed to Ormuz and India; who relateth the ſame in the Diarie of his Trauels: ſometimes the Trunkes or Bodies of Trees, vnder the water of this Riuer, conſpiring dangerous attempts; ſometimes Zelebe, and other ouer-hanging Mountaynes, threatning ruine, and euen now ſeeming to ſwallow them in their darke-deuouring jawes; ſometimes the violence of ſome ſteeper Current, as it were hurling them into a Whirle-poole; alway the Arabians ready attending for prey and ſpoile. One Citie, or rather the carkaſſe of a Citie, whereof onely the ruines are remayning, ſtands on the left hand of this Riuer, greater in his opinion then Cairo in Egypt: the Mariners affirmed to him, That by the report of the old men, it had three hundred threeſcore and ſixe gates: from morning to noone, with the helpe of the ſtreame, and foure Oares, they could ſcarcely paſſe one ſide thereof.

i Monfart ſaith, he went from Aleppo in a Carauan of 10000. men, which trauelled all by night, guided by the ſtarre through the Deſarts, 30. dayes to Nane or Euphrates. The vſuall way, is to Bir, &c.

This is called Elorſi, perhaps that which was anciently called Edeſſa. Hee ſpeakes of the Caraguoli, inhabiting as they paſſed, which agree neither with Turkes, Moores, nor Perſians, in their Sect, but haue an Hereſie by themſelues. Hee trauelled more then one whole day by one ſide of old Babylon: from Felugia to Bagdad, though the ground bee good, yet ſaw hee neither Tree nor greene Herbe, but all barren, and ſeeming to retaine ſome markes of the Propheſies threatned by Eſay againſt this place. They which dwell heere, and trauell from hence to Balſara, carrie with them Pigeons, whom they make their Letter-poſts to Bagdad, as they doe likewiſe betweene Ormuz and Balſara. The coaſts of Perſia as they ſayled in this Sea, ſeemed as a parched Wilderneſſe, without tree or graſſe: thoſe few people which dwell there, and in the Ilands of * Lar and Cailon, liue on fleſh, being in manner themſelues tranſformed into the nature of Fiſhes; ſo excellent ſwimmers are they, that ſeeing a veſſell in the Seas, though ſtormie and tempeſtuous, they will ſwimme to it fiue or ſixe miles to begge almes. They eate their fiſh with Rice, hauing no Bread; their Cats, Hennes, Dogges, and other Creatures which they keepe, haue no other dyet. In the Iland of Bairen, and thoſe of a Gonfiar, they take the beſt Pearles in the world. In Muſcato, threeſcore miles from Ormuz, they dare not fiſh for them, for Fiſhes, which are as cruell to the Men, as they to the innocent Oyſters. They hold, that in Aprill the Oyſters come to the top of the water, and receiue the drops of Raine which then fall, wherewith they returne to the bottome againe: and therefore fiſh not till the end of Iuly, becauſe that ſubſtance is not before ripened and hard. In ſayling from Ormuz to Diu, he ſaith they paſſed ouer a Bay of a hundred and thirtie leagues of water, white like milke. I haue ſeene an Extract of a Chronicle, written by Pachaturunuras, which raigned in Ormuz three hundred yeares agoe; teſtifying, that one Mahomet being King of Amen in Arabia Fœlix, pretending title to Perſia, built a Citie on the Continent of Hormuz, which his poſteritie held in ſucceſſion of many generations. It happened that King Cabadim flying from the King of Creman, came to Iarum, that is, a Wood; ſo they called this Iland, which is almoſt all of Salt, the Riuer being brackiſh from a ſalt Mountaine in the middeſt thereof, and the ſides of the Riuer white ſalt. Yet there then grew thinne Woods. Heere he built Ormuz; which Albuquerk made tributarie to the Portugals, being Lady of the Ilands thereabouts, and principall Staple of Merchandize for thoſe parts of the world. Odaricus ſpeaketh of the intollerable heate in thoſe parts: and Balby teſtifieth, that neere Balſara, many perſons die of the extremitie of heat: which happened to foure of their company; which forced by heat and wearineſſe, ſate downe, and with a hot blaſt of winde were all ſmothered. Ormuz * is lately taken from the Portugals by the Perſian.

In the Diſcourſe of theſe Aſian Seas and this Perſian, among the reſt, I thought it worthy relating, which b Luys de Urreta, in his Æthiopian Hiſtorie, telleth of a certaine Iew, though perhaps but a tale (for a lyer, ſuch as hee hath beene cõicted in his Æthiopian Storie, loſeth his credit, where he ſpeakes truth) yet euen tales ſerue for mirth being intermixed with ſerious hiſtories, branded that they may be knowne for Rogues or Ieſters. Be it as it will; he tels that this Iew trauelling alongſt the ſhoare of this Perſian Sea, by ſome In-lets and Armes thereof, which embay themſelues within the Land, ſaw the Sea loftie and ſwelling, by force of the Windes and Tides, ſeeming to threaten the higher Elements, but euen now ready to ſwallow vp the Earth, roaring out a loud defiance in ſuch ſort, that the poore Iew was amazed, and dreadfully feared therewith: and this continued the ſpace of ſome dayes, whiles the Iew trauelled thereby. But on the Saturday and Sabbath, Superſtition commanded the Iew; and Nature (the Hand-maid of Diuinitie) enioyned the angrie Elements to reſt; a ſuddaine calme followed, as if Waues and Windes would accompany the Iew in his deuotions, and had forgotten their former furie and wonted nature, to remember the ſanctification of this Day. The Iew hauing heard before, that there was a Sabbaticall Riuer (which ſome place in Æthiopia, ſome in Phœnicia; others, they cannot tell where) in a credulous fantie perſwades himſelfe, that this Arme of the Sea was that Sabbaticall Streame, and that he now ſaw the experiment of that relation with his eyes. Fancie had no ſooner affirmed, but Superſtition ſware to the truth, and Credulitie tickles him with gratulation of Diuine fauour to himſelfe, that had liued to ſee that bleſſed ſight. Rauiſhed with this conceit, hee fills his Budget full of the Sand, which is of a more groſſe and cleauing nature, then in other places, and carrieth it with him as a great treaſure vnto the place of his habitation. There hee tells his Countreymen, that now the Meſſias would not be long before he came, for now he had found this ſigne thereof, the Sabbaticall Riuer; ſhewing this Sand in proofe thereof. Credit Indens Apella, the Iewes beleeue quickly all but the truth, eſpecially in Portugall, whither he came with this report. Many thouſand moued by his words, remoued their dwellings, and ſelling their ſubſtance, would needs goe into theſe parts of Perſia, by the Sabbaticall Riuer to fixe their habitation; there wayting for their promiſed Meſſias. One, and a chiefe of this ſuperſtitious Expedition pedition, was Amatus Lusitanus, a Physician of great note, accounted one of the most learned of his Profession, and a Writer therein; and Iohn Micas, a Merchant of great wealth. They passed through France, Germany, Hungary, their company (like a Snow-ball) encreasing as they went, with the addition of other Iewes of like credulity. When they came to Constantinople, there were of them, in many Bands or Companies, thirty thousand. Cabasmi Bassa, the Turkish Commander, thought to gaine by this occasion; and would not suffer them to passe ouer the water into Asia, without many hundred thousands of Duckets, except they would passe on horse-backe. This example was soone both spred and followed of the other Bassaes and Commanders in Asia, as they went; their wealth and substance being euery where so fleeced, that they came into Syria, much lessened in numbers, in estate miserable and beggerly; new Officers euery where, as new hungry Flyes, lighting on these wretched carkasses (so I may call them:) some they whipped, some they empaled, some they hanged, and burned others. Thus were these miserable Pilgrimes wasted: and Don Iohn Baltasar was present, when Amato aforesaid being dead with this affliction, his Physicke bookes were in an Out-cry to be sold at Damasco, and because they were in Latine, no man would buy them, till at last another Iew became Chapman. Micas, one of the wealthiest men which Europe held, dyed poore in an Hospitall at Constantinople. And this was the issue of their Pilgrimage to the Sabbaticall streame, which they supposed to finde in this Persian Gulfe, where wee haue too long holden you the Spectators of this Iewish Tragedie.

And yet let me intreate your patience a litle longer, in considering the occasion of this error. We haue elsewhere [f] mentioned this Sabbaticall Riuer: now you shall vnderstand that the Iewes generally haue drowned their wits therein. Rambam [g] cals it Gozan. Genebrard alleageth many R. F. testimonies of it: but of all and of all, let Eldad Danius his tale which Genebrard hath translated) find some fauourable entertainment; the rather because one of our Apocryphall Authors seemes to weaue the same webbe, which as the worthier person, deserueth first examination. Esdras therefore (so wee suppose him, and this is not all his Iewish Fables) reporteth, that the ten Tribes which Salmanasar led captiue, tooke counsell among themselues to leaue the multitude of the Heathen, and goe forth into a further Countrey where neuer Mankind dwelt: that they might there keepe their statutes which they neuer kept in their owne Land. And they entred into Euphrates by the narrow passages of the Riuer. For the most High then shewed signes for them, and held still the flood till they were passed ouer. For through that Country there was a great way to goe, namely, of a yeere and a halfe: and the same Region is called Arsareth. Then dwelt they there vntill the latter time. And now when they shall begin to come, the Highest shall stay the springs of the streame againe, &c. Here you see no lesse Miracle then in Iordan, or the Red Sea, for their passage: which seeing it was through Euphrates, yee will pardon our Iew for searching it neere this Persian Gulfe, especially seeing his good Masters the Rabbins had increased this Tale with the Inclosure of these Iewes from passing againe into our World; not by the continuall course of Euphrates, as Esdras insinuateth, but by the Sabbatising of the Sabbaticall streame, which by Eldads description is two hundred cubits ouer, full of sands and stones, without water, making a noyse like thunder as it floweth, which by night is heard halfe a dayes Iourney from it. On the Sabbath it is continually quiet and still, but all that while ariseth thence a flame, that none dare enter, or come neere by halfe a mile. Thus the fire (if not the Religion of the Sabbath) then detaynes them no lesse then the stony streame on the weeke dayes: and what stony heart can refuse them credit? Yet doth not hee and Esdras agree of the Inhabitants, both deriuing them from the tenne Tribes; but Eldad challengeth no lesse antiquitie then from Ieroboam, who contending with Roboboam, the godly Catholike Israelites refusing to fight against the house of Dauid, chose rather to attempt this Pilgrimage, and so passing the Riuer Physon (for the Scriptures had forbidden them to meddle with Egypt, Ammon or Amalek) they went and they went til they came into Ethiopia. There did the foure Tribes of Dan, Nepthali, Gad, Aser settle themselues, which continually warr vpon the seuen Kingdoms of Tusiga, Kamtua, Koha, Marhugia, Tacul, Bacma, and Kacua (fie on the simplicity of our Geographers, which know not one of these, no better then Esdras his Arsareth:) they haue a King whose name is Huziel Mathiel, vnder whom they fight, each Tribe three moneths, by course. The Tribe also of Moses (for they imagine his children claue to their Mothers Religion, which was a Madianite or Ethiopian) is turned to their truth: and they all obserue the Talmud, the Hebrew Tongue, the Ordinances of the Elders, and suffer nothing vncleane amongst them: Yea, no Vtopian State comparable to theirs. He tels the like tales of the other Tribes. But how came he thence to tell this newes? Truely I wonder no lesse then you: yet he saith he got to the Sea (forgetting that before he had compassed his Countrey with the Sabbaticall streame) and there was taken captiue, and by his leanenesse escaping the Canibals (else our fat Storie had beene deuoured) was sold to a Iew, of whom perhaps this forged Tale procured his redemption. Howsoeuer the Tradition holds, both for these inclosed Iewes, and that Sabbaticall streame, that it should be sought here-a-wayes, or found no where. The reciting is sufficient refuting to a reasonable vnderstanding; and yet the Iewes are not onely besotted with their inclosed brethren, imagining their Messias may bee amongst them, although they know not whether to ascribe this transportation to Salmanaser, or to Alexander the Great, or to the dayes of Ieroboam: but Christians also tell [h] of them about the Pole, and they know not where. And I haue seene a printed Pamphlet of their comming out of those their Inclosures in our times, with the numbers of each Tribe. Yea, Postellus, Boterus, and many other deriue the Tartars from them: which dreame, they which please may reade at large confuted by Master Brerewood. It was about the yeere 1238. when Eldad came from thence into Spaine.

If any lust to haue another Guide for the Sabbaticall streame, Master Fullers [i] learned labours will giue him good directions. He saith it is the same which Brocard in his Description of the Holy Land, calleth Valania: hee also correcteth the vsuall Translations of Ptolemey and Iosephus (learned Casaubon is of his minde) and addes other things ridiculous enough out of the Rabbines, out of whose muddie Lakes this Riuer floweth to enclose the fabulous Iewes aforesaid.

If any maruell why in a Discourse of the Sea wee adde this, I answere, that wee cannot finde the Land whereto it is due: and therefore one absurditie must follow another. But let vs proceed.

§. III.

Of the Red Sea, Sir H. MIDDLETONS taking, and of Rhodes and Cyprus.

THE Red Sea, or Arabian Gulfe, seemes vnwilling to be the Oceans subiect: so many small Ilands doth she continually muster in resistance, besides her vndermining the the Sea with her shallow Channell, conspiring the destruction of many heedlesse Mariners, that here will aduenture as tenants to the Sea in their mouing houses. Once (by a mightier hand) was it helped to preuaile against the Seas force, to discouer a dry Land in the middest thereof, and with her watery erected wals to guard these new passengers, till the same hand reuersed it, or rather rewarded the then empty belly thereof with the prey of so many thousand Egyptians. Babelmandel, Camaran, and Mazua are accounted amongst the chiefe of these Isolets: Suachen hath most soueraigntie, being the Seat of the Turkish Bassa for Abassia.

Arianus in his Periplus of the Red Sea, and Agatharchides in a Treatise of like Argument, mention not many Ilands therein: Orine, Alalæ, Catacumene, and that of Diodorus in the mouth of the Strait. Don Iohn of Castro hath written an exact Treatise (from his owne experience) of these Seas and Ilands, which Master Hakluit hath in a written Copy; out of which we shall obserue more in our coasting about Africke. Thomas Ienes, who was in the Ascension in this Sea, speaketh of twelue or thirteene desolate Ilands, where they found refreshing with Cokos, Fish, and Turtle-doues, whereof one may with his hands take twenty douzen in a day. The Straits are a mile and an halfe ouer, but now not chained. Mokha is the chiefe Staple of Indian Commodities, which passe that way to Cairo and Alexandria.

This Moha or Mokha is eighteene leagues within the Bab, and hath beene often visited by [k] English ships; but in the yeere 1610. they dealt treacherously and barbarously with Sir H. Middleton and his Fleete, both here and at Aden. Aden hath beene of great trading a great Citie; now ruinated, neither shops of any account within it, nor shippes of Merchandize without, adorning the same as in times past. Neither doe the Turkes deserue better, who tooke it by treachery at first, hanging vp the King comming to visit them, and keeping (or rather losing and lessening) it still by like treachery. Thus dealt they with Captaine Downton his Company, in colour of Trade surprising twenty, and making them prisoners: and yet worse was the Generall dealt with at Moha. The Aga, after much protestation of loue, and vesting him publikely to testifie the Grand Signiors Grace in cloth of Gold, giuing leaue to set vp their Pinnasse, with many offices and offers of kindnesse, on the eight and twentieth of Nouember suddenly assaulted the English, killed eight, knocked downe the Generall, and tooke him with eight and fortie of his company: and Master Pemberton also with nine of his Men. They attempted presently to surprise the Darling with three great Boates full of Souldiers, where they found the Trumpeter asleepe, and slue him with another. The decke vpon occasion of romeaging that day for Quick-siluer, was couered with victuals, none of

of his companie fearing, or prepared for offence or defence. Happily one threw forth a barrell of poulder, and disturbed them with fire, which when their Captaine Emer Babare cryed to cut the ships cables, made them mistake and cut the Boat-ropes, so driuing away, leauing their Captaine and fiue and twentie more behinde to the slaughter. And with a Peece they gaue present warning to the Trades Increase, Sir Henries ship, so that their villanie succeeded not by Sea, their intent being to become Masters of all. The next day Sir Henrie Middleton with seuen more, all chained by the necks, were brought before the Aga, who sternely demanded how he durst come into their Port of Moha, so neere their holy Citie of Mecca, being the Port and Doore thereof, adding that the Bassa had order from the Great Turke to captiuate all Christians in those Seas, although they had His Owne Passe. He pressed the Generall to write to the Ships, that they should come on shore (out of the water into this fire) and not preuayling, caused him to be taken out of his chaine and coller, and clapping a great paire of fetters on his legs, and manacles on his hands, separated from the rest of his companie, laid him in a durtie dog-kennell vnder a paire of staires. At night the Consull of the Banians intreated some mitigation, so that he was remoued to a better roome, but lodged on the bare ground, continuing in this miserie (They hoped meanewhile for want of water and victuall to obtayne the ships) till December 26. Order then came from Ieffar Bassa, to bring them to Zenan or Sinan, chiefe Citie of Yeomin or Aymen. Then being re-examined as before, His Irons were knocked off, and with foure and thirtie more English hee was sent thither, the Turkes themselues pitying their manacles, and some of them doing them fauours; Master Pemberton made a strange escape.

Moha, the Port of Mecca.

Zenan is nineteene miles from Moha North North-west, in 16. 15. There they arriued Ianuarie 5. being their Diuano or Councell day, conueyed as in great pompe and triumph one by one. The Generall was carried vp into the Castle to a roome twelue steps high, where two great Men tooke him by the wrists, and led him to the Bassa, sitting at the vpper end of a long Gallerie couered on the floore with Turky carpets, and when hee came within two yards of Him, he was staid, the Bassa with frownes demanding his countrey, and other questions like these of the Aga. Then was he with foure or fiue more committed to the Keepers house; the rest to the common prison, clapped in Irons, where they had with their small allowance starued, if the Generall had not releeued them by the meanes of some of the Turkes themselues, by promises * and other meanes become their friends. On Ianuarie 17. arriued nineteene more of those which had beene betrayed at Adan. On the 11. of Februarie, they were all freed of their Irons, whereas (they heard) their intent had beene to cut off the heads of the chiefe, and make slaues of the rest: and at last with faire promises returned to Moha in the beginning of March. And on the 11. of May the Generall made his escape by this deuice: He sent to the ship for prouisions as for longer stay, and especially for Wine and Aquauite, which hee gaue bountifully amongst his Keepers, so that at noone they went home to rest their laden braines. The Aga himselfe also was gone that day on pleasure out of towne. Thus the English (hauing some tolerable libertie since their returne) carried one emptie Tunne to the shore, and an other after it in which was the Generall, the rest of the companie being appointed by sundrie wayes to meete there at the Boat which was appointed to come from the ship; and thus they got aboord, a few onely staying longer, and therefore left behinde. But these with other their goods by force were rendred to them, hauing recouered their ships. The treacherous Aga was remoued, Ider Aga placed in his roome: and since, Ieffar Bassa is also reported to haue lost his head.

a He promised the Ruha or Lieutenant 1500 Venetian peeces. A Moore of Cairo, and Hamet Waddy, the Bassaes Merchant, and others were their friends.

In their way to Zenan they were much annoyed with cold in the Mountaynes, the ground euery night couered with a white frost, and the Ice in one night a finger thick. The Citie is bigger then Bristoll, hath a wall of mud, Orchards and Gardens within the same: there are many women and children kept as Hostages, to secure the Parents and Husbands allegeance. The way is by ragged Mountaynes (especially betweene Tayes and Zenan) and hath many Censers or Innes by the Grand Seignior erected for the ease of Trauellers. Their returne from Zenan was on the nineteenth of Februarie, eighteene miles to Surage, where the people are poore, clothed from the waste to the knees: The twentieth to Damane (twentie miles) a Towne consisting of fiue Hamlets ioyned; a plentifull place. The next day they trauelled till after mid-night, and came to Ermin, fifteene miles. The two and twentieth, they went fourteene miles; and the three and twentieth staid at Naquellamare a common Inne. On the Hill there is a Castle, the Gouernour an Arabian; No Turke may passe this way without Passe and Licence, the Arabs in the most places ruling, and the people not brooking the Turkish insolence. The foure and twentieth, they tooke vp Asses, but the people tooke them away againe notwithstanding the Bassaes warrant: they went fifteene miles. The fiue and twentieth, sixteene miles to Rabatanim Censor. The sixe and twentieth, as farre beyond to Mersadine. The seuen and twentieth, to Tayes, a Citie halfe as bigge as Zenan, with a mud wall wall and a Castle. On the first of March sixteene miles, to Fufras. The second eleuen miles, to Asanbine. The fourth to Mousa, seuenteene miles. Hereabouts and at Tayes, is store of Indico. The fift they came to Moha. The Countrey is populous all the way: and because is is so little knowne, I haue particularly related this iournall. On the fift of Ianuarie is great resort of people to Fufras, in deuotion towards one of their Saints there buried, and thence they goe together to Mecca.

Moha. Moha is a towne vnwalled, very populous, seated close to the Sea, a salt, sandie, barren soile: the Agà had beene as they say Catamite to Ieffar Bassa, as the other at Aden also. At their returne he feasted Sir Henrie, and called for the Alcoran, kissed it, and swore that hee bare him no ill will. Hee might rather haue sworne by their ships: for that was the Deitie that he most feared. These in this time found a good Road, called Assab, for their refreshing in the Abex or Habesh shore, the King of Reheita (a towne neere the Bab) kindly entertayning them. At this Assab-road they had wood and water enough, but brackish; with other prouisions at reasonable rates. On the shore they are Mahumetanes, within land Christians. This King came riding pompously on a Cow to the English, when Generall Saris was there, with fish-shels hanging for a iewell on his forehead. The better sort speake and write Arabike, the vulgar another language. But this is African; and so may we reckon Sodotora and those two Ilands which confront it; Of [a] which one (they say) is the habitation of Men, and the other of Women, which sometimes haue entercourse one with the other, but the Aire (Natures inexorable and heauy Hand-maid) not suffering any long abode to each, but in their owne alotted portion.

Loth am I to looke any further into that boysterous Sea, and therefore leauing all that huge Tract of Afrike, as compassed by a sudden thought, but vnsaluted, we shall finde other Asian Ilands in the Mediterranean. And because being now wearied, the Archipelago would be too tedious a passage for vs, neither are there many Ilands worth naming in Propontis, or the Euxine, we will speake a little of Rhodes and Cyprus, and then remember how long we haue forgotten our Readers patience.

The former of those containeth about an hundred and twentie miles: fertile in soile, and of most pleasant aire, caused by that loue which Phœbus beareth to it; there neuer passing day, in which hee doth not, in his bright and shining apparell, salute it. And for this cause happily was that huge Colossus of brasse (gilded ouer, and reputed the most wonderfull of the Worlds seuen Wonders) here dedicated to the Sunne (though some ascribe it to Iupiter) the workmanship of Chares Lindius, of threescore and ten cubits, [b] or as others tell, an hundred and fortie three feet, but it selfe told fourescore cubits in height, which, falling by an Earthquake, the Oracle forbade the Rhodians to erect againe. But nothing forbade Mabias, or Muaui, the fifth Caliph, after his seuen yeeres warre about Constantinople (as saith [c] Constantius, out of Theophanes) inuading this Iland, to carry away nine hundred (Constantinus numbreth many more) Camels burthens of this brazen carkasse.

b This inscription was in the basis, as Meursius translates it: Rhodo Colossum his quater cubitis decem Superbientem Lindius fecit Laches, which wordes shew both the Author Lindius Laches, and the height foure-score cubits. Meursius in translat. Constant.

c Constant. Porphyrogenitus de ad imp. cap. 21. Theophanis Chronicon.

The Temple of Liber was here enriched, with many presents of the Greeks and Romans, to both which the Citie of Rhodes was had in friendly and honourable regard. Much was their force by Sea in ancient times, and for two hundred yeeres space it was the seate of the Hospitular Knights, which now reside in Malta; driuen thence by mightie Solyman.

These Knights had also, by purchase of King Richard [d] the first of England, the Ilands of Cyprus [e], dedicated by the Poets to Venus, to whom the Inhabitants were too much addicted, as appeared by their Temples and other vanities in her honour. At Paphos shee was worshipped in the likenesse of a Nauell; and round thereabouts (by the Deuils working) it rayned not. Trogus writeth, That the Cyprians prostituted their daughters (before they married them) to Mariners on the shore. We haue seene at Rome (saith R. Volateranus) the attendants of Queene Carlotta, neuer awhit better then those ancient.

Of Cyprus thus reporteth Ammianus Marcellinus, lib. 4. It is ennobled by two Cities, Salamis and Paphus; the one famous for Iupiters Images; the other, for the Temple of Venus. It is so plentifull in all things, that it needes no helpe of other Nations, and of her owne abundance is able to set forth a ship, from the Keele to the Top-saile, with all prouision, furnished to the Sea. Neither grieue I to tell it; the Romans more greedily then iustly, made themselues Lords thereof. For Ptolomie the King being Confederate with vs, was proscribed without any fault, but the defect of our Treasurie, who therefore poysoned himselfe, and the Ile became tributarie. Sextus Rufus saith as much. Amasis was the first, if we beleeue Herodotus [f], that euer conquered Cyprus, and made it tributarie. He also saith (lib. 4.) That the Cyprians were partly from Salamine and Athens, partly from Arcadia, partly from Cythnus, from Phœnicia, and from Æthiopia. Plinie affirmeth [g], That it was sometime the seate of nine Kings, and was diuersly named, as Acamantis, Ceraftis, Aspelia, Amathusia, Macaria, Cryptus, and Colinia. It was such a Forrest of Trees [h], that when as their shipping and Mines were not able to waste them, it was made lawfull for any man to fell and destroy them, and for his labour to possesse the land which he had so cleered. Bartholomæus Saligniacus sayth, he saw flying fishes in the Sea about Cyprus, which in the Atlantike Ocean are common: he saw also a Ramme in Cyprus with seuen horne.

In the time of Constantine it was forsaken of the Inhabitants, as before forsaken of the Elements, which refused to water with any drops of raine that Iland (sometime called Macaria or happy) the space of seuenteene yeeres together, or as others haue it, sixe and thirtie, repeopled from diuers parts by Helena, the Mother of Constantine, * and remayning to the Greeke Empire, till that Lion of England made it a prey, and the Knights purchase, who sold it to Guido Lusignun: whose posterity failing, the Venetians succeeded, till SELYM the Second, minding to erect a Religious Hospitall, to testifie his magnificence, beganne with an irreligious foundation. For whereas their holy Lawes will not suffer any thing to bee dedicated to holy vses, which their owne Sword hath not conquerd, hee brake league with the Venetian, and robbed them of this Iland, which they are thought, not with the iustest title, before to haue possessed. But it is high time to bethinke vs of our Indian shore, whence we haue taken so large a prospect: where we are stayed to be transported into the chiefe of those Ilands there to take a more leisurely view of their Regions and Religions. And if any be desirous to reade the ancient names and descriptions of the Seas and Ilands about Asia, Marcianus, Heracleotes, and Scylax Carnandensis haue written especiall Treatises thereof, which Dauid Hœschelius hath published in Greeke, very profitable to the learned Students of the ancient Geographie, as are the workes also of Isidorus Characenus, Artemidorus Ephesius, and Dicearchus Messenius, which he hath ioyned with them.

A larger Relation of some principall Ilands of Asia, and first of the Ilands of Iapon.

§. I.

A Preface touching the Iesuites, and a description of Iapon, with some of their strange Customes.

THE Iesuits haue not more fixed the eyes of the World vpon them in the Westerne parts, then they haue fixed their owne eyes on the Easterne: heere seeking to repaire, with their vntempered Morter, the ruines of their Falling Babylon; there laying a new foundation of their after-hopes: heere, by their Politike Mysteries and Mysticall Policies, endeuouring to recouer; there, by new Conquests to make supply to their losses: heere, for busie intruding into affaires of State, suspected by their owne, hated by their Aduersaries; there, by seeming to neglect Greatnesse, and to contemne Riches, of the mightiest are not feared, whiles Others beleeue, obserue, and admire them. Both heere and there they spare not to [a] compasse Sea and Land, to winne Proselytes; euery of their Residences or Colledges, being as so many Forts to establish this new Romane Monarchie, but with vnlike aduantage, encountring there with Reason (or rather with the carkasse of Reason) attended with Ignorance, and Superstition, whose Owlish eyes cannot endure the enterview of Truth, though darkened with those Cloudes, wherewith they ouer-cast it: Heere, with Truth, yea, the Soule of Truth, true Religion; whose Shield of Faith, and Sword of the Spirit, these (the stronger part of the strongest Gate of Hell) cannot prenaile against. A Spanish Faction of Spanish humour and successe, more easily conquering a World of the naked Americans, and effeminate Indians, then keeping all they had in Europe. Such are the armes of the one, and the preaching of the other. Yet would I faine be thankful to the one and the other, [b] the first for furthering Geographie with knowledge of a new World; the other, for making a possibility of a better World to some, whereas otherwise there was a generall desperation of all.

[a] Mat. 23. 15.

[b] Benefit by the Spaniard and Iesuite.

Neyther are the wounds of Popish Superstition so absolutely mortall, as the Ethnike Atheisme [c]; the [d] one hauing no foundation at all; the other shewing the true foundation: although their Babyloniſh slime euen heere supply the roome of better morter, besides their stubble, hay and wood built vpon it. Better a mixed truth, then a totall errour: and a maymed Christ, then none at all. But howsoeuer they bee beholden to them for their Diuinitie, it were inhumanitie in vs, not to acknowledge a beholdingnesse to them, for that they giue vs the knowledge of many peoples, although in all their Discourses this caution is necessary, not to yeeld them a Catholike and vniuersall credit, where we any way may spie them dawbing the wals of their pretended Catholike Church. In relating their Miracles, and such like, we will remember they are Iesuits: in other things not seruiceable to Rome, we will heare them as Trauellers; when lying doth not aduantage them, nor hurt vs. But as the labours of the Iesuites may euery where breed shame to our negligence in a better quarrell: so in Iapon it is most of all admirable, that the furthest part of the World should be so neere to their industry. And that you at last may bee acquainted with Iapon, wee will borrow of them to pay your hopes, by this long introduction suspended.

[d] Of the wants of their Conuersions, see T. a Iesuite: and the Epistles of Xauier, Baptista, Montanus, &c.

Maffæus (who hath translated and set forth more then thirty of those Iaponian Epistles) in the twelfth Booke of his Indian History, doth thus describe it. Besides other lesse, three principall Ilands beare the name of Iapon; which the [d] first and greatest more particularly challengeth, and contayneth in it three and fifty Kingdomes or Principalities, the chiefe City whereof is Meaco: The second is Ximum, diuided into nine Signiories: The third, Xicoc, quartered into foure Lordships, so that there are in all of this Iaponian Dominion, three score and sixe Shires, or pettie Kingdomes. The space of Land is measured two hundred leagues in length, in bredth some-where ten, in other places thirtie, betweene the thirty and thirtie eight degrees of Latitude: Eastward from China. (Our Countrey-man William Adams [e] which now liues there, and hath done these many yeeres, and therefore hath better meanes to know the truth; placeth it from the 35. to the 48. degree of Northerly latitude: the length East and by North, and West and by South, for so it lyeth, is two hundred and twenty English leagues that way, and South and North two hundred and three score lea-almost square.) The soyle is not very fertile, subiect to much Snow, the ayre wholsome. The bowels of the earth are stored with diuers Mettals; the Trees are fruitfull, and one c wonderfull, in that it abhorreth moysture, and if happely it bee moystened, it shrinketh and becommeth withered; which they remedie by plucking it vp by the rootes, and after it is dryed in the Sunne, to set it in drie sand; if a bough bee broken off and nayled on againe, it groweth.

c A strange Tree.

They haue two high Mountaynes, one of which casteth foorth flames, and in the toppe thereof the Diuell vseth to shew himselfe in a bright Cloud to some, that (by long fasting) haue prepared themselues to this sight: the other, called Figeniana, is by some leagues higher then the Cloudes.

They much esteeme a tall personableneese: they plucke off the haires on their head (Children before; the common people halfe way; the Nobilitie almost all) leauing but a little growing behind, which growes long and is tyed vp on knots, to touch which, were to offer great indignitie to a man.

They can endure much hardship: an Infant new-borne in the coldest of Winter, is presently carried to the Riuer to bee washed: their education is hard; yet are they neate: they vse forkes (as the Chinois) or stickes, not touching the meat with their fingers, and therefore need no Naperie: they sit on Carpets, and enter the roomes vnshod, their Tables are a hand high, some eighteene inches square, curiously wrought, to each Guest one, and changed at euery new seruice or change of meat.

Frois saith (speaking of Feasts) they haue three of them at the beginning of the Feast set before each guest with diuers gilded Dishes in each of them, and as many at the end: And in greater solemnities more.

They vse d much the powder of a certaine Herbe called Chia, of which they put as much as a Walnut-shell may containe, into a dish of Porcelane, and drinke it with hot water. At the departure of Friends they will shew all their most precious Houshold furniture, the best whereof they employ about the heating water, or other vses for this Herbe, which is of precious account with them.

The women in Iapon which wanted meanes to bring vp their Children, with inhumaine butcherie did depriue them, being new-borne, of that life, which not long before they had communicated to them. Their Houses are most of wood, because of often Earthquakes: and some of stone. Temples and Monasteries they haue for both Sexes; and more had, till Nubunanga destroyed them. Their Language is one, and yet exceedingly diuersified, according as they differ in State or Sexe: or as they speake in praise or dispraise, vsing a diuers Idiom.

Mel Nunnes.

They vse Characters in writing and Printing, as in China. Their Swords are of a most excellent temper. Their Customes differ in many things from other men. e Blacke is a festiuall colour, White a funerall: their meates, drinkes, perfumes, are as dissonant to ours. Their Teeth are coloured with blacke, as beauties liuery borrowed of Art, which wee by Art would auoyd. They mount on the right side of the Horse. They sit (as we rise) to entertaine a friend. They giue to the sicke persons, salt things, sharpe and raw: they vse Pills, neuer let blood: we contrary (as in other rites) either to other ridiculous.

e Customes in things indifferent are comely or vncomely, pro more loci.

All their Nobles are called Toni: amongst whom are diuers degrees: all of them holding their all in capite, to finde so many Souldiers to the warres, at their owne costs. Generally the whole Nation is wittie: pouertie is a disgrace to no man, Reproches, Thefts, Periuries, Dice-play are hatefull: very ambitious they are in all things, respectiue to their credite, full of courtesie each to other, neuer brawling, no not at home with their households. The inconstancie of that State learneth them by vse to prepare for, and to welcome euery State.

They are exceedingly subtill, hypocriticall and double-dealing: they are also of cruell disposition, not to their enemies alone, but sometimes will assay the goodnesse of their blade and strength of their arme, on some innocent body; and in case of distresse, they esteeme it a credit to preuent the sentence f of Law by bloody execution done on themselues, which they vsually doe in ripping vp their brests a-crosse, a seruant or friend attending to smite off his head: and if it bee a Man of any sort, his friends and followers in like manner with their owne hands plucke out their bowels to testifie their loue. The Gouernours haue absolute rule ouer their inferiours: yea, in euery priuate Family, the authoritie extendeth to life or death.

f Sometimes this is the sentence thus to kill themselues, or at least a mitigation of the sentence; so esteemed there, as with vs the beheading of great persons condemned to a death more ignominious.

The people (saith Adams) are exceeding courteous and valiant; they are gouerned in great Ciuilitie (no Land better) with seueritie of Iustice. They are very superstitious, and of diuers opinions.

§. 11.

The Voyages of some English to Iapan, and their abode there.

* W. Adams his strange voyage and aduentures.

THis our Countryman * went chiefe Pilot of a Fleet of Hollanders of fiue Saile, 1599. and wintred in the Magellan Straits from Aprill to September. Neere to the Ile of Saint Mary in seuen and thirtie degrees in the South-sea, the ship wherein hee was, and another of the Fleet lost their men in fight with the Indians. They sayled thence to Iapan, and sought the North-Cape (which is falsly placed in Maps) in thirtie degrees, but found it in 35. In his voyage from Saint Mary hither, they were foure moneths and two and twenty dayes, and then there were but sixe besides himselfe that could stand vpon their legs. They anchored neere Bonago: and two or three dayes after a Iesuit from Langasack came aboord them. The King of Bungo befriended them with house-roome, and refreshing for their sicke: but three of their company dyed the next day, and three after, onely eighteene were left. The Emperour sent fiue Galleis or Frigats for them, about fourescore leagues distance: and demanded of them many questions touching our Country, and the termes of Warre and Peace in which it stood with others. Then was he commanded to prison, and two dayes after conuented againe, and demanded the cause of his Voyage. The Iesuits and Portugals informed against them as robbers of all Nations, and vsed their best friends to their worst designements: so that euery day they looked to bee crossed (or crucified, which is there the vsuall death of malefactors.) But the Emperour answered, they had not hurt him: and after long imprisonment, he was suffered to returne to his Ship, and restitution of the goods (before seized on) commanded, but without effect because they were dispersed. They had fiftie thousand Rials

giuen them. This Citie was called Saca, two leagues and a halfe from Ozaca. From thence they were remoued to Quanto, an hundred and twentie leagues Eastward, neere to Eddo, where the Emperour resided. They could not obtaine leaue to goe where the Hollanders traded, but were allowed each man two pound of Rice a day, and eleuen or twelue Ducats a yeere. In processe of three or foure yeeres, the Emperour employed Adams in making him a Ship after the fashion of ours, which, * as he could, he did, which wan him fauour and a larger annuitie: Hee after built him another an hundred and twentie tunnes: and by this meanes, and acquainting him with some principles of Geometry, and the Mathematikes, grew in such fauour, that the Iesuits and Portugals (his quondam enemies) were now glad to vse him as a mediatour in their suits to the Emperour: Hee hath now giuen him a Lordship, with eightie or ninetie Husbandmen or Slaues, to serue him, a fauour neuer before done to any Stranger. He could neuer obtaine leaue to returne home to his wife: but the Emperour was contented he should write for a Dutch and English trade to be there established yeerly. They haue there (saith he) an Indies of money: a good attractiue to bring them thither. And thither since both Hollanders and English haue resorted. The first English ship that there arriued, was the Clowe, anno 1613. Generall Saris aduenturing from Bantam thither by the Moluccas, and after an intricate passage amongst Rockes and Ilands, (which he feared would haue inclosed him without possibilitie of Egresse) through an open Sea he arriued at last at Firando. He was well entertayned there by King Foyen and his Nephew the young King, who comming aboord, began their Complements of Salutation at the feet, putting off their shooes; and ioyning their hands, the right within the left, moued them to and fro before their knees. They were entertained with a banquet and musicke to their good content. No sooner were they gone, but multitudes of their Gentrie came aboord with their Presents; but to preuent danger they obtayned a Gardiano from the King. Daily they were oppressed with multitudes to gaze on the Ship and her beautifull Sterne: and some women seeing the Pictures of Venus and Cupid, hanging in the Generals Cabin, fell on their knees thereto, whispering (for they durst not openly professe it) that they were Christianos; and this Picture they tooke to bee that of Our Lady and Her Sonne: such a ridiculous Image (scarsly an Image) of truth is there in Images, called Lay-mens bookes, indeed [a] Doctrines of vanity, and [b] Teachers of lies: whence it is an easie discent to [c] Yee worshippe yee know not what. After that the King came aboord againe with his Women, which there sang and played on Instruments, obseruing time, and that by booke, as it was pricked, but with harsh musicke to English eares. Hee gaue him the choyse of diuers houses to hire for his abode: but little sale might be made, the people not daring to trade till the Emperours License was obtayned. Sixe weekes he stayed here expecting the comming of Master Adams before named, with whom he after passed to the Court eight hundred miles further. First, from this Iland by water to Ozaca, thence to Surunga or Sorungo, where the old Emperour resides. He was well prouided of necessaries for his Water-passage by the King of Firando, and for his Land-iourney also, with Men and a Palankine for Himselfe, and a spare Horse, and one and twenty other horses for his men, taken vp (as with vs Post-horses) by the way. The third day after they were come to Sorungo, they were admitted to the Emperours presence in his Castle, where they ascended on certaine stayres, and came to a matted roome, in which they sate a while on the matts (after the Easterne fashion) wayting the comming of the Emperour, to whom they were anon admitted, and deliuered His Maiesties Letter vnto Him, which He tooke and layd vpon his head, and with promise of speedy dispatch, willed them to repaire to their lodging after their tedious journey. Thence they went to Edoo where the Prince keepes his Court, and found honourable entertainment. Surungo is as bigge as London with the Suburbes, but Edoo is both a greater and fairer Citie, all, or most of the Nobilitie, hauing there their faire Houses, gilded, and making a gallant shew. The old Emperour wisely makes way to his Sonnes succession, almost putting him into present possession of the State, by the greater Court and Pompe heere, then at Surunga. The Princes Secretary is Father (and therefore of greater experience) to the Secretary of the Emperour. The Prince is aboue fortie yeeres old. He returned to Surunga, and had Articles of Trade granted (which the Secretary aduised they should propound as briefely as might be, the Iaponians affecting breuitie.) These * I haue seene in the Iaponian Character, seeming to differ from that of the Chinois in forme, but like for paper, and manner of writing with pensils (taking the Inke from a stone whereon it is mixed with water) the lines downewards, multiplyed from the right hand to the left; sealed with a redde print of Inke, and not with Waxe. Some say the Iaponians haue letters; Captaine Saris brought diuers of their bookes, which seeme rather to be Characters then Letters as farre as I can guesse, vnlike to the Chinois, yet with like art of Printing, the Pictures in their bookes not comparable to the Art in ours. He heard that they had but twenty Characters, which must be vnderstood of Letters: for Characters standing for entire words cannot easily be numbred, as in China we haue obserued.

* He was no Shipwright.

* I haue published the forme of them in Captaine Saris his Voyage, *tom.*1.*l.*4.*c.*1. The Iaponian Alphabet of 20. the Malayan (which Ca. Saris could speake) of 24. Letters.

This trade still continueth. See Prings voyage &c. in my Voyages.

Being returned (after the view of Meaco) to Firando, He there setled a Factorie of English Merchandise, leauing Master Cockes with some others of our Nation there in Trade, Himselfe returning from Bantam. Since this, some Intelligence hath beene receiued from Master Cockes, as wee shall obserue in due place : and others haue beene employed in this Iaponian Trade: whither the Chinois resort with many Iunkes, notwithstanding their mutuall hatred, the Iaponian ready to kill that Man which shall call him a Chinese, and the Chinois so hating all Trade with Strangers, that themselues heere reported, that fiue thousand had lately beene slaine by the King therefore, and the Officers put out of their places; the new Officers neuertheless for bribes permitting These this Egresse. And this may serue by the way to answer such [a] as will by no meanes beleeue that the Iesuites haue set foot in China, because the Chinois dare not for any summe carry a Stranger thither, and protest that none are admitted, no nor any Iesuites there seene. For all this I easily beleeue ; the Iesuites also acknowledge; and therefore in many yeeres (euen after the Mart was permitted in Canton to the Portugals) could not bee admitted, till great importunitie after many many repulses on the one side, and on the other side bribes, preuayled ; especially for These, as not seeming dangerous, so few in number, so sacred in profession, so farre in habitation, so Admirable for Arts, so liberall in the Giuing Art, (which goes beyond all the Seuen Liberall) and at last, after many yeeres pressing with Presents vnto the King Himselfe, and those so acceptable as in that Story is mentioned. The Chinois at Bantam knew it not , and no maruell : for these were Merchants neere the Coast, from which the Iesuites had their Residences very remote: Their China fashion of keeping much within ; going abroad with their faces couered with Vailes, Fannes, and chayre Curtaines; and so few in such a Sea of people, might easily escape their sight. Somewhat that [b] before by vs related, more the Iesuites owne Histories, can cleere this point, which I heere mention, because diuers in speech and writing so confidently affirme that none of the Iesuites are or haue beene in China : when as yet in so many forreine Ports they meet with China-Merchants, all trading on perill of their liues, if briberie preuented not seueritie. But I will not kindle that fire of contention in these Relations, which betweene those Nations so easily flameth, the Chinois and Iaponians. The Emperour sent his Letter to his Maiestie of Great Britaine, as did also the King of Firando, with promise of much kindnesse to His Subiects : which with many other Rarities of this and the rest of Captayne Saris his Voyage and Actions in the Red-sea, at Bantam, the Moluccas and other Places, I haue in my bookes of Voyages now published, to which, and other Iaponian voyages there added I referre the more Studious.

§. III.

Of the Gouernment and Courage of the Iaponers.

WEe haue heard that in the Empire of Iapon are sixtie sixe Signiories or petty Kingdomes, all subiect to one Monarch. Touching their ancient Kings wee can say little: but as it seemes in these last eight hundred yeeres, They haue had much Ciuill warre, each labouring to make Himselfe Lord of as much as he could. The three last haue beene the greatest which Iapon in many ages hath seene : The first of these was Nabunanga a great Tyrant, a greater was Quabacondono his Successour, both in Tyrannie and Empire, who from a Cutter of wood climbed to the Imperiall Soueraignitie. Hee had a Nephew, whom Hee caused to be made Quabacondono, contenting Himselfe with the Title of Taicosama; but growing in jealousie of this Rising Sunne, soone brought Him to a Set, enforcing Him to crosse or kill Himselfe with other of his Companions, after the Iaponian manner. Before his Death, hauing no Children but one Infant, He sent for Gieiaso Lord of eight Kingdomes, and committed to Him as Protector, the Administration of the Kingdome; adioyning as Counsellers, foure other great Princes, and fiue other of His owne Creatures, that these Decem-viri might rule the State in the Minority of his Sonne. For further securitie He tooke an Oath of these and all the Nobilitie, and married the Neece of Gieiaso to this young Emperour, being about two yeeres old. Hee also made marriages betwixt others of the Nobilitie, to hold them in concord. But these bonds were too weake : for soone after the Nine Counsellers or Gouernours brake out against Daifusama (so was Gieiaso now called) whom Taicosama had appointed chiefe of the Tenne : and this fire beeing smothered, kindled the second time into a greater flame, which brought all Iapan into combustion : wherein Daifusama being Conquerour, added many Kingdomes to his owne, and at last the Empire also, which was all this while entituled vpon Firoi, or Fireizama, or Findeorizama, the Sonne of Taicosama. Daifusama vsurping the Empire, changed his Title into Cubo. Captaine Saris calls him Ogoshasama : perhaps a later Title.

He holds more Kingdomes in his hand then any formerly: fifteene beſide thoſe that Taicoſama held: this being their policy to keepe ſome Signiories immediatly ſubiect, and make others Tributary. This Emperour fortified at Gieudo or Edoo in his Kingdome of Quanto, employing three hundred thouſand continually in his works from February to September: where now his Sonne reſides as apparant Heire to this Monarchy. Fireiſama, Sonne of Taicoſama, keepes at Ozaca: where by later Intelligence from Maſter Cockes, wee vnderſtand that there haue reſorted to him of Exiles, Male-contents and others, eighty or a hundred thouſand, againſt whom Ogoſhaſama gathered an Army of three hundred thouſand, the iſſue of which warre we haue not yet heard, but onely that Ozaca (a City as bigge as London within the wals) is burned. Ex Iap. 1606. 1607. Dec. 10. 1614.

All Iapon ſometime obeyed one Prince, called Vo, or Dairi, [a] who at length addicting himſelfe to his priuate delights, and putting off the burthen of ruling to his Officers, grew in contempt: and at laſt euery one ſeized on his owne Prouince, whereof you haue heard there are three ſcore and ſixe, leauing the Dairi a bare title, and a Heralds Kingdome, to giue termes of honour at his pleaſure, whence he rayſeth great reuenue, otherwiſe ſubiect (excepting his Title) as are all the reſt, to the Lord of Tenſa, (ſo they call the nobleſt Kingdome adioyning to Meaco.) This [b] Vo, or Dairi deſcendeth by ſucceſſion from the ancient Kings, out of which he is choſen, and is honoured as a God. He may not touch the ground with his foote, which if he doe, he is put by the place, neuer goeth out of his houſe, ſeldome is ſeene of the people. He ſitteth in his ſeat with a Bow and Arrowes on one hand of him, on the other a Dagger. If he ſhould kill any, or if hee ſhew himſelfe an enemy to peace, hee is depriued as well as if he had trodden on the ground. All great men haue their Factors with him to procure new Titles of honour, the only ſewell of his greatneſſe. The King of China giuing Royall Enſignes to Taicoſama, perſwaded him to depoſe and aboliſh the Dairi, which he liued not to effect. [a] Maffi. 2. [b] Coſ. Turrian.

They haue another generall Officer or chiefe Iuſtice, which denounceth war, and in peace, giueth ſentence on matters in controuerſie. But theſe are but the Inſtruments of the Lords of Tenſa, as are alſo the Bonzij. Theſe are their Religious, among whom one is ſupreme in caſes ſpirituall, by whom all their old Holies are ordered, and all new are confirmed or daſhed. The Tundi (which are as their Biſhops) are by Him conſecrated and confirmed, although their nomination be by Lay-patrons. He diſpenſeth with them in diuers Priuiledges and Immunities: he enioyeth great Reuenue and Soueraignty, and is aduanced hereto by money and kindred. The Tundi giue Prieſtly orders, & diſpenſe in ſmaller matters, as eating fleſh on daies prohibited. They are ſubiect in ſpirituall things to theſe, in ſecular affaires to their Kings and Ciuill Magiſtrates. Through their diuiſions and many wars they were much infeſted with Robbers and Pyrats, till Quabocondonus, in ſtead of ſo many Tyrants, erected One, and became vniuerſall Monarch of Iapon. Betweene him and the King of China hapned warres about the Kingdome of Coray, which the Iaponites left vpon his death; and the Chinois alſo, as caring for no more then they already had. Many of them ſtill are Pyrats, very much feared, and not ſuffered to land in any place. Captaine Dauis had experience of their daring ſpirits to his coſt; for hauing taken a ſhip of them, and not poſſeſſing himſelfe of their weapons, becauſe of their humble ſemblance, they watched opportunity, and ſlue him; and thought to haue taken their takers, and made themſelues Maſters of the Engliſh ſhip; hauing a watch-word or token for thoſe aboord their owne ſhip, to murther the Engliſh there. Dangerous had this Fray prooued, had not the murthering Peece, with almoſt a cleane riddance of them, cruelly decided the quarrell. Yet would they not deſire their liues, and pulled the Pikes of ſuch as had wounded them, thorow their bodies, to reuenge it with their Swords. Sir Ed. Michelborne.

This is generall to the Iaponians, call it fortitude or deſperatneſſe, or cruelty, or in ſome reſpects all of them. Quabacondono the Nephew of Taicoſama before mentioned, ſeemed to delight in bloud and butchery, and obſerued as an ordinary recreation, at ſet times to haue condemned perſons brought before him, in a place purpoſely incloſed and framed to this inhumanity; in the midſt of which was a faire Table, and thereon thoſe wretches were ſet in what poſture he pleaſed, ſo to try his arme, art, and blade in this beaſtly caruing of humane bodies: ſometimes alſo ſetting them for markes to his Peece or Arrowes; ſometimes exenterating women, to open and curiouſly to ſearch the cloſeſt Cabinets of Nature; alway prouoking vengeance to repay him in his owne Coyne. For old Taicoſama hauing a young child, of his owne bodie, ſtudied how to remoue this Quabacondono. It is a cuſtome in Iapon that the Fatherr growing old, reſigne their Signiories to the Sonne or Heire: The Lords of Tenſa (which title includes the Iaponian Empire) adde another ceremony, to viſit that Sonne now in poſſeſſion, ſo to acknowledge a kind of ſubiection, all the Lords in the Empire doing the like, in publike ſolemnity. This time was appointed, and Quabacondono prouided all variety of cheere for entertainment, a thousand choyce Wayters to attend, and thirteene thousand of their Iaponian Tables, little bigger then our Trenchers: but all was disappointed by Taicosamas iealousie, refusing to come. After that, He picked quarrels with him, and caused Him to goe to the [c] Monastery of Coia, (a receptacle for Exiles.) Quabacondono in this distresse shaued his hinder-locke and beard, changing his name to Doi. The Bonzij gaue Him entertainment at Coia (as to other Exiles) without any respect to his present Title, or late power. A few dayes after came a Mandate from Taicosama, that they should all plucke out their bowels after the Iaponian custome. First began an Honourable seruant, who, hauing cut himselfe open acrosse the brest, was by Quabacondono, (after reuerence done to him) beheaded, and then Others in order after the same manner: the fift was Quabacondono, whose head, after hee had ripped vp himselfe, was strooke off with the same Sword which hee had vsed before in his butcherly recreations. And lastly, he that had smitten off his head, committed execution vpon himselfe: the Bonzij presently burning all their bodies in the same place. One of this company was offered by Taicosama his liberty, which hee refused; chusing kindly to dye with him, who in life had vsed him kindly.

c Coia is a city consecrated to Combodassi a Bonzi the first author of their letters. Many Bonzij attend his Holies, and the Princes are all there buried, or a tooth of them at the least. P. Bert. tab. Aug. 15. 1595.

The like executions followed in others, one of which was the mightiest Lord in Tensa, who being slaine, his Son but 16. yeeres old, had his life offered: but sending word to Taicosama, he could not liue without reuenge of his Fathers death, went presently to a Temple in Meaco, and before the Idoll Fotoco disembowelled himselfe. Of all Quabacondonos wiues and their followers, one and thirty chiefe women, and three of his children little Infants, were carried in Carts to the place of execution, where the Executioner presently presents them with Quabacondonos head, that death might first enter at their eyes, which by a bloudy hand soone possessed all the other members: Their bodies were all laid in one Graue, ouer which Taicosama raysed a Temple with Inscription; The Temple of Trayters. After other wiues and children of the other Nobles executed, hee demolished to the ground the Palace which Quabacondono had built, with the City by him founded, consisting of little other then three hundred Noblemens Houses: this being the Iaponian policy, vnder shew of attendance, to keepe the Grandes at the Court, so to bee secured of their persons and practices. I haue beene the longer in this Relation, to shew the Iaponian tyranny in this example: whereof it were easie to giue you many. The poorest, if sentence of Death bee determined on them, will (if they can haue knowledge and meanes) preuent it with this (accounted honourable kind of death) crossing themselues. And whensoeuer any man is executed, presently euery man rusheth in, and tryes his Catan or Sword on the body of the Dead, thus shred into gobbets, not a piece left bigger then a mans hand. This Captaine Saris saw done on a woman, and her two Paramours at Firando, whom shee had appointed to visit her; but one comming soonerand before the other was gone, they quarrelled (to draw a Sword in a Garrison Towne, and adultery [d] are both death) and they were all thus executed. The like for stealing, one for a little bagge of Rice, another for a piece of Lead not worth aboue sixe pence. Their doores stand open (so little doe they feare Theeues) and they make ordinary through-faires thorow other mens houses. Crucifying is common, the bodies still hanging, and putrifying by the high-wayes: their Crosses haue two crosse timbers fastned to the maine Post which is set into the ground, the one for the expansion of the hands, the other of the feet, with a shorter piece in the midst to beare vp the weight of the body. They bind them thereto, and runne a Launce into the right side of the crucified, sometimes two acrosse. Headding is vsuall, which in Solemnitie is thus performed: one goes before with a Mattocke, another followes with a shouell; a third with a boord or table contayning the crime, which also hee himselfe following next, holdeth in a sticke, to which is fastened a paper made like a Vane, the end whereof is in his hands tyed behind him, by which cord the Executioner leades him, on each side a Souldier with his Launce resting on him; at the dismall place without shew of feare hee sits downe, and holds out his head presently wiped off, others mangling him as is said.

d Yet is adultery common.

Crosses in Iapan.

Since Captaine Saris his returne, the King of Firando is dead, and three of his followers crossed themselues, their bodies were burned and enioyed the same Sepulchre with his. And the Mint-master a Great man with this olde Emperour, hath already promised thus to dye with Him. I could leade you from these Tragedies to their Comedies, which in Iapon are common, and that by common women, which are to bee hired of their Pandar or Owner for this, the Bed, or attendance at table to fill your drinke: but it is Note-worthy that the Pandar, being dead, is by a bridle made of Straw put in his mouth, drawne about the streets, and cast on a dung-hill or some open place to bee deuoured of Beasts or Fowles. This hinders not but these Hydras heads multiply. Sometimes Great Men at their Great Solemnities will themselues in person personate the Acts of their Ancestors: This Captaine Saris saw the King of Firando with the chiefe Men doe whiles hee was there, all the Towne and and Neighbour-hood sending their Presents, and comming to view the same, and not the meanest but admitted to meate in the Kings presence. I could from hence conduct you to the monstrous buildings raysed be Taicosama, employed night and day one hundred thousand men at worke. I could present you with the pompous entertainment of their great Solemnities, this being a tyrannicall policy to cause Gentry and Nobility of this stirring Nation thus to impouerish themselues with all possible brauery, that so their hands might bee too short for State-practices. But with remembring these things I should forget my principall scope: Let vs therefore take view of their Religion. Insana structura

§. IIII.

Of their Sects and Bonzian Colledges.

THey haue many Sects, some reckon them twelue; all truely agreeing, in disagreeing with truth: some of them Epicure-like denying Gods Prouidence, and the Soules Immortality. They hold that a man hath three soules, which one after another come into, and depart out of the body. Few of their Bonzij will openly teach this Doctrine, but labour to hold the people in awe. Amida and Xaca they preach, as Sauiours, and to bee worshipped. Some of their Sects [e] doe beleeue an eternall life, and promise it to all such as call vpon these supposed Deities, as Saints which sometime led so austere a life for the sins of Mankinde, that for a man to vexe his minde, or macerate his body for his owne sinnes, or to doe good workes, would not onely bee superstitious, but offensiue and derogatorie to their merits. [e] Itoxuand secta.

And here the kind-hearted Iesuite [f] is panged with a fit of Charity to yoke the Lutherans with them; as if the sufferings of Iesus were but the Superstitions of Amida, as if eyther the sufferings of man, imperfect, borrowed, dutie, could bee; or the sufferings of God could not bee meritorious; or as if the Lutherans denyed Christian contrition (whose affect is Indignation, [g] effect (selfe reuenge) as they doe Popish Confession and Satisfaction. These Gods they call Fotoques. Other Gods of a lesse mould, they call Camis, which haue their charges and peculiar Offices, for Health, Children, Riches, &c. as among the elder (that I trouble not the queasie stomackes of the later) Romanes. These were Kings and Noblemen, or Inuenters of Artes, of whom they they haue as true tales as Homer or the Legend yeeldeth. [f] Franc. Gasp. [g] 2. Cor. 7. 11.

Taicosama that dyed [h] a few yeeres since, (the first in which these many later ages took the title of a King, which, together with the Crowne, hee receiued of the King of China) ordayned before his death, that his body should not be burned after the wonted manner, but closed in a Chest, and, in a sumptuous Temple, for that purpose built, [i] his Image should be enshrined, and worshipped with the title of Scinfaciman, or new Faciman, the name of their Mars or Warlike God; which was also done. Hee had appointed by Will the forme of that Temple which should bee built vnto him, which by those Decem-viri was done. Captayne Saris saw it, hauing on each side fifty stone Pillars, very stately for matter, Arte, and scite, seated on a Hill. The people called him the principall Cam of their Cams at the first erection; his corps was there intombed, and his Statue erected for their Superstitious worships. Thus he, which in his youth had vsed to cut wood and carry it into the Market to sell for his daily sustinance for his valour promoted in Military Honours, at last became the greatest Monarch that Iapon had seene in eight hundred yeeres; and not contented with humane greatnesse, would aspire to that diuine, whereof hee himselfe had beene a derider in others. His name before was Faxiba, called after Quabacondonus; the highest title next to the Dairi, and signifieth the chiefe of the Treasure: next borrowing a Kingly stile from China, would (mad folly!) on his Death-bed bequeath God-head to a Man, and Immortalitie to a carkasse: when hee could no longer hold out his pride, cruelty, and other wicked courses, which made his presence dreadfull, his memory detestable. Nabunanga was his predecessor in his State and Impiety, arrogating diuine honour to himselfe, [k] but destroying the Temples of their Gods, together with the Temple-keepers, the Bonzij. This appeared at Frenoiama, a famous Vniuersitie of those Bonzij, nine miles from Meaco, wherein eight hundred yeeres past, a Iaponian King had erected three thousand and eight hundred Temples, with houses adioyning for the Bonzij: allowing to their maintenance the third part of the Reuenue of the Kingdome of Vomen. Hence proceeded their orders and gouernment in affaires both of State and Religion, being a Seminary of Lawes and Superstitions. But these Temples in time diminished to eight hundred, and the Bonzian Discipline as much em-

The Bonzij tooke part with Nechien, enemy of Nabunanga, who enraged hereat, made truce with the one, to deſtroy the other. The Bonzij not preuayling by their ſuing for peace, fortified themſelues for warre in the Temple of Quanon their God of health and long life, much frequented with Pilgrimes from all parts, much ſolemnized with their pompous Proceſſions (like in all parts, if yee beleeue the Ieſuite, to their Corpus Chriſti Solemnity) which grew the more famous, for that theſe were but the preamble to the like pompe in Gibon Feſtiuall at Meaco. But all preuayled not with Nabunanga, who deſtroyed both Temple and Prieſts with fire and ſword, burning foure hundred other Temples for company, in the yeere 1572. At Meaco he burned twenty of theſe Bonzian Cloyſters of the greater ſort, beſides foureſcore leſſe, and in one of them threeſcore Bonzian women or Nunnes, whoſe Deuotion was employed in begging for the reparation of the Temple of Daibud. Amongſt the reſt, as the Grecians had their Mercury with his Caduceus, ſo the Iaponians haue their Izus with his Trident, to conuey ſoules departed into their alloted eternall reſidences: The Bonzij his Chaplaines by lots enquired whither they ſhould remooue him; hee commanded it, and they with great ſolemnitie performed it, but out of a place, which then eſcaped, to another wherein, and wherewith he was burnt. Facuſangin was another Bonzian Academy, adorned with many Colledges, which he deſtroyed. Xuanguen the King of Caiuochun ſhaued his head and beard, and profeſſed himſelfe a Bonzi, and not only attyred himſelfe in their Habit, but thrice a day did performe their Superſtitions, hauing ſix hundred Bonzij to his followers. He writ to Nabunanga, intituling himſelfe the Patron of thoſe Religions: the other in his anſwere ſtiled himſelfe the Tamer of Deuils, and Enemy of Sects. But after that he would bee a God, ſoone did he ceaſe to be a man; the immortall God, hating Corriuals, by his owne ſubiects deſtroyed his life, riches, and memory. Theſe Bonzij are for the moſt part Gentlemen, whom their Parents (hauing many children) for want of mayntenance thruſt into Cloyſters; Shauen (as you haue heard) and Shauers, couetouſly pilling and polling the people of their money by many deuices, as by ſelling them Scroles to keepe them (by the Deuill) from hurt of Deuils after death: borrowing of money here, to repay with great intereſt in the future World; giuing the Creditor a Bill or Scroll of their hands for ſecurity: by telling of things ſtolne or loſt (which they doe by Inchantments, calling a Deuill into a child, who being ſo poſſeſſed, anſwereth their queſtions) by ſelling their bleſſings and curſes, like Balaam. Some by vow (the moſt) liue vnmarryed: as the Bonzian women.

Another Sect called Iamambuxos, before their admiſſion into that Order, liue two thouſand or more together on a high Mountayne, for the ſpace of threeſcore dayes macerating themſelues with ſelfe-inflicted penance; the Deuill in diuers ſhapes meane-while appearing to them. And after this they are receiued into that damnable Fellowſhip, diſtinguiſhed by white flockes hanging downe their neckes, curled haire, and blacke hats, and ſo wander from place to place, giuing notice of their comming by a little Bell. Another Sect, called Genguis, dwell on ſome high Hill, blacke of complexion, and (as is ſuppoſed) horned, marrie Wiues of their owne kindred, paſſe ouer great Riuers by the Deuils helpe, who on a certaine Hill, at times appointed, appeareth to them: of whom by the name of Amida he is worſhipped. In another Hill he was wont to appeare to his deuout followers, whom then hee would lead, as they thought, to Paradiſe, indeed to deſtruction. They ſay that a Sonne, not able to perſwade his Father from this paſſage to Paradiſe, ſecretly followed him with his Bow and Arrowes, and when the Deuill appeared, ſhot and wounded a Foxe, whom he followed by the bloud to a Lake wherein he found many dead mens bones. They haue another Vniuerſity in Iapon called Coia, whoſe Bonzian Students are of the Sect of Combendaxis, ſuppoſed the Inuenter of the Iaponian Letters. He in his old age digged a foure-ſquare Caue, into which hee conueyed himſelfe, affirming that hee then dyed not, but after ſome Millions of yeeres would returne in the dayes of one Mirozu, which then ſhould be a moſt worthy King in Iapon. About his Sepulchre burne many Lampes, ſent thither from diuers Nations, with opinion that ſuch as enrich that Monument, ſhall themſelues here be enriched, and in the other life by Combendaxis patronized. In the Colledges here liue ſixe thouſand of thoſe Shauelings: from whom women are reſtrayned vpon paine of death. At Fatonochaiti, the Bonzij trayned vp witty and proper youths in all trickes of ſubtlety and guile; acquainting them with Genealogies of Princes, that ſo they might counterfeit to bee the ſonnes of ſuch or ſuch great men, and borrowing money on that credit, might enrich their wicked Colledge: till the ſleight being found, they were killed of the Inhabitants.

Some hold Xacas booke in ſuch veneration, that without it they hold it impoſſible to bee ſaued. Other Bonzij haue beene in other ages in high reputation of holineſſe; but [e] one eſpecially, not a hundred yeeres ſince, the author of the ſect called Ikkos: the Ruler or Generall of which ſect is openly wicked, but ſo adored of the people, that if he but looke on them, they will ſalute him with teares of idy, praying him that all their ſinnes may bee pardoned, and therewith giue him no ſmall quantitie of their gold. His yeerly feſtiuall is ſo honoured with thronging of the people, that in the entrie of the Cloyſter many are trodden vnder foot, which yet is of the blinde people accounted a happineſſe, many willingly yeelding themſelues to be killed in that preſſe. And in the night, whiles his prayſes are ſung, there is a great howling and lamentation. Nequiron was author of the ſect Foquexan.

There is an Image or Coloſſus of Copper in the way from Ozaca to Sorungo, called Dabis, made hollow, ſitting vpon his heeles, of huge greatneſſe: and yeelding a great ſound if any hallow in the hollow thereof, as ſome of Captaine Saris his companie did. At Meaco he obſerued one Temple as great as the body of Paules weſtward from the Quire, with a ſtone roofe, borne vp on as high pillars. Hee ſaw an Idoll greater then the former, reaching vp to the top of the arch. That of Dabis was in their way to the pilgrimage of Teuchiadema, where Maſter Adams told him that hee had beene. There they euery moneth preſent the Deuill with a new Virgin, inſtructed by the Bonzij to aske him certayne queſtions, which he in humane ſhape appearing, anſwereth; hauing the carnall vſe of her body, if ſome Bonzi make not the Deuill Cuckold, as in our Egyptian Relations yee ſhall find of Tyrannus.

Some of their Bonzij profeſſe a militarie diſcipline, as the Knights of Malta. The profeſſion called Nougori was inſtituted by Cacubau (who is therefore deified) in which ſome intend their prayers, whiles others fight, and others performe their taske of making fiue arrowes a day. Their gouernment is an Anarchie; euery one obeying and commanding, the meaneſt perſon amongſt them hauing a Negatiue in all their conſultations: And nothing is agreed on till all be agreed. In the night they often kill one another without remorſe, and yet (ſuch is their Religion) this Sect holdeth it a ſinne to kill a flye or any liuing thing. Amongſt the Bonzij there [f] are two principall men, which if vnder their hand-writing they giue their teſtimoniall to other of their Orders, it is as conferring a Degree, yea a kinde of Canonization. For thence-forward they ſit in a chaire, and are adored, and appoint to other Students their taskes of meditation. One of theſe, puffed vp with vanitie and arrogance, profeſſed to know what he was before he was borne, and what ſhould become of him after death. Valentine Carualio [g] in relating the death of ſome principall Nobles, which withſtood Daifuſama the preſent Emperor, ſpeaks of a certaine Bonzi, which neuer ſtirres out of doores but vpon ſuch occaſions; who accompanied with many of his Sect, after other hallowing ceremonies did giue them a certaine booke to kiſſe, and laid it on their heads, wherein they repoſed much holineſſe, and worſhipped it as a god: but one of them, named Auguſtine, reiected him, crying out hee was a Chriſtian, and therewith tooke out a picture of Queene Catharine of Portugall, ſiſter to Charles the fifth, in which were alſo repreſented the holy Virgin, and our Lord, and with great reuerence laid it three times on his head, and ſo reſounding the names of Ieſus and Maria, was beheaded. This I mention to let you ſee the Iaponian Chriſtianitie. Some of the Bonzij are diligent Preachers, with great zeale and eloquence declaring the goodneſſe of their Amida, and exhortation to call vpon him.

§. V.

Of their Feaſts, their bloudie Pilgrimages and Confeſſions.

MEaco their chiefe Citie is chiefe alſo in ſuperſtitions, hauing had (if report lye not) on the Hill neere to it ſeuen thouſand Cloyſters or Abbies: one of which is ſo famous, that the Kings in their Warres will vow great ſummes of gold, and after victorie pay the ſame there: the people alſo in diſtreſſe make it their ſanctuarie, where the Deuill by viſions deludeth them. In Auguſt they celebrate the Feaſt of Gibon with Pageants: fifteene or ſixteene Chariots couered with ſilke, goe before, in them are children with Minſtralſie. Euery Chariot is drawne with thirtie or fortie men, and followed by their peculiar Companies or Trades: and after them Chariots of men armed, which all paſſe by the Temple in the morning. In the euening, two Litters come forth, carried by men; the one of the God, the other of his Lemman; then followed the third of his Wife, with with which the men runne vp and downe in such a confused manner, as may signifie her iealousie. Here the people weepe and pray to their goddesse, whom yet with a contrary deuotion they comfort: and lastly, (as if by the peoples mediation) the Litters are ioyned together, and carried into the Temple. In the same moneth they haue their feast of All-soules, in which they light many lamps at their doores, and all night walke vp and downe the Citie: and many suppose at a certaine place they meet with the walking ghosts of their deceased friends, and after welcomming ceremonies, they set victuals h before them, at least in that place, where hauing a little attended, they inuite them to their houses. The reason of this refreshing they alleage the long iourney to Paradise, which in lesse then three yeeres space cannot be passed, and therefore they haue neede of heartning. Two dayes this feast lasteth, in which they cleanse their graues, and giue presents to the Bonzij. In March they haue festiuall Playes, in which many meet in the afternoone painted with the Images of their gods on their shoulders: and parting themselues into two rankes, the boyes beginne with stones, the men continue the fray with arrowes, poles, and swords, alwayes with the death of some, and impunitie of the doers. The fourth moneth is a kind of Lent, or deuouter season, in which euery day in the weeke the Bonzij preach twice or thrice a day in the prayses of Xaca.

h Baites in the iourney to Paradise.

Nic. Trigaut.

At Sacai in July they keepe the feast of Daimaogin, to whom many Temples are dedicated: in which the Idoll is carried with much pompe on horse-backe, followed first by the Bonzij, then the Nobilitie, after them certayne Witches, whom armed troupes of Souldiers follow. Then commeth the Litter of the God, all gilded, carried by twentie men, answering each other in certaine Hymnes; the people worshipping.

L. Frois.

They beleeue diuers Paradises, into each of which their peculiar gods carry their owne worshippers: And some make ouer-hastie iourneyes thither on this sort. Hee watcheth certayne dayes, and then out of a pulpit preacheth of the contempt of the world. Others betake them to be his companions, and some giue their almes. On the last day hee maketh an Oration to his fellowes, who all drinking wine goe into their ship, carrying a sithe to cut vp all the brambles in their way; and putting on their clothes, stuffe their sleeues with stones, and hanging a great stone about their necks to helpe them the sooner to their Paradise, hurle themselues into the Sea. And great honour is done to them being thus dead. I saw one (saith Frois) that had seuen of his companions, which with their great alacritie, and my great amazement, did this. But they which worship Amida, obserue another rite. Being weary of liuing, they put themselues in a straight hole of the earth, receiuing breath onely by a reede, and so continue fasting and praying till death. Some in honour of a certayne Idoll, doe cast themselues downe from an high Tower, where this Idoll is placed, and after their death are reputed Saints. Others i saile to their Paradise (as before) but when they haue launched into the deepe, make holes in the ships keele for Death to enter, and the Sea to swallow both it and them. Diuers also crosse and disembowell themselues before their Idols; for with such sacrifices their gods are pleased.

k Ioseph. Acost. Histor. Indiæ, lib. 5. cap. 25.

Ioseph. Acosta k tells of a strange Confession, which is obserued in this order. There are (saith he) in Ocaca very high and steepe Rocks, which haue pikes or points on them aboue two hundred fadome high. One of which, higher and more terrible then the rest, daunteth and terrifieth the Xamabusis (which are certayne pilgrimes) to looke vp vnto it: vpon the top of the poine there is a great rod of Iron of three fadome long, placed there by a strange deuice: at the end of this rod is a ballance tyed, whereof the scales are so bigge, as a man may sit in one of them. And the Goquis (which be Deuils in humane shape) command those pilgrimes to enter therein, one after another, not leauing one of them. l Then with an Engine or Instrument, which mooueth by meanes of a wheele, they make this rod of Iron to hang in the aire; one of the Xamabusis being set in one of the scales, which (because there is no counterpoise in the other scale) presently hangeth downe, and the emptie one riseth to touch the rod aforesaid, whereupon the ballance hangeth. Then the Goquis telleth the poore pilgrime that hee must confesse all his sinnes, that hee can remember, with a lowd voyce, that all may heare: Which he presently doth, some of the hearers laughing, some sighing. At euery sinne mentioned, the other scale falls a little, till that hauing told all, it remaynes equall with the other, wherein the sorrowfull penitent sits. Then the Goquis turnes the wheele, and drawes the rod and ballance vnto him, and the pilgrime comes forth, and another enters till all haue passed. If any concealed any sinne, the emptie scale yeelded not: and if when hee was vrged to confesse, he grew obstinate, the Goquis cast him downe from the top, where in an instant he is broken in a thousand peeces. A Iaponian, who had seuen times made triall hereof, being conuerted to Christianitie, reported thus. But the terror was such (said hee) that few would conceale any thing. The place is hereof called Sangenitaqua, that is, the place of Confession. Thus much Acosta, whom I did thanke for the storie, so I would a little trouble (for hee would more patiently heare and beare, then some of his hotter brethren) with a question concerning Confession. And if the question come too late, yet the Societie liueth (and will longer then a better thing) in to a Colledge of whom Iapon hath brought vs, as their names here testifie.

[f] The question is, whether euery Residence of the Iesuites bee not a Sangenotocoro of Ocaca, that is, a place of Confession (so doth Sangenotocoro signifie) of which wee may exclaime ὦ κάκκη, and if you will ὦ κάκκη, the one for the cruell terrour wherewith it filleth the Conscience, and the latter for the fleshly filthinesse wherein Ocaca is not blamed: but their [a] Churches haue beene Stewes, and Confession the Bawde. But to let this passe, and consider the former. What Racke or Rocke can Ocaca yeeld like to this, which the [b] Councell of Trent hath framed, that full confession of all mortall sinnes (loe here the Racke) euen the very thoughts against the two last Commandements, with the circumstances of the sinnes, is necessarie by diuine ordinance vnto all which haue sinned after Baptisme; and (loe here the Rock) Anathema to the gainsayers. Tush, your coyne is not currant, although you yeeld it profitable, and comfortable, and satisfactorie to the offended Church, except you yeeld all necessarie, all diuine. Diuines shall [f] call you, or Goquis, Deuils in the flesh, that make a hell in the spirits of men: that with your debita præmeditatione, and with your omnia & singula peccata, etiam occulta, etiam circumstantias, circumuent poore Christians, and put them in an Ocacan ballance ouer hell-mouth, there to fall, without such fauour as to be broken in peeces. Goe Cardinall, and write [d] whole volumes for the proofe hereof, yet would I rather choose to enter the Sangenotocoro-scale; then your Confession-schoole. Easie it may bee indeede to seared Iesuiticall consciences, that account Treason Religion; yea pleasant and delightfull to such Statists, to haue Kings vpon the knees of their bodies, to powre out before them the secrets of their soules, and (they are wiser then Salomon [e] which esteemed it vnpossible) to search out the Kings heart: But to such as haue businesse enough to know and rule themselues, and doe indeed make conscience of euery dutie, what intolerable anguish is here prepared? when mans heart, besides that it is wicked and deceitfull aboue all, who can search it? is like an vntamed Heifer, who can rule it? Had I not need alway to haue a Priest at mine elbow, to whom to shriue me? [f] Who knoweth the errours of his life? and who knoweth when hee hath made his due premeditation, to examine them? This made Bellarmine vse the difficultie of Confession [g] as an argument of the diuine Institution thereof. It is so difficult (saith hee) that no power of Man or the Church could haue imposed it, and therefore it was diuine. I will not say, who instituted the ballance of Ocaca, and yet it was a hard thing, and neuer the like heard of? I say, that the Gospell imposeth not such hard things (this were to bring vs back to the Law) but prescribeth an [h] easie yoke, and a light burthen; easie to such as loue not their ease, light to such as like and delight in it. But this, euen to those that dote vpon it, and deuote themselues to it, is not onely hard, but altogether impossible. Witnesse Bellarmine himselfe, Quid enim molestius, quid oneroſius, quàm vt cogantur etiam viri principes, Regesq; potentissimi, sacerdotibus qui & ipſi homines sunt, peccata sua omnia detegere, quàmuis arcana, quammis turpia? &c. Witnesse experience in such [i] as haue tried it more neerely then Bellarmines Controuersies would giue him leisure, yet liuing in continuall disquietnesse, and torment of their Consciences, in the vse of their Sacrament of Confession, receiuing no rest day nor night, as seruing gods, who cannot giue it them. These are the wordes of Sheldon (happily brought out of that darknesse, wherein, and whereof hee was a Priest and Minister, to a cleerer light) who out of his owne knowledge addeth; That it is not imaginable what inconsolable liues, some, that are frequent in the vse of Confession (as necessarie to saluation) doe leade: there is no stonie heart which would not pitie them, knowing their torments. But lest any man thinke, that some Goquis hath hurled me out of the scale of my Historie, to fall and split my selfe vpon these Iesuiticall rocks, I will returne to our Narration of the Iaponites.

Of their Idols, Temples, Funerals.

I Haue mentioned too many of their Idols alreadie, Amida, Xaca, Facimau, and others: I might here adde their Idoll [*] Casunga, of whom they begge riches. A Iaponian 1611. found one of his Images by change, whereupon he promised to himselfe store of wealth, but soone after, all that hee had was seized on by the Gouernour; this caused him to cast this Idoll out of doore, and (as the Iesuites say) to become their Scholer. I might annexe Tamondea, Bosomondes, Homocondis, and Zoiolis: to which foure, their superstitious opinion committeth so many heauens in custodie; Canon and Xixi, the sonnes sonnes of Xaca, Maristenes, Tirgis, and others, would be too tedious to report. Organtinus a telleth. That whiles vpon a time the Feast of this last was solemnizing, a showre of stones rayned with such violence, that the companie, to the number of twentie thousand, betooke them to their heeles. But Amida is most worne in their lips; beggars asking and begging in his name: chapmen in buying and selling, sounding and singing it, the Bonzij promising salvation to all that inuoke it. Admirable are the Temples b for matter and workmanship erected to him; one neere to Meaco is an hundred and fortie elles in length, with a huge Image of Amida, hauing thirtie Images about it of Souldiers, besides Æthiopians and Deuils, yea Windes and Thunders figured, and a thousand Images of Canon (on each side of the Temple fiue hundred) all in like, but monstrous shape, with thirtie armes, two onely holding proportion to his body, the brest adorned with seuen faces; all the Images and other furniture so glittering with gold, that it dazeleth the beholders eyes. Almeida describeth a Temple of theirs in Meaco, called Cobucui, which had three Porches, with so many Cloysters, and other pieces of stately and costly workmanship. Two mightie Colosses or statues of Lions, were set as Porters at the doore. In the middest of the Temple were set Xaca and his sonnes about him. There were threescore and ten pillars of Cedar of such height, that (as the Register booke of the Temple testified) each of them cost fiue thousand ducats. These and the walls were painted, the roofe artificially framed: a hall for the Bonzij fortie elles long and twelue broad of like workmanship with the Temple: whereunto were annexed their chambers, an hundred and fourescore in number, a Librarie full stored with bookes; Bathes, Butteries, Kitchins, huge Caldrons an elle deepe, to heate their water for drinke, which they neuer drinke cold, neither in Summer nor Winter; Parlors foure and twentie, with lights burning in them all night. Before it, is a Fish-poole fiftie elles square, full of fish, which none may touch. It is sixe hundred yeeres since the foundation of this Temple. The pleasant and spacious walks before the Temple of Casunga, planted with lottie Cedars and Pines, watered with a goodly streame, arched with a double row of pillars, adorned with fiftie Lanternes on each side, of solid metall couered with gold, and curiously wrought, which burne all night; the large Monasterie of Bonzian Nunnes, which being aboue fiue and fortie yeeres old, deuote themselues to these holies; the Quire not to be entred by any but certaine Religious, which there sit in garments of silke: these with other like might tempt my pen to bee tedious. And so might the Temple of Fachiman in the same Groue, more costly and curious then the former, and another without it consecrate to Dai, which hath two giantly Porters of stone fourteene elles high, fourescore and eighteene pillars of wonderfull height, and three elles and a halfe in compasse: it was built seuen hundred yeeres since, and was twentie yeeres in building. A Tower or Steeple of wood is borne vp with thirtie pillars, in which did hang a brazen Bell, the mouth whereof was two elles, the compasse sixe, the depth three and a halfe, the thicknesse aboue thirteene inches. There are many Deere and Doues consecrated to the Temple, which goe into mens houses, no man touching them. Their walkes set with Orange Trees, and other their rarities of Art and Nature, they which would further learne, let them resort to Almeida our Author. One Temple is dedicated iust by, to a Lizard, (which they make Author and Patron of learning) without Altar or Image in it. Hee that readeth of the huge workes of Taicosama, holding sometime an hundred thousand workmen in labour at once, may present to his imagination the incredible buildings which those Tyrants by so many slauish hands, can raise. Their busie wits appeare by their curious questions to Iohn Fernandus, of the nature of the Soule, of Angels and Deuils, &c. and some of them c seeing the absurdities of the Bonzij, worship nothing at all. The Bonzij, as the Iesuites report, rayse slanderous rumours of them, to be eaters of mens flesh, and causes of the warres and plagues which their gods prouoked by this new Sect sent amongst them: they d slandered the new Conuerts as miserable Apostataes, which became Christians, because they would not be at the charges of their Idolatrie. The Iesuites e tell of a great woman possessed with a Deuill, which said that he was a Foxe, for some iniuries offered by the Maide, thus dealing with the Mistresse. There were in those parts store of Foxes, multiplyed by their superstition, not daring to hurt any notwithstanding their great harmes, because, forsooth, they were the Deuils instruments to punish them. Yet in this case the Wizard being consulted, counsayled to take a Foxe without hurting him, (which with a trap was done) and to giue him all kinde entertaynment with most delicate foode and vsage, so to pacifie the Good-wifes angrie Daemon, who yet (like a Deuill) with faire entreatie grew worse. Hereupon another famous Wizard was called, who writ a long scroll, binding himselfe in the Deuill-Foxes name to free the woman, subscribing with his bloud; which scroll hee hanged on the Foxes necke before taken: which being neatly trimmed and shauen by a Barber, and painted (as their women, being of pale complexion, vse) was let goe, and the Deuill intermitted his tortures awhile, but after reiterating the same. The womans husband husband cauſed all the Foxes thereabouts to bee ſlaine, for this perfidiouſneſſe: and a third Wizard cured the Miſtreſſe, by coniuring the Diuell into one of her Maides.

They are very curious and ambitious in ſetting foorth their Funerals; thus briefely: The friends * aſſemble in their beſt array to the fire: the women of his acquaintance goe forth in white raiment, with partie coloured veyles on their heads, and their Maidens attending: their chiefe women are carried in Beds, or Litters of Cedar. After them follow the Men in ſumptuous habite: next comes the chiefe Bonzius of his Sect in his Pontificalibus, carried in a coſtly Bed, attended with thirtie other Bonzij in their Linnen veſtments. Then one in Aſh-coloured garments (for that is alſo a mourning colour) with a long Torch lighted, ſheweth the Corpſe the way to the fire: followed with two hundred Bonzij ſinging to the Deitie which the dead had chiefely obſerued: others beate on a Baſon till they come at the fire: others carrie paper-baskets full of painted Flowers, which they ſhake out by the way, as a token that his ſoule is gone to Paradiſe. Eight Bonzij draw Banners on the ground, in which is written their Idols name: tenne Lanternes, with the ſame inſcription, are carried with lights burning. Two follow with Torches vnlighted, wherewith afterward they kindle the fire. Many come after in Aſh-coloured habite, with three-ſquare Caps on their heads, with the name alſo of their Diuell therein written, which name another beareth written in a Table with large letters of Gold. After all theſe (did you thinke you had loſt him?) comes the Corpſe ſitting in a Bed, in white, borne by foure men, his hands ioyned in a praying geſture. His Children are next, the eldeſt carrying a Torch to kindle the fire. Laſtly, comes the multitudes with ſuch Caps as wee ſpoke of. After an houres hallowing their Holies by all this multitude, and three times compaſſing about the incloſed ſquare place, in which (beſides tables for viands) the fire is made, the chiefe Bonzij in an vnknowne language mumbleth ouer an Hymne, and lighting a Torch, doth thrice brandiſh it about his head (thereby ſignifying that the ſoule is without beginning or end) and then caſts it away. Two of his Children take it vp, and after a triple ceremonie (the body being layd thereon) kindle therewith the wood: on which they hurle coſtly woods and Oyle, and ſo burne the carkaſſe to aſhes. Which done the Children, making incenſe, adore their Father, as now aſſumed to the heauenly ſocietie, and richly reward the Bonzij. Next day they returne and put the reliques of this Corpſe, aſhes and bones, into a gilded veſſell, which is hanged in the houſe, there to receiue like exequies, and afterwards with no leſſe ceremonie buried; euery ſeuenth day, and ſeuenth month, and ſeuenth yeere, his Children renuing their deuotions. The poorer ſpend herein two or three hundred, the rich as many thouſand Ducats. In the Obits of Great Perſons, the Lords and men of Ranke aſſemble themſelues, and are called euery man by name to doe honour to the Image of the deceaſed, with incenſe as in ſacrifices. After ſo much wickedneſſe of men, let vs adde ſomewhat of the admirable workes of God in Iapan.

Their Funerals

§. VII.

Of the ſtrange Earthquakes and Tempeſts in Iapan, with ſome other Obſeruations.

IN the a two and twentieth day of Iuly, in the yeere 1596. it rained Aſhes round about Meaco, couering the ground as if it had beene Snow. Soone after it rained both there and in other places, red ſand, and after that, as it had beene, womens haire. And not long after followed an Earthquake, that hurled downe Temples and Palaces (wherein Taicoſama had then newly employed night and day an hundred thouſand workemen, to his exceeding coſt, and their intollerable ſlauerie) which with their ruines deſtroyed thouſands: ſixe hundred gilded Images in the Temple of Ianzuſangue were caſt downe, and broken in pieces, as many remaining whole. It brought vp the Sea a great way vpon the maine Land, which is carried backe with it into the Sea, not leauing mention that there had beene Land. So was the Citie Ochinofama ſwallowed. Famaoqui, Ecuro, Fingo, Caſchianaro; the neighbour-Townes attended her in this new Voyage and became Sea. The Ships in the Hauen found no more ſecuritie, but were alſo deuoured. The like happened in the yeere of our Lord, 1586. to Nagaſama, a place frequented with Merchants, which the Sea before had enriched, then with an Earthquake deuoured, the Earth in many places opening ſuch wide mouthes, that a Caliuer-ſhot could ſcarce reach from the one ſide to the other, belching out of that yawning ſuch a ſtinke, as none were able to paſſe by. The Earth and Sea not onely ſhooke with feare, but bellowed out ſuch roaring cries vnder that blow of their Creators hands, as did make the accident more dreadfull. Yet was all ſoone forgotten, and Taicoſama fell to building of new Palaces.

Francis Fernandes writeth, that in the way from Malacca to Iapan they are encountred with great ſtormes, which they call Tuffons, that blow foure and twentie houres, beginning from the North to the Eaſt. and ſo about the Compaſſe: theſe happen in Iune and Iuly. It is there colde in Nouember, December, Ianuarie, and Februarie, becauſe of continuall North and North-weſt windes. Whiles Captayne Saris was there, a terrible Tuffon blew downe the houſes in Firando, turning them ouer with the fire in them; which muſt needs haue fired them, but for (as ſtrange an accident) ſo much Raine comming withall. A Bonzi pretended to haue beene told by their God or Deuill, that ſuch a Night their Towne ſhould bee burnt: this made ſuch Out-cries euery night, the Diuell ſtill proouing a lyar, that they could not ſleepe. That Tuffon ſunke diuers Iunkes, and did much harme to the Hollanders wharfe, bringing vp the Sea ſo terribly that it made the Earth to ſhake. And yet the yeere after worſe harme was related from Edoo by Maſter Cockes: this faire Citie all ouerflowne, and the people forced to flee into the Mountaynes: the waters taking poſſeſſion of thoſe gilded Houſes, and the windes carrying away all the Tiles of the Kings Palace ſtately builded in His new Fortreſſe, theſe Tiles all gilded, but now none to bee found. The Pagans aſcribe this to the Charmes of the Ieſuites lately baniſhed; the Chriſtian Iaponians, vnto that perſecution. Their women are as white as with vs: but not well coloured, which they ſupply with Art. There are women at Firando, which liue in their Boates, and take Fiſh by diuing in eight fathom deepe: their Eyes are red by this diuing, they eaſily this way knowne. They haue three ſorts of Siluer. It is with little coſt reduced to the Spaniſh puritie. Their houſes are floored with Mats, and they fringed with Silke, Gold or other ſtuffe. The Iapanders confirme and ſubſcribe their compacts and bonds with their Blood. Their Siluer is in bars, their Gold coyne in long forme.

Hee that liſteth further to bee acquainted with Iaponian affayres, may reſort to the Epiſtles of the Ieſuites, which beſides theſe I haue named are many: and of that ſocietie are not many leſſe then two hundred in this Iland, [a] which alſo is now become an Epiſcopall Sea. Some Cities are become wholly [b] Chriſtian, if wee beleeue the Ieſuites, abandoning all their Ethnike Paganiſme and Idolatrie: would God no leauen were mixed with their Chriſtianitie. Peter Martinez their firſt Biſhop tels of aboue twentie thouſand in a yeere conuerted to Chriſtian Religion: whereas in China they haue found ſmall ſucceſſe, notwithſtanding that they [c] there promiſed to themſelues a more plentifull harueſt then in any other Nation. The firſt of them was Xauier (one of Ignatius firſt companions, and like to haue beene canonized before him too) which dyed in China, 1552. and lyeth buried at Goa: of which Arias Blandonius, and the Ieſuites tell many ſtrange things. But the firſt finding of this Iland is by Galuanus aſcribed to Antonio Mota and his fellowes, 1542.

But before theſe M. Polo writeth of this Iland, which hee calleth [d] Xepangu, whither Cublai the great Tartarian Can, in the yeere 1264. ſent two Captaynes to conquer the Iland. The windes (as angry with the Tartarians, and taking part with the Ilanders) raiſed ſo ſtormie a Sea, that (when there were now thirtie thouſand of their Companie, landed in a little Iland) they were forced to put off to Sea, and ſcattered with tempeſts. The Ilanders ſet foorth a Nauie to take thoſe Tartarians, which ſo confuſedly ordered that enterprſe, that the Tartarians found meanes to make themſelues Maſters of their enemies Nauie, and therewith to ſayle away.

Marcus Paulus reporteth like things of their Idolatrous Religion, as you haue heard: of Idols with heads of Oxen, Hogges, and Dogges, and other deformed ſhapes: and ſome with many hands, as a teſtimonie of their great power. The enemies which they tooke in warre, not able to redeeme themſelues, hee ſaith they did eate in ſolemne Feaſts: hee addeth, that in the Iaponian language Mangi was called Cin; as now it is Cina or China.

I haue preſumed to adde a piece of a Letter of Quabacondonus to the Viceroy of India, which after other things, hath theſe words: Iapan is the Kingdome of Chamis, whom wee eſteeme to bee the ſame with Scin, which is the beginning of all things. This Scin is the ſubſtance and very being of all things: and all things are one and the ſame with Scin, and into Scin are reſolued, which in Scina is called Iutto; and in Teſcincu Buppo. In the obſeruation of the Lawes of this Chamis, conſiſteth all the politique gouernment of Iapan, both inward and outward, &c.

Betweene the Sects of Amida and Xaca happened a late grieuous quarrell. Anno 1609. Both Sects number great multitudes, and are ſaid in times paſt to haue numbred betwixt them three thouſand Colledges or Monaſteries in the Mountaynes not farre from Meaco. Their originall was from Sijenoyama a Towne in the ſaid Hilles: thoſe of the Amidan Sect were called Fandoxus, the other of Xaca Foquexus. Now it happened that one of

theſe Foquexus, tranſported with zeale, in a Sermon of his had rayled on Amida, and his Sectaries, which by one of them was ſoone anſwered: whereupon followed a challenge of Diſputation betwixt them, which came to the eares of Cubo, who followed Amida. Hee commanded that both of them ſhould come to Yendo, or Edoo, to trie the matter before Him: where the Foquexus feared the Emperour (the rather becauſe hee had ſhewed the bitterneſſe of his zeale againſt one of Cubos Sonnes, which, hee ſaid being lately dead, was now damned for being of Amidas Hereſie, and rode vp and downe all Iapan without reſt, appearing heere and there.) And now could hee ſpeake but halfe words, beeing ſurprized with his feare, a paſſion which is the betraying of the Succours that Reaſon offereth. Cubo commanded that hee ſhould bee ſtripped of his Bonzian habite in a publike Congregation by other Prieſts, together with his Companions, laden meane while with inſolent words and blowes. After this, they and eleuen more of their Sect (aboue twentie in all) were bound, and ledde vp and downe this Citie, and other the chiefe Cities of Iapan, in which before hee had Preached. Laſtly, all of them were carried backe to Miaco and Carted, the Preacher had his Eares and Noſe cut off, the reſt their * Noſes: and the matter taken vp by the King of Fingo which followed Xaca, obtayned this Concluſion, that all the Foquexus ſhould by their publike writing confeſſe, that the Founder of their Hereſie, which firſt taught the worſhippers of Amida to bee damned, was an Impoſtor, and that Xaca neuer had taught ſo.

Thus hath this Emperour dealt with the Iaponian Sects: nor is hee equall to the Ieſuites Chriſtianitie. For in Yendo (ſo the Ieſuites call that Imperiall Citie of the Prince, Ours Eddo and Edoo) Proclamation was made that None of the Nobles ſhould become Chriſtian. And many inferiour Kings perſecuted the ſame, ſpecially Michael an Apoſtata, the King of Arima, which had before vſed bad meanes to remoue his Father, ſo to become his vntimely Succeſſour. This his Father Iohn had a little before beene employed againſt the Portugals Ship of Macao. The reaſon was, ſome quarrels at Macao betwixt the Portugals and Iaponians, who being ſeuerely enquired into by the Portugall Magiſtrate, fledde home, and acquainted Cubo with the buſineſſe. Hereupon this ſhip arriuing in Iapan at Nangaſach, Hee ſent this King of Arima againſt them; in which fight the Portugall Ship long preuayling, by caſualtie was fired, and by themſelues caſting fire into the Gunners-roome, blowne vp, to the loſſe of a Million of goods. This Iohn vſing indirect meanes to obtaine part of the Kingdome of Fyen, his hopes increaſed by the marriage of the Emperours Neece to his Sonne Michael, notwithſtanding his former wife. The iſſue was, that whiles the Father entertayned one policie, the Sonne had two: the one for that Land of Fyen, the other to ſupplant His Father (who ſeemed to forget the Iaponian cuſtome, in their age to relinquiſh the Gouernment to the Sonne or Succeſſour.) This at laſt hee effected by his Fathers baniſhment firſt, and ſoone after his death, and now becomming of his wiues Religion, perſecuted the Chriſtians, and baniſhed the Ieſuites. Hee burnt or roaſted rather eight of his Subiects, after Saint Lawrence his example. And the Emperour himſelfe hath much diſtaſted the Ieſuites. The reaſon is not mentioned by the Ieſuites. But Captayne Saris then in Iapan, affirmes, that a Ship of the Portugals comming from Macao, Ogaſhaſama ſent to haue ſome rarities bought for his vſe: The Gouernour (I know not whether it were the King of Firando) moued the Ieſuites to effect the Emperours pleaſure; They ſaid they were Religious men, this belonged to the Captayne of the Ship. Hee being ſollicited, ſaid it belonged to the Maſter: the Maſter was asked, and anſwered, The Ieſuites ruled herein. Thus was the buſineſſe wound in a Circle, (they ſeeking it ſeemes to heighten the price) and the Gouernour to whom the Emperour had ſent, accuſed the Ieſuites as beeing vnder the Cloake of Religion, Merchants. Hereupon He cauſed their Temples to be pulled downe, and all remoued to Nangaſacke and prohibited any Maſſe-ſaying within fiue leagues of the Court: which whiles ſome preſumed in their zeale to tranſgreſſe, ſaying Maſſe in an Hoſpitall of Lepers within that Compaſſe, they were Crucified therefore. Captayn Saris in his journey to Sorunga met with ſome of their Churches thus taken downe, diuers Iunkes being laden with them. For ſuch is the Iaponian building with joynts in their Timber, and without nayles, that it may eaſily be remoued. The Reliques of theſe crucified perſons were reſerued as great Holies: as great Follies, I ſhould haue ſaid. And ſince, Maſter Cockes hath written that the Ieſuites are all baniſhed Iapan, and their Churches puld downe and burnt. The Ieſuites had ſome goodly Colledges, as at Meaco, one as large as the [a] Tower-Hill, whither the Children reſorted daily to their Schoole.

And before theſe dayes the Kings [b] of Bungo, Arima, and Omur ſent their Embaſſadours to the Pope (then Gregorie the thirteenth) with Letters of deuotion to his Holineſſe, and had audience in the Conſiſtorie the three and twentieth day of March Ann. 1585. This was the Ieſuites policie (ſaith * Linſchoten) to make the Iaponites to know the magnificence cence of Europe, and by that meanes principally to enrich themselues with Gifts and Priuiledges. Howsoeuer; the Iaponites thought themselues hereby much obliged to the Pope, as by the Letter of Don Sancio, the King or Lord of Omur, and Protasius of Arima to Pope Xistus 1590. appeareth. But for a farewell to these Iaponian Iesuites, I like their being there so well, that I could wish all of that societie were Preaching in that Iland, or acting the Scripture-stories vpon the Stage (which i is one way of instructing the Iaponites) or, if you like that rather, a whipping themselues in their vaine-glorious Processions (which is another of their Iaponian Lectures) that so they might in some measure expiate the crimes of their European brethren; or any way else, so that our Europe were well ridde of such vermine.

i Arias Sanctius Bap. Montanus.

Coray is a hundred leagues from Iapan by Sea, which is so troublesome, that in the fiue yeeres warres betweene the Iaponites and the Corayans, it swallowed aboue fiue hundred Ships. This Kingdome of Coray is an hundred leagues long, and threescore broad, tributary to China, and confining vpon the Tartars. They are good Archers, but not so good Souldiers as the Iaponians, nor so well weaponed; but better prouided of Ships. Taicosama warred vpon it, both to make it his way (as was thought) to China, and especially that hauing subdued it, he might place the Kings his vassals in Iaponia there, so to possesse all that Iaponian state immediately himselfe.

There are to the North of Iapan neere to Sassuma certaine plentifull Ilands called Liuquiu; the Portugals name them Sechies, which by the King of Sassumas indeuour Cubo hath conquered, the King, Nobles, and a rich bootie taken. Formosa is a great barren Iland, betwixt Macar and Iapan, not farre from China, to which it is tributary, betwixt whom and the Iapanders haue beene late quarrels. Lewis Frois speaketh of a great Nation of wilde people to the North of Iapan, three hundred leagues from Meaco, which are cloathed with Beasts skinnes, with great beards and mustachoes; a people giuen to Wine, valiant, dreadfull to the Iaponites: they worship the Heauen: and other Religion they haue not. Captayne Saris was told at Edoo of an Ile called Yedzo North-west from Iapan, by one which said hee had beene there twice; * that the people are hayrie as Monkeys, and that further North there were small people of little stature. These of Yedzo were as tall as the Iaponians, with whom they haue continuall traffique, hauing little apparell but from them. Of Corea hee was also told, that there are many bogges, for which cause they haue Waggons with broad wheeles, to keepe them from sinking, and obseruing the Monson or season of the wind (of which you haue heard how certaine it comes yeerely in all the East) they haue sayles fitted to those Waggons, and so make their Voyages on land. With such Waggons full of Souldiers Taicosama (as he was told) had intended to assaile China, but was preuented by One, which to poison him, poisoned himselfe.

Of the Philippina's.

§. I.

Of the Spanish Ilands, and others adioyning.

IT is already shewed, that those Ilands receiued this name of Philip the second, King of Spaine, and that this name sometime is in a large sense attributed to all these Ilands in those huge Seas, but more properly to those which Legaspi discouered, in the yeere 1564. and where the Spaniards haue since that time had some places of abode; Mendenao, Tendaya, Luzon, and their neighbours, lying farre into the Sea before Cauchinchina, and Cambaya, betwixt the seuenth degree and the twentieth of Northerly latitude: but first of all other Tendaia was called Philippina, by the Spaniards, which discouered it out of New-Spaine 1542. as Iuan Gaetan, one of them, testifieth. They are a many in number, some of them very great, rich in Rice, Honey, Fruits, Birds, Beasts, Fishes, Gold; and enriched further with trade from China. Seuentie of these Ilands are Subiects or friends to the Spaniards. Of ancient time they were subiect (as some say) to the Chinois, b vntill they did voluntarily relinquish them: the cause of much Ciuill warre amongst themselues, that Anarchie prouing worse to them then a Tyrannie, or rather the worst tyrannie, euery man becomming a Tyrant, and as hee had meanes meanes of wit, ſtrength, and followers, preying vpon others vſing or ſelling them for ſlaues: which their diuiſions made an eaſie way to the Spaniſh Conqueſt.

They worſhipped the Sunne and Moone, obſeruing in their honour ſolemne and ſumptuous Feaſts. In the Illocos they worſhipped the Deuill, and offered to him many Sacrifices in recompence of a great quantitie of Gold, which they ſaid he had giuen them. Their Feaſts and Sacrifices were done by women, which were Witches of them called Holgo) reuerenced amongſt them as Prieſts. Theſe had ordinary talke with the Deuill, and many times in publike. Theſe wrought ſtrange Witchcrafts; they anſwered vnto all Queſtions that were demanded of them: (although their Anſweres were often eyther Lyes or Riddles) they vſed Lots as the Chinois, and were obſeruers of times. If they beganne a Iourney, and met with a Lizard or other Worme, they would returne home, ſaying the Heauens prohibited their proceeding.

They haue now amongſt them many Preachers and Monaſteries of the Auguſtinians, Franciſcans, and Ieſuits. But the wicked life of the Spaniards is ſo offenſiue to the Inhabitants, that the Diſcourſer (himſelfe a Frier) telleth heere of a notable Story. [c] A certayne Ilander ſoone after his Baptiſme, died, and appeared after to many of his Countreymen, perſwading them to be baptized, as a way vnto that happineſſe; whereof hee now had in himſelfe moſt bleſſed experience; onely they muſt be baptized, and obſerue the Commandements; which the Spaniards preached to them; of whom, and of others like vnto them, there were in that happy place infinite numbers. Hereupon he vaniſhed and ſome were perſwaded: but others of them refuſed, ſaying, that ſeeing there were Spaniſh Souldiers in glory, they would not go thither, becauſe they would not bee in their company. A like Hiſtory Bartholom de las Caſas [d] relateth of a Weſterne Indian, at the time of his death anſwering to a Dominicke Frier, which counſelled him to dye a Chriſtian, and ſo to bee capable of Heauen (when hee heard there were Spaniards in Heauen) hee would rather bee in Hell with his Fore-fathers, then in Heauen with the Spaniards.

The Spaniards [e] haue their Biſhop and Archdeacon, and beſides other Religious, ſeuen Colledges of Ieſuits. Boterus [f] ſayth, That the King of Spaine had thought to haue made Manilla an Archbiſhopricke, and added three other Archbiſhoprickes. Captaine [g] Noort (a Dutchman that compaſſed the World) loſt a ſhip heere in fight with the Spaniards, and ſunke one of theirs: he affirmes, that the Conuerts of theſe parts are more Popiſhly Chriſtian, then in the midſt of Rome or Spaine, and more addicted to their Superſtitious follies.

In theſe Philippina's [h] ſome carue and cut their skinne, with ſundry ſtreakes and deuices all ouer their body. Moreouer, as we haue ſpoken of Bals wornem their yards, (or Bels rather, for they make a lowd ringing as they goe, if they wrap them not vp very cloſe) by the men of Pegu; ſo heere, the men, and men-children amongſt them haue nayles of Tin thruſt quite thorow the head of their priuy part, being ſplit in the lower end, and riueted, which is done when they be young, and the place groweth vp againe, without any great paine. They take it out, and put it in, as occaſion ſerueth. This here, as that in Pegu, is ſaid to haue beene practiſed to auoid the ſinne of Sodomy, whereto before they were prone. The Males alſo are (at leaſt in ſome [i] of the Philippina's) circumciſed. The people worſhip the Deuill, who oft times appeareth to them in conference, in moſt vgly and monſtrous ſhape. There is amongſt them an Iland of Negro's, inhabited with blacke people, almoſt as bigge as England, in nine degrees.

They vſe to let themſelues bloud with a certayne Hearbe layd to the member, and licked with the tongue: with which they can draw out all the bloud in their body. They are like the Cafers or Ethiopians, and are diuided into many Kingdomes, as [l] Nunnes writeth.

Migindinao, Mindanao, or Vendenao is a great Iland, contayning by Iuan Gaetans obſeruation, three hundred and foure ſcore leagues in compaſſe. It is inhabited of Moores and Gentiles: there are many Kings. In ſtead of bread they vſe Riçe and Sagu. There is Pepper, Ginger, and Gold ſingularly good. Tendaia enuironeth a hundred and ſixty leagues, from twelue to fifteene degrees of latitude; the people Idolatrous; abound with Pepper, Ginger, Gold, and Mynes.

When as Magellan, firſt of all men, [m] by the Weſt diſcouered theſe Eaſterne Ilands, in the Ilands of Buthoan and Caleghan, hee could learne no other Religion obſerued amongſt them, but that lifting vp their hands cloſed together, and their face towards Heauen, they called on their God by the name of Abba. In Zubut (in token of friendſhip) hee and the King did let themſelues bloud on the right arme, for ſo was their wont to confirme leagues of amity. The King had his skinne painted with a hot Iron Penſill: he and his people at Magellan's perſwaſion were baptized; and burned their Idols, which were made of hollow wood, with great faces and foure teeth, like Bores tuskes in their mouthes: painted they were all ouer, but had only a forepart, and nothing behind.

They weare in their yard a nayle of Gold. They had many wiues, but one principall.

n Maſ. Tranſil. uano. They [n] obſerued many Ceremonies in killing a Hogge, in Sacrifice, as it ſeemed, to the Sunne. After the ſounding of their Cymbals, and certaine Cates ſet downe in platters, two old women came forth with Trumpets or Pipes of Reed, and did reuerence to the Sunne, and then clothing themſelues with ſacred Veſtments, one of them put about her fore-head a haire-lace with two hornes, holding another heire-lace or skarfe in her hand, and ſo beganne to ſound, dance, and call vpon the Sunne, wherein ſhe is followed by the other, both of them in this manner dancing about the Hogge, which is there faſt tyed. The horned Beldame ſtill muttereth certaine words to the Sunne, and the other anſwereth her: then doth ſhee take a cup of wine, and after ſome Ceremonies powreth it on the Hogge: and after that with a Launce, after dances and flouriſhes, ſhe killeth the Hogge. All this while a little Torch is burning, which at laſt ſhe taketh into her mouth, and byteth it: and the other woman waſheth the Pipes with the Swines bloud, and with her finger embrewed with bloud, marketh the fore-head of her husband firſt, and then of the reſt. Then doe they vntire themſelues, and onely with women aſſociates, eate the cheare in the platters: and after ſindge the Hogge, and eat him. Without theſe Ceremonies they eat no Swines fleſh.

From hence Magellan went to Mathan, where in a battle with the Ilanders he was ſlaine.

In Pulaoan they keepe Cockes for the game, but eate not of their fleſh, forbidden by their Superſtitions. In Ciumbubon they found a tree, which had leaues like thoſe of the Mulbery, hauing beſides on each ſide of the leafe, as it were, two feete, with which (as if it had beene mouing and ſenſible) it would ſtirre and goe vp and downe. Pigafetta kept one eight dayes in a platter, and when he touched it, preſently it would flee from him, and moue vp and downe: he thought it liued of the ayre.

In Burneo the people are partly Moores, and partly Gentiles, and according to their Religions, haue two Kings and two Royall Cities, ſituated in Salt-water. The Moores when o Maſ. Tranſil. they kill a Hen or a Goat, vſe firſt certayne words to the Sunne. The Gentiles [o] worſhip the Sunne and Moone, eſteeming the one Male and the other Female, him the Father, this the Mother of the Stars, whom alſo they reckon in the catalogue of their Demi-gods. They ſalute the Sun in his morning-approach, with certaine Verſes and adoration: which they alſo performe to the Moone, and demand of them children, riches, and other their neceſſaries. After death they expect no future ſtate. The Spaniards heard of great Pearles as bigge as Egges, which the King of Burneo had: and if you beleeue them, they tooke an Oyſter themſelues, whoſe fiſhie-ſubſtance weighed ſeuen and fortie pounds. The Moore King in Burneo was ſerued in his Palace, and attended only by women and Maydens.

p Pigafetta. In Gilolo [p] they are likewiſe, ſome of the Arabian Sect, the others Gentiles. The Moores had two Kings of their Law, each of which had ſixe hundred children. The Gentiles vſed to

The Cloue-trees not onely sucke vp all the moysture of the Earth where they grow, disdayning any other plant should grow neere them (like our Inclosers) suddenly drinking vp all the Heauens liberality in showres, but with their thirsty appetite intercept the running waters that descend from the Mountaines, before they can betake them to their Mothers lap, the Oceans refuge. In this Iland [t] are said to bee men hauing anckles with spurres like to Cockes, heere are Hogges with hornes: a Riuer stored with fish, and yet so hot, that it flayeth off the skin of any creature which entereth it: Oysters so large, that they Christen in the shels: Crabs so strong, that with their clawes they will breake the Iron of a Pick-axe: stones which grow like fish, whereof they make Lime.

In [u] Ternate is a Mountayne, which (as it were) angry with Nature, for being fastned to the earth, doth not only lift vp his high head aboue the Ayrie Regions of clouds, but endeauoureth also to conioyne it selfe with the fiery Element, wherewith it seemeth to hold some entercourse, with dreadfull thunders, belching out light flames mixed with a darke smoke, like proud Greatnesse, wasting it selfe with it owne flames, and filling the neighbouring valley with ashes. It is not much aboue a hundred yeeres, since first the Sect of Mahumet entred the Moluccas. But now [x] both heere and in Amboino the Iesuits haue their Residences, and haue perswaded many to their Catholike Faith, and whipping Processions. Stephan ab Hagan in the yeere 1605. wanne this Iland of Amboino, and the Fort of the Portugals, to the States: it is a Cloue-Iland. In [z] Ternate theft is neuer suffered vnpunished: the Hollanders saw a Boy of eleuen or twelue yeeres, for stealing a leafe of Tobacco, led vp and downe with his hands bound behind him, for a publike spectacle and derision to other Boyes. They maintaine deadly warre with the Portugals, and spare none of them that they can get. that their King, or ſome great man amongſt them will dye. Experience thereof was the ſixt of Auguſt 1599. when the Moone was eclipſed about eight of the clocke at night, they euery way by crying out, by ſtrange geſtures, praying and beating their Baſons and Drummes, expreſſed a lamentable paſſion of griefe, for the feare aforeſaid. And the eclipſe being paſt, when they ſee that neither the King, nor any other is dead, they obſerue the next day ſolemnely feſtiuall with publike Proceſſion of old and young of all ſorts. They eſteemed it a Miracle when the Hollanders told them that there were in their Country which could prognoſticate of Eclipſes long before. Columbus [a] vſed the like ſimplicity of the Iamaicans to his preſeruation: for when they forſooke him, hee threatned vnto them the anger of God, whereof they ſhould ſee an euident token in the darkening of the Moone within two dayes, which according to the naturall reuolution of the Heauens (knowne to Columbus) comming to paſſe, the Ilanders with dread and feare ſhewed all readineſſe to his Seruice. The conceits of the Moones Eclipſe haue beene diuers, ſome Indians thinking that ſhee was whipped by the Sun till the bloud followed: the Greekes attributing the ſame to Theſſalian Charmes, for remedy whereof, they [b] vſed to beat on Inſtruments of Braſſe, and lighted Torches, and caſt fires vp towards Heauen. The water about Ternate is ſo cleere, that they fiſh by the eye, and can ſee the Anchors in the bottome of the water, at ſixteene or ſeuentéene fathome deepe, as if it were but a foote: and eſpy euery fiſh which paſſeth, to no ſmall aduantage of their fiſhing.

When the King goeth to the Meſquit, a Boy goeth before, which beareth his Sword on his ſhoulder, and in the other hand a Kid: after him follow the Kings Souldiers. After them another with a Cenſer. Next to whom commeth the King with a Tireſold ouer his head, to keepe off the Sunne. When they are come to the doores, there are veſſels of water to waſh their hands and feete, before they enter; and then the floore is couered with white cloth, whereon they proſtrate themſelues, with their faces to the earth, ſoftly mumbling their Mumpſimus-deuotions. In the middeſt is a Pulpit ſpread with white cloth. In ſtead of a Bell, they haue a great Drum hanged vp, which they beate with Clubs. They haue in euery Temple alſo one Bell, but without a clapper. All come at that peale, or ſound, with their weapons armed.

The Moluccians [c] are better proportioned then other Indians, haue more beard, (which the elder men nouriſh and weare long for their greater authority) browne of colour, and meane of ſtature. For valour they haue not their like in all India, eſpecially thoſe of Ternate, chuſing rather to dye then flee, and eſteeming it a great credit to fight againſt greater multitudes. Their ſhields are of wood two ſpans broad, and 4. foot long. They are exceedingly addicted to ſloth and eaſe, none working in any Handicraft; their houſes are of Timber and Reeds, without one nayle in them, which their ſlaues build, and doe alſo their other labours. They haue no money, and the ſiluer which they haue is employed to veſſels of plate. Their riches are their Cloues, wherewith they prouide them of other neceſſaries. They neuer ſee their wiues till they are married; nor the wiues them. Makian and Moher are now ſubiect to the King of Ternate; Tidore and Batian haue their peculiar Kings. This people haue the power to elect their King, ſo that they chooſe one of the Royall and ancient Family. The King of Ternate calleth himſelfe King of Gilolo, whereof hee hath but a part, and that by conqueſt. The birds of Paradiſe (ſaith this Authour) haue two feet as well as other Birds; but as ſoone as they are taken, they are cut off, with a great part of their body, whereof a little is left with the head and necke, which being hardned and dryed in the Sunne, ſeeme to be ſo bred. The Moores [d] made the Ilanders beleeue that they came out of Paradiſe, and therefore call them Manucodiata, or holy Birds, and haue them in religious account. They are very beautifull, with varietie of feathers and colours.

They haue Gallies [e] after their manner, formed like Dragons, which they row very ſwiftly: they call them Karkolleu. The Admirall came to the Hollanders with three of theſe, full of armed men, which rowed round about them, expreſſing manifold ſignes of ioy with Songs and Drummes; the ſlaues ſinging as they rowed. They had three Peeces of Ordnance in euery Galley, which they diſcharged, anſwered in that kinde by the Hollanders. But two of the Holland ſhips not finding ſufficient ſtore of Commodities for them all, went to Banda, paſſing by Poel Setto, an Iland not inhabited, bearing North-weſt from Banda fiue Dutch miles. Banda Banda is foure and twentie dutch miles from Amboyna, and diuided into three parts, which comprehend fiue miles. The chiefe Citie is Nera. In this Iland are more ſtore of Nutmegs then elſewhere in the Moluccas: for which cauſe they reſort hither from Iaua, China, and Malacca. They profeſſe Mahumetiſme ſo deuoutly, that they neuer goe to their watches before they haue prayed in the Meſquit, whereinto they enter, being firſt waſhed (after the Mahumetane manner) but pray ſo lowd, that they may bee heard a great diſtance: their wordes of prayer are Stofferolla, Stofferolla; Aſcehad an la, Aſcehad an la; Ylla, Aſcehad an la; Yll lolla, yll lolla, Mahumed die Roſulla: At the pronouncing of which laſt wordes, they ſtroke their hands ouer their face; in which geſture they thinke is much holineſſe. Other prayers they mutter ouer very ſoftly, with little moning their lips. They ſtand vpon Mats, and lift vp their eyes twice or thrice to heauen: after which they kneele downe, bowing their head twice or thrice to the earth. Thus they doe often euery day, both at home and in the ſtreets. They haue their publike meetings and bankets in their Temples very often, euery one bringing his part of the cheere: which ſometimes they doe in the woods a hundred in a companie. At theſe times they conſult of publike affaires.

They haue ciuill warres, Nera and Lantoor holding together againſt three other Townes. Two little Ilands, Pollerujn and Poelvunay take part with Nera, and when occaſion requireth, come thither with their boates to conſultation, where they are entertayned in publike feaſts: the manner whereof is, that they ſit downe in order; in ſtead of a table euery one hath a peece of a leafe of the Bonanas Tree: then is ſet before each a peece of Sagu bread, after that, a diſh made of the leafe of another Tree, with a little ſodden Rice and Fleſh-pottage, which they hurle by handfuls into their mouthes, deuouring rather then eating the ſame. In the meanewhile the Gentlemen ariſe with their weapons, and exerciſe themſelues in Martiall games, with Daunces. The quarrell betwixt theſe Ilanders grew about the cutting of certayne Trees, from whence it is come to cut and kill one another with cruell butcheries. They exerciſe Sea-fights in their Caracoræ, or Galeots, with great dexteritie, with great ſhowts and cryes, the Gentlemen dancing on the hatches very actiuely. They are very bloudie and barbarous, yet bury the heads of their enemies with ſweet odours. If any of their friends die, the women make a ſhrill and lowd crie to call him againe; which not effected, they prouide a great feaſt, whereunto all the kindred and friends are inuited. They burie them almoſt after our faſhion, in a white ſheet, the corps being carried on mens ſhoulders, the men firſt, and women after, following. A Cenſer is there left fuming all the day and night; and in the night they keepe a light burning in a little houſe, which they haue ſet ouer the graue. In the morning and euening all of all ſorts come and ſay their prayers a long while together at the graue: and being asked wherefore? they ſaid, that the dead ſhould not ariſe againe. They haue a play with the Ball, exerciſed by many of them, not as amongſt vs with the hand, but with their feete, toſſing the ſame vp into the ayre, and taking it one of another with admirable ſleight. Thus haue we related from Dutch teſtimonies.

Polerine or Poolaroon and Polaway.

In Banda the Hollanders are reported to haue foure Factories, and three Caſtles. They are farre more feared of the Natiues then loued. They rayſed a Fort neere to one of their Meſgids or Temples, to the prophanation (as they thought) of their holy ground, and of the Sepulchres of their dead, which for this cauſe they ſpared not. Hence did the Bandeſes burne with indignation, which yet they concealed, and with goodly proteſtations deſired the Dutch Generall Verhauf, which was there at that time with many ſhips, to come into their Houſe, or place of Councell. This was compaſſed with Trees and Buſhes, in the midſt hauing a faire round place, where they ſate vpon Mats, their chiefe Magiſtrate being the Sabandare. Verhauf promiſed to come, and when hee was by one of his Country-men, that had long continued there, admoniſhed of the trecherie of this people. Hee yet ſcorned to feare, and with ſome three hundred followers at the appointed houre marched thither. The Xeriff (one of Mahomets kindred, wearing, as note hereof, greene in his Turbant) which had before inuited him to this aſſembly, with all lowly ſemblance meetes him, tells that in ſuch armed troupes they ſhall not dare to ſpeake their mindes. He preſently commands his Souldiers to ſtay, tooke with him ſome two and fortie chiefe men, entred and ſate downe with the Bandeſe Senate, croſſe-legged, a Bandeſe and a Hollander together, and ſo through all the companie. At the watchword each Bandeſe ſtabbed his neighbour Dutch, and preſently the Generals head was ſmitten off, and carried out to his Souldiers, now buſie in playing, or altogether idle, their peeces lying on the ground: and in this caſe they were ſuddenly aſſaulted by an ambuſh, hidden there in the Thickets, and were in great danger to haue loſt their Fort. The Engliſh in their ſhips might ſee the fight. In another place the Hollanders turned one of their Meſgids into a Fort. The offended Bandeſes offered their ſeruices liberrie to diſpoſſeſſe them: they refuſed, till a Iauan Merchant (then there with his Iunke) offered his ten ſlaues aboard his Iunke to giue the onſet. Thus they wrote about three hundred, each man with a fire-fire-brand in one hand, and a creese in the other, aduentured on the shot, and soone fired the Fort ouer their heads, slaying euery man.

N. Bangam. These Ilands of Banda are subiect (as some, but vntruely, report) to the King of Botone, with whom one M. Richard Welding, an Englishman, was in great fauour. The king had a sonne which was mad, whom a certaine Italian vndertaking to cure, was sent to attend him in the other World, his patient dying vnder his hand. M. Welding had serued him in his warres, and gotten victories for him, and honour for himselfe and his Nation.

Martin Pring. It is reported, that lately neere to the Hollanders Fort in * Banda, there issued a great fire out of the Sea, which continued a good space, and was likely to haue fired the Hollanders Fort, the Natiues wayting for such oportunity, but by shifting of the winde it escaped. The Sea in that fired place was many many fathomes deeper then it had beene before. But our English haue since this was published, enioyed not only commerce but Forts and Dominion by voluntary subiection of the Bandaneses themselues; the cause of great warres twixt the Dutch and ours: the particulars whereof you may see at large in my Booke of Voyages.

* The more full relation of this Earthquake (so it was) see in my Voyages, l. 5. tom. 1. together with a description of these Ilands in Cap. Fitzherberts Letter. There also may you see diuers Letters of the Kings of Tidore, Ternate, Bantam, to His Maiestie, and three Surrenders to him of diuers of those Ilands: and the warres which the Banda businesse occasioned in the Indies betwixt the Dutch and Our Merchants, as their owne and ours haue related the same.

The Hollanders and the Spaniards are in continuall warres for these Molucca Ilands. They droue out the Portugals by force about ten yeeres since, but the Spaniards haue succeeded in the quarrell, which yet is managed on both parts, so as the Natiues haue the worst. For they both weare out the Country people in warres, which betweene Tidore and Ternate are ancient (by these bellowes kindled into continuall flames) that there are scarsly sufficient to gather their Cloues. Machian yeelds the most store: in the third yeere (which is most plentifull) about 1800. Bahars; on other yeeres almost eleuen hundred.

The Spaniards haue a Castle on Ternate, another on Tidore, in Gelolo also and Battachina two others, but the Hollanders haue three in Terenate, and as many in Tidore, one in Amboyna, one in Battachina, in Batchame one, in Botoone two Bulwarkes, in Mechame three, in Moutter one; besides their other Indian Forts, and all their Factories. They haue their wiues also to helpe man (if that name may bee giuen to women) their Fortresses in some places. Their Sea-force and Land-vices being added, make them dreadfull to the Spaniard, hatefull to the Indians, and for their insolence, distastefull to the * English, vnder pretence of I know not what conquest, stiffely denying, terribly threatning, disgracefully deprauing the English, vnder whose name they haue yet borne themselues in many places of the Indies, and with mayne force and violence binding the Natiues to their owne trade, and that at lower prices and harder conditions; which makes them loue the more liberall, though imperious and proud spirit of the Spaniard, more then that accounted sordid dealing of the Flemming, in the Moluccas and Banda Ilands.

Capt. Saris. Will. Keeling. W. Floris. W. Bangam. R. Cock. Martin Pring. M. Ball, &c.

Before we leaue these Moluccas and their dependant Ilands, we may conclude with a Tragedy, wherein blind superstition, and beastly cruelty, were principall Actors. When Menesius [k] was Gouernour of the Portugall Fort in Ternate, he kept a Sow, which some of the deuouter Mahumetans killed. He getting the chiefe Priest (accessorie to the fact) into the Castle, at his deliuerie made his face bee greased with Bacon by the Iaylor, which caused the people to offer abuse to some Portugals. Menesius in reuenge cut off the hands of two of them, the third had his hands bound behinde him, and was bayted with two dogges on the Sea-shores, which his implacable enemies transported him into like dogged humour (though he were not with Hecuba transformed into the shape:) insomuch, that fastening with his teeth on one of their eares, he held fast, till his strength fayling, hee sunke into the Sea with the Dogge, and was drowned.

[l] Od. Barbosa. In Celebes they [l] eate mans flesh. [m] The King of the Moluccas was wont to send condemned persons to Celebes, to be deuoured. Nicolaus Nunnes writeth, That Celebes is very large, and containeth many and great Ilands: the Soyle is exceeding fertile; the Inhabitants comely and tall, rather ruddie then blacke. They haue many Kings; which is cause of many contentions. Three of them were conuerted. Peter Mascarenia, in a Letter dated a thousand fiue hundred sixtie nine, speaketh of a King of Sion in Celebes, which was baptized, and his subiects therefore rebelled against him, one Towne onely except: and that hee and the King of Sanguim did take vp a Crosse on their owne shoulders, which the chiefe Men had before hewen of a faire piece of wood, and helped to erect the same; and then, with the multitude kneeling downe, worshipped it.

[m] Hak. tom. 3.

Southward of Celebes, is situated a litle Iland, where Sir Francis Drake graued his ship. This Iland is throughly growne with Woods; in which, euery night certayne fierie Flyes made such a light, as if euery Twigge or Tree had beene a burning Candle. Here they found Batts as bigge as Hennes, and plentie of Cray-fishes so great, that one vvould suffice foure men to their dinner: they digged themselues holes in the earth, like Conies.

At Macassar in this Iland is an English Factorie. In this Iland some are Moores, some Ethnikes. They enuenome their Arrow-heads (which are made of Fish-bones) with an incurable incurable poyſon. There are Prieſts, which conforme, or rather deforme themſelues, to the habit of women; nourſhing their haire on the head, and plucking it out of the face. They gild their teeth, and vſe broken, wanton, effeminate geſtures. They are called Becos, and marrie one another. For them to lye with a woman, is capitall, and puniſhed with burning in pitch. Theſe Men-Monſters, Women-Deuils, much hindered the Portugals Conuerſions.

§. III.

Of the Iauas, and other adioyning Ilands.

NOt farre from hence is Iaua: of which name, M. Paulus and Nich. de Conti, reckon two great Ilands; aſcribing to the one, two thouſand; and to the other, three thouſand miles in circuit. The leſſe is neere to the firme Land of the South Continent, where Beach, and ſome other Prouinces, are named by Paulus and Vertomannus, of Heathenish ſuperſtitions. The leſſe Iaua had, in the dayes of M. Paulus, eight Kingdomes; in ſixe of which, himſelfe had beene, which hee nameth Felech; wherein the rurall Inhabitants were Idolaters; the Citizens, Moores: the Idoll-worſhippers eate any fleſh whatſoeuer, of man, or beaſt, and obſerue all day what they firſt ſee in the morning. Baſma [a] the ſecond, acknowledged the Great Chams ſoueraignty, but payed him no tribute. Here were certayne Vnicornes, headed like Swine, footed like an Elephant, with one horne on their foreheads (with which they doe not hurt any, but to that end vſe certayne prickles that grow on their tongues:) They delight alſo in the myre, like Swine. Here are little Apes, much reſembling men in their countenance, which they vſed to preſerue with certayne Spices, hauing flayed off their skins, and left the haire growing in thoſe parts, where Nature couereth men to be hayrie, and ſell them to Merchants, to be carried ouer the World as the bodies of little men; happily the onely true Pygmies the world yeeldeth. In Samara, the third of thoſe Kingdomes, none of the North-ſtarres can bee ſeene. They are Man-eaters, and Idolaters; but not ſo brutiſh, as in Dragorian, the next Kingdome: where, if a man bee ſicke, his kinſmen conſult with their Sorcerers, who enquire of the Deuill, Whether he ſhall eſcape, or no? And if the anſwere bee Negatiue, they ſend for certayne men, ſpecially deſigned to that villanous myſterie, which ſtrangle him; and then they dreſſe and eate him amongſt the kindred, euen to the very marrow in his bones. For (ſay they) if any fleſh ſhould remayne, it would putrifie, and wormes would breede thereof, which after (for want of ſuſtenance) would periſh; whereby the ſoule of the dead partie would be much tormented. The bones they burie ſafely, that no beaſt ſhould touch them; ſuch dread haue they of beaſts and cruelcie, in a more then beaſtly crueltie, and ſuch a care to obſerue humanitie and pietie in a moſt impious inhumanitie. Lambri, the next Kingdome, hath in it ſome men with tayles, like Dogs, a ſpan long. The laſt is Fanfur, where they liue of bread made of pith of Trees, the wood whereof is heauie, and ſinketh to the bottome, if it be put in water, like Iron: and therefore they make Lances thereof, able to pierce Armour; for it is three fingers thicke betwixt the hollow and the barke.

[a] M. Paulus, lib. 3. Theſe ſeeme Rhinocerotes.

To let paſſe Pentan, Sondar, and other Idolatrous Ilands, and come to Iaua maior: This Countrey is very rich; but in times paſt, of moſt abominable cuſtome. Nic. Conti ſaith, That they feede on Cats, Rats, and other vermine, and were moſt vile murtherers, not ſticking to make triall of the good cutting or thruſt of their blades on the next body they met with; and that without puniſhment, yea (if the blow or thruſt were deliuered with fine force) with much commendation. Vertomannus [b] affirmeth of them, That ſome obſerue Idols, ſome the Sunne or Moone, others an Oxe, and many the firſt thing they meete in the morning; and ſome worſhip the Deuill. When men were old, and not able longer to worke, their children or parents carryed them into the Market, and ſold them to others, which did eate them. And the like they vſed with the younger ſort in any deſperate ſickneſſe, preuenting Nature with a violent death, and eſteeming their bellies fitter Sepulchres then the earth; accounting others fooles, which ſuffered the wormes to deuoure ſo pleaſant foode. For feare of theſe Man-eaters, they ſtayed not long there. It ſeemeth, that they haue much left their brutiſh cuſtomes; ſince, wonne to more ciuilitie, by trading of the Moores and Chriſtians, eſpecially ſuch as are of the Arabian law: although, as our owne Countrey-men report, which haue there liued, a mans life is valued to the murtherer at a ſmall ſumme of money. They are a prowd Nation. [c] If a man ſhould come in, where they are ſet on the ground after their manner, and ſhould ſit on a Cheſt, or high thing, it were as much as his life were worth. The [d] King of Bantam breaking promiſe with the Hollanders; when they obiected it, My tongue (he anſwered) is not of Bone.

When they are ſicke, [e] they vow vnto God, vpon their recouerie, a more honourable death, which they performe after their recouerie, by the murtherous hand of ſome other vpon them. They are [f] great Inchanters, and obſerue houres, and fitting minutes and moments of time, for compoſing their Blades and Armour, of which they are conceited, that being tempered with their charmes and ſuperſtitions, with the leaſt drawing bloud of another, they will kill him; themſelues, in their inchaunted Armour, ſafe from others blowes. They abide in expectation of theſe martiall minutes, for their coniured Armours, ſometimes eight or ten yeeres, before they can finiſh them. The Iauans [g] ſay, That their Anceſtors came from China, which Countrey they forſooke, becauſe of the tyrannie wherewith they were oppreſſed, and in great multitudes peopled this Iland. They weare their haire and their nailes long. They are dutifull to their ſuperiors. The great men ſtirre not forth, without a great troupe of followers. They are ſeldome idle, much buſied about their ſcabberds and weapons, which they vſe to poyſon. They are not without their weapons night or day, which they will not ſuffer another man to touch. They are ſo eager of reuenge, that they will preſſe on their aduerſaries weapon, drawing it thorow their owne body, to kill him that hath wounded them. They haue Mahumetane Temples, where they doe their deuotions with great ſilence. They acknowledge IESVS, Mahomet, Dauid, and Moſes, foure Prophets. They obſerue their houres, and two Faſts, or Lents. The great mens wiues neuer goe out of the doores to be ſeene. Their Cities are Ballambua, and Paparucan (a litle from whence is a burning Hill, which firſt brake forth 1586. and oppreſſed infinite numbers of men, and caſt great ſtones into the citie, for three dayes ſpace making one continued night of darkneſſe) Paſſarua, the King whereof married the King of Ballambuas daughter, and the ſecond night after hee had lyen with her, ſlue her and her attendants, becauſe ſhee would not turne Mahumetane. Ioartam, Surrabaia, Tuban, Matara, are alſo royall Cities, as are Daunia, Taggal, Charabaon, and many others. But bantam is of moſt traffick, frequented by Portugals, Dutch, and Engliſh, in which euery day are three ſeuerall markets. Here Merchants, when they come, may buy a woman for their fleſhly and worldly buſineſſe (you may adde the Deuill too, to make vp the number) which at their departure they ſell againe. Publike affaires are treated & handled by night, at which time the Counſellors of State meet, and aſcend ſome tree, or the roofe of the houſe, viewing the Heauens till the Moone ariſe, and then goe into the Senate-houſe.

The women in Iaua act Comedies. They puniſh Adulterie with death, the woman chuſing her neereſt friend or kinſman to ſtabbe her. The Southerne parts of Iaua are little knowne, being full of Lions and wilde Beaſts. It hath been fatall to many Engliſh: but much through [h] their owne diſtemper, with Racke (a wine made of Rice) and their contagious women. Iohn Midwards iournall relateth of their voyage againſt their wills by the South of Iaua, and of ſome Ilands, Bayes, and other obſeruations in thoſe parts.

Not farre from Bantam in Iaue certaine of the Paſſarrans, which being there oppreſſed by their King, came hither, and heere obtayned a piece of ground, to build them a Citie, which is called Sora. They haue a King or Gouernour, and liue quietly, following Husbandrie: they eate nothing that hath life (a common Superſtition of the Indians) weare white Clothes of Paper, made of the leaues of Trees and neuer marrie (herein reſembling the Iewiſh Eſſees) yet neuer want ſucceeding generation: Many of the Iauans daily conſecrating themſelues vnto their Societie. The Chinois in Iaua doe ſometimes bring vp Crocodiles, and eate them.

Bantam is the chiefe Factorie of the Engliſh, although they haue others. The King of Bantam hath the Title, but the Pangram exerciſeth the Power, and hath ſhut vp the King, where none, but at his pleaſure, may come at him. The ſituation of this Citie is low and vnwholſome: it is often ſubiect to fire: in diuers of which fires, our Engliſh haue by Gods bleſſing well eſcaped. Not farre from hence at the Ile Pulo Penione, the Trades Increaſe periſhed in the Careening, moſt of the Company, both of Engliſh and others, which wrought on Her, dying of an infectious ſickneſſe: which a Chinoiſe offered by ſacrifice to the Diuell to cleere. Sir Henry Middleton heere dyed of this ſickneſſe, and the Ship too, wanting that Head and neceſſarie Hands to ſuſtaine her; bequeathing that goodly Fabricke to the two Elements, Fire, and Water, which not agreeing in the Diuiding, whiles each laboured to haue all, the Ship was loſt in the quarrell. A great loſſe of our greateſt Merchants-ſhip that England euer had, but not till after great exploits; and not comparable to diuers loſſes of the Portugals or Hollanders, [k] at the Iland Mauricius and other places, both there, and at their owne doores.

The King of Tuban [l] is the richeſt King, and mightieſt in all Iaua. They haue many Horſes, and make great account of them, decking them with gallant furniture of gold, ſiluer, and the counterfeits of Dragons and Diuels on their Saddles: they ride and manage their Horſes with great ſkill. Iambee is another Paſſaman for vnwholſomneſſe.

They are theeuiſh, and giuen to ſpoyle, and captiued many of the Hollanders, which went thither on ſhoare, to buy commodities; which they were forced to redeeme at a deare rate. In theſe parts, are Battes as bigge as Hennes, which the people roſt and eate.

The Iland Baly is East from Iaua, very populous, containing (as is thought) ſixe hundred thouſand Inhabitants; they are Ethnikes, and worſhip that which they firſt meet in the morning. Heere and in Pulo Roſſa the Women are burned with their dead Husbands: one man is ſaid [k] to haue had fiftie of his Wiues (for they marrie as many as they pleaſe) burned with him, whiles the Hollanders were there. The Iland hath many Bulls, Buffals, Goates, Swine, Horſe, with many kindes of Fowles, Fruits, and Metals: The chiefe men are carried by ſlaues on Seats borne on their ſhoulders, or elſe in Chariots drawne with Buffals.

In the Voyage of Maſter Thomas Candiſh [l] is mention made of a Iauan King, called Raia Ballomboam, very aged, [m] which had a hundred Wiues, and his Sonne had fiftie. Their cuſtome is, that when the King dyeth, they burne the body, and preſerue the aſhes. Fiue dayes after, the wiues of the dead King goe to a place appointed, and there ſhee which was deereſt in his fauour, throweth a ball from her; and where that ball reſteth, thither they goe all, and turning their faces Eaſtward, ſtabbe themſelues with a Criſe or Dagger to the heart. They are very reſolute people, and dread no attempt which the King ſhall enioyne them, bee it neuer ſo dangerous. All the race of this King Ballomboam was raſed and vtterly deſtroyed by the Paſſaruan, after a long ſiege: which warre was begun in the blood of the King of Ballamboams Daughter, whom he ſlew, as is before ſaid, and added this Drunkenneſſe vnto his thirſt.

Edmund Scot writeth, That they vſe in Bantam martiall Law; Adulterie is death. The free Iauan muſt to euery wife keepe ten women-ſlaues, which are their Concubines alſo; ſome keepe fortie: but they may haue but three Wiues. They are proud, and (by this multitude of Slaues) poore; cruell, and cowardly. Their Criſſes or Daggers are two foot long, waued Indenture-faſhion; and poyſoned, that few eſcape. The vulgar ſort haue little Religion: but many pray to the Diuell (whom for that end they haue painted in their houſes, and ſet Wax Candles, and ſing before them) for feare of hurt; which they doe not to God, becauſe of his goodneſſe. The moſt of their worke, is to carue ſtickes for their Criſſe-handles. They are Couzeners, Theeues, Idle, Gluttons; take Betele, Opium, Tobacco. They haue diuers Sects; yet moſt are in manner Atheiſts. Many Chinois dwell there: Some thinke, that if they bee good, they ſhall be borne againe after death to great riches; and that wicked men ſhall bee turned into Toades, or other vgly beaſts. Euery New Moone they burne Sacrifices, and ſing ouer them certayne Prayers, in the meane while tinging a Bell, which at the end of euery Prayer they ring out; which is alſo their Paſſing-Bell Ceremonie, when any are readie to die. They furniſh their Altars with Goats, Hennes, Duckes, ſometimes raw, and ſometimes ready dreſſed; all which they eate: onely certaine papers, painted and cut out in curious workes, they burne. Many of them haue ſome skill in Aſtronomie. They keepe no Sabbath; but what day they begin any great worke, they after keepe holy. They haue South-ſayers, which ſometimes runne vp and downe the ſtreets like mad-men, with ſwords in their hands, tearing their hayre, and throwing themſelues againſt the ground. Chinois cut not their haire, for then they may not returne to China. They buy Slaues, and get Children of them, which they carrie with them to China, but ſell the Mother. The * Moores, if they be Great men, haue Moſchees in their owne houſes: they haue one great one in the Citie. Forreiners (whereof are many from many places) inhabite the Suburbes. They buy by night diſtilled Wines of the Chinois, and drinke it ſecretly, being forbidden it by their Mahumetane Law. It was about the yeere 1560. that this people became of that Sect. Of Samatra, and Zeilan.

a Ga. Bot. Ben. Maff. lib. 4. G. Arthus Hiſt. Indiæ Orient. cap. 40.

SAmatra is eſteemed by ſome [a] the greateſt of the Eaſterne Ilands, ſtretching it ſelfe almoſt ſeuen hundred miles in length, in bredth aboue two hundred. The Ayre is not very wholſome, by reaſon of the ſituation vnder the Line, and the multitude of Lakes and Riuers, whereout the Sun drinketh more then hee can well concoct, and therefore (as it were) belcheth out heere continually ſuch crude and vndigeſted vapours. Their food is Millet, Rice, Sagu, and Fruits. Their riches are Pepper, Ginger, Caſſia, Silke, Benioyn, Gold, Tinne, Iron, &c. The Kingdome of Campa yeeldeth Trees, whoſe pith or marrow is Aloe, which is prized in India at the like weight (ſome ſay) of Gold; the Barke is called Aquila. In the Sea-coaſt they are Moores in Religion, and ſo haue been about theſe laſt two hundred yeeres: vp, within Land, they are Pagans; and in many places, as in the Kingdomes of Andragiri and Aru, they are Man-eaters. They were diuided, before the Portugals entred India, into nine and twentie Kingdomes, whereof the chiefe was Pedir, after that Pacem, and now Acem. For Abram, ſometime a Slaue, ſince King of Acem, hath conquered almoſt all the North part of the Iland, and with helpe from the Turke and the Arabians, diſtreſſeth ſometimes the affaires of Malacca. This King [b] gaue in marriage with his Daughter, to the King of Ior, a Peece of Ordnance, ſuch as for greatneſſe, length, and workmanſhip, can hardly bee matched in all Chriſtendome. Heere is a [c] Hill, called Balaluanus, which continually burneth; and a Fountaine (as is reported) which runneth pure Balſome. Some [d] thinke, that this was Cherſoneſus Aurea of the Ancients.

Galuanus [e] writeth, That the Bacas, or Man-eaters in the Mountaines of Samatra, gild their teeth, and eſteeme the fleſh of blacke people ſweeter then of the white. The fleſh of their Kine, Buffes, and Hennes, is as blacke as Inke. They ſay, that there are certaine people there called Daraqui Dara, which haue tayles like to Sheepe. Heere is ſaid alſo to grow a Tree, the juyce whereof is ſtrong poyſon, and if it touch the blood of a man, killeth him, but if a man drinke of it, it is a ſoueraigne Antidote. As for thoſe tayled-people (a ſlander by Beckets Legend [f] reported of ſome Kentiſh-men, iniurious to that angrie Saint, and after applyed to our whole Nation; many indeed eſteeming the Engliſh to bee tayled.) Galuano affirmeth, That the King of Tidore told him, that in the Ilands of Batto-China there were ſome which had tayles, hauing alſo a thing like vnto a dugge betweene their coddes, out of the which there came Milke.

Nicoli de Conti [g] ſaith, in his time the Samatrans were all Gentiles, and the Man-eaters amongſt them vſed the skuls of their eaten enemies in ſtead of money, exchanging the ſame for their neceſſaries; and he was accounted the richeſt man, which had moſt of thoſe skuls in his houſe. In Vertomannus time they had money in Pedir, marked on the one ſide with a Diuell, on the other with a Chariot, drawne with Elephants. Their [h] Religion (hee ſaith) is the ſame with thoſe of Tarnaſſari, burning their Wiues in like manner. The inhabitants are cunning Artificers, Merchants, and Saylers: their Ships haue at each end a Prow, which with maruellous agilitie they can diſpoſe forwards, or backwards, making vſe of the ſame, according to the diuerſitie of Wind and Channell, which there are very changeable.

Afterwards, he became Protector of the young King (the former being dead) but proued his murtherer, and ſent a thouſand of the chiefe men to follow him into the other world, ennobling baſe fellowes of his Conſpiracie, and vſurped the State to himſelfe. He was ſuppoſed an hundred yeeres [k] old; ſo old, that his eldeſt Son (whom he kept at home with him, hauing made his younger King of Pedir) impriſoned him, [l] alledging, that he was too old for Gouernment, & warred on his Brother. Our Engliſh firſt [m] had Trade here in the laſt times of Queene Elizabeth, whoſe name was then famous in thoſe parts for her Exploits againſt the Spaniards. piece of Calico wrought with gold, and offered Pledges for the Generals safetie; for whom he sent six Elephants, with Drums, Trumpets, Streamers, and much people. The greatest Elephant, being thirteene or foureteene foot high, and a small Castle, like a Coach, couered with Veluet, on his backe: in the midst whereof, was a great Bason of Gold, with a rich Couering of Silke, wherein the Letter was put. The Generall was mounted on another Elephant, but was staid at the Court-gate, till the Kings pleasure and license was againe sent. The King made him a Feast; the dishes were of Gold or Tambayck (which is mixed of Gold and Brasse) their Wine is of Rice, in which the King dranke to the Generall out of his Gallery (a fathom higher then where they sate) it is as strong as Aqua vitæ. After the Feast, the Kings Damosels made Musick and Dances: which was a great fauour; for they are not commonly seene. The chiefe Prelate was appointed one of the Commissioners for Articles of League, which were concluded. They tooke a Prize of 9. hundred Tuns, and were like to be taken themselues by a strange Spout (as they call it) which fell not farre from them (as in one whole drop, enough to haue sunke any ship; and sometimes continueth a quarter of an houre together, as powred out of a vessell, the Sea boyling therewith [n].) The King sent a Letter and a Present to the Queene: and at their departure asked, if they had the Psalmes of Danid, and caused them to sing one; which, he and his Nobles seconded with a Psalme (as he said) for their prosperitie.

n The like hapned there May 5. 1613. Pat. Copland.

The Court [o] hath three Guards, betweene each of which is a great Greene. The King may see all that come, himselfe vnseene. The walls of his house are hanged sometimes with Cloth of Gold, Veluet, or Damaske. He sits crosse-legged, with foure Crisses, two before, and two behind, very rich. Fortie Women attend him with Fannes, Cloathes, Singing, and other Offices. Hee eateth and drinketh all day, or chewing Betele and Arecca, talking of Venerie and Cock-fighting. When they would doe reuerence (which we vse to performe by vncouering the head) they put off their hose and shooes, holding the palmes of the hands together, and lifting them aboue the head, with bending of the body, and saying, Donlat. They vse not to put malefactors to death, but cut off their hands and feet, and banish them to the Ile Polowey: and if they execute them, it is by Elephants tearing them, or thrusting a stake in their fundament. This King had an hundred Gallies; of which, some will carry foure hundred men: open, without decke; their Oares like shouels, foure foot long, rowed with one hand. A woman was Admirall; he not daring, through selfe-guiltinesse, to trust men.

o Cor. Houtman.

They had many differing Dignities and Degrees for their Clergie; vsed to pray with Beads; had Schooles: they had one Prophet, disguised in his apparell, whom they much honoured. They bury their Dead in the fields, with their head towards Mecca, laying a free stone at the head, and another at the feet, with signification what the deceased had beene. The Kings haue them, not of Stone, but of Gold: and this King had two made for him, each weighing a thousand pound, enriched with Stones. They haue a tradition, that Achen is Ophir. Once euery yeere they obserue a solemne ceremonie of going to Church, to see if Mahomet bee come. Then are there fortie Elephants richly couered, and on them the Nobles; one, spare for the Prophet, and another whereon the King rideth, with much pompe. When they haue looked into the Moskee, and not seene their Mahomet, the King returnes on that spare Elephant. Pider, Manaucabo, and Aru, are tributaries to Achen. Anno, 1613. Aprill twelfth, Captayne Best anchored in the Rode of Achin, and was kindly entertayned. The King sent an Arancaia riding in a Tent on an Elephants backe, attended with two or three of the Kings boyes (for Hee is attended by Boyes abroad, and by Women within) to receiue His Majesties Letter, which was thus carried in a Bason of Gold, the Generall following with fortie or fiftie Men. After this Letter and a Present deliuered, the King told them they should see some of his pastime; which was first Cock-fighting, next that, the fight of Rammes, then his tame Elephants, after them his Buffoloes, (all as they succeeded, exceeding the former in fiercenesse,) lastly the Antilopes which the Generall had giuen Him. All this while did the King take Tobacco in a Siluer pipe, giuen him by his Women standing in a close roome behind. This done, Supper was serued in by young Boyes of foureteene or fifteene yeeres old, in Swasse, which is a mettall halfe Copper, halfe Gold: and continued from seuen of the clocke till almost twelue, in which were serued in foure hundred Dishes, besides Hot drinkes. The next day the King sent the Generall an Elephant to ride on (otherwise none might doe it) and appointed One of his chiefe Arancaias alway to attend Him: free accesse was likewise granted at all times, which none else may doe without the Kings Creese or Dagger (there vsed as a Scepter) and the Articles agreed on betweene Sir Iames Lancaster and his predecessour, were promised to be ratified. On the second of May, all Strangers were inuited to a Feast kept at the Spring of the Riuer, in the water, sixe miles from the Citie. Two Elephants were sent for the Generall. The dishes were serued in by Boyes, swimming with one hand, and holding the Dish or strong drinke in the other. Of all these drinkes they must taste, and then throw the rest into the water. This continued from one till fiue; they had fiue hundred dishes well dressed. Generall Best weary of sitting so long in the water, had leaue to depart an houre before the Rest: the Captayne of the Dutch house tooke his bane either with hote drinkes, or cold sitting so long in the water, and soone after dyed. The King gaue the Generall a New Title, calling, and charging his Nobles to call him, Arancaia Pule, that is, the honourable white man. Iune, the second, They were entertayned with a fight of foure Elephants, and a wilde Tygre, which was fastened to a stake, and yet so fastened on their Trunks and legs, that he made them roare and bleed extreamly. Sometimes wild Elephants fight before Him, which would soone kill each other, but that tame ones are fastned to them, which draw them backe, fourescore or a hundred men helping. And for their taming, they vse to set one wilde, betweene two tame.

This King sent to his Majestie a Present, and a Letter in forme for painting and writing very curious, the words thus interpreted. PEDRVCKA SIRIE SVLTAN, King of Kings, Renowned for his warres, and sole King of Samatra, and a King more feared then his Predecessours: feared in his Kingdome, and honoured of all bordering Nations; in whom there is the true image of a King, in whom raignes the true methode of Gouernment, formed as it were of the most pure mettall, and adorned with the most fine colours; whose seate is high and most compleat, like to a Chrystall Riuer, pure and cleere as the choisest Glasse; from whom floweth the pure streame of Bounty and Iustice; whose presence is as the finest Gold; King of Priaman, and of the * Mountayne of Gold, viz. Solida; and Lord of nine sorts of Stones; King of two Sumbreroes of beaten Gold; hauing for his Seates Mats of Gold: His furniture for his Horses, and Armour for Himselfe being likewise of pure gold; His Elephant with teeth of Gold, and all prouisions thereunto belonging; His Lances halfe Gold, halfe Siluer; his small Shot of the same; a Saddle also for another Elephant of the same mettall; a Tent of Siluer; and all his Seales, halfe Gold, halfe Silner; his Sepulchre of Gold: (whereas his Predecessours had all these halfe Gold, halfe Silner) his seruices compleat of Gold and Siluer. For which cause, I the Great King of Samatra doe professe my selfe to bee of One heart, one minde, and of one flesh, with the most Potent Prince IAMES *King of England, and doe earnestly desire that the League begunne, may bee continued to all Posterities. And herein I take my greatest Felicitie, there being nothing in the world more pleasant or ioyfull to Mee. And for a testimony of my desire, that the League and Amitie begunne, may bee continued betwixt Vs, I haue returned this Letter vnto your Maiestie, making also My Prayers vnto the Great God for the Continuance of the same. And it shall bee My greatest Honour to receiue Memoriall from so Great a Potentate, and so Remote a Nation. And for a pledge of My Loue and Honour, and Continuance of our League, I send your Maiestie a Creese wrought with Gold, the hilt thereof being beaten Gold, with a ring of Stones, an Assagaya of Swasse, halfe Copper, halfe Gold, eight Purslan dishes small and great of Camphire, one piece of Sowering stuffe, three pieces of Calico Lawne: Which your Maiestie accepting as from a Brother, I shall rest satisfied and much honoured. This Letter for the strange swelling forme, and because it contayneth a pettie Inuentorie of the Kings Wealth, and some knowledge of the adioyning Kingdomes, I haue thus verbatim expressed. This King of Achi is a proper gallant man of warre (they are Master Coplands words) of * two and thirtie yeeres, of middle size, full of Spirit, strong by Sea and Land; his Countrey populous, his Elephants many, whereof wee haue seene a hundred and threescore, or a hundred and fourescore at a time. His Gallies and Frigats carry in them very good Brasse Ordnance, Demicanon, Culuerin, Sakar, Minion, and the like. His building is stately and spacious, but not strong: his Court at Achi pleasant; hauing a goodly branch of a maine Riuer running about and thorow his Palace, which branch Hee cut and brought sixe or eight miles off in twentie dayes whiles wee continued at Achi. Samatra is very Mountainous, the people courteous. Without the Kings Chop no Stranger may haue ingresse or egresse. Hee desired the Generall to commend Him to the King of England, and to intreat Him to send him two white Women. For (said Hee) if I beget one of them with Child and it proue a Sonne, I will make Him King of Priaman, Passaman, and of the Coast from whence whence you fetch your Pepper, ſo that you ſhall not need to come any more to Mee, but to your owne Engliſh King for theſe Commodities.

He is cruell: he plucked out one of the eyes of a Nobleman for looking on one of the Kings women waſhing in a Riuer: Another wearing a Shaſh beyond his degree, had his head cut round ſo farre, as that too large: ſome he boyles in ſcalding Oyle, ſome are ſawne in pieces, ſpitted aliue, their legs cut off, or otherwiſe tortured. It is reported that in his Predeceſſors time, when Malacca was beſieged, the Portugals putting on ſhore here, by the ozie and myry landing, were made an eaſier prey to an Ambuſh of Achiners in the Reeds, which tooke many of them, who by the Kings command, had all of them, all their Priuities preſently cut away. To returne to M. Copland, on the third of Iuly 1613. the Kings Armada of a hundred and twenty, or two hundred Frigats and Gallies arriued from Ioar; which Kingdome Laxamar the Generall had then ſubdued to this King, with the Kingdome of Siak, bringing both thoſe Kings with two of their brethren, and ſome Dutchmen priſoners to Achi. Captaine Saris.

At Tecoo they ſtayd eleuen weekes, and bought a hundred and twenty tunnes of Pepper, burying fiue and twenty men, which got their death at Paſſanan (for Tecoo is a healthfull place) where and in the Country about, the Pepper moſt groweth.

In Nicobar they are baſe people, and till not the ground. Sumbrero is ten or twelue leagues Northward from this Iland, where that plant growes, not a plant but a Worme, but a ſtone: before * obſerued. The people are tawny and naked: they paint their faces. Their Prieſts in their Sacrifices weare apparell ſo cloſe, as if it were ſowed to them; and hornes on their heads turning backe, with a taile alſo hanging downe behind: for ſo the Deuill (they ſay) appeareth to them. Their faces and haire are deformed with greene, blacke and yellow colours.

HONDIVS his Map of Zeilan.

Of Zeilan.

ZEilan (which some call Seylon, other Ceilan) is by Barrius auerred to be Taprobana: sometimes (according to Marcus Paulus [a] his reports) thought to haue comprehended 3600. miles in circuit, since much impayred by his ouer-mighty neighbour the Sea, which hath now left not aboue 250. miles in length, and an 140. miles of breadth vnto it. [b] The Indians call it Tenarisim, or the delicious land, and some are of opinion, that this was Paradise. (So iust are the iudgements of the Highest, that, when as man wandred from him, caused him also to wander from himselfe, and from his habitation; yea, the place it selfe hath also wandred, in mens wandring conceits, ouer the World, yea, and out of our habitable World altogether, as before is [c] shewed; men now seeking it as vainly as before they lost it.) It is in fashion [d] resembling an Egge, by a shallow channell separated from the Cape Comori. The Heauens with their dewes, the Ayre with a pleasant holesomnesse and fragrant freshnesse, the Waters in their many Riuers and Fountaynes, the Earth diuersified in aspiring Hils, lowly Vales, equall and indifferent Plaines, filled in her inward Chambers with Metals and Iewels, in her outward Court and vpper face stored with whole Woods of the best Cinamon that the Sunne seeth, besides Fruits, Oranges, Limons, &c. surmounting those of Spaine; Fowles and Beasts, both tame and wild (among which is their Elephant [e] honoured (by a naturall acknowledgement of excellence) of all other Elephants in the World.) These all haue conspired and ioyned in common league to present vnto Zeilan the chiefe of worldly treasures and pleasures, with a long and healthfull life in the Inhabitants, to enioy them. No maruell then, if Sense and Sensuality haue heere stumbled on a Paradise. There, wooddie Hils (as a naturall Amphitheatre) doe encompasse a large Plaine: and one of them, as not contenting his beetle-browes with that onely prospect, disdayneth also the fellowship of the neighbouring Mountaynes, lifting [f] vp his steepe head seuen leagues in height; and hath in the top a Plaine, in the middest whereof is a stone of two Cubits, erected in manner of a Table, holding in it the print of a mans foot, who (they say) came from Deli thither, to teach them Religion. The Iogues and other deuout Pilgrimes resort thither, from places a thousand leagues distant, with great difficulty of passage both hither and heere. For they are forced to mount vp this Hill by the helpe of nayles and chaines fastened thereto, Nature hauing prohibited other passage. Maffæus and Boterus could perswade themselues, that this foot-step is a relike and memory of the Æthiopian Eunuch: others will haue it further fetcht, and father it vpon Adam, the first Father of Mankinde, of whom the Hill also is named, Pico de Adam. The Moores [g] call it Adam Baba, and say, That from thence Adam ascended into Heauen. The Pilgrimes are clad in their Palmers Weed, with Iron chaines, and skins of Lions, and other wild beasts. Vpon their armes and legs they weare buttons with sharpe points, that cut the flesh, and draw bloud, which (they say) they doe in Gods seruice.

Before they come at the Mountayne, they passe by a fenny Valley full of water, wherein they wade vp to the waste, with Kniues in their hands, to scrape from their legs the bloud-leeches, which else would end their Pilgrimage and life before the time. For this dirty and watery passage continueth eighteen miles, before they come at the Hil; whose proud top would disdaine climbing, if Art did not captiue Nature, and binde the Hill with chaines of Iron, as is said. When they are mounted, they wash them in a Lake or Poole of cleere springing water, neere to that foot-stone, and making their Prayers, doe thus account themselues cleane from all their sinnes. This holy iourney is generally performed by the Ilanders (sayth Vertomannus) once a yeere. He addeth [h] that a Moore told him, that this foot-print was two spans long: and that Adam heere a long time bewayled his sinne, and found pardon. But Odoricus affirmeth, that they reported this mourning to haue beene for Abel, and to haue lasted three hundred yeeres, and of the teares of Abel and Eue this purifying water to haue proceeded: which Odoricus [i] proued to be a Tale, because he saw the water springing continually, and it runneth thence into the Sea. He saith, that this water had in it many precious stones; and the King gaue leaue at certayne times of the yeere to poore men to take them, that they might pray for his soule; which they could not doe, but first anointed with Limons, because of the Horse-leeches in that water. There [k] are reckoned nine Kings in this Iland: The first of Colmuchi, to whom the rest pay tribute, viz. the Kings of Ianasipatan, Triquinamale, Batecolon, Villassem, Tanamaca, Laula, Galle, and Candy.

In Candy [l] were Statues artificially wrought fiue or sixe fathomes high, which these Symmetrians proportioned to the stature of Adam, gathered by that print of his foot. In Vintane [m] is a Pagode or Idoll Temple, the compasse whereof is an 130. paces: it is very high, and all white, except on the top, which hath the spires thereof gilded, insomuch that men men are not able, when the Sun ſhineth, to looke thereon. It hath a Towre or ſquare Steeple of excellent workmanſhip. There are many other Temples, and a Monaſtery alſo of Religious perſons, which are attired in yellow, haue their crownes ſhauen, with Beades in their hands, and alwayes ſeeme to mumble ouer ſomewhat of their deuout Orilons, being in high eſtimation of ſanctity with the vulgar, and freed from publike labours and burthens. Their Monaſtery is built after the manner of the Popiſh, being alſo gilded with Gold. In their Chappels are many Images of both ſexes; which, they ſay, repreſent ſome of their Saints: they are ſet on the Altars, and are clothed with garments of gold and ſiluer. Before them are the Images of Boyes, which beare vp great Candleſtickes, with Wax-candles burning there-10 in night and day. Euery houre they reſort to theſe Altars to their Mumpſimus. They held a ſolemne Proceſſion, whiles the Hollanders were there, in which their Abbot rode on an Elephant richly attired, lifting vp his hands ouer his head, with a golden Rod therein: the Monkes went two and two before him in order, partly bearing and playing on many Inſtruments of Muſicke, partly bearing Wax-lights and Torches: the men alſo, and after them the women and Maids following in like order: and the faireſt Virgins were buſied with games and dances, being naked from the nauell vpwards, beneath couered with ſmockes of diuers colours, their armes and eares adorned with Gold and Iewels. Any man that ſhould ſee it (ſaith our Author) would thinke, our Weſterne Monkes had hence borrowed their Ceremonies. Their Images are in euery corner of the way, which they adorne with flowers. In Can-

20 dy, the chiefe Citie of that Kingdome, were Pagodes innumerable. The houſes or Temples were of ſtone, like the Temples in theſe parts: ſome Statues were as high as the maſt of a ſhip. The people heere, if they haue once touched meate, which for quantity or quality they cannot eate, they caſt it to the dogs: neither will any man (be he neuer ſo meane) eate that which another hath touched. The women goe naked from the waſte vpwards. They marry as many wiues as they can keepe.

The King makes vſe of their Superſtition: For pretending to build Temples, he after leaues them vnperfect, excuſing himſelfe, that they had not contributed ſufficient ſummes of mony, and therefore exacteth a new. There is one Statue of great ſtature, with a Sword in his hand, which by illuſion of the Deuill (if it be not the deluſion of fabulous reports) made as though 30 he would ſtrike the King with his Sword, as he was entring the Temple, and put him in great feare, whereas before he had made a mocke of it. The Singales or Natiue Inhabitants ſay, that the World ſhall not periſh, as long as that Image continueth ſafe. When any one is ſicke, hee ſacrificeth to the Deuill, hauing a Box hanging in his houſe to that end, therein to gather ſomewhat for his Offering. Some pray vnto the Image of an Elephants head, made of wood or ſtone, that they may obtaine wiſdome (whereof this prayer argues their great want:) ſome eate no quicke creature. They eat no Beefe, nor drinke any Wine; they worſhip whatſoeuer firſt meeteth them in the morning.

George Spilberge was bountifully entertained of the King of Candy, [n] but Sebald de Weert was with diuers of his companions ſlaine, after he had receiued much kindneſſe of the King; n Herman. de Bree, ap. de Bry, part. 8. Ind. Or.
40 his importunitie to get the King into his ſhip, making him ſuſpect ſome trechery.

The King of Motecalo had eares adorned with Iewels, and hanging downe (the lappets of them were ſo ſtretched) to his ſhoulders. He was kind to the Hollanders: but they incenſed him againſt them by killing certaine Kine; for ſome of them ſaid, that the ſoules of Kine ſlaine after that manner, were hurled forthwith into Hell. He obſerued one Pagode, to whoſe Feaſt he went while the Hollanders were there, the ſolemnity whereof was to continue (ten dayes) till a new Moone, with great concourſe of deuout perſons.

Of the Superſtitions of Perimal, and the worſhip of the Apes tooth, celebrated in this Iland; we haue already ſhewed in the Chapter [o] of Narſinga. The Cingalan language which they ſpeake in this Iland, is [p] thought to haue beene there left by the Chinois, ſometimes
50 ſuppoſed (I thinke falſely) Lords of Zeilan. In Marcus Paulus his dayes the Tartarians had not pierced thus farre. For the King then raigning, refuſed to ſell to Cublai Can (then the greateſt Monarch in the World) at a price, a Rubie which hee had left him by his Anceſtors, eſteemed the richeſt Iewell in the World, being (as he [q] ſaith) a ſpan long, and as bigge as a mans arme, cleere and ſhining, as if it had bin a fire. In this Iland were reckoned nine Principalities or Kingdomes, but [r] not long ſince, their chiefe King was murthered by a Barber, who draue the other Kings out of the Countrey, and vſurped the Monarchy to himſelfe, practiſing hoſtility againſt the Portugals. The Cingulas are very cunning Artificers in all Metals. One of them preſented the Archbiſhop of Goa with a Crucifix, ſo cunningly wrought, as if he had giuen life to the Image of one dead. He ſent it to the King of Spaine as a rare Iewell, 60 not to be equalled in Europe. The Inhabitants heere are actiue and expert in lugling, both men and women, trauelling through India with their ſtrange Hobby-horſes, to get money by this vanity. The Sea-coaſt (as in other Indian Ilands) is inhabited with Moores, the Inland with Pagans.

The Portugals haue a Fortresse at Colombo. The Ilanders f are not warriours: they giue themselues to pastime and pleasure: they goe naked from the girdle vpward: they make wide holes in their eares, which they stretch out with the weight of their Iewels to their shoulders. Monfart relates, that Zeilan hath whole Forrests of Cinamon, and Mountaynes of Chrystall, and that out of their Riuers they draw Pearles, Rubies, Saphirs and Cats-eyes: that they worship the first creature they meet, eat nothing that hath bloud, make no more bread then will be eaten at a meale, their Religion prohibiting them to eat any two houres old. The Hollanders found exceeding, both good and bad entertainment with the King of Candy. Now for that question, whether Zeilan or Samatra be that Taprobane of the ancient is very doubtfull, yet that report in Pliny t of Taprobane, seemes more to encline for Zeilan. For hee sayth, That in Claudius time, a seruant of Annius Plocamus, which was Customer for the Red Sea, was carried from the Coast of Arabia, besides Carmania, in fifteene dayes, which, I thinke, could not possibly bee done to Samatra. Likewise the excellency of the Elephants, beyond all the Indian, agrees to Zeilan: and had Samatra beene so knowne at that time, the other parts of India (it is like) had beene better discouered then they were in those times. This Taprobane was discouered to bee an Iland, by Onesicritus, Alexanders Admirall of his Fleet in these parts. It was then accounted another World, and therefore shall be the period of our Pilgrimage, and Perambulation in this Asian part of the World: which (by the gracious goodnesse of his Almighty Guide) the Pilgrime hath now passed, and hath led the industrious Reader along with him.

§. III.

The Conclusion of this Asian Pilgrimage.

u W. Thorp. ap. Fox, Act. Mon. Our Pilgrimes with wanton Songs, Bagpipes, Canterbury Bels, &c. when they come into a Towne, make more noyse then the King with all his Clarions and Minstrels, So Chaucers tales. Eras. Colloq. &c.

x See diuers examples here of in Iohn Nichols Pilgrimage, and W. Lithgow reporteth the like when he was there.

THe Popish Pilgrimes were wont to beguile their weary steps, with Musicke u or pleasant tales (according to the delicate deuotion of those times) & easie was their pardon and penance at their iournies end. And in these our times Madonna de Loretto must giue entertainment to many Pilgrimes, which (as if Venus were become her Chamberlaine) haue their Curtezan-consolations to solace their Pilgrim-paines: the deuout Friers and Nuns themselues, that haue defied the Deuill, and denyed the World, by a new Vow deuoted to the flesh, disguise themselues in Lay-habits, trauelling thither, and from thence, as Man and Wife, only at Loretto couering all with their Cowles. And if Confession discouer, it hideth againe as a double couering. But to vs, Vowes, Cowles, and such salace-solaces are wanting: the end of this labour is but the beginning of another: our penance endureth all the way; neyther haue we hope of Pardon and Indulgence from some seuerer Pœnitentiaries and Censours, whose greatest vertue is to find or seeke faults in Others.

Had the Muses beene propitious, and the Graces gracious, we would haue had some Musicall and gracefull harmony, at least in Phrase and Method: but euen the Muses which whilome so graced that Father of History, Herodotus, that each of them vouchsafed, if yee vouchsafe it credit, to bestow that Booke on him, which hee entitled with their names) seemed afraid of so tedious a iourney; nor would the Graces grace vs with their company. Many indeed offered themselues with their Rules, Methods, and Precepts of Histories, as Bodinus, Chytraus, Possevinus, Mylaus, Foletta, Viperanus, Zuinger, Sambucus, Riccobonus, Patritius, Pontanus Foxius, Robertellius, Balduinus, and Others which haue written Treatises of that argument: but I thought such attendance would be chargeable, especially to a Traueller: and their many Rules would not haue added wings to my Head and Feet, (as the Poets paint their Mercury) but rather haue fettered my Feet, and made my weake Head forget it selfe with their remembrances. I therefore followed Nature (both within me and without me) as my best guide, for matter and manner, which commonly yeeldeth Beauties as louely, if not so curious, as those which bankrupt themselues with borrowing of Art: the issues of our bodies and minds herein being like, Quas matres student, demissis humeris esse, vincto pectore vt gracilæ sint, saith Chærea in the Comedy, Tametsi bona est natura, reddunt curatura iunceas: To conceited curiositie may hide rather then commend Natures bounty, which of it selfe is alway more honest, if not more honourable. Neuer could the Persian Court parallel the goodlinesse of Ester and Aspatia, which yet neglected the Persian delicacies. Onee, I haue had sufficient burthen of the businesse in hand; enough it was for me to goe, though I did not dance vnder it. But it is time to leaue this idle discourse about our course in this Asian History, and bethinke vs of our African Perambulation.

§. I.

Of the Name and Limits of Africa.

WHether this name Africa, bee so called of [a] Epher or Apher, the sonne of Midian, and nephew of Abraham, by his second wife Keturah (as Iosephus [b] affirmeth, alleaging witnesses of his opinion, Alexander Polyhistor, and Cleodemus;) or of the Sunnes presence, [c] because it is aprica, or of the colds absence, of ἀ and φείκη, as Festus saith; or of the word Feruca, [d] which in the Arabian tongue signifieth to diuide (wherupon they call this part of the world Ifrichia) becaule it is (saith [e] Leo) diuided by Nilus, and the Sea, from the rest of the world: or of [f] Ifricus, an Arabian King, which (chased by the Assyrians) here seated himselfe; or of עפר Aphar, the Hebrew word, which signifies dust (as Aphra the Syriake also) fitly agreeing to the sandie and parched Soile: or if any other can giue more probable Etymologie of the Name, I list not to contend. Nor is it meet for me so be religious in these questions of names, in this Quest and Inquisie of Religions. It is a great Peninsula, by one Isthmus, or neeke of Land betweene the Red Sea, and the Mediterranean, ioyned to the Continent: which with the Red Sea aforesaid is the Easterne limit of Africa, as the Mediterranean on the North, and elsewhere the Ocean. For Nilus is a mere obscure, and vncertaine Vadpare. Some diuide the World into two parts, Asia and Europe, accounting Africa a part of Europe, which opinion Varro ascribeth to Eratosthenes; Solinus, Lucan, and Ethicus, with Stenderus, mendiorem. It is twice [h] as bigge as Europe, and yet not so much peopled: Nature hauing made here her solitarie place of retyring, attended by scorching heats, and showres of sands, as a counterfeit of those heauenly raines, and moving waters, which the Aire and Seas afford in other places. Such are the many Deserts in Africa, onely fertile in barrennesse, although in other parts it is both fruitfull and populous.

lous. The Equinoctiall Circle doth in manner diuide it in the middest. And yet old Atlas neuer sheddeth his snowie haires, but hath alwayes on his huge and high tops vnmolten snow; whence sometime it is dispersed (as from a store-house) in such incredible quantitie, that it couereth Carts, Horses, and the tops of Trees, to the great danger of the Inhabitants: and the Fountaynes are so cold, as a man is not able to endure his hand in them. Mount Atlas aforesaid stretcheth from the Ocean, [i] bearing name of him, almost to Egypt. Other Mountaynes of name are those of Sierra Leona, and the Mountaynes of the Moone, &c.

[i] Oc. Atlanticus.

One Lake Zembre yeeldeth three mightie Riuers, disemboking themselues into three seuerall Seas: Nilus, which runneth Northwards fortie degrees from hence, in Astronomicall reckoning; Cuama, which runneth into the Easterne; and Zaire into the Westerne Seas: of which Riuers, and of other like, the Reader shall finde more in due place spoken. 10

Some parts of Africa are beyond admiration for barrennesse, some for fertilitie. Plinie [k] mentions a Citie in the middest of the sands, called Tacape, in the way to Leptis, which hath a Spring of water flowing plentifully, and dispensed by course amongst the Inhabitants. There vnder a great Date-tree groweth an Oliue, vnder that a Figge, vnder that a Pomegranate, vnder that a Vine, vnder that Wheat, Pease, Herbs, all at once. The Vine beares twice a yeere; and otherwise, very abundance would make it as bad as barren. Somwhat is gathered all the yeere long. Foure cubits of that soile square, not measured with the fingers stretched out, but gathered into the fist, are sold for so many Denarij. This Budeus [l] summes and proportions by the Acre, after the Roman measure, and saith, that an Acre of that ground, after that rate, is prised at 12800. Sesterij nummi, which maketh 320. French crownes; not 60 reckoning the defect of the cubit, which being added, addes much to the summe.

The Romans reckoned sixe Prouinces in Africa: Ptolemey numbreth twelue. But then was not not Africa so well knowne as now. Iohn Leo [m] (a Moore, both learned and experienced) hauing spent many yeeres in trauell, diuideth Africa into foure parts; Barbaria, Numidia, Libya, and the Land of Negros. Numidia he calleth Biledurgerid, or the Region of Dates: and Libya, he calleth Sarra, for so the Arabians call a Desart. But he thus excludeth Egypt, and both the higher and lower Æthiopia, which others [n] adde hereunto, and make vp seuen parts of Africa.

§. II.

Of the Beasts, wilde and tame.

MAny are the [o] Creatures which Africa yeeldeth, not vsuall in our parts. Elephants are there in plentie, and keepe in great herds together. The Giraffa, or Camelopardalis; a beast not often seene, yet very tame, and of a strange composition, mixed of a Libard, Hart, Buffe, and Camell, [p] and by reason of his long legs before, and shorter behinde, not able to graze without difficultie, but with his high head, which hee can stretch forth halfe a pikes length in height, feeds on the leaues and boughs of trees. The Camels in Afrike are more hardie then in other places; and will not onely beare great burthens, but continue to trauell fiftie dayes together, without carrying with them any corne to giue them, but turne them out at night to feede on thistles, boughs, and the little grasse they find: and no lesse patient are they of thirst, being able to endure fifteene dayes without drinke vpon necessitie, and fiue dayes ordinarily. The Arabians in Africa count them their greatest wealth: for so they describe a mans riches, saying, Hee hath so many thousand Camels: and with these they can liue in the Desarts without dread of any Prince. Sixe [q] hundred waight is his ordinarie load, yet will hee carry a thousand. In lading or vnlading, hee lyes on his belly, and when hee is laden proportionably to his strength, will rise, not suffering more to bee laid on him. For satisfying his thirst, they say, in his often belchings he rayseth vp a bladder, wherewith he moystneth his mouth and throat. They are, say some, the onely that ingender backward: which others haue affirmed also of the Lion, Tygre, Elephant, Rhinoceros, and Ounce: and some denie it, not of those alone, but euen of the Camell, who voydeth vrine backward, but by a strange worke of Nature is said in that act to shoot forward.

o Io.Let. lib.9.

p P.Bellon.lib.2 cap.49. doth largely describe him. See his description in Moreson and Sandys: also Master Sanderson saw one at Cairo, and hath described him in his voyage, which I haue printed. Tom.1. lib.9.

q G. Sandys.

Of Camels they haue three sorts: the first called Hugium, of huge stature and strength, able to carry a thousand pound waight: the second lesse, with two bunches on the backe, fit for carriage and to ride on, called Becheti, of which they haue onely in Asia. The third sort, called Rugnabil, is meagre and small, able to trauell (for they are not vsed to burthens) aboue an hundred miles in a day. And the King of Tombuto can send messengers on such Camels to Segelmesse or Darha, nine hundred miles distant, in seuen or eight dayes, without stay or change by the way. Their Camels also are docible: they will more be perswaded, to hold on a iourney further then ordinarie, by songs, then blowes. In the Spring they are mare-wood, and mad of copulation, in which time they are very readie both to hurt their followers, and to kill their masters, or any that haue whipped or hurt them. Of Horses they haue both wilde (which they entrap by subtiltie) and tame: of which the Barbarie horse is famous, in Europe and Asia highly prized. The Lant or Dant is a kinde of wilde Kine, but swifter then almost any other beast. They haue also wilde Kine and wilde Asses. The Adimmain is as bigge as an Asse, otherwise resembling a Ram. They haue other sheepe, [r] whose tayles weigh twentie pound, and sometime fourescore or more, carried on little carts behind them. But those Adimmain are found in the Desarts, and kept to profit, yeelding them milke and cheese. The females onely haue hornes.

r Caius de rar. animal. speakes of two kindes: the taile of the one three cubits long, of the other a cubit broad. vid. Hero. Thal Arist. hist. an.8. Plin. 8.49. Ælian, &c.

The Lions in cold places are more gentle, in hotter are more fierce, and will not flee the onset of two hundred horse-men armed. Master Iohn Vassall [t] (a friend and neighbour of mine) told me that he brought out of Barbarie a Lions skin, which from the snowt to the top of the taile contayned one and twentie foot in length, a thing seeming incredible, a raritie and prodigie also to those Barbarians: and I could almost doubt whether memorie fayled not: for otherwise the Relator I know to be otherwise wise and honest. Strange it is that a Lioness by shewing her hinder parts to the male, should make him runne away. In time of their coupling eight or ten will follow one female, with terrible and bloudie battels amongst themselues. They spare such men as prostrate themselues, and prey rather on men then women, and not at all on Infants, except compelled by hunger. Plinie tels that Alexander set thousands on worke by hunting, hawking, fishing, or other meanes to take and learne the natures of Creatures, that Aristotle might be by them informed thereof, who wrote almost fiftie Treatises of that subiect, whereof it seemeth most are lost. He citeth out of [u] him, that

Lions

Lions bring forth ſmall deformed lumps, at the firſt time fiue, and (euery yeere after) one leſſe, after the fift burthen remayning barren. It cannot ſtirre till it be two moneths old, nor goe till it be ſixe, if you beleeue him. The Libyans beleeue that the Lion hath vnderſtanding of prayers, and tell of a Getulian woman, which lying at the Lions mercy, beſought him ſo noble a beaſt, not to diſhonour himſelfe with ſo ignoble a prey and conqueſt, as ſhee a weake woman was. The like is told [u] of a Spaniſh dogge, of one Didacus Salazar a Spaniard. This man according to the bloudie practice of that Nation, minding to fill his dogs belly with an old womans fleſh which was his captiue, gaue her a letter to carry to the Gouernour, and ſo ſoone as ſhee was a little paſt, looſed his Maſtiffe, who preſently had ouer-taken her. The woman terrified, proſtrates her ſelfe to the dogge, and ſues for her life; Good maſter Dogge, maſter Dogge (ſaith ſhee) in her language, I carry this letter to the Gouernour (and ſhewes it him) Be not fierce on me, maſter Dogge. The dogge (hauing changed, it ſeemes, with his Maſter, his doggedneſſe for the others humanitie) made a ſtay, and lifting vp his legge, onely piſſed on her and departed, to no ſmall wonder of the Spaniards that knew him.

But to returne to the King of beaſts. His tayle ſeemeth to be his Scepter, whereby he expreſſeth his paſſion. Hee ſhrinkes not at danger, except ſome couert of woods ſhroud him from witneſſes, and then hee will take the benefit of flight, which otherwiſe hee ſeemes to diſdaine. Mentor, a man of Syracuſa, was encountred with a Lion, which in ſtead of tearing him, fawned on him, and with his dumbe eloquence ſeemed to implore his aide, ſhewing his diſeaſed foot, wherein Mentor perceiued a ſtubbe ſticking, which he pulled out. The like is reported by Gellius out of Polyhiſtor, of a fugitiue ſeruant, who hauing performed this kind of office to a Lion, was by him gratified for a long ſpace with a daily portion of his prey. But after this the man was taken and preſented to his Maſter (a Roman Senator) who exhibited games to the Romans, wherein ſeruants and condemned perſons were expoſed to the furie of the beaſts, amongſt whom he placed this ſeruant; and by a wonderfull Fate, this Lion alſo was a little before taken, and beſtowed on him for this ſolemne ſpectacle. The beaſts running with violence to their bloudie encounter, ſuddenly this Lion ſtayed, and taking little better view, fawned on this his gueſt, and defended him from the aſſault of the other beaſts: whereupon, by the peoples entreatie (who had learned the ſtorie of him) he was freed, and the beaſt giuen him: which followed him with a Line in the ſtreets, the people pointing and ſaying: Hic eſt homo Medicus leonis; Hic eſt leo hoſpes hominis. One Elpis a Samian performed a cure on another Lion, pulling a bone out of his throat, at the Lions gaping and ſilent moane: and in remembrance hereof built a Temple (at his returne) to Bacchus at Sango, whom before hee had inuoked before in feare of a Lion.

A. Gellius Noct. Attic.

Plinie and Solinus among other African beaſts mention the Hyæna, which ſome thinke to be Male one yeere, and Female another, by courſe: This Ariſtotle [x] denyes, This beaſt hath no necke ioynt, and therefore ſtirres not his necke, but with bending about his whole body. He will imitate humane voyce, and drawing neere to the ſheepe-coates, hauing heard the name of ſome of the ſhepheards, will call him, and when hee comes, deuoure him. They tell that his eyes are diuerſified with a thouſand colours, that the touch of his ſhaddow makes a dogge not able to barke. By engendring with this beaſt, the Lioneſſe brings forth a Crocuta, of like qualities to the Hyæna. Hee hath one continued tooth without diuiſion throughout his mouth. Some thinke this Hyæna to bee the Lycanthropos or Man-wolfe, ſome the Ciuet-Cat, ſome a fable: howſoeuer, old and late Philoſophers, Phyſitians, and Hiſtorians mention it. Something, perhaps, told of it is fabulous. But it is abſurd to denie the eye-ſight of ſo many witneſſes. He that will reade a pleaſant ſtorie of the taking them, let him reade Buſbequius his Epiſtles: if an entire ſtorie, Bauhinus his ſecond booke De Hermaphroditis.

[x] Ariſt. Hiſt. animal. l. 6. c. 32.

In Africa alſo are wilde Aſſes, among which, one Male hath many Females: a iealous beaſt, who (for feare of after encroching) bites off the ſtones of the young Males, if the ſuſpicious Female preuent him not by bringing forth in a cloſe place where hee ſhall not finde it. The like is told of Beuers, [y] which being hunted for the medicinable qualitie of their ſtones, are ſaid to bite them off when they are in danger to be taken, paying that ranſome for their liues. It cannot be true that is reported of the Hyæneum, [z] a ſtone found in the Hyæna's eye, that being put vnder the tongue of a man, bee ſhall foretell things to come, except hee foretell this, That no man will beleeue what our Authour before hath told. The Libard is not hurtfull to men except they annoy him: but killeth and eateth dogges. Dabuh is the name of a ſimple and baſe creature like a Wolfe, ſaue that his legges and feete are like to a mans: [*] ſo fooliſh, that with a ſong, and a taber, they which know his haunt will bring him out of his den, and captiue his eares with their muſicke, while another captiuateth his legs with a rope. Scaliger thinkes this is the Hyæna, which the Turkes call Zirtlan, and take with a rope faſtened to the legge, he that goes in profeſſing he is not there, till they be there ſure of him.

The

The Zebra of all Creatures for beautie and comelineſſe is admirably pleaſing: reſembling a Horſe of exquiſite compoſition, but not all ſo ſwift, all ouer-laid with partie-coloured Laces, and gards, from Head to Taile. They liue in great Heards, as I was told by my friend Andrew Battle, who liued in the Kingdome of Congo many yeeres, and for the ſpace of ſome moneths liued on the fleſh of this Beaſt, which hee killed with his Peece. For vpon ſome quarrell betwixt the Portugals (among whom he was a Sergeant of a band) and him, he liued eight or nine moneths in the Woods, where hee might haue view of hundreds together in Heards both of theſe, and of Elephants. So ſimple was the Zebra, that when hee ſhot one, he might ſhoot ſtill, they all ſtanding ſtill at gaze, till three or foure of them were dead. But more ſtrange it ſeemed which he told me of a kinde of great Apes, if they might ſo bee tearmed, of the height of a man, but twice as bigge in feature of their limbes, with ſtrength proportionable, hairie all ouer, otherwiſe altogether like Men and Women in their whole bodily ſhape, except this, that their legges had no calues. They liued on ſuch wilde fruits as the Trees and Woods yeelded, and in the night time lodged on the Trees: Hee was accompanied with two Negro-Boyes. and they carried away one of them by a ſudden ſurpriſe: yet not hurting him, as they vſe not to doe any which they take, except the Captiue doe then looke vpon them. This ſlaue, after a moneths life with them, conueyed himſelfe away againe to his Maſter. Other Apes there are ſtore, and as Solinus reporteth, * Satyres with feete like Goates, and Sphynges, with breſts like women, and hairie, whereof Pierius ſaith hee ſaw one at Verona, and a kind of Conies alſo at the ſame time, foure times as bigge as the ordinary, and (which is more incredible) had each of them foure genitall members. Philippo Pigafetta ſpeaketh in his Relation z of Congo, of other Beaſts in Africa, as of the Tygre as fierce and cruell as Lions, making prey of Man and Beaſt, yet rather deuouring blacke men then white: whoſe Muſtachios are holden for mortall poyſon, and being giuen in meates, cauſe men to die madde. The Empalanga is ſomewhat like to an Oxe. Their Sheepe and Goates neuer bring forth leſſe then two, and ſometimes three or foure at a time. They haue Wolues, Foxes, Deare (Red and Fallow) Roe-buckes, Ciuet-cats, Sables and Marterns.

The Riuer-horſe ſeemes peculiar to Africa, a beaſt ſomewhat reſembling a Horſe, ſhorter-legged, with great feet and a very great head, with horrible teeth: ſo fearefull by Land that a Child may affright them, and in the Water as their proper element (though their aliment be Graſſe, Corne in the blade, and other like from the earth) they are audacious and daring. But of this and many other African Creatures (too long heere to relate) the Reader may informe himſelfe more fully in my Voyages; in Iobſon, Battell, Santos, Aluares, Iohn Leo, and others there publiſhed.

These great Apes are called Pongo's.

* Satyres are thought to be a kind of Apes: theſe are Naturall. There are others vnnaturall of humane copulation with goats: a third ſort diabolicall illuſions, & a fourth poeticall tales. See theſe things at large in Baubinus de Hermaphrod. l. & alſo Drad. in Sohar, &c.

§. III.

Of Crocadiles, Serpents and other ſtrange Creatures.

THey haue Snakes and Adders, whereof ſome are called Imbumas, fiue and twentie ſpannes a long, liuing in Land and Water, not venemous but rauenous, and lurke in Trees (for which taking purpoſe, Nature hath giuen it a litle horne or claw within two or three foot of the Taile) waiting for their prey, which hauing taken, it deuoureth hornes, hooſes, and all, although it bee a Hart. And then ſwolne with this ſo huge a meale, it is as it were drunke and ſleepie, and vnweldie for the ſpace of fiue or ſixe dayes. The Pagan Negroes roaſt and eate them as great dainties. The biting of their Vipers killeth in foure and twentie houres ſpace. Africa for monſters in this kinde hath been famous, as in the Roman hiſtorie appeareth. Attilius b Regulus the Romane Conſul in the firſt Punicke Warre, at the Riuer Bagrada encountred with a huge Serpent, and planted his Engines and Artillerie againſt the ſame, whoſe skinne, ſent to Rome for a Monument, was in length a hundred and twentie foot, as Gellius out of Tubero reporteth. The Scales c armed it from all hurt by Darts or Arrowes, and with the breath it killed many, and had eaten many of the Souldiers, before they could with a ſtone out of an Engine deſtroy this deſtroyer. The Riuers of Niger, Nilus, Zaire, and others, haue ſtore of Crocodiles, whereof ſome are of an incredible bigneſſe, and greedie deuourers, thirtie foot long, from an Egge leſſe then a Gooſe-egge. Ariſtotle ſaith, that Crocodiles haue no tongues, but I my ſelfe haue ſeene both great and little (ſaith our Author) dead and dryed, in all which I found a tongue, but very ſhort, flat and large. Strange it is that they tell of the number of ſixtie in this beaſt; the age ſixtie yeres, the teeth, joynts, egges, and dayes of laying and hatching, being all numbred by ſixtie.

The Crocodiles taile is as long as his body, his feet with clawes, his backe armed with ſcales almoſt impenitrable: hee moueth onely his vpper jaw, and that ſo wide, that ſome of them are able to ſwallow an entire Heifer, as ſome report. They ſay alſo, that the Female layes her Egges where Nilus will make an end of his flowing that yeere, as if by ſecret Prouidence ſhe diuined how farre the Riuer would riſe. In ingendring ſhe lyes on her backe, and through the ſhortneſſe of her legs cannot turne her ſelfe on her belly, but by the Males helpe: from which being ſcarred by the clamours of ſome watching this opportunitie, ſhe is eaſily taken: which they doe alſo by Pit-fals and other meanes. Foure moneths together in the Winter, they eate nothing: they are thicke-ſighted by Land, and eaſier take their prey by water, which is done by their tayle. They are bold vpon the fearefull, and fearefull vpon the bold: yet a fearefull beaſt to encounter riſing on his tayle, with ſuch Helliſh iawes and Deuilliſh clawes ouer the aſſaylant, as require an vndaunted ſpirit. For which the Tentyrites were famous, eaſily conquering them. Authors tell of a little Bird, which as he lyes gaping, goes into his mouth, and picks his indented teeth, which he cannot deuoure by reaſon of her ſharp feathers rayſed like briſtles, when he offereth to ſhut his mouth on her: the Ichneumon or Rat of Nilus is ſaid to gape for this occaſion of his gaping, and then to runne into his belly and gnaw himſelfe a paſſage out, therefore worſhipped of the Egyptians. The Ichneumon is as big and as cleanly as a Cat, ſnowted like a Ferret, but without haire, and blacke; ſharpe tooth'd, round ear'd, ſhort legg'd, long tayl'd, ſuppoſed of both genders: bought at Markets in Egypt to kill Mice and Rats. They prey vpon all leſſer Serpents deſtroy Crocodiles Egs, and ſtrangle all the Cats they meet with, loue Poultrey, cannot endure the wind: their mouthes are ſo little, they cannot bite any thing that is thicke.

Mount Atlas hath plenty of Dragons, groſſe of body, ſlow of motion, and in byting or touching, incurably venemous. The Deſarts of Lybia haue in them many Hydra's. Dubb is the name of a kind of great Lizard, not venemous, which neuer drinketh, and if water bee put in his mouth, he preſently dyeth. He is counted dainty meat, and three dayes after hee is killed, at the heat of the fire he moueth as if he had life. In Congo is a kind of Dragons like in bigneſſe to Rammes, with wings, hauing long tayles and chaps, and diuers iawes of teeth, of blue and greene colour, painted like ſcales, with two feet, and feed on raw fleſh. The Pagan Negros pray to them as Gods, for which cauſe the great Lords keepe them to make a gaine of the peoples deuotion, which offer their gifts and Oblations. The Chameleons are knowne among vs, admirable for their Ærie ſuſtinance (although they alſo hunt and eat Flies) and for the changeableneſſe of their colours into all (as Theophraſtus ſayth) but redde and white. The Tarandus is a Beaſt ſomewhat reſembling an Oxe, in quantitie, a Hart in ſhape, the skin hard, a finger thicke, fit for ſhields, haired like a Beare, liuing, as Theophraſtus affirmeth, in Sarmatia, Solinus ſayth in Æthiopia, ſeldome ſeene, of incredible changeableneſſe to the colour of that which is next it. The Polypus ſeemeth by his breath to change his colour, his lungs extending almoſt through all his body: which Ariſtotle teſtifieth he doth both for feare and hunting his prey: adding the ſame qualitie of another fiſh called a Cuttell. Another Serpent hath a rundle on his Taile like a Bell, which alſo ringeth as it goeth. But if any deſire to know the varietie of theſe Serpents, Solinus in his thirteenth Chapter will more fully ſatiſfie him, and Bellonius in his obſeruations.

Manifold are theſe kindes of Serpents in Africa, as the Ceraſtes, which hath a little Coronet of foure hornes, whereby he allureth the Birds vnto him (lying hidden in the ſands all but the head,) and ſo deuoureth them. The Iaculi dart themſelues from Trees on ſuch Creatures as paſſe by. The Amphisbena hath two heads, the Taile alſo onerated, (I cannot ſay honored) with a Head, which cauſeth it to moue circularly with crooked windings: a fit Embleme of popular ſedition, where the people will rule their Prince; needs muſt their motion bee crooked, when there are two heads, and therefore none. The Scythale is admirable in her varied Iacket. The Dipſas kils thoſe whom ſhe ſtingeth, with thirſt. The Hypanale with ſleepe, as befell to Cleopatra. The Hemerois with vnſtanchable bleeding. The Preſter with ſwelling. And not to poiſon you with names of many other of theſe poyſonfull Creatures, the Baſilisk is ſaid to kill with her ſight or hiſſing. Galen deſcribes it, and ſo doe Solinus and others. It is not halfe a foot long and hath three pointels (Galen ſaith) on the head, or after Solinus, ſtrakes like a Mitre. It blaſteth the ground it toucheth, the Herbes alſo, and Trees, and infecteth the Ayre, ſo that Birds flying ouer, fall dead. It frayeth away other Serpents with the hiſſing. It goeth vpright from the belly vpwards. If any thing be ſlaine by it, the ſame alſo proueth venemous to ſuch as touch it. Onely a Weaſill kils it. The Bergameni bought the carkaſſe of one of them at an incredible ſumme, which they hung in their Temple (which Apelles hand had made famous) in a Net of Gold, to preſerue the ſame from Birds and Spiders. The Catoblepas is ſaid to be of like venemous nature, alwayes going with her head into the ground, her ſight otherwiſe being deadly. As for the Monſters, that by mixt generations of vnlike kindneſſe Nature vnnaturally produceth, I leaue to others diſcourſe. Leuinus Lemnius tels, that of the marrow in a Mans back-bone is ingendred a Serpent; yea, of an Egge which an old Cocke will will lay after he is vnable to tread Hennes any longer, is (saith hee) by the same Cockes sitting, produced a Basiliske: and tells of two such Cockes at Zirizea, killed by the people, which had found them sitting on such Egges. Theophrast also saith, that Serpents are plentifully ingendred of much Raine, or effusions of Mens blood in Warre. Mice are multiplyed in drie seasons) which the store of them this drie Winter 1613. confirmeth) of which hee saith there are great ones in Egypt with two feet, which they vse as hands, not going, but leaping.

Ostriches keepe in companies in the Desarts, making shewes a farre off, as if they were troopes of Horsemen; a ridiculous terrour to the Caravans of Merchants: a foolish Bird, that forgetteth his Nest, and leaueth his Egges for the Sunne and Sands to hatch, that eateth any thing, euen the hardest Iron: that heareth nothing. They haue Eagles, Parrots, and other Fowles. But none more strange then that which is termed Nir, bigger then a Crane, preying vpon Carrion, and by his flight buryeth his great body in the Clouds that none may see him, whence hee espyeth his prey: and liueth so long, that all his feathers fall away by age, and then is fostered by his young ones.

Other Fowles they haue too tedious to relate, of which let the Reader consult Iohnston, Sanzos, and other Relations in our Voyages published. Grashoppers doe here often renue the Egyptian plague, which come in such quantitie, that they intercept the shining of the Sunne like a Cloud, and hauing eaten the Fruits and Leaues, leaue their spawne behind (worse then their predecessours) deuouring the very barkes of the Leafe-lesse Trees. The old depart none knowes whither: and sometime with a South-East winde are carried into Spaine. The Arabians, and Libyans eate them before they haue spawned, to that end gathering them in the morning, before the Sunne hath dryed their winges, and made them able to flie. One man can e gather foure or fiue bushels in a morning. f Orosius tells, that once they had not onely eaten vp Fruits, Leaues, and Barke while they liued, but being dead, did more harme: for being carried by a wind into the Sea, and the Sea not brooking such morsels, vomiting them vp againe on the shoare, their putrified carkasses caused such a plague, that in Numidia dyed thereof eight hundred thousand: and on the Sea-coast neere Carthage and Vtica, two hundred thousand: and in Vtica it selfe thirtie thousand Souldiers, which had beene mustred for the Garisons of Africa. In one day were carried out of one Gate one thousand and fiue hundred carkasses. They are said to come into Barbarie seuen yeeres together, and other seuen not to come, at which times Corne before so deare, is sold for little, and sometime not vouchsafed the reaping, such is their soyle and plentie. The iuyce of the young is poyson. Plinie cals them a plague of Diuine Anger: they flie saith hee, with such a noyse, that one would take them for other Fowles, and passe ouer huge tracts by Sea and Land. In Italy the people by them haue beene driuen to h Sibyllins remedies for feare of Famine. In Cyrenaica there was a Law made a yeere to warre against them, destroying the Egges first, then the young, and lastly the growne ones. In Lemnos a certaine measure is appointed for each man to bring of them to the Magistrate. And they hold Iayes in high regard, because they kill them with flying against them. In Syria men are compelled to kill them: in Parthia they eate them. The Scriptures also often threaten and mention this plague as Gods great Armie. But otherwhere they seeme strangers: In Æthiopia they haue their principall habitation. Clenard mentioneth their mischiefes about Fez, where they bring Cart-loades of them to sell, the people deuouring these deuourers.

Alvares in his thirtie two, and thirtie three Chapters, tels of these Grashoppers in Æthiopia, that in some places they made the people trusse vp bagge and baggage, and seeke new Habitations where they might finde victuall; The Countrey all Desart and destroyed, and looking as if it had snowed there, by reason of the vnbarked Trees, and the fields of Mais, the great stalkes whereof were troden downe, and broken by them: and in another place, a Tempest of Raine and Thunder left them more then two yards thicke, on the Riuers banks. This he saw with his Eyes. But if we stay a little longer on this subiect, the Reader will complaine of their troublesome companie heere.

The studious of Natures rarities in these parts, may resort to Leo, and others, as also for their further satisfaction in the Fishes and Monsters of the water; as the Hippopotamus, in shape resembling a Horse, in bignesse an Asse, they goe k into the Corne grounds of the Egyptians, and in their feeding goe backwards towards the Riuer, so to beguile men, who looking forwards for them, they meane while conuey themselues into the Water. In l this Riuer of Nilus, in the time of Mauritius, Mena being Gouernour of Egypt, there with many other saw neere the place where Cairo now standeth, a Giantly monster, from the bottome of his belly vpwards aboue the water like altogether to Man with flaxen hayre, frowning Countenance, and strong limbes. Some imagined him to bee Nilus the supposed Riuer-deitie. After hee had continued in the common view of all men three houres, there came forth of the Water another like a Woman with a ſmooth face, her haire partly hanging, and partly gathered into a knot, and blacke of colour; her face very faire, roſie lippes, fingers and breſts well proportioned, but her lower parts hidden in the water: Thus from morning till Sun-ſet, they fedde their greedy eyes with this ſpectacle, which then ſanke downe againe into the Waters. Hondius ſpeakes of a Mermaid taken in the Netherlands, and taught to Spin: I ſweare not to the truth of it. Of Ægypt and the famous Riuer Nilus: and firſt Kings, Temples, and Monuments, according to HERODOTVS, DIODORVS, and others.

§. I.

The names of Ægypt, and of the Riuer Nilus.

AFter our generall view of Africa, Egypt may juſtly challenge the principall place in our African diſcourſe, as being both in ſituation next to Aſia (whence we are lately come) and conſequently from thence firſt peopled; beſides that Religion, our Load-Starre hath heere found the ſooneſt and ſolemneſt entertainment. And not in Religion alone, but in Policie, Philoſophie, and Artes, the Grecians [a] which would ſeeme the firſt Fathers of theſe things, haue beene Diſciples to the Egyptians, as [b] Am. Marcellinus, and D. Siculus, Plutarch, and many others affirme. Hence Orpheus, Muſæus and Homer fetched their Theologie; Lycurgus and Solon their Lawes; Pythagoras; Plato, Anaxagorus, Eudoxus, Democritus, Dedalus, here borrowed that knowledge for which the World hath euer ſince admired them. Let it not then be imputed to me as a tedious officiouſneſſe. If I longer detaine the Reader (otherwiſe delighted with the view of thoſe rils which hence haue flowed among the Greeke and Latine Poets and Philoſophers) in Surueighing theſe Ægyptian Fountaines and Well-ſprings; whence haue iſſued eſpecially a deluge of Superſtition, that in elder times drowned all the neighbouring parts of the World. Nor let it be tedious vnto vs to behold (in this Hiſtoricall Theater) thoſe Egyptian Rarities; the ſight whereof hath drawne not Philoſophers alone but great Princes too, and mightie Emperors, to the vndertaking of long and dangerous journeyes: As [c] Seuerus, who though hee forbad Iudaiſme and Chriſtianite, yet went this Pilgrimage, in honour of Serapis, and for the ſtrange ſights of Memphis, Mimnon, the Pyramides, Labyrinth, &c. Veſpaſian alſo and others did the like.

The name of Egypt (ſaith [d] Ioſephus) is Meſre of Miſraim, the ſonne of Cham, as the Egyptians themſelues are called Meſrei. So the Arabians at this day call it (as Leo [e] affirmeth) but the Inhabitants they call Chibith. This Chibith they ſay was he which firſt ruled this Countrey, and built houſes therein. The Inhabitants alſo doe now call themſelues thus: yet are there not now left any true Egyptians, ſaue a few Chriſtians; the Mahumetans hauing mingled themſelues with the Arabians and Africans. Theſe Chriſtians are hereupon [f] called Cophti, of their Nation, as Maſter Brerewood obſerueth, not of their Religion, which is the ſame with the Iacobites. And the Egyptians in ſome ancient Monuments are tearmed Ægophti: and the name Ægyptus (which ſome deriue from Ægyptus brother of Danaus) is likelier to come of that Ghobth: or this, Ægophti: and all theſe names may ſeeme to borrow borrow their originall from Koptus, a chiefe Citie in Egypt, as both Scaliger g and Lidyat are of opinion, quasi Ai Koptus, * the Land of Koptus so is Æthiops of Ai and Thebeth, or Thebais. Ignatius the Patriarch of Antioch, in an Arabicke Epistle written to Scaliger, calleth Egypt the Land of Kopts, where he speaketh of Æra Kopti, or the computation of yeeres by those Koptite Christians, reckoned from the nineteenth yeere of Diocletian, at which time hee destroyed the Christian Churches, and slue an hundred and forty foure thousand Martyrs in Egypt, and other seuen hundred thousand exiled. Egypt was before called (if wee may beleeue Stephanus i and others) Æria, and otherwise also by the names of Æria, Potamia, Ogygia, Melambolos, Hæphestia, Ethiopia. Some adde k Hepla, as Nilus was also called Melas of the blackenesse. The Riuer was first called Oceanus, then Egyptus, and after that Nilus, and Triton.

Egypt hath on the l East the Gulfe, and some part of Arabia; on the South the fals and Mountaynes of Æthiopia; on the West the Desarts of Libya; on the North, the Mediterranean Sea: all which Nature hath set not only as limits, but as fortifications also to this Countrey. Nilus is by Ouid m called aduena, for his forreine Springs; by Tibullus, fertilis, which supplyeth the place of showres to Egypt, whereupon Claudian sings:

Egyptus sine nube ferax, imbresque serenos Sola tenet, secura poli, non indiga venti:
and Lucan,
Terra suis contenta bonis, non indiga mercis,
Aut Ionis, in solo tanta est fiducia Nilo.

Egypt no raines nor Merchandise doth need,
Nilus doth all her wealth, and plenty breed.

Hereupon the Romanes accounted it their Granary, and the Turke Selym when he conquered it, said, he had now taken n a Farme that would feed his Gemoglans, without it, the earth is sand, perhaps had not beene earth, nor is there aboue one Well of sweet springing water, nor brackish in all Egypt. The water of Nilus is sweet, wholesome, and yeelds no mystie vapours.

n G. Sandys.

This Riuer runneth through the midst thereof, sixty miles from * Cairo, making by diuision of himselfe) that Delta, to which some appropriated the name of Egypt, refuted by Iupiter Ammon, whose Oracle (sayth Herodotus) reckoned all that Egypt, which Nilus ouerflowed. Ptolemaus p numbreth three of those Deltas. Touching the head of q Nilus; Breidenbachius affirmeth, that many Soldans haue sent men on purpose furnished with skill and prouision for the Discouery, who, after two or three yeeres, returning, affirmed that they could find no head of this Riuer, nor could tell any certainty, but that it came from the East, and places not inhabited: both of like truth. And before the Soldans, Sesostris, Cambyses, Alexander, Nero, are reported to haue made search for the head of this Riuer. Neros men by the helpe of the Æthiopians passed farre vp, to large vnpassable Marishes full of weeds, the extents vnknowne. Later Geographers relate, that Nilus ariseth out of a Lake in twelue degrees of Southerly latitude, out of which not onely this Riuer runneth Northwards into the Mediterranean; but Zaire also Westward; Zuama, and Spirito Sancto Eastward, into the Ocean, as is said; all ouerflowing their Territories in the same time, and from the same cause. What this cause should be, many both old and later Writers haue laboured to search. Herodotus, Diodorus, Pliny, and Solinus, haue lent vs the coniectures of Antiquity herein. r Fracastorius and Rhamnsius haue bestowed their Discourses on this Subiect, as Goropius also and others of s later yeeres haue done. The most probable cause is the raines, which t Goropius in his Nilos-copium, deriueth from a double cause. For the Sunne in places neere the Line, doth shew more mighty effects of his fiery presence, exhaling abundance of vapours, which in terrible showers he daily repayeth, except some naturall obstacle doe hinder (as in some places of u Peru, where it seldome or neuer raineth:) And hence it is, that the Indians both East and West, and the Africans reckon their Summer and Winter otherwise then in these parts of the World: for this time of the Sunnes neere presence with them, they call Winter, in regard of these daily stormes; which hee seemes to recompence them with other sixe moneths continuall serenitie and faire weather, not then raysing (by reason of his further absence) any more exhalations then are by himselfe exhausted and consumed, which time for that cause they call Summer. GOROPIVS therefore out of his coniectures telleth vs of a twofold Winter, vnder both Tropikes at the same time; vnder Cancer the rainy Winter, which in manner (as ye haue heard) attends on the Sunne; vnder Capricorne the Astronomicall Winter in the Suns absence, where also he supposeth it to raine at that time, by reason of the high Hils there situate, and the great Lakes which minister store of moisture, besides that Cancer is then in the house of the Moone. Againe, the winds [x] Etesy (that is to say, ordinary euery yeere) in their annuall course, euery Winter lift vp the Cloudes to the tops of the Hils, which melt them into raine, whereby all the Riuers in Æthiopia are filled: and cause those ouer-flowings, which in Nilus is strangest, because it is in Egypt farthest off from the raines that cause it. Aristides [y] sayth, that Aristotle found by his wit, and Alexander by experience, sending men thither for that purpose, that raines were the cause of this ouer-flowing; and that those raines were caused by Etesian winds, which (sayth hee) are by the approching Sunne ingendred in the North parts, and carried to the South, where meeting and multiplying on the tops of the high Æthiopian Hils, they cause raines. Master Sandys affirmeth, that some moneth before this rising of Nilus, for diuers dayes you shall here see the troubled Ayre full of blacke and ponderous Cloudes, and heare a continuall rumbling, threatning to drowne the whole Country, yet seldome so much as dropping, but carried Southward by the North winds that constantly blow at that season. The Egyptians by three Pitchers Hieroglyphically intimated a threefold cause; the Earth, the South Ocean, and these raines. Strange it is, that the Earth of Egypt adioyning to the Riuer, preserued, and weighed daily, keepes the same weight till the seuenteenth of Iune, and then growes daily heauier with the increase of the Riuer: experimented generally affirmed by French, English, and others.

Marcus Fridericus Wendelinus hath written a large Booke, which hee calleth Admiranda Nili, and hath preambled with a pretie Preface Booke of the wonders of water, Saint Ambrose had giuen him a good Text in his Hexaemero. The Sea, saith hee, is good, the hostry of Riuers, the fountaine of showers, the deriuation of ouer-flowings. By it remote Nations are ioyned, danger of battles are removed, Barbarian furie is bounded, it is a helpe in necessitie, in perils a refuge, a delight in pleasures, wholsomnesse to the health, coniunction of men separated, compendiousnesse of trauelling, a shelter of the afflicted; a Subsidie to the publike Treasury, the nourishment of sterilitie. Hence are showres transfused on the Earth, the Sunne drawing the water of the Sea, by his rarifying beames, and exhaling it vp to the colder shadie clouds; there cooled and condensate into showers, which not only temper the drought, but makes fertile the fields. What should I reckon the Ilands, which are as it were embroydered Iewels, in which those which with firme purpose of chastitie put off the secular enticements of intemperance, may chuse to lye hid to the World, and to auoyd the doubtfull turneagaines of this life. The Sea therefore is the Closet of Temperance, the Schoole of Continence, the retyring place of Grauity, the Hauen of Securitie, the time-tempests calme, the sobrietie of the World; the incentiue of deuotion, the voyce of singers contending with the waues, surges, &c.

These prayses of that holy Father giuen to the Sea, may here be set as Prince Nilus his Inheritance, the Oceans eldest sonne, a Riuer of longer course, and further fetched, and more vnknowne pedigree then any Riuer that age of the Ancients knew, and from so equall an arbitriment to three Seas, the West-Atlantike, the East-Indian, and vnknowne-South running so many degrees to the North, in pilgrimage to that holy ground where Christ himselfe had sought refuge, and whence by a mightie hand God had deliuered Israel, and in whose waters Moses made the beginning of the Egyptian plagues. For more holinesse was in Christs feet, then could be vnholinesse in Egypts elder Idolatries, or later Mahumetan Furies; and yet those precious feet impart no holinesse to the ground or men, where Faith receiueth not what thence readily floweth. Still doth Nilus visit, and euer forsakes those whom Christ visited, and which haue forsaken Christ, as drowning himselfe for anguish, or vnder the Seas bottome to seeke close and priuate Intelligence with Iordan, where the waters are as pestiferous in that Dead Sea, as were the deeds Deuillish which ouerwhelmed the Sodomites Region therein, and from the neighbouring Region chased the Canaanites first, and after the carnall Israelites. But I am almost drowned also betwixt these places of Diuine Iudgement. Wendelinus hath giuen vs the elder names Schichor, μέλας ἀπὸς, Oceanus, Ægyptus, Triton, Astaboras, Iupiter Ægyptius, Gichon, Syris, Chrysorrhoas, Neym, Mahara, Abbabuius, Syene, Dyris. Hee tels vs also the originall (out of the Negus his Title) to be in Goyome, a Countrey subiect to the Abassine: argueth against the conceits of those which make Nilus one of the Riuers of Paradise, and Philosophically discourseth of the ouer-flowing, the mouthes and issues, and the qualities thereof, but so largely that I rather referre the studious to him, then presume hence to enlarge this Discourse already tedious. He hath packed his Booke as a full store-house of ancient and moderne, Ethnike and Christian authorities of all kindes in this Argument. manifold speculations thereon. It seemeth not without cause that the name Paper is deriued from Papyrus, growing in Nilus; so much Paper hath hir writer of her. He deriueth Nilus from two Lakes, which I dare not aduenture, there are so many Hippopotami, and Crocodiles therein. The ouer-flowing is common to most Riuers vnder the Line, to Zaire, and diuers Riuers of Africa (but the cause and effect are in shorter streames more euident) to Gambra also whose ouer-flowing is as obscure on the Guinea Coast as Nilus on the Egyptian) likewise to Menan of Pegu, and Indus (which Philostratus in diuers other things compares to Nilus) and the Riuer of Siam in Asia, and to the Riuers of Amazones, and Guiana in America. Frier [z] Luys de Urreta ascribeth the ouer-flowing to some secret passages and pores, whereby the Ocean, and the Mountaynes of the Moone hold mutuall commerce. This increase of Nilus continueth forty dayes or more, after which followeth the decrease as long. In the middle of Nilus (sayth [a] Leo) ouer against the old City of Cairo, standeth the Ile Michias, or the measuring Ile, containing one thousand, and fiue hundred Families, and a Temple, and a foure-square Cisterne of eighteene [b] Cubits depth, whereinto the water of Nilus is conueyed by a certaine sluce vnder the ground, in the midst whereof is a Pillar marked also with eighteene Cubits, to which Officers for the purpose resort daily from the seuenteenth of Iune, to obserue the increase, which if it amount to fifteene Cubits, and there stay, it doth portend fertilitie, and how much ouer or vnder, so much lesse abundance. In the meane time the people deuoutly exercise Prayer and Almes-giuing: And after, the price of victuals (especially of Corne) is proportionably appointed for the whole yeere. The Cities and Townes of Egypt, whiles this inundation lasteth, are so many Ilands. Master Sandys [c] writes, that it begins to arise with the arising Sunne on the seuenteenth of Iune, swelling by degrees, till it mounts sometimes foure and twenty Cubits, but that the vttermost. Heretofore seuenteene was the most that it attayned to, presented by that Image of Nilus hauing seuenteene children playing about it: brought from hence by Vespasian, and dedicated in his Temple of Peace, still to bee seene in the Vatican at Rome. That yeere when he was there, it did rise at Cairo three and twentie Cubits about two miles aboue the Citie; at the end of old Cairo, in the beginning of August they cut the bankes (for sooner, it would destroy the vnreaped fruits) the Bassa himselfe in person giuing the first stroke; a world of people attending Boates, or in Pauillions on the shoare, with night triumphs and reioycings, welcoming in the Riuer into the Land diuers dayes together. The Bassa feasts three dayes in the Castle of Michias. In the nights their many lights (placed in buildings erected of purpose for this solemnity) make a glorious shew. These lights are said to succeed the Deuillish Sacrifices of a young Man and a Mayd, wonted to be offered at this time to Osiris and Isis; euery night they haue fire-workes: Euery Turke of account hath a gallant Boat adorned with Streamers, Chambers, and the Lights artificially set, to represent Castles, Ships, Houses, or other formes: in the day making Sea-fights, others practising like exercises on land. The soyle is sandy and vnprofitable, the Riuer both moystening and manuring it. Yea, if there dye in Cairo fiue thousand of the plague the day before, yet on the first of the Riuers increase, the plague not only decreaseth, but meerely ceaseth, not one dying the day after: which we haue elsewhere ascribed to the Sunnes entrance into Leo. The land is otherwise a very Desart, as appeared two yeeres together when Cleopatra raigned, Nilus not ouer-flowing, and in Iosephs seuen yeeres of famine, the Riuer being part of Pharaohs Dreame, by which he stood, and out of which the fat and leane [d] Kine ascended.

And thus, sayth Herodotus, The Land of Egypt doth not onely owe the fertility, but her selfe also vnto the slimy increase of Nilus: for [e] raine is a stranger in this Countrey, seldome seene, and yet oftner then welcome: as vnwholesome to the Inhabitants. Pharus, by Homer mentioned farre off in the Sea, is now adioyning to the Continent. The mouthes or falls of Nilus, numbred by the Prophet Esay, [f] and other in old times, seuen; and after Plinie (who reckoneth the foure smaller) eleuen: are now (as Willielmus Tyrius out of his owne search testifieth) but foure, or as other Writers, but three worthy of consideration: Rosetto, Balbetina, Damiata, where the saltnesse of the earth and shels found in it, may seeme to confirme Herodotus opinion, that Nilus hath wonne it from the Sea; which Goropius laboureth to confute. Aristotle [g] doth not onely auerre the former opinion with Herodotus, but addes, that all the mouthes of Nilus, except that of Canopus, may seeme to be the labour of men, and not naturall Channels to the Riuer Royall computation at Mizraim. If our Berosus which Annius hath set forth, were of authoritie, [k] hee telleth, that Cham, the sonne of Noah, was by his father banished for particular abuse of himselfe, and publike corruption of the World, teaching and practising those vices, which before had procured the Deluge, as Sodomie, Incest, Buggerie: and was therefore branded with the name Chemesenua, that is, Dishonest Cham, in which the Egyptians followed him, and reckoned him among their gods by the name of [l] Saturne, consecrated him a Citie, called Chemmis. The Psalmes of [m] Dauid doe also thus intitle Egypt, The land of Cham: which name was retayned by the Egyptians themselues in Ieromes [n] dayes. Chemmis, after Diodorus, was hallowed to Pan, and the word signifieth Pans Citie. In Herodotus his time it was a great Towne in Thebais, hauing in it a Temple of Perseus, square, and set round with Palme-trees, with a huge porch of stone, on which were two great statues, and in it a Chappell, with the Image of Perseus. The Inhabitants want not their miraculous Legend, of the Apparitions of their god, and had a relique of his, a sandale of two cubits which hee sometimes ware; they celebrate festiuall games in his honour, after the Greeke manner. Herodotus also mentioneth an Iland called Chemmis, with the Temple of Apollo in it. Some say, [o] Thebes was called in their Holies, Chemia, or Chamia: and all [p] Egypt was sometime called Thebes.

Lucian [q] saith, the Egyptians were the first that had Temples, but their Temples had no Images. Their first Temples are reported [r] to haue beene erected in the time of [s] Osiris and Isis, whose parents were Iupiter and Iuno, children to Saturne and Rhea, who succeeded Vulcan in this Kingdome. They built a magnificent Temple to Iupiter and Iuno, and two other golden Temples to Iupiter Cœlestis, and Iupiter Ammon, or Cham, which wee before spake of, instituting vnto them Priests and golden statues. Menas is reckoned the first King after those Demi-gods, [t] who built a Temple to Vulcan, and taught the people to sacrifice, and other rites of Religion. Long after him, Busiris built Thebes, which was [u] said to haue an hundred Gates, and many stately erections of Temples, Colosses, Obeliskes; by the one name they call their more then giantly Images; by the other, their pillars of one stone, fashioned like a needle. Pomponius Lætus, and Martianus, speake of two of these Obeliskes with hieroglyphicall inscriptions, carryed from Hieropolis in Egypt by Augustus to Rome, the one fourescore foote high, the other an hundred and thirtie, which was broken in the rayfing. Plinie mentions these and others at Rome, one of which hee made serue for the measuring of the Sunnes shadow in Campus Martius, in Dyall-wise. He speaketh of an Obeliske at Thebes made and rayfed by twentie thousand men.

Of foure Temples, there was one containing in circuit thirteene furlongs, in height fiue and fortie cubits, the wall foure and twentie foote thicke. The ornaments answered to the structure. But the Gold, Siluer, Iuorie, and Iewels were taken away by the Persians, when Cambyses burned the Egyptian Temples. Out of those fires, they report, flowed three hundred talents of gold, and [x] two thousand and three hundred of siluer. Amongst the seuen and fortie Sepulchres of their Kings, that of Simandius was reckoned most sumptuous, the gates whereof were two hundred foote long, and fiue and fortie cubits high: within was a square Cloyster, containing in each square foure hundred foote, borne vp with statues of beasts in stead of pillars, of sixteene cubits, the roofe made of stones, of two paces broad, beautified with starres. Then was there another gate like to the former, but fuller of worke, with three huge statues to himselfe, his mother and daughter. Within this was another Cloyster more beautifull then the former. But for the particulars of these things, let our Reader resort to Diodorus Siculus, who partly from the Priests relations, and in great part from his owne sight, deliuereth them at large. He addeth, that there was an inscription containing the cost and charges hereof to be three thousand and two hundred millions of Minæ. These summes are admirable, and scarcely to bee paralleld in any Historie, excelling euen those summes which Dauid left Salomon for the Temple, and onely surmounted by those which Sardanapalus is said to haue consumed together with himselfe in his funerall fire. For if we account euery Mina three pound two shillings and sixe pence, as Master Brerewood hath obserued of the Atticke Mina, out of many Authors, (which yet is lesse then the Egyptian, and but halfe so much as that of the Hebrewes and Alexandrians) it comes to ten thousand millions of our pounds: a summe incredible, improbable, that I say not impossible. Yea, neither are those things credible which Ctesias tells of Sardanapalus, which Brerewood summeth after the Attick Talent, at two and twentie thousand and fiue hundred millions of pounds in gold, and eighteene thousand two hundred and fiftie millions of pounds in siluer. Euen in those things also which the sacred Historie auoucheth of Dauid, howsoeuer the truth is beyond all names of certaintie, yet the interpretation of that truth is not fully agreed vpon, as we haue elsewhere shewed.

This cost of Samandius, although inlarged in the telling, doth not disagree to that Egyptian tian opinion, esteeming their houses their Innes, and their Sepulchres their eternall habitations. Of the race of Simandus was Ogdous, that built [e] Memphis (called in the Scripture Noph) compassing a hundred and fifty furlongs, at the parting of Nilus into that Delta diuision, where the succeeding Kings abode, forsaking Thebes till Alexandria was after built by Alexander.

[e] In 69.51.& 29.50.

Thebes was called Diospolis, or Iupiters City, where (as Strabo [f] reporteth) was consecrated to Iupiter a beautifull Virgin of noble birth, who, vntill the time that shee had her naturall purgation, had the carnall company of whomsoeuer shee pleased, and at this her menstruous accident was bewayled as dead, and after married. Such Virgins the Greeks (sayth he) called Palladas. Many yeeres after Ogdous, succeeded Sesostris. [g] Iosephus is of opinion, that Herodotus erred in the name, and ascribed the deeds of [h] Shishak to Sesostris; to which also the computation of Herodotus doth agree reasonably in the time. [i] Others account him the same with Sesachis in Diodorus. The huge Conquests of this Sesostris are beyond all that euer Alexander atchieued, if we credit Authors. At his returne he builded in euery City of Egypt a Temple to their chiefe God at their owne costs, and offered a ship of Cedar two hundred and eighty Cubits in length, gilded on the inside, siluered on the outside, to the chiefe God at Thebes, and two Obeliskes one hundred and twenty Cubits high, wherein were ingraued the greatnesse of his Empire and Reuenues. At Memphis in the Temple of Vulcan he dedicated Statues of himselfe and his wife, thirty Cubits high, of his children twenty. And when he went to the Temple, or through the City, his Chariot was drawne by Kings, as Lucan singeth:

Tacitus [l] telleth of Rhameses an Egyptian King, who conquered the East and South parts of the World, helped herein (as the Priests told Germanicus) with the forces of Thebes, who had then seuen hundred thousand fighting men. This was written in Egyptian Characters at Thebes, interpreted by one of the Priests, together with his reuenues not inferiour to the Romane or Parthian Empires. Pheron, the Sonne and Successor of Sesostris, enraged at the rage of Nilus, swelling aboue eighteene Cubits, cast a Dart against the streame, [m] and thereupon lost his sight, which by the aduice of the Oracle in Butis, was restored by the vrine of a woman, which had neuer knowne man but her husband: which caused him to burne his owne wife, and many other, fayling in this new experiment, and to marry her whom at last he found by this proofe to be honest. He set vp in the Temple of the Sunne two Pillars, each of one stone of 100. Cubits high, and eight broad. After succeeded Memphites, Rhasinitus, and Cheopes. This last shut vp all the Temples in Egypt and busied them in his owne workes, one hundred thousand by course ten yeeres together, in building a Pyramis for his Sepulchre. The least stone was thirty foot, and all grauen. Nilus passeth vnder it by a Trench. It was reckoned among the Wonders of the World. His daughter and brother made two other; odious therefore to the Egyptians who will not once name them. This was hollow, the other solid. They did it (sayth he) in hope of the Resurrection. For they would not interre their dead bodies, because of the Wormes; nor burne them, because they esteemed fire; a liuing creature, which feeding thereon, must together with it perish. They therefore with Nitre and Cedar, or with compositions of Myrrhe, Cassia, and other Odours thus preserue them. Scaliger sayth, [n] they set these bodies in their dining Roomes, that their Children and Nephewes might behold them whiles they were eating. Some also report, [o] That the poorer sort vsed hereunto the slimy Bitumen of the Dead Sea, which had preserued an infinite number of Carcasses in a dreadfull Caue (not farre from these Pyramides) yet to bee seene with their flesh and members whole, after so many thousand yeeres, and some with their haire and teeth: Of these is the true Mummia.

The Mores and Indians violate the Sepulchres: and either burne them, (as is reported they somtimes doe, in stead of fire-wood, which is scarce in those parts) or else sell them at Cairo, a body for a Dolor, the Citie being high twenty miles from thence. For these Mummies are neere the place where Memphis sometimes stood. In that place are some indifferent great, and a number of little Pyramides with Tombes of seuerall fashions; many ruinated, and many violated: the ancient Egyptians coueting there to bee buried, as the place supposed to conteine the the body of Osiris. Vnder euery one, or whereſoeuer lye ſtones not naturall to the place, by remouing the ſame, deſcents are diſcouered like the narrow mouthes of Wels, hauing holes in each ſide of the walls, to deſcend by (but with troubleſome paſſage) ſome well-nigh ten fadome deepe, leading into long Vaults (belonging, it ſhould ſeeme, to particular Families) hewen out of the Rock with pillars of the ſame. Betweene euery arch the corpſes lye ranckt one by another, ſhrowded in a number of folds of linnen, ſwathled in bands of the ſame, the breſts of ſome being ſtayned with hieroglyphicall Characters. Within their bellies are painted papers, and their gods inclоſed in little models of ſtone or metall: ſome of the ſhape of men in coat-armours, with the heads of Sheepe, Hawkes, Dogs, &c. others of Cats, Beetles, Monkies, and ſuch like. They wrapt the dead bodies in manifold folds of linnen beſmeared with gumme, and after other ceremonies laid the corps in a boat to be wafted ouer Acheruſia, a Lake on the South ſide of the Citie by Charon (ſo they called the Ferry-man) and there the body was brought before certayne Iudges, who, if conuinced of euill life, depriued it of buriall; the moſt terrible of puniſhments to the Egyptians. About this Lake ſtood the Temple of Hecate, with the Ports of Cocitus and Lethe, or Oblivion: Styx and other Poeticall fables had hence their deriuation. But let vs returne to the Pyramides, and view them as they now ſtand, with Maſter Sandys his eyes: hauing firſt told a miracle, or impoſture rather of the Moores with pieces of Mummies ſtucke in the ſands, many thouſands on Good Friday reſorting to ſee the armes and legs of dead men appearing on the other ſide of Nilus, to the gayne of the Ferry-men, for this cauſe perhaps, deluding the ſuperſtitious vulgar. Baumgarten mentions it in his time, and thought it an illuſion of the Deuill: whether Hee, or His, wee will not now examine.

Full weſt from Cairo, cloſe vpon the Libyan Deſarts, hauing croſſed Nilus, and a Playne twelue miles ouer, they came to the three Pyramides, the greateſt of them is aſcended by two hundred and fiftie fiue ſteps, each ſtep aboue three feet high, of a breadth proportionable. No ſtone ſo little through the whole; as to bee drawne by our carriages, brought out of the Mountaynes of Arabia, with a double wonder of the conueyance and mounting. The North ſide is moſt worne by reaſon of the humiditie of the Northerne winde in theſe parts. From the top is diſcerned the Countrey, with her beloued Nile, the Mummes and many huge Pyramides afarre off, each of which, were this away, might be reputed wonderfull. Deſcending on the Eaſt ſide, below from each corner equally diſtant, they approched the entrance, into which they went with a light in euery mans hand: a narrow and dreadfull paſſage, ſtooping or creeping, as downe the ſteepe of an hill an hundred foote, the deſcent ſtill continuing, but few daring to venter further. (Plinie writes, that at the bottome is a ſpacious pit, eightie and ſixe cubits deepe, filled at the outflow by concealed Conduits; others adde, that there is in the middeſt a little Iland, on that the Tombe of Cheops the Founder.) Maſter Sandys ſaith, That climbing ouer the mouth of this dungeon, they aſcended by like vneaſie paſſage about an hundred and twentie feete; and thence paſſing through a long irkeſome entrie direct forward, they came to a little roome with a compaſt roofe of poliſhed marble. From hence they climbed an hundred and twentie feete higher, at the top entring a goodly roome twentie foote wide, and fortie foote long; the roofe of a maruailous height, the ſtones ſo great, that eight floores it, eight roofes it, eight flagge the ends, and ſixteene the ſides, all of well wrought Theban marble. At the vpper end is a Tombe of one ſtone, vncouered and emptie, breſt high, ſeuen foote in length, and almoſt foure in breadth, ſounding like a bell, more probably ſuppoſed the Builders ſepulchre. If any deſire a more exact ſuruey, let him reſort to our Authour, and other eye and pen-witneſſes. Not farre hence is that Sphynx, a huge Coloſſe, with the head of a Maide, and body of a Lion, ſuppoſed by Bellonius, to be the monument of ſome ſepulchre, by Plinie, of Amaſis. It yet continueth all of one ſtone, and is a huge face, looking toward Cairo. The compaſſe of the head, ſaith P. Martyr * an eye-witneſſe, is fiftie eight paces. Plinie numbreth eight Pyramides, and ſaith, That the compaſſe of this Sphynx, about the head, was an hundred and two feete, the length an hundred and fortie three. Maſter Sandys affirmeth, that vnto the mouth it conſiſts of the naturall Rocke, thus aduanced; the reſt of huge flat ſtones laid thereon, wrought altogether into the forme of an Æthiopian woman (heretofore adored by the people) not ſo huge as before reported, the whole being but ſixtie foote high: the face diſfigured by Time, or the Moores ſuperſtition, deteſting Images. Plinie writes, That three hundred and ſixtie thouſand men were twentie yeeres in making one of the Pyramides; and three were made in ſeuentie eight yeeres and foure moneths. The greateſt (ſaith he) couereth eight Acres of ground; and Bellonius affirmeth, That the Pyramides rather exceed, then fall ſhort of the reports of the Ancient; and that a ſtrong and cunning Archer on the top, is not able to ſhoot beyond the fabrick of one; which Villamont, being there, cauſed to bee tried and found true. William Lithgow writeth, that the height of one is 1092. foote, [b] as their Dragoman told him: the top thereof is all one

c Sandys hath three stones, one c stone, which he measured seuenteene foote in euery square, yet on the ground seemed as sharpe as a pointed Diamond. The other are lower, and want steps to ascend on them. They are of marble. But I would be loth to burie the Reader in these sumptuous monuments, the witnesses of vanitie and ostentation; of which, besides the Ancient, Martyr, Bellonius, Eueſham, Villamont, and other eye-witnesses haue largely written.

d Porcharch in his Funerali Antichi Tau. 12. hath set forth this in picture. Hont. Cos. lib. 3. Reg. 23. 29.

Mycerinus is reckoned the next King, better beloued of his subiects, whose daughter was buried in a woodden Bull d in the Citie Sai; to which euery day were odors offered, and a light set by night. This Oxe once a yeere was brought out to the people. Next to him was Asychis, who made a Pyramis of bricks; and these bricks were made of earth, that claue to the end of a pole for this purpose, in a vaine curiositie thrust into a Lake. Yet were all these wonders exceeded by the Labyrinth, the worke (say some) of Psammetichus, or (after Herodotus) of the twelue Peeres which raigned in common as Kings; partly aboue ground, partly beneath, in both containing 3500. roomes. Herodotus saith, he saw the vpper roomes, the lower he might not, as being the sepulchres of the Founders, and of the sacred Crocodiles: all was of stone, and grauen. The cause of making this Labyrinth is diuersly deliuered; by Demoteles, the Palace of Mothetudes; by Lysias, the sepulchre of Meris; the most probable opinion, that it was consecrated to the Sunne: the paterne to Dedalus, for that in Crete, representing but the hundreth part of this. The entrance was of Parian marble pillars. The worke was diuided into Regions e and perfectures, sixteene vast houses being attributed to sixteene of them. There were also Temples for all the Ægyptian gods; and Nemeses aboue in fifteene Chappels: many Pyramides also, each of fortie elles, and founded on sixe walls. After a wearie iourney they come to those inexplicable wayes (the Labyrinth of this Labyrinth) hauing before ascended high Halls and Galleries, each of ninetie steps, finely adorned with pillars of Porphyrie, Images of their Gods, statues of Kings, and monstrous shapes. Some of the houses were so seated, that the opening of the doores caused a terrible thunder: As terrible was the darke wayes: and most of all, without a guide, the inextricable windings, infolded walls, and manifold deceiuing doores; making by many passages, none at all. No cement or morter was vsed in all this huge worke.

The Lake of Meris was not lesse wonderfull, compassing three thousand sixe hundred furlongs, and fiftie fadome in depth, made by Meris whose name it beareth: in the middest were two Pyramides fiftie fadome aboue, and as much beneath water, one for himselfe, the other for his wife. The water flowes sixe moneths out, and sixe moneths in, from Nilus. The fish were worth to the Kings coffers twentie of their pounds a day, the first sixe; and a talent a day, the last sixe moneths. Of Necus, whom the Scripture calls Pharaoh Necho, and of his victorie against the Syrians in Magdolo, or Magiddo, where he slue King Iosiah, Herodotus witnesseth. Hee also makes this Necus authour of that Trench; from Nilus to the Red Sea (which Strabo ascribes to Sesostris. Plinie f makes Sesostris first Authour, seconded by Darius, who in this businesse was followed by Ptolemaus) one hundred foot broad, seuen and thirtie miles long; but forced to leaue the enterprise, for feare of the Red Sea ouer-flowing Egypt, or mixing his water with Nilus.

Tremellius thinkes it to be the labour of the Israelites, in that seruitude from which Moses freed them. He consumed in this worke 120000. Egyptians. After him reigned Sammi, and then Apries. About these times g Nabuchodonosor conquered the Egyptians according to Ezechiels prophecie, Ezech. 30. But they had also ciuill warres. Amasis h depriued Apries, who, being of a base birth, of a great bason of gold in which himselfe and his guests had vsed to wash their feete, made an Image and placed it in the most conuenient part of the Citie, and obseruing their superstitious deuotion thereunto, said that they ought now no lesse to respect him, notwithstanding his former base birth and offices. When hee was a priuate man, to maintayne his prodigall expenses, he vsed to steale from others: and when they redemanded their owne, he committed himselfe to the censure of their Oracles. Such Oracles as neglected his thefts, hee being a King, did neglect. Hee brought from the Citie Elephantina twentie dayes sayling, a building of solid stone, the roofe being of one stone, one and twentie cubits long, fourteene broad, and eight thicke, and brought it to the Temple at Sai. Hee ordayned, that euery one should yeerly giue account to the Magistrate, how hee liued, and maintayned himselfe. And he which brought a false account, or liued by vniust meanes, was put to death. Hee was buried, as was supposed, in that Sphynx aboue said. Psammenitus his sonne succeeded, whom Cambyses depriued.

CHAP. III.

Of the Ægyptian Idols, with their Legendarie Histories, and Mysteries.

§. I.

Of Osiris and Isis, their Legends of the Creation, &c.

IF we stay longer on this Ægyptian Stage, partly the varietie of Authors may excuse vs which haue entreated of this Subiect, partly the varietie of matter, which adding some light to the Diuine Oracles, (not that they need it, which are in themselues a Light a shining in a darke place; but because of our need, whose Owlish-eyes cannot so easily discerne that light) deserue a larger relation. For whether the Histories of the old Testament, or the Prophecies of the New, be considered, both there literally wee reade of Ægyptian Rites practised, and here mystically of like Superstitions in the Antichristian Synagogue reuiued; therefore b spiritually called Sodome and Ægypt. No where can Antiquitie plead a longer succession of error; no where of Superstition more multiplicitie; more blind zeale, in prosecuting the same themselues; or crueltie in persecuting others that gaine-laid. Oh Ægypt! wonderfull in Nature, whose Heauen is brasse, and yet thine Earth not Yron; wonderfull for Antiquitie, Artes and Armes; but no way to wonderfull, as in thy Religions, wherewith thou hast disturbed the rest of the World, both elder and later, Heathen and Christian, to which thou hast beene a sinke and Mother of Abhominations. Thy Heathenisme planted by Cham, watered by Iannes, Iambres, Hermes, ouerflowed to Athens and Rome: Thy Christianisme was famous for many ancient Fathers; more infamous for that Arrian hereste, which rising heere, eclipsed the Christian Light; the World wondring and groaning to see it selfe an Arrian. I speake not of the first Monkes, whose Egge, here laide, was faire, and beginnings holy: but (by the Diuels brooding) brought forth in after-ages a dangerous Serpent: Thy Mahumetisme entertained with like lightnesse of credulitie, with like eagernesse of deuotion, hath beene no lesse troublesome to the Arabian Sect in Asia and Afrike, then before to the Heathens or Christians in Europe. The first Author (it seemeth) of this Egyptian, as of all other false Religions, was Cham (as before is said) which had taken deepe rooting in the dayes of Ioseph the Patriarch, and in the dayes of Moses; their Priests, c Wisemen and Southsayers, confirming their deuotions with lying Miracles, as the Scriptures testifie of Iannes and Iambres; and d Hermes Trismegistus, of his Grandfather and himselfe. The Grecians ascribe these deuotions to Osiris and Isis: of whom the Historie and Mysterie is so confused; that Typhon neuer hewed Osiris into so many pieces, as these vaine Theologians and Mythologians haue done. They are forsooth in the Egyptian throne, King and Queene: in the Heauens, the Sunne and Moone: beneath these, the Elements; after Herodotus, they are Bacchus and Ceres: Diodorus maketh Osiris the same with the Sunne, Serapis, Dionysius, Pluto, Ammon, Iupiter, Isis, the Moone, Ceres and Iuno, Appollodorus makes her Ceres: and Io. Antonius, and Cleopatra stiled and figured themselues, the one Osiris, and the other Isis. In Macrobius, and Seruius, she is the nature of things; * He, Adonis, and Atis: Plutarch addeth to these Interpretations Oceanus and Sirius, as to Isis, Minerua, Proserpina, Thetis. And if you haue not enough, Apuleius will helpe you, with Venus, Diana, Bellona, Hecate, Rhamnusia: and Heliodorus neerer home, maketh Osiris to be Nilus, the Earth Isis. So true it is that e An Idoll is nothing in the world, and Idolaters worship they know not what. Stampellus interpreteth Osiris to be Abraham, and Isis to bee Sarah, whom Moses calleth also Ischa. Orus Apollo, or Horapollo saith, Isis is the Starre called of the Egyptians Sothis, which is the Dog-starre, therefore called Isis, because at the first rising of that Starre, they prognosticated what should happen the yeere following. The like was in vse amongst the Cilicians, who obserued the first rising of that starre from the top of Taurus, and thence saith Manilius,

Euentus fruges varios & tempora dicunt,
Quaq; valitudo veniat, concordia quanta, &c.
Thence they foretell what store of fruits or want,
What times, what health, what concord, they descant.

Tully in the first Booke of his Diuination, reciteth the same out of Heraclides, Ponticus of the Cei. But the Egyptians had more cause to obserue that Starre, because Nilus doth then begin to encrease. And therefore from thence they began to reckon their Tekuphas or quarters of their yeere, as the Iewes from Nisan.

But to search this Fountaine further, you may read the Egyptian opinion in Diodorus, f how that the World, being framed out of that Chaos, or first matter, the lighter things ascending, the heauier descending, the Earth yet imperfect, was heated and hardened by the Sunne; whose violent heat begate of her slimie softnesse certaine putride swellings, couered with a thinne filme, which being by the same heat ripened, brought forth all manner of creatures. This muddie generation was (say they) first in Egypt most fit (in respect of the strong soyle, temperate ayre, Nilus ouerflowing, and exposed to the Sunne) to beget and nourish them; and still retayning some such vertue at the new slaking of the Riuer, the Sunne then more desirous (as it were) of this Egyptian Concubine, whom the waters had so long detained from his sight, ingendring in that lustfull fit many Creatures, as Mice and others, whose fore-parts are seene mouing before the hinder are formed. These new-hatched people could not but ascribe Diuinitie to the Author of their Humanitie, by the names of Osiris and Isis, worshipping the Sunne and Moone, accounting them to be gods, and euerlasting: adding in the same Catalogue, vnder disguised names of Iupiter, Vulcan, Minerua, Oceanus, and Ceres, the fiue Elements of the World, Spirit, Fire, Ayre, Water, and Earth. These Eternall Gods begot others, whom not Nature, but their owne proper Merit made immortall, which reigned in Egypt, and bare the names of those cœlestiall Deities. Their Legend of g Osiris, is, that he hauing set Egypt in order, leauing Isis his wife Gouernour, appointing Mercurie her Counsellour (the inuenter of Arithmeticke, Musicke, Physicke, and of their superstition) made an Expedition into farre Countries, hauing Hercules for his Generall, with Apollo his brother, Anubis and Macedon his sonnes, (whose Ensignes were a Dog and a Wolfe, creatures after for this cause honoured, and their counterfeits worshipped) Pan, * Maron, and Triptolemus, and the nine Muses attending with the Satyres. Thus did hee inuade the world, rather with Arts, then Armes; teaching men Husbandry in many parts of Asia and Europe, and where Vines would not grow, to make drinke of Barley. At his returne his brother Typhon slew him, rewarded with like death by the reuenging hand of Isis and her sonne Orus. The dispersed pieces, into which Typhon had cut him, shee gathered and committed to the Priests, with injunction to worship him, with dedication vnto him of what beast they best liked, which also should be obserued with much ceremonie, both aliue and dead, in memorie of Osiris. In which respect also h they obserued solemnely to make a lamentable search for Osiris with many teares, making semblance of like ioy at his pretended finding, whereof Lucan singeth, Nunquamq; satis quæsitus Osiris; alway seeking (saith Lactantius) and alway finding. To establish this Osirian Religion, shee consecrated a third part of the Land in Egypt for maintenance of these superstitious rites and persons: the other two parts appropriated to the King, and his Souldiers. This Isis, after her death, was also deified in a higher degree of adoration then Osiris selfe. One thing is lacking to our tale, which was also lacking a long time to Isis in her search. For when shee had with the helpe of waxe made vp of sixe and twentie parts, which she found, so many Images of Osiris, all buried in seuerall places: his priuities, which Typhon had drowned in Nilus, were not without much labor found, and with more solemnitie interred. And that the Deuill might shew how farre hee can beset men, the Image i hereof was made and worshipped; the light of this darkenesse shining as farre as Greece, whose Phallus, Phallogogia, Ithiphalli, Phallophoria, and Phallaphori issued out of this sincke, together with their Membrous monster Priapus. Yea, the Egyptians hauing lost their owne eyes in this filthy superstition, bestowed them on the Image of Osiris his stones, which they pourtrayed with an eye.

Athenæus k telleth of Ptol. Philadelphus in a solemnitie, wherein hee listed to shew to the world his madnesse; or (as it was then esteemed) his magnificence (a place worth the reading to them, who are not heere glutted with our tedious Egyptian Banquet) He among many sumptuous spectacles presented a l Phallus of gold, painted, with golden crownes, of an hundred and twentie cubits length, hauing a golden starre on the toppe, whose circumference was sixe cubites. This was carried in a Chariot, as in others the Image of Priapus, and other Idols. Of Typhon the Poets m fable, that after the Gods, by the helpe of mortall men, had slaine the Giants, the Earth in indignation for the losse of that her Giantly brood, lying with Tartarus, brought forth Typhon, which exceeded all the former: for his height surmounted the Mountaines, his head reached to the Starres, one of his hands to the West, the other to the East, from which proceeded an hundred heads to Dragons: his legges were entwined with rolles of Vipers, which reached to his head, filling the world with terrible hissings: his body couered with feathers, his eyes flaming with fire, a flame streaming also out of his mouth. Thus was hee armed, and fought against Heauen, and made the Gods runne away into Egypt, and turne themselues into many formes: with many tales more whilst I surcease to rehearse.

possessed by Card. Bembus, full of mysticall Characters, explained by Laurentius Pignorius in a Treatise of this Argument, may further acquaint the desirous Reader. Diodorus thinketh this the cause why they consecrated Goats, and erected Images of Satyres in their Temples; affirming that their Priests are first initiated in these bawdie Rites.

§. II.

The causes of Consecrating their Beasts, and the mysticall sences of their Superstitions.

THeir canonized Beasts, of which the Ægyptians and Syrians, (saith o Tully) conceiued stronger opinions of Deuotion, then the Romans of their most sacred Temples, were p Dogges, Cats, Wolues, Crocodiles, Ichnumons, Rammes, Goates, Bulls, and Lions, in honour of Isis: their sacred Birds were the Hawke, Ibis, Phœnicopterus: besides Dragons, Aspes, Beetles, amongst things creeping: and of Fishes, whatsoeuer had scales; and the Eele. Yea their reason did not onely to sensible things ascribe Diuinitie, but Garlike and Onions were free of their Temples, derided therefore by q Iuuenal,

Porrum & cœpe nefas violare & frangere morsu:
O sanctas gentes quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis Numina.

For this cause some r thinke the Hebrewes were in such abhomination to the Ægyptians, that they would not eate with them, as eating and sacrificing those things, which the other worshipped. Example whereof Diodorus, an eye-witnesse telleth, That when Ptolemey gaue entertainment to the Romans, whose friend hee was declared; a Roman, at vnawares hauing killed a Cat, could not by the Kings authoritie, sending Officers for his rescue, nor for feare of the Romans, bee detayined from their butcherly furie. For such was their custome for the murther of those sacred Creatures, to put to death by exquisite torments him that had done it wittingly, and for the Bird Ibis and a Cat, although vnwittingly slaine. And therefore if any espie any of them lying dead, hee standeth aloofe, lamenting and protesting his owne innocencie. The cause of this blinde zeale, was the metamorphosis of their distressed Gods into these shapes; Secondly, their ancient Ensignes; Thirdly, the s profit of them in common life. Origen t addeth a fourth, because they were vsed to diuination, and therefore (saith hee) forbidden to the Israelites as vncleane. Eusebius out of the Poet citeth a fifth cause, namely, the Diuine Nature diffused into all Creatures, after that of the Poet:

Deum namq; ire per omnes
Terrasq; tractusq; maris, cœlumq; profundum.
God goes thorow Sea and Land, and lofty Skies.

I might adde a sixth, that μετεμψύχωσις or transanimation, u which Pythagoras (it seemeth) borrowed hence and from India. Yea, Æneas Gazeus x a Platonike, in his Theophrastus or Dialogue of the Soules immortalitie, affirmeth, That Plato learned this opinion of the Egyptians, and dispersed it through all his Bookes; as did Plotinus and other his followers after him, nor bring amongst the rest Porphyrius, and Iamblichus.

If I might, with the Readers patience, I would adde somewhat of their Mysterie of iniquitie, and this mysticall sense of this iniquitie. For as many haue sweat in vnfolding the mysteries of that Church, which spiritually is called Sodome and Ægypt, as Ambrosius de Armariolo, Amalarius, Durandus, Durantus, and others: so heere haue not wanted mysticall Interpreters, Porphirius, Iamblichus, Plutarch, and the rest. Such is the deepenesse of Sathan in the shallownesse of humane, both reason and truth. Water and Fire they vsed in all their Sacrifices, and doe them deuoutest worship (saith y Porphiry) because those Elements are so profitable to mans vse: and for this vse sake they adored so many Creatures: at Anubis they worshipped a Man. But especially they held in veneration those creatures which seemed to hold some affinitie with the Sunne. Euen that stinking Beetele or Scarabee did these (more blinde then Beetles) in their stinking superstitions obserue, as a liuing Image of the Sunne; because, forsooth, all Scarabees are of Male sexe (and therefore also saith z Ælian, Souldiers wore the figure of the Scarabee in their Rings, as thereby insinuating their masculine spirits) and hauing shed their seed in the dung, doe make a ball thereof, which they rowle too and fro with their feete, imitating the Sunne in his circular journey. Iulius Firmicus a inueigheth against them for their worship, and supplications, and superstitious vowes made to the Water: and for that their fabulous Legend of Osiris, Isis, and Typhon, vnfolding the Historie and Mysterie. Eusebius followeth this Argument in the seuerall Beasts which they worship; but to auoyd tediousnesse, I leaue him, to looke on Plutarchs paines in this Argument.

gument. Hee b maketh Isis to bee deriued of the Verbe εἰδέναι to know, as being the Goddesse of Wisedome and Knowledge: to whom Typhon for his ignorance is an enemie. For without Knowledge, Immortalitie it selfe could not deserue the name of Life, but of Time.

Their Priests shaued their owne haire, and wore not woollen but linnen garments, because of their professed puritie, to which the haire of Man or Beast being but an excrement, disagreed: and for this cause they reiected Beeues, Mutton and Porke, as meates which cause much excrements. Yea their Apis might not drinke of Nilus, for this Riuers fatning qualitie, but of a Fountaine peculiar to his holinesse. At Heliopolis they might not bring wine into the Temple, holding it vnseemely to drinke in the presence of their Lord. They had many purifications wherein Wine was forbidden. Their Kings, which were also Priests, had their sacred stints of wine; and did not drinke it at all before Psammeticus time, esteeming Wine to be the Bloud of them which sometime warred against the gods, out of whose slaine carkasses Vines proceeded, and hence proceedeth drunkennesse, and madnesse by wine. Their Priests abstaine from all fish: they eate not Onions, because they grow most in the wane of the Moone, they procure also teares and thirst. Their Kings were chosen either of the Priests, or of the Souldiers; and these also after their election, were presently chosen into the Colledge of Priests. Osiris signifieth many eyes, in the Egyptian language. Os, is much, and Eri, an eye. The Image of Minerua at Sai had this inscription, I am all, which is, which hath beene, which shall be, whose shining light no mortall man hath opened. Ammon c they call Am (the same, as is before said, with Ham or Cham, the sonne of Noah) in the vocatiue case, as inuocating him, whom they hold the chiefe God of the World, to manifest himselfe. They esteemed children to haue a diuining facultie, and obserued the voyces of children playing in the Temples, and speaking at aduenture, as Oracles, because Isis seeking after Osiris, had enquired of children. They interpret Astronomically the Dog-starre to belong to Isis; the Beare, to Typhon; Orion, to Horus.

c Ἄμμας. Opifex intellectus qui veritatis est dominus & sapientiæ, quatenus in generationem progrediens occultam latentium rationem produxit in lucem, Amum Egyptiaca lingua vocant: quatenus autem sine mendacio peragit omnia Phtha nuncupatur; quatenus effector bonorum Osiris; aliasque denominationes habet propter potentias, actionesque differentes: Tumblichus de Mysteriis.

The Inhabitants of Thebais acknowledged nothing for God which was mortall; but worshipped Cneph, which they said, had neither beginning nor ending. So many are the interpretations in their mysticall Theologie, that Truth must needes bee absent, which is but One: and these may rather seeme subtile fetches of their Priests, to gull the people, then the true intents of their first authors of Idolatrie. Because Typhon was of red colour, they consecrated red Bulls, in which yet there might not be one haire blacke or white. They esteemed it not a sacrifice acceptable to the gods, but contrarie, as which had receiued the soules of wicked men: and therefore they cursed the head of the sacrifice, which they hurled into the Riuer: and since haue vsed to sell to strangers. The Deuill happily would teach them an apish imitation of that sacrifice of the red Cow, Num. 19. The Priests abhorre the Sea, as wherein Nilus dyeth; and salt is forbidden them, which they call Typhons spittle. In Sai, in the Porch of Minerua's Temple, was pictured an Infant, an old Man, a Hawke, a Fish, and a Sea-horse. The mysterie was, O yee that are borne, and dye, God hateth shamelesse persons. The Hawke signified God; the Fish, Hatred; the Sea-horse, Impudencie.

By their Osiris and Typhon, they signified the good and euill, whereof wee haue not onely vicissitudes, but mixtures, in all these earthly things. And heere Plutarch is large in shewing the opinion of these wise-men, which when they saw so much euill, and knew withall that good could not bee the cause of euill, they imagined two beginnings, one whereof they called God, the other Diuell: the good, Orimazes; the bad, Arimanius. This opinion is fathered on Zoroastres. Betwixt those two was Mithres, whom the Persians called a Mediator. So the Chaldæans had among the Planets, two good, two bad, three of middle disposition. The Grecians their Iupiter and Dis, and Harmonia begotten of Venus and Mercurie. Empedocles called the one Friendship, the other Discord: the Pythagoreans d call the Good, One, bounded, abiding, right, square, &c. The other, Duplicitie, infinite, moued, crooked, long, &c. Anaxagoras, the Minde and Infiniteneſſe; Aristotle, Forme and Priuation. Plato, the Same, and Another. Hence appeareth how true it is, that e the Naturall men perceiue not the things of God, nor can know them: and hence grew the Manichæan Heresie.

e 1 Cor. 2. 14.

All f the deformitie and defect of things, Plutarch ascribeth to Typhon (whom they also called Seth, Bebon, and Smy; saith Pignorius) that which is good, to Osiris, and g Isis, to this the matter, to him the forme. In the Towne of Idithya they burned liuing Men, whom they called Typhonians, scattering their ashes, and bringing them to nothing. This was openly done in Dog-dayes. But when they sacrificed any of their sacred Beasts, it was done closely and at vncertaine times. According to which custome, Achilles Statius h frameth his Historie of Leucippe, sacrificed by Ægyptian Robbers and Pirats, for expiation of their villanies, and protection against their enemies: the Rites whereof were, after some Hymnes sung by the Priest, to kill and rippe her, and hauing viewed and tasted the liuer, to burie her.

Of HERMES TRISMEGISTVS.

Mercurius Trismegistus (so called, b becaus hee was thrice greatest King, Priest, and Philosopher) was (saith c Lactantius) called Thoth or Thoyth, of whom they named their first moneth, acknowledging to haue receiued their Lawes and Letters from him. He built the Citie Hermopolis, and of the Saits was honored for a God. Of him also Augustine de Cinitate Dei, lib. 8. cap. 26. illustrated by the Annotations of Vines, will further acquaint you. Goropius d from a speech of Iamblichus, That all sacred Writings were ascribed to Mercury Trismegistus, coniectureth after his farre fetched fashion, that Trismegistus signifieth God in Trinity and Vnity (which hee gathereth also out of the word Got, or God) and that no mortall man was intended by Mercury, but God himselfe; called Thoyt, or Theut, as the head of all things, and that the eternall Wisdome of God first taught men Letters e. That the Egyptians were subdued by the Cymmerians, who came thither out of Phrygia, and changed their Religion, leauing them both their Hieroglyphicall Characters (wherein also were included Mysteries of holy things) and their Language, both which the Priests obserued in their Lyturgies and Deuotions. Diuine things were not meet to be ascribed to men, and therfore all the Books of their Diuinity were ascribed to Mercury, whose Image was a head ending in a square Statue, a resemblance of that Diuine Wisdome and constancie. They vse to set vp these Images in the high-wayes, therein engrauing some good morall admonitions, for which cause they were called Mercuries and Hermes, as his Dutch Etymologies declare, Herman signifying nothing but a publike admonishing, and Merkman, that which men ought to marke, and most diligently to attend. The like hee doth in the names of Harpocrates, and other their Deities, some of them through ignorance from Hieroglyphikes (as the Emblemes of George, Christopher, f and Margaret, amongst the Romists) becomming Gods. Whether these things be true, or doctæ nugæ, for which Scaliger censureth Goropius, I list not to determine, nor to fill these pages with store of matter of this nature from him, with whom the desirous Reader may himselfe find entertainment: where hee will shew the Mysteries of their Pyramides to signifie the fierie soule of the World, and Obeliskes, the Sunne, and other things more then euer the Egyptians themselues conceiued. He affirmeth, that there were two of that name, the one Grandfather to the other: the elder of which was counseller and instructer of Isis, and the Scholler of Noah. Hee had a Son named Tat, which begate the second Hermes, which Hermes had a Son also called Tat, by which likenesse in name great confusion and vnlikelihoods haue happened in History, This second Hermes (hee supposeth) liued in the dayes of Moses, but was somewhat more ancient. Both the elder and younger were Writers, as he sheweth out of their Workes: and called Trismegisti, not for that hee was greatest King, Priest, and Philosopher as Ficinus sayth, nor for their cleere Sentences touching the Holy Trinity, but (as the French vse the word thrice, for the Superlatiue) as men thrice or most excellent in Learning. The same Patricius hath set forth three Treatises of Asclepius: of which name were three learned Egyptians, Asclepius Vulcani, Inuenter of Phyſicke, Asclepius Imuthes, Inuenter of Poetry, and another which had no ſirname, to whom Hermes dedicated ſome of his Bookes; and the ſame Asclepius [i] in the beginning of his firſt Booke calleth himſelfe the Scholler of Hermes. In the Writings of theſe Egyptians, tranſlated into Greeke, and explaned by the Egyptian Prieſts, the Greeke Philoſophers, eſpecially Platonikes and Pythagoreans, learned their Diuine, Morall, and Naturall Philoſophy. Antiquity and Learning hold vs longer in theſe mens company; the more curious may haue recourſe to their owne works. For my owne opinion, I cannot beleeue ſo ancient Monuments of Ethnike Authors to remayne: but, as in the Sybills, Beroſus, Henoch, and many other old Authours loſt, ſome new obtruded on the World in their Names. Yet I leaue to each man his owne cenſure.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the Rites, Prieſts, Sects, Sacrifices, Feaſts, Inuentions; and other Obſeruations of the Ægyptians.

§. I.

Of their Apis and other Beaſts, Serpents, and other Creatures worſhipped.

THus farre haue we launched out of their Hiſtory, into their Myſteries. To returne to the Relation of their Beaſts and Beſtiall Superſtitions. Lucian [a] ſaith, That Apis repreſented the Celeſtiall Bull; and other Beaſts which they worſhipped, other ſignes in the Zodiake. They that reſpected the Conſtellation of Piſces, did eat no fiſh; nor a Goat, if they regarded Capricorne. Aries a heauenly Conſtellation, was their heauenly deuotion: and not here alone, but at the Oracle of Iupiter Ammon. [b] Strabo ſayth, That they nouriſhed many Creatures, which they accounted ſacred, but not Gods. This nouriſhment, after [c] Diodorus, was in this ſort. Firſt they conſecrated vnto their maintenance ſufficient Lands. Such Votaries alſo as had recouered their children from ſome dangerous ſickneſſe, accuſtomed to ſhaue their haire, and putting it in gold or ſiluer, offered it to their Prieſts. The Hawkes they fed with gobbets of fleſh, and with Birds catched for them. The Cats and Ichneumons, with bread, and milke, and fiſh: and likewiſe the reſt.

When any of them dyeth, it is wrapped in fine Linnen, ſalted and embalmed with Cedar and ſweet Oyntments, and buried in a holy place, the reaſonleſſe men howling and knocking their breſts, in the exequies of theſe vnreaſonable beaſts. Yea, when famine hath driuen them to eate mans fleſh, the zeale of deuotion hath preſerued vntouched theſe ſacred creatures. such a Beast lyeth dead, Superstition forbiddeth further vse of it. Principall men, with principall meates, are appointed to nourish them in the circuit of their Temples.

They bathe and anoint them with odoriferous Oyntments. And they prouide to euery one of them a Female of his owne kinde. Their dead they bewayle no lesse, then their owne children: In their Funerals they are exceeding prodigall. In the time of Ptolemeus Lagi, their Apis or Bull of Memphis being dead, the Keeper bestowed on his Funerall, ouer and aboue the ordinary allowance and offerings, fiftie Talents of siluer borrowed of Ptolemey, that is, twelue thousand and fiue hundred pound of our money after the Egyptian Talent, or after the Alexandrian, eighteene thousand seuen hundred and fifty pound. And in our Age, sayth Diodorus, an eye-witnesse of these his Relations, some of these Nourishers haue bestowed an hundred Talents on this last expence, which is twice as much as the former. After the death of this Bull, which they call Apis, was made a solemne and publike lamentation, which they testified by shauing their heads, although their purple lockes might compare with those of Nisus, sayth [d] Lucian: and after his buriall [e] were an hundred Priests employed, in search of another like the former; which being found, was brought to the City Nilus, and there nourished forty dayes. Then they conueyed him into a close ship, hauing a golden habitacle, in which they carried him to Memphis, and there placed him in the Temple of Vulcan for a God. At his first comming [f] only women were permitted to see him, who I know not in what hellish Mystery, lifting vp their garments, shewed him Natures secrets, and from thence forth might neuer be admitted the sight of him. At his first finding, the people cease their funerall lamentations. At his solemne receiuing into Memphis, they obserue a seuen-dayes festiuall, with great concourse of people. His consecration was done by one wearing a Diadem on his head. They made the people beleeue he was conceiued of Lightning. He [g] had a Chappell assigned to him, and called by his name. Hee was kept in a place enclosed, before which was a Hall, and in that another enclosed Roome, for the Dame or Mother of Apis. Into this Hall they brought him, when they would present him to strangers. Psammetichus was the founder of this building, borne vp with Colosses, or huge statues of twelue Cubits, in stead of Pillars, and grauen full of figures. Once a yeere [h] he had sight of a Female, chosen by especiall markes, and slaine the same day. On a set day, which he might not out-liue, according to their rituall Bookes, they drowned him in the bottome of a sacred Fountayne: and then buried him as aforesaid, with much mourning. After this solemnity it was lawfull for them to enter into the Temple of Serapis. Darius, to curry fauour with the Egyptians, offered an hundred Talents to him that could find out a succeeding Apis. Of this Apis, thus writeth Saint [i] Augustine. Apis was the King of the Argiues, who sayling into Egypt, and there dying, was worshipped by the name of Serapis, their greatest God. This name Serapis was giuen him (sayth Varro) of his Funerall Chest, called in Greeke σορὸς, and from thence Serapis, as if one should say, Soros apis, after, Serapis. It was enacted, that whosoeuer should affirme, that he had beene a man, should be done to death. Hence it is, that in the Egyptian Temples Harpocrates, [k] an Image holding his finger on his mouth, is ioyned a companion to Isis and Serapis, in token of concealing their former humanitie. Suidas [l] sayth, that Alexander built vnto him a magnificent Temple, of which, and of this Serapis, wee shall largely declare in the next Chapter. Viues out of Nymphodorus sayth, that this carkasse in that Chest, whereof the name Serapis was deriued, was of a Bull, not of a Man. Eusebius [m] nameth two Kings called by this name Apis, one a Sicyonian, the other of Argos: the first more ancient; the other the Sonne of Iupiter and Niobe, called after, Serapis. But Apollodorus [n] affirmeth him the Sonne of Phoroneus, and Brother of Niobe. And therefore the Sicyonian King is more likely to be the Egyptian Apis Builder of Memphis: for the other [o] dyed in Peloponnesus, which of him was called Apia. Calius Calcagninus [p] affirmeth, that their Apis was but the symbole of the soule of Osiris: and that Serapis is an Egyptian word, and signifieth ioy and mirth. But who can find truth in falsehood, or certainty in Superstitious errors? The markes [q] of the next Apis were these; All his body was blacke, with a white starre in his fore-head, after Herodotus, or in his right side, sayth Pliny, like vnto a horned Moone: For he was sacred to the Moone, sayth Marcellinus. On his backe hee had the shape of an Eagle, a knot on his tongue like a Beetle. If such an one might seeme impossible to be found, as (no doubt) it was rare, and therefore costly; Augustine [r] attributeth it to the Deuils working, presenting to the Cow, in her conception, such a phantasticall apparition; the power of which imagination appeareth in [s] Iacobs example.

But what a beastly stirre haue we here (me thinkes I heare some whining Reader say) about Beasts and Buls? I answere, That it deserueth the more full relation, both for the multitude of Authors, which mention something of this History; for the Antiquitie; and especially, for the practice of the same Superstition, [t] in Aarons and Ieroboams Calues, after their returne from Egypt; the Schoole of this Idolatry. Besides this Apis of Memphis, they in other places obſerued others: as Mneuis, a blacke Bull, conſecrated to x the Sunne, as Apis was to the Moone; with his haires growing forward, worſhipped at Heliopolis: Bacis, y another, that was fayned to change colour euery houre, at Hermunthus; beſides, Onuphis, and Menuphis, other-where. Thus by Sinne, Beaſts became Gods, Men became Beaſts: if this be not a baſer degree of baſeneſſe, to worſhip Beaſts, and in them, Deuils: to content themſelues with meane houſes, and neuer to be contented with the magnificence and ſumptuouſneſſe of their Temples to Beaſts. z Splendida fana cum lucis, & Templa cum veſtibulis & porticibus admirandis: introgreſſus autem videbis adorari felem, &c. that is, They haue glorious Chappels, with Groues; and ſtately Temples, with goodly Gate-wayes and Porches: but when you are within once, you ſhall ſee nothing but a Cat (or ſome ſuch Carrion) worſhipped, &c. And euen at this day, in Cayro and other places of Egypt, they account it (according to their Mahumetane Superſtition) no ſmall point of charitie, to bee bountifull and liberall to Birds, which they will redeeme a to libertie; and to Dogges, Cats, and other Beaſts, ſetting them meate and good prouiſion at appointed times.

As for the Camell, that hath carried the Alcoran at Mecca in their Pilgrimage, yee haue heard b alreadie, how religious they eſteeme the touch thereof: Douſa c ſaw the like at Conſtantinople; ſome plucking off his haires as holy relikes, ſome kiſſing him, ſome wiping off his ſweat, therewith to rub their faces and eyes; all entertayning him with frequent concourſe, and at laſt eating his fleſh, diſtributed into ſmall parts for that purpoſe.

We are further to know, that although Egypt worſhipped beaſts, yet not all, the ſame: theſe d onely were vniuerſally receiued; three beaſts, a Dogge, a Cat, a Bull: two Fowles, the Hawke, and the Ibis; two fiſhes, Lepidotus and Oxyrinchus. Other beaſts haue their Sects of Worſhippers: as ſheepe among the Thebans and Saits; the fiſh called Latus, among the Latopolitans; a Cynocephalus, at Hermopolis; (which is a kind of great Ape, e or Monkie, naturally circumciſed, and abhorring from fiſh) a Wolfe at Lycopolis. The Babylonians neere to Memphis, worſhipped a beaſt called Cepus, reſembling in the face a Satyre, in other parts, partly a Dogge, partly a Beare: Likewiſe, other Cities, other beaſts, which cauſed great diſſentions; whereof f Iuuenal:

Ardet adhuc Combos & Tentyra, ſummus utrinq;
Inde furor vulgo, quod numina vicinorum
Odit uterq; locus———

Combos and Tentyra doe both yet burne
With mutuall hate, becauſe they both doe ſpurne
At one anothers Gods, &c.

Strabo ſaw, in the Nomus, or Shire of Arſinoe, diuine honour giuen to a Crocodile, kept tame in a certaine Lake by the Prieſts, and named Suchus, nouriſhed with Bread, Wine, and Fleſh, which the Pilgrims that came to viſit him, offered. Now the Tentyrites, and thoſe of Elephantina, killed Crocodiles. And in the Citie of Hercules they worſhipped an Ichneumon, a beaſt that deſtroyeth Crocodiles and Aſpes, and therefore euen at this day of much eſtimation, as Bellonius g obſerueth, where you may ſee his deſcription. Theſe imagined that Typhon was transformed into a Crocodile. At Hermopolis they worſhipped a Goat: and Goats had carnall mixture with Women.

h The Ombites (more beaſtly) eſteemed themſelues fauoured of their Crocodile God, if he filled his paunch with the fleſh and bloud of their deareſt Children, as Balbi, and others report of the Moderne Inhabitants of Pegu, before related. King Menas built a Citie called Crocodile, and dedicated the Neighbour-fenne to their food. They were as ſcrupulous in the vſe of meates: ſome i abſtained from Cheeſe, ſome from Beanes, ſome from Onyons, others after their owne fancie. This multiplicitie of Sects is aſcribed to the policie of their ancient Kings, according to that Rule, Diuide and Rule. For it was not likely they would ioyne in Conſpiracie, whom Religion (the moſt mortall make-bate) had diſioyned. At Coptus, where the holies of Iſis were moſt ſolemne, there were (ſayth k Ælian) ſtore of great Scorpions, which preſently killed ſuch as they ſtung; but yet the women which there lamented Iſis, no leſſe then Widowes the death of their Husbands, or Mothers of their Children; and going bare-foot, are neuer hurt by them. Heere they deuoted the Male Goats to their bellies, the Females to their Goddeſſe. Hawkes were conſecrated to Orus or the Sunne, becauſe they flie and looke directly againſt the Sun-beames: of this bird they fabled that it liued ſeuen hundred yeeres. They which will, may find in that his tenth Booke, the Reaſons of diuers other their beaſtly and foule deuotions, to Fowles and Beaſts: too tedious for this place.

They held Serpents in so sacred account, that e Osiris is neuer painted without them: and Iosephus f saith, That it was reckoned a happinesse (which I thinke few would enuy them) to be bitten of Aspes, as also to be deuoured of Crocodiles. Venimous was that Old Serpent, which both here, and in other Nations, then, and at this day, hath procured diuine honor to this first Instrument of Hell: As if he would thus exalt this Trophee of his ancient conquest, in despight both of God and Man, in that Creature whereby Man perished, and which God had curst: except we will rather attribute it to a deuillish malice, or apish imitation of that Brasen Serpent, set vp by g Moses in the Wilderneſſe, the figure of Christ crucified, who brake this Serpents head. Ieremie the Prophet was stoned (some h say) at Tanis in Ægypt, and was after worshipped of the Inhabitants there (such was their difference of Sects) for his present remedying the stings of Serpents.

I thinke by this time, either my Relation, or their superstition, is tedious: and yet I haue not mentioned other their gods, both stinking and monstrous. Loth am I to search the Waters for their deified Frogs, and Hippopotami; or play the Scauenger, to present you with their Beetle-gods, out of their priuies: yea, their Priuies, i and Farts, had their vnsauorie canonization, and went for Egyptian deities; Lettice sutable to such lips. So Hierome k derideth their dreadfull deitie, the Onion, and a stinking Fart, Crepitus ventris inflati quæ Pelusiaca religio est, which they worshipped at Pelusium. Lesse brutish, though not lesse idolatrous, was it in l Ptolomæus Philopator, to erect a Temple to Homer, in which his Image was placed, comely sitting enuironed with those Cities which challenged him for theirs. That came neerest to reason in the Egyptian m deities (though farre enough from Religion) when they expressed God like a Man with an egge in his mouth, thereby intimating that God created the World with his Word. So in the Citie Sai they expressed in hieroglyphikes an Infant, an old Man, a Hawke, a Fish, and a Riuer-horse, on the doores of Minerua's Temple, as if Minerua should say, O yee which are borne and die know that God hateth impudence. This also by the way we adde for difference of Egyptian hieroglyphikes and Indian pictures n in Mexico, that these expressed Histories, those concealed Mysteries: the Indians describing things as plainly as they could, the Egyptians yeelding a double shell before you come to the kernell; and therefore more implicite and difficult then the other. For that a picture of a Hawke, a Fish, and a Riuer-horse should represent such creatures is euident: but that one of these should represent God, the second Hatred, the third Impudence, is a mysterie, and if well searched, an absurditie, and a thing much to be admired that wise men should so admire things so ridiculous.

§. II.

Of their Sacrifices, their Iewish Rites, and of their Priests.

THeir sacrifices were so diuersified in their kindes, that Peucer o saith, they had sixe hundred threescore and sixe seuerall sorts of them: Some they had peculiar to speciall gods; p as to the Sunne, a Cocke, a Swan, a Bull; to Venus, a Doue; to the celestiall Signes, such things as held correspondent similitude: besides, their sacrifices of Red men to Osiris. Busiris q is said to haue offered Thrasius (first Author of that Counsell, worst to the Counsellor) thereby to appease angrie Nilus, that in nine yeeres had not ouer-flowed. They offered euery day three men at Heliopolis; in stead of which bloudie rites, Amasis after substituted so many waxen Images.

Thus were their gods beastly, their sacrifices inhumane, or humane rather, too much. Other things they obserued of their owne inuention, framing to themselues deformed and compounded shapes, whose Images they adored. Such were their Canopi, swadled as it were in clowts (so resembling Orus) with heads of dogs, or other creatures. Osiris r is sometime seene with the head of a Hawke, Isis with the head of a Lion, Anubis alway with the head of a dogge; and contrariwise, beasts pictured with the heads of Osiris and Isis: monstrous misse-shapen figures, of misse-shapen monstrous mysteries.

They borrowed of the Iewes abstinence from Swines-flesh, and Circumcision of their Males; to which they added Excision of their Females, still obserued of the Christians in those parts. Theodoret testifieth, s That Pythagoras receiued circumcision of the Egyptians, which they receiued of the Hebrewes. Ambrose t affirmeth, That the Egyptians circumcised both sexes at the age of fourteene yeeres (as the Ismaelites at thirteene) because that then the lusts of copulation begin to burne; which Reason teacheth, to neede circumcision: and therefore (it seemeth) they vsed it in those parts that are the seats and instruments of Lust; and not either in regard of originall corruption, or the promised Seede, which were hidden mysteries mysteries to their mysticall superstitions. It is like, the Deuill would thus prophane this diuine Sacrament of Circumcision, as at this day in the Heathen Nations about Congo, and in Iucatan in America, before the Spaniards came there. They so abhorre Swine, [n] that if one by the way touch them, hee presently washeth himselfe and his garments. Neither may a Swine-heard haue accesse into their Temples, or marry with their daughters. Yet doe they offer Swine to the Moone and Bacchus (Isis and Osiris) when the Moone is at full. In this sacrifice they burne the Tayle, Milt, and Leafe; and (which on another day would be piacular) on that day of the full they eate the rest. Ælian [x] giueth this reason of their hatred of Swine, because it is a gluttonous beast, not sparing the flesh neither of their owne young, nor of men; as on the contrarie, they worship the Storke for her pietie, in nourishing her aged parents (that I speake not of their wed-locke chastitie; for breach whereof, [y] Crollius tells, from the relation of an eye-witnesse, That in a wood neere to Spire in Germanie, the Male complayning to a congregation of Storkes, caused them to teare his Mate in pieces.) The Egyptians also had a conceit, That Swines milke would breede the leprosie; and that Swine were beasts odious to the Sunne and Moone. He citeth out of Eudoxus, That they spared them, for treading their Seede into the ground; which was their Harrowing and Tillage, when Nilus had newly left the softned Earth, to send these Labourers, their Kine and Swine, to tread in the myrie Earth the Corne which they sowed therein. The Egyptians [z] sware by the head of their King; which oath whosoeuer violated, lost his life for the same, without any redemption.

The Priests, in old time renowmed for their learning, in Straboes time were ignorant and vnlearned. No woman [a] might beare Priestly function. These Priests might not eate Egs, Milke, or Oile (except with Sallads:) they might not salute Mariners, nor looke vpon their children or kinsfolks. They [b] washed themselues in the day-time thrice, and in the night twice: they were shauen, wore linnen garments alwayes new washed, were daily allowed sacred meates. [c] Of their ancient Priests, thus Du Bartas singeth in Sylvesters tune:

> The Memphian Priests were deepe Philosophers,
> And curious gazers on the sacred Starres,
> Searchers of Nature, and great Mathematickes,
> Ere any letter knew the ancient'st Attickes.

Tertullian [d] speakes of the continence of Apis his Priests, and addes, That certayne women, consecrated to the African Ceres, voluntarily relinquished marriage, and from thenceforth might not touch a Male, no, not so much as kisse their owne sonnes.

Their magicke skill appeared in Iannes and Iambres, which withstood Moses; and in Hermes testimonie of himselfe. R. Salomon on Exod. 8. writeth, That Pharao said to Moses and Aaron, Doe you bring straw into Ophraim, a Citie full of straw? And doe yee bring inchantments into Egypt, which aboundeth therewith? Postellus deriueth the Egyptian and Orientall sciences from Abraham, to whom he dareth to attribute their diuinations by the Aire, Water, Fire, Earth, Birds: and alleageth Rambams authoritie, That the greatest part of the Alcoran is taken out of the Egyptian learning; and saith, That Moses and Salomon studied the same, and expounded in Scripture, what Abraham had taught them: to which also hee ascribeth the Iewish Exorcismes, in casting out Deuils. But some Deuill, I thinke, hath taught him so to commend these deuillish Arts, as he doth no lesse the Alcoran, and the Iewes Cabala, calling them an excellent Appendix to Moses, and both, of I know not what magicall faultie, first infused into Adam in the puritie of his creation, and taught by the Angell Raziel, by him deliuered in verball tradition; written first by Henoch, the bookes whereof Nimrod stole from Noah, which Abraham might learne either in that Chaldean Nation, or from Melchisedech. But let vs obserue these Priests further.

When they sacrificed, they made choice of their beasts by certaine religious markes: (a Cow they might not sacrifice, as consecrated vnto Isis:) They kindled a fire, and sprinkling water ouer the Sacrifice, with inuocation of their God, killed it, cut off the head; which either they sold to the Grecians, if they would buy it; or cast it into the Riuer with imprecation, That whatsoeuer euill was imminent to them or their Countrey, might be turned vpon that head. This ceremonie [e] seemes to haue come to them from the Iewes. And they haue beene as liberall of their Rites since to the Catholikes (for so they will be called) as appeareth both by this Relation, and by the testimonie, not onely of Moresinus [f] a Protestant, but [g] Maginus, Polidorus, Boemus, and Beroaldus, Popish writers, although dawbed ouer with new mysticall significations; as in Bellarmine, and other the purest Catholikes, is seene. Their Priests [h] were their Iudges, the eldest of which was chiefe in pronouncing sentence. He wore [i] about his necke a Saphire Iewell, with the Image of Truth therein engraued. The Priests [k] of Isis, besides their shauings and linnen garments, had paper-shoes: on their heads, Anubis; in their hands a Timbrell, or a branch of Sea-wormewood, or a Pine-apple. They had one chiefe Priest, or Primate of Egypt, as appeareth [l] by Iosephus and Heliodorus, who maketh Thyamis to succeede his father Calasyris in this high Priesthood at Memphis. Manetho also enioyed this Pontificall Hierarchie, as appeareth by his Epistle to Ptolemeus, which after shall follow. Philostratus [m] speaketh of Gymnosophists, which some ascribe to India; Heliodorus to Ethiopia; he to Ethiopia and Egypt. These, saith hee, dwelt abroad without house, on a Hill a little off the bankes of Nilus, where grew a Groue, in which they held their generall Assemblies, to consult of publike affaires, hauing otherwise their studies and sacrifices apart, each by himselfe. Thespesion was the chiefe of this Monkish Colledge, when Apollonius, after his visitation of the Babylonian Magi, and Indian Brachmanes, came thither. These held the immortalitie of the soule, and accounted Nilus for a god. If a man at Memphis had by chance-medley killed a man, hee was exiled, till those Gymnosophists absolued him.

Hercules Temple, at Canopus, was priuiledged with Sanctuarie, to giue immunitie to Fugitiues and Malefactors: Thus elsewhere, Osiris; Apollo, in Syria; Diana, at Ephesus; euery Cardinals house (saith [n] a Pope) in Rome; Saint Peter [o] at Westminster, and other Popish Oratories, priuiledged Dennes of Theeues. §. III.

Of their Feasts and Oracles.

THeir Feasts were many: of which, * Herodotus reckoneth one at Bubastis, in honour of Diana. To this place the Men and Women, at this festiuall solemnitie, sayled in great multitudes, with minstrelsie and showtings: and as they came to any Citie on the waters side, they went on shore; and the women, some danced, some played, some made a brawle with the women of the place: and thus resorting to Bubastis, they there offered great Sacrifices, spending in this feast more Wine then in all the yeere besides. Hither resorted of Men and Women, besides Children, seuen hundred thousand. In Busiris was solemnized the feast of Isis; in which, after the sacrifice, many thousands beat themselues: but with what they did beate themselues, was not lawfull to relate. The Carians that inhabited Egypt, did also cut their foreheads with swords, signifying thereby, that they were forreiners. This Citie was in the midst of the Egyptian Delta, and in it, a very great Temple of Isis. A third feast was at Sai, in honour of Minerua, where assembling by night, they lighted candles full of Salt and Orle, and therewith went about the walls of the Citie: This solemnitie was called * Light-burning, or if you will, Candle-masse. This night, they which came not hither, yet obserued the letting vp of Lights throughout Egypt. A fourth was at Heliopolis, in honour of the Sunne. A fift at Buto, of Latona, wherein onely sacrificing was vsed. At Papremus was obserued the solemnitie of Mars, with sacrifices, but till Sunne-set, onely a few Priests were busied about the Image: a greater number of them stood before the doores of the Temple with woodden clubs, and ouer-against them aboue a thousand men that payed their vowes, each with clubs in their hands, who the day before carried the Image out of a gilded Chappell of Timber into another sacred Roome; those few which were chosen for the Idoll-seruice, drawing a waggon with foure wheeles, on which the Chappell and Image were carried. Those that stood at the Porch, forbade these to enter; but the Votaries, to helpe their god, beate and draue them backe. Here began a great club-fray, in which many were wounded, and many (although the Egyptians concealed it) dyed of the wounds. The cause (forsooth) was, because here was shrined the mother of Mars; to whom, her sonne, at ripe age, resorted to haue lyen with; but was repelled by her seruants: whereupon, hee procuring helpe elsewhere, was reuenged of them. Hence grew that solemnitie.

On the seuenth day of the moneth Tybi * (which answereth to our Ianuarie and December) was solemnized the comming of Isis out of Phœnicia; in which, many things were done in despight of Typhon. The Coptites then hurled downe an Asse from a steepe place, and abused ruddie men for this cause. They had [a] also in their Bacchanall-solemnities, most filthy Rites; in which, being drunken, they carried Images of a cubit length, with the priuie Member of a monstrous size, with musicke, accompanied with the elder Matrons. This Yard, which they called Phallus, was vsually made of fig-tree. Herodotus [b] saith, That besides their Swine-feast, they obserued another to Bacchus, without Swine, in like sort as the Grecians: in which, they had such cubitall Images made of sinewes, or as Cœlius [c] readeth it, made made to bee drawne to and fro with ſinewes or ſtrings, carried by women. In the moneth Thoth (which moſt-what agreeth to September) the nineteenth day [d] was holy to Mercurie, in which they did eate honey and figs, ſaying withall, Truth is ſweet. On the ninth day of this moneth they obſerued another feaſt; wherein euery man before his doore did eate roſted fiſh: the Prieſts did not eate, but burne the ſame. Before is mentioned the ſeeking of Oſiris. This was an Egyptian feaſt, obſerued in the moneth Athyr (which anſwereth ſomewhat to Nouember) from the ſeuenteenth day (in which they imagined that Oſiris periſhed) foure dayes were ſpent in mourning: the cauſes were foure; Nilus ſlaking, the Windes then blowing, the Dayes ſhortening, the Winter approching. Here is the myſterie vnfolded. On the nineteenth day they went by night to the Sea, and brought forth a ſacred Chiſt, in which was a golden Boxe, into which they powred water, and made a ſhowt, That Oſiris was found. Then they mingled the Earth with Water, adding ſpices and coſtly perfumes, and made an Image of the Moone, applying theſe myſticall Rites to the nature of the Earth and Water. About the winter Solſtice they carried a Cow ſeuen times about the Temple [e], in remembrance of the Sunnes circuit, which in the ſeuenth moneth would be in the Summer Solſtice.

The originall of Iſis ſeeking Oſiris, is before ſhewed. Some make Typhon the husband of Iſis, which ſlue Oſiris her ſonne, or brother (as diuers diuerſly eſteeme him) for meeſt committed with her, and cut him in pieces. Anubis her Huntſman, by helpe of his dogs, found out the pieces againe. This (ſaith [f] Minutius Fœlix) is reſembled euery yeere, Nec deſinunt annis omnibus vel perdere quod inuenerunt, vel inuenire quod perdunt. Hæc Ægyptia quondam, nunc & ſacra Romana ſunt. Truly the Playes of Chriſt his Crucifying and Reſurrection, which are obſerued in all Churches of the Roman Religion yeerly, might ſeeme to haue had this Egyptian originall. Once, Index expurgatorius, hath cut out Viues tongue, where he ſpeaketh againſt them, as [g] before vpon like occaſion is noted. This feaſt is alſo mentioned by Iulius Firmicus, and others.

They had another feaſt called Pamylia, of Pamyle the Nurſe of Oſiris, who going to fetch water, heard a voyce, bidding her proclaime, That a great King and Benefactor was borne. On this holy day was carried in proceſſion an Image with three ſtones, or (as Plutarch [h] ſaith) with a three-fold yard, in which beaſtly Rite hee findeth a fooliſh myſterie, not worth the telling. But I thinke this Feaſt of Feaſts hath glutted euery man.

The Egyptians had many Oracles of Hercules, Apollo, Minerua, Diana, Mars, Iupiter, and others. The Oracle of Latona at Butys [i] told Cambyſes, That hee ſhould die at Ecbatana, whereby he ſecured himſelfe for Syria, and yet there dyed, in an obſcure village of that name, whereas he had interpreted it of the great Citie in Media. Their Apis and Serapis were alſo eſteemed Oracles. Annibal was deceiued by the Oracle of Serapis, telling him of his death, which he conſtrued of Libya, and fell out in a place of the ſame name in Bithynia. At Peluſium, if we may beleeue Achilles Statius [k], was the Temple, Image, and Oracle of Iupiter Caſſius; and by an Oracle, he maketh Leucippe, a Virgin, to be appointed for ſacrifice. At Memphis, a Cow; at Heliopolis, the Bull Mneuis; at Arſinoe, the Crocodiles were their Oracles. But it were too tedious to relate the reſt.

§. IIII.

Of the inuentions and diſpoſition of the Ægyptians.

THe firſt amongſt their Inuentions, wee may reckon the deriuation of their ſuperſtitions to others. That the elder Romans entertayned theſe damnable Egyptian holies, appeareth by the Temples, Chappels, Streets, Coynes, dedicated vnto Iſis, Serapis, &c. mentioned by Onuphrius, Roſinus, Victor, Fabricius, Apianus, Amantius, Gruterus, Goltzius, Occo, and other writers of Roman Antiquities. Of Iſis and Serapis were certayne publike places in Rome, named Iſeum and Serapeum. * Ioſephus relateth of one Paulina, a noble woman of Rome, married to Saturninus, deuoted to the ſuperſtition of Iſis, whom Decius Mundus had ſollicited in vaine to diſhoneſtie, notwithſtanding the offer of two hundred thouſand Drachmæ (which comes to fiue thouſand ſixe hundred and twentie fiue pound) for one night: but with a quarter of that ſumme hee corrupted the Prieſts of Iſis; one of which told Paulina, That the god Anubis inflamed with her loue, had ſent for her; which meſſage was welcome to her, and to her husband not diſtaſtefull. Thus Mundus, vnder pretext of Anubis, obtayning a nights lodging, meeting her three dayes after, merrily ieſted at her, for lauing his money, but not her honeſtie: Whereupon Tiberius baniſhed him, crucified the Prieſts, and razed the Temple, commanding the Image of Iſis to bee caſt into Tiber. But theſe ſuperſtitions were reuiued ſoone after, Vitellius * the Emperour not refuſing refusing to weare a Linnen religious garment openly in her solemnitie. Vespasian also honoured them, and Domitian in the religious habite of Isis conueyed himselfe vnknowne from Vitellius and his persecutors.

Husbandrie [a] by some is ascribed to them, but falsely; Adam, Caine, Noah, and others were in this before them. Astronomie also is not their inuention, but [b] taught them by Abraham. Geometrie [c] is more like to bee theirs, driuen to seeke out this Art by Nilus ouer-flowing. Idolatrie to the Starres was first heere practised (saith Lactantius) for lying on the rootes of their houses (as yet they doe) without any other Canopie then the Azure skie, first they beheld, then studied, lastly adored them. Gandentius Brixiensis [d] applyeth the destroying of the Ægyptian first-borne, to the perishing of Idolatrie through the light of the Gospell: the Egyptians (saith hee) being the first, which worshipped the Images of dead men.

Magicke is also ascribed to them; of whose timely professours Iannes and Iambres are an instance. Physicke is fetched also from hence; and Writing, both after the vulgar sort, as also that of the Priests, Hieroglyphicall, whereof Horopollo an Egyptian, Pierius, Goropius, Michael Mayerus, Curio, Schualenberg, besides Mercerus and Hoeschelius, with others haue written. Ælianus [e] accounteth Mercurie the first inuenter of their Lawes. The Women [*] in Egypt did performe the offices which belonged to the Men, buying, selling, and other businesse abroad; the men Spinning and performing houshold-taske. Claud Duret [f] hath expressed (besides a Discourse of their Region and Learning) two Egyptian Alphabets, if any desire to see the forme of their Letters: which [g] some thinke that the Phenicians borrowed from Egypt, and lent by Cadmus to the Græcians. But I am not of their minde. This Elogie or commendation is giuen them by Martial:

Niliacis primum puer hic nascatur in oris,
Nequitias tellus scit dare nulla magis:
From Ægypt (sure) the boyes birth may proceed,
For no Land else such knauerie can breed.

And Propertius:

Noxia Alexandria dolis aptissima tellus.
The place where Alexandria doth stand,
Is noysome, and a Conie-catching land.

Wee may heere adde out of Flauius Vopiscus [h] a testimonie of the qualities of the Ægyptians. They are (saith hee) inconstant, furious, braggarts, injurious: also vaine, licentious, desirous of nouelties, euen vnto common Songs and Ballads, Versifiers, Epigrammatists, Mathematicians, Wizards, Physicians both for Christians and Samaritanes; and alway things present, with an vnbridled libertie, are distastefull to them. Hee bringeth also for witnesse of this assertion, Ælius Adrianus, who in an Epistle to Seruianus, affirmeth thus: I haue learned all Ægypt to bee light, wauering and turning with euery blast of fame. They which worship Serapis, are Christians, and euen they which call themselues Bishops of Christ, are deuoted to Serapis. No Ruler is there of the Iewish Synagogue, no Samaritan, no Christian Priest, which is not a Mathematician, a Wizard, a Chirurgion (or anointer of Champions.) This kinde of men is most seditious, most vaine, most injurious: the Citie (Alexandria) rich, wealthie, fruitfull, in which none liues idle. Goutie men haue somewhat to doe, Blinde men haue somewhat to doe, or haue somewhat which they may make; nor are the goutie-fingred idle. They haue One GOD; him doe the Christians, him doe the Iewes, him doe they all worship. I wish them nothing else, but that they may bee fedde with their owne Pullen, which how they make fruitfull, I am ashamed to tell. Thus much Adrianus.

The Pullen hee speaketh of, it seemeth, are such, as euen to this day they vse to hatch (not vnder the Henne, but) in Furnaces of dung [i] and ashes, wherein thousands of Egges are layd for that purpose. That which hee speaketh of the Christians, is either of some Heretickes, or luke-warme Time-seruers to bee vnderstood: or else remember, that it was Adrian, an Ethnike, whose intelligence was from such as himselfe in those times hating the Christians; of whom, through blinde zeale of their Idolatry, what did they? What did they not faine and deuise? Euen more odious then here is expressed, as Ecclesiasticall Histories shew. The Iewes had giuen Adrian cause, by their Treasons, to hate them, and flatterers opportunitie to belie them. Let him that loues mee, tell my tale. But a man would maruell to heare Adrian blame the Ægyptians so much for that, for which himselfe in Authors is so much blamed; namely, Superstition and Sorcerie. For hee made Images of Antinous, which he erected almost in all the world, saith [k] Dion. This Antinous was in high estimation with him (some thinke, his Minion:) Hee dyed in Ægypt, either drowned in Nilus, as Adrian writeth, or (which is the truth) was sacrificed. For whereas Adrian was exceeding curious, and addicted to Diuinations and Magicall Arts of all kindes (in the hellish rites whereof was required the soule of such a one as would die voluntarily) Antinous refused it not, and therefore was thus honoured, and had a Citie in Ægypt newly repaired from the ruines, and dedicated in his Name. Yea, hee reported [l] he saw a new Starre, which (forsooth) was the soule of this Antinous. The Greekes made a God of him, and a giuer of Oracles; whereof Prudentius singeth:

Quid loquar Antinoum cœlesti sede locatum, &c.
Adrianiq; dei Ganimedem —— —— Cumq; suo in Templis vota exaudire Marito?

And Iustin Martyr: Antinoum qui modo extitit, omnes metu coacti pro deo colere, cum & quis, & unde esset, scirent. Hee caused money to bee coyned with the picture of the Temple of Antinous which Adrian had erected, and a Crocodile vnder it. Choul [m] expresseth diuers formes of these Antinoan Coines, and one with inscription of Marcellus the Priest of Antinous.

Ammianus Marcellinus [n] ascribeth to the Egyptians a contentious humour, addicted to lawing and quarrels, Assuetudine perplexius litigandi semper latissimum. Their vanitie and superstition may further appeare by that which Diophantes [o] recordeth of one Syrophanes a rich Egyptian; who doting on his Sonne yet liuing, dedicated an Image in his house vnto him, to which the seruants at any time, when they had displeased their Master, betooke themselues, adorning the same with Flowers and Garlands, so recouering their Masters fauour. Some [p] make the Egyptians first inuenters of Wine (which they say, was first made in the Egyptian Citie Plinthis) and of Beere, to which end they first made Mault of Barley, for such places as wanted Grapes. When a man proued more in shew then in substance (as hypocrites, whom the Truth it selfe calleth Whited Tombes) the Prouerbe termed him an Egyptian Temple, because those buildings were sumptuous and magnificent for matter and forme to the view, but the Deitie therein worshipped, was a Cat, Dogge, or such other contemptible creature. The naturall furie [q] and crueltie vsed amongst the Egyptians, hath made them infamous among Authors, both Prophane and Diuine. And Stephanus Bizantinus saith, that they which practised close, subtile, craftie couzenages, were said, Αἰγυπτιάζειν, to play the Ægyptians: Æschylus also the Greeke Poet makes them Mint-masters therein: and perhaps those Rogues which wander ouer so many Countries, and liue by their wits and thefts, were therefore [r] called Egyptians, rather then for the Nation, being the scumme and dregs of other Nations, disguised by a deuised tongue and habit; called in some Countries Cingari; their life resembling much the Beduini, or Rezumi, roguish Arabians wandring in Syria, and other parts. Bellonius saith, That these wander through all the Turkish Empire, and are no lesse strangers in Egypt then other places. They are cunning in Iron-worke, and cheating Fortune-tellers: some esteeme them Walachians.

But least I should also impose too cruell a taske on my more willing Readers, I will proceed to other obseruations. I haue heere in this Egyptian relation of their Rites, Manners, and Mysteries, beene the larger, both because Authors are herein plentifull, and especially because Egypt hath beene an olde storer and treasurer of these mysticall Rites for that later vpstart, the Mysticall Babylon, in the West; which as shee is spiritually called Sodome and Ægypt, so, like that Strumpet mentioned [s] by Salomon, hath not a little decked her bed with the Ornaments, Carpets, and Laces of Ægypt. Wiser were the Romanes [t] of olde, which made diuers Lawes to expell the Ægyptian Rites out of their Citie, which the later Popes entertaine.

CHAP. V.

Of the manifold alterations of State and Religion in Ægypt by the Persians, Grecians, Romans, Christians, Saracens, and Turkes.

§. I.

Of the Persians and Gracians acts in Ægypt, and the famous Vniuersitie and Librarie at Alexandria.

THE last Egyptian Pharao was Psammenitus, vanquished by Cambyses, sonne of Cyrus the Persian, who quite extinguished that Egyptian Gouernment, and much eclipsed their superstitious solemnities. For [a] Cambyses proclaimed defiance, not to the persons onely of the Egyptians, but to their Gods also: yea, hee set their sacred Beasts in the fore-front of his battell, that being thus shielded by their owne deuotion, hee might easily ruinate the Kingdome. Such a disaduantage is Superstition to her followers, being indeed but a life-lesse carkasse of true Religion, which alway breedeth true Fortitude; as Ptolomey and the Romanes vsed the like stratageme against the Iewes on their Sabbath, which (in it selfe a diuine Commandement) they construed to a superstitious Rest, a Sacrifice without Mercie, wherein they might helpe their beasts, but suffer themselues, like beasts, to be ledde to the slaughter.

Ioseph. Antiq.

Cambyses hauing pulled downe their Temples in Egypt, intended [b] as much to the Oracle of Iupiter Ammon, in which exploit hee imployed fiftie thousand men, which (as the Ammonians report) were ouer-whelmed with a tempest of Sand. Other newes of them was neuer heard. Himselfe meane-while, meanely prouided of victuall for such an enterprise, made an Expedition against the Ethiopians; in which, Famine making her selfe Purueyour for the Armie, fedde them with the flesh of each other; euery tenth man being allotted to this bloodie seruice. Thus with a double discomfiture altogether discomforted, hee retireth to Memphis, where hee found them obseruing their festiuall solemnitie of the New-found Apis, and interpreting this ioy to haue proceeded from his losse, hee slew the Magistrate, whipped the Priests, commanded to kill the Citizens that were found feasting, and wounded their Apis with his sword, vnto death. Hee practised no lesse hostilitie vpon their Obeliskes, Sepulchres, and Temples. The Sepulchers they esteemed Sacred, as their eternall Habitations: (and no greater securitie could any Egyptian giue vnto his Creditor, then the dead bodies of their Parents.)

b Iustin. l. 1.

The [c] Temples, euery where accounted holy, heere were many, and those magnificent. At Memphis they had the Temples of Serapis, Apis, Venus, and the most ancient of them all, of Vulcan, with the Pigmey-Image of Vulcan in it, which Cambyses derided: of Serapis at Canopus, where Pilgrimes by dreames receiued Oracles: at Heraclium, Sai, and Butis, to Latona; at Mendes to Pan; at Momemphis to Venus; at Necropolis, Nicopolis, and other places to other supposed Deities. Cambyses also burned the Images of the Cabyrians and the Temple of Anubis at Heliopilis, whose stately building and spacious circuit Strabo describeth, as likewise at Thebes.

c Strab. l. 17. describeth the forme of their Temples.

They write, that after, as hee was taking Horse, his sword, falling out of the Scabberd, wounded him in the thigh (where hee before had wounded Apis) and slew him. In [d] the time while the Persians enioyed Egypt, the Athenians, by instigation of Inarus King of Libya, inuaded Egypt, wonne Nilus and Memphis: but after sixe yeeres lost all againe.

Ochus, one of his Successours (called of the Ægyptians, Asse) killed their Apis, and placed an Asse in his roome, which kindled such indignation in Bagoas an Egyptian, (one of his Eunuches) that hee murthered Ochus, whom hee hurled to bee rent and torne of Cats that this Beast, sacred to Isis, might reuenge the indignitie offred to Apis. But this Eclipse of the Egyptian superstition, caused by this Persian imposition, had an end, together with that Monarchie. For Alexander [e] did not only leaue them to their wonted Rites, himselfe [f] sacrificing to their Apis, and solemnizing Games in his honor, but added further glory to their Country, by erection of that famous Citie, named of himselfe Alexandria, (g wheras some thinke [h] the Citie No had before stood, destroyed by Nabuchodonoser) second in reputation to Rome, the [i] receptacle of Iewish, Grecian, and Egyptian Religions, adorned with many Temples and Palaces: his Successours, Ptolomæus Lagi (of whom the following Kings were all called Ptolomæi and [k] Lagidæ) Philadelphus, Euergetes, Philopator, Epiphanes, Philomator, Euergetes the second, Physcon, Lathurus, Auletes, the Father of Cleopatra, (whom Iulius Cæsar made Queene of Ægypt, the price of her honestie, and Anthonie, his wife, whom, together with her selfe, her ambition ouerthrew) adding to the greatnesse of Alexandria. Platoes Philosophie was not onely first borrowed of the Egyptians, but was publikely read at Alexandria as well as at Athens: which continued many ages. Sixe hundred yeeres after his death, Ammonius surnamed (of his former occupation being a Porter) Saccus seemed to haue lighted on the bookes of Hermes, [l] and thence learned the Doctrine of the Trinitie: of whom his Disciples Plotinus and Aurelius write, and after them their Schollers Porphyrie and Theodorus Asinæus; and their Auditors Iamblichus and Syrianus; to this last succeeded at Athens Proclus, Lycius, and after him the last of the greatest Platonikes Damascius: which haue written many things of the three beginnings.

The same Ammonius with like Philosophicall happinesse are said to haue found the Oracles of Zoroaster, which the two Iulians the Father and the Sonne, Chaldæans, translated out of their tongue into Greeke, in the time of M. Aurelius the Philosopher. Pythagoras had before learned it of Zabratus in Assiria: which (it seemeth) Plato heard of the younger Architas, and dispersed closely the seedes thereof in his Bookes, so that the elder Interpreters conceiued him not till the time of this Ammonius the Porter, from whom heere (as from Socrates a Statuarie in Athens) flowed this Diuine wisedome. Hee taught at Alexandria in the dayes of Clemens Alexandrinus about two hundred yeeres after Christ. Origen was his hearer. Iamblichus comprehended these Oracles of Zoroaster, in thirtie Bookes or thereabouts: for Damascius citeth the eight and twentie.

The wealth of the Ptolomies [m] raigning in Egypt appeareth by Straboes report of Auletes, his reuenues to be twelue thousand fiue hundred Talents, which yet was counted dissolute and vnthriftie. This by Master [n] Brerewood is summed two millions three hundred fortie three thousand & seuen hundred and fiftie pounds of our mony: Wheras the reuenues of Darius Hystaspis (accounted a hard man) is by Herodotus reckoned foureteene thousand fiue hundred and sixtie Euboike Talents, which makes 1820000. pounds, a great deale lesse summe, from that greater Empire. But they had other improuements. Alexander [o] is said to spend more then this on Hephestions funerall, by fiftie fiue thousand pounds. Yea, the Roman reuenues are by Plutarch [p] summed at eight thousand fiue hundred Myriades, which in our money is two millions, sixe hundred fiftie sixe thousand, and two hundred and fiftie pounds, not hugely exceeding the Egyptian.

§. II.

Of the Schoole and Librarie at Alexandria.

HAuing mentioned the Studies and learned men at Alexandria, and wealth of their Kings, I hold it not amisse to entertaine your eyes in longer view of that Alexandrian Schoole and Librarie. Simandius or Osymanduas [a] is the first in any Historie mentioned that erected a Librarie, setting this Inscription in the Frontispice thereof, ψυχῆς ἰατρεῖον, The Medicinary or Physicke-shop of the Minde. Some accuse Homer to haue stollen his Iliads and [b] Odysses out of Vulcans Temple at Memphis, being the workes of Phantasia a woman: the worke of a womanish fantasie so to deceiue, or receiue, of That almost more then Man. But the second Ptolomey, sonne of Ptolomeus Lagi was Anthor of that famous Library at Alexandria, following (saith [c] Strabo) the example of Aristotle. [d] Atheneus addes the Bookes of Aristotle also bought by Ptolomey of Neleus, which succeeded Theophrastus in this Legacie bequeathed to him from the Philosopher Himselfe. Iosephus tells vs of the Translation of the Law by the [e] Seuentie or Seuentie two Interpreters, procured by Demetrius Phalareus at the Kings charge: who also obtained the like Translations of other [f] Chaldæan, Egyptian, and Romane Monuments: the number of which translated Bookes, Cedrenus numbers one hundred thousand. Seneca [*] speakes of foure hundred thousand. Iosephus of fiue hundred thousand in the whole, which by the succeeding care of this Kings Successors, did after amount (it is [g] Gellius, Ammianus, & Isidores testimonie) to seuen hundred thousand Volumes: All which by cruell disaster in the Ciuill warres of Cæsar, perished by fire; He firing the ships, and they the adjoyning Library; which neither He in his Commentaries, nor Hirtius (as Cæsars most dismall fate) once mention: but Plutarch, Dio, Liuie, Seneca, Ammianus, and Gellius forget not these manifold Memorials, thus buried at once, & for euer, in forgetfulnes. This Library was in the Temple of Serapis, as both Marcellinus, & after him Tertullian, testifie: but that in Tertullians dayes was another famous Library of Cleopatra's Founding, called called for the likenesse, Ptolemeys; which in likelihood continued till that glorious Fabrike was ruined in the dayes of Theodosius, as Ruffinus, Socrates, and Sozomen haue written. Most of the Bookes of this latter, were brought from Pergamus, chiefe City of the lesser Asia, Seat of the Attalike Kings; one of which, Eumenes there collected two hundred thousand Volumes, ἄπλα βιβλία (not reckoning, as [u] Lipsius interprets the place, that Volume for more then one, which contayned diuers Treatises) giuen by Antonius vnto Cleopatra, as [x] Plutarch hath related. Ptolemey the fift then liuing, denied Eumenes in enuious emulation, the Egyptian paper, the cause that Parchment was then inuented at Pergamus, by Eumenes his industry, for the vse of his Library, as not onely Plinie and Varro, but the name of these skinnes called Pergamina of that City, sufficiently witnesse. The Egyptian Paper (of which ours made of ragges hath still the name) was made of a Sedge Reed growing in the Marishes of Egypt, called Papyrus, which easily diuides it selfe into thinne flakes; these laid on a Table, and moystened with the glutinous water of Nilus, were presst together and dryed in the Sunne. The Greekes and Romanes had their many famous Libraries, which would here trouble our Egyptian Trauceller, who in Lipsius his Booke of that Argument may better satisfie himselfe: as also touching their Furnitures of Marble, Iuory, Glasse, and many many curious artificiall Inuentions; besides the [y] Images of the bodies of learned Men there placed of Gold, Siluer, or Brasse, neere to more precious Images of their learned Mindes in their written Monuments. These indeed are the best mens best Images, in which their [z] Immortall Soules speake Immortally, yea, Immortality to themselues and others; they being dead, yet speaking, and neuer denying their wise counsels and familiar company to the Studious; who by this meanes are neuer * lesse alone, then when alone, and (as King Alphonsus sometimes said) neuer find better Counsellers then these dead.

And euer let their names flourish, that bestow care and cost to keepe those learned Names euer flourishing, and in redeeming these Monuments from Wormes, Mice, and putrifaction, erect vnto themselues Monuments farre beyond the stupendious Pyramides and other monstrous birth of artificiall vanity. Cheops is scarsly remembred, not worthy to be named with this Ptolemey, that fire not being able to consume the honour of his Name, that deuoured his Bookes: whereas Cheops his very name is doubted, and his memoriall rotten, notwithstanding his Pyramis still continues the remembrance of his Actiue and Passiue forgetfulnesse. And let my body want a Sepulchre, if my soule doe not more honour that [a] Bodleian Monument, then all Triumphall Chariots of the liuing, then the Mausolean, Mogoll, or Memphian magnificence for the dead, or any other Regall or Imperiall interments. There the stones are mute, or speake the Architects prayse, or haue inscribed a few Verses, verball flourishes perhaps of the Poets wit: but here euery Booke hath an Epitaph, nay the whole Booke is an Epitaph, and reall Testimony of the Founders worth; so many thousand dead Authours quickened by such care to speake his deserued prayse; so many liuing Students hauing their Minds daily feasted by such bounty, and the vnborne posterity hauing a better Inheritance purchased and prouided to their minds, then their carefull Parents can for their Bodies. But how doth this likenesse transport vs from Alexandria to Oxford? In both an admirable Library; in both Prouisions of maynteinance for Collegiate and Academike Students, both necessary companions. For what else is store of Bookes, stately Fabrikes, and costly Furniture without Students, but carkasses without soules? and what They without Bookes and maynteinance, but walking Shadowes and wandring Ghosts? the one is (it is Senecas sentence) a [b] studious luxury, the other a riotous study. Diuine then is that Heroike care of Such who (at once both Clients and Patrons of Arts and Learning) by liuing and liuelihood seeme to ioyne and giue life to soule and body together. And such was this Ptolemey, who made part of His Palace a Schoole, hauing conuenient places for sitting and walking (they are the words of [c] Strabo) and a great House or Colledge, in which the Learned conuerse, and dyet together. This Colledge hath rents in common, and a Priest also Rector of the Schoole, appointed first by the Kings, and after by Cæsar. So carefull were these Kings of learned Neighbourhood, that they assigned part of the Palace to this employment, that all the choise learned in the Kingdome (as [d] Philostratus speaking of Dionysius admitted one of them by Adrian, affirmeth) were chosen Fellowes into this Colledge, not young Students, but rewarded publikely for their former proficience, as the best deseruing Citizens of Athens had their dyet in the Prytaneum: therein differing from the Seminaries of Diuine and Humane Learning amongst vs. Claudius enlarged the Schoole; and Hadrian vsed much to dispute and question with the learned therein, herein [e] blamed that he bestowed this preferment on Pancrates a Poet, which had flattered him in the Canonization of Antinous.

§. III.

Of their Deuotions in those Times.

AS for the deuotion there f practised, wee may reade in Ruffinus of the Temple and Image of Serapis in his time destroyed by Theophilus, successor to Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria. This Temple was borne vp with Vault-worke, with great lights and secret passages, the space of an hundred steps: on the top whereof round about, were lofty roomes, in which the Keepers of the Temple, and they which made themselues chast (ἐγκρατεῖς) remayned. Within these were Galleries, or Cloysters, in squared rankes, and in the middest of all was the Temple, lifted vp on costly Pillars, and built of Marble. Post Capitolium nihil orbis terrarum cernit ambitiosius, saith g another: Except the Capitoll, the World hath not a Statelier Piece. Here was the Image of Serapis, reaching with his right hand to the wall on one side, with his left hand vnto the other, being framed of all kinds of Wood and Metals. It had on the East a little window so fitted, that when on a solemne day the Image of the Sunne was admitted to salute this Serapis, the iuggling Priests so obserued the time, that euen then the Sun-beames through this window, should seeme to kisse Serapis. They had also another tricke, by a Load-stone placed in the Roofe, to draw vp the Iron Image of the Sunne, as if it did then bid Serapis farewell. The superstitious Ethnikes had a Tradition among them, That if euer mans hand did offer violence to that Image, the Earth should presently returne, and resolue it selfe into the first Chaos, and the Heauens would suddenly fall. All this notwithstanding, a Christian Souldier dismembred the same, and burned Serapis openly, the Mice running out of his diuided trunke.

g Am. Marcel. l.22. Dionys. saith as much or more. Inter Serapidis templa celeberrimum apud Alexand. Vetustiss. Memphi hoc fanum subire nec hospit. nec sacerdotib. licet priusquam Apin sepelierint. Paus. At.

Rome (sayth Ruffinus) esteemed this Serapis to bee Iupiter, and that hee ware a Measure (Modius) on his head, as hee which gouerned all things in measure, or else did liberally feed men with the fruits of the Earth. Others coniectured him to be Nilus; others, Ioseph h that fed Egypt in the seuen deere yeeres. Others thought him to bee one Apis, (a King in Memphis) who in the time of famine, with his owne store, supplied the peoples want: for which benefit they built a Temple to him after his death, wherein they nourished an Oxe, in remembrance of him, whose husbandry and tillage had nourished them. This Beast they called also Apis.

h Oros. l.1.c.8. affirmeth, that of Iosephs act Egypt is still witnesse vnto his time, continuing the payment of the fift part of their profits to the King.

He i mentioneth the Temple of Saturne, whose Priest called Tyrannus, (vnder pretence of Saturnes commandement) would demand the company of what Lady he liked to beare the God company at night: which the Husband did not much sticke at, esteeming it an honour to haue a God his Corriuall. But Tyrannus shutting the woman into the Temple, by secret passages conueyed himselfe thither into the hollow Image of Saturne, in which hee held conference a while with the woman, and after by a deuice putting out the lights, satisfied his lust, in committing in the darke those workes of darkneſſe, which after being brought to light, caused the Temples destruction.

i Story of Tyrannus Saturnes Priest.

They had Brest-plates of Serapis in euery House, in the Walles, Entries, Posts, Windowes; in stead whereof they after fastened Crosses. The Crosse in the Egyptian Mysteries signified life to come. They had a Tradition, That their Religion should continue, till there came a Signe, in which was Life. k And by this occasion many of their Priests were conuerted. Sozomen l reporteth the same, That in purging of Serapis Temple at Alexandria, the Crosse, beeing found among other their Hieroglyphickes, was occasion of the conuersion of many vnto the Christian Faith. This m Temple, and the Temple of Bacchus, were turned into Christian Churches. Olympius a Philosopher with a company of seditious Ethnikes, fortified themselues in Serapis Temple, and caused many by force to sacrifice: and when the Christians burned their Images, he answered that the Images were but corruptible matter, but the Vertues, or Diuine Powers which inhabited them, were fled to Heauen. This I thought to mention for their sakes, who to their Image-worship haue borrowed the like Heathenish plaister. Ruffinus addeth, That in destroying the Temples, they found Reliques of their bloudie Superstition, the heads of Infants cut off, with the lips gilded.

k Socr. l.5.c.16
m Nicep. l.12.28 Theod. l.5.22. Hist. trip. l.10. cap.29.

The deuotion of Canopus was not inferiour to that of Alexandria. Here, through the subtiltie of the Priest, the Chaldeans were vanquished. For whereas they challenged their God Fire to be the strongest, as deuouring other Woodden and Mettal-gods, hee conueyed an Earthen pot full of holes, which he had stopped with Waxe and filled with water, into the Image: and when the Chaldæans made their fiery tryall hereof, the Waxe melting, the Water issued, and quenched the fire. Hence it is that they made the Image of Canopus with feet and necke short, and a belly like a barrell, or water-vessell.

Tacitus m reporteth certaine Miracles wrought at Alexandria by the instigation of Sarapis: the curing of a lame and blind man, whom that God had mooued to seeke this helpe at Vespasians hand, which he also performed. He consulting with this Oracle, saw suddenly behind him in the Temple one Basilides, whom by present enquiry hee found to lye sicke fourtescore miles thence in his bed. The name yet was an ominous signe to him of the whole Empire, as deriued of βασιλεὺς. The originall of this God is by some imputed to Ptolomæus Lagi, who hauing in Alexandria erected Temples, and instituted Religious Rites, seemed in his sleepe to see a tall young man, warning him to send into Pontus, to fetch thence his Image, suddenly after vanishing in a flame of fire. When the Egyptian Priests could not satisfie him in the interpretation of these things; Timotheus an Athenian, whom hee had sent for to bee chiefe Master of Ceremonies, willed him to send to Sinope, wherein was an ancient Temple of Pluto, hauing in it the Image of Proserpina. Ptolomey neglecting this; and with a second Vision terrified, sent to Scydrothemis King of Sinope, for the same; being (in the way) further hereunto incouraged by the Delphian Oracle. Scydrothemis protracting the businesse, was by diseases and manifest anger of the Gods forced to assemble and perswade his people to suffer the carrying away of their God. But whiles they resisted this enterprize, the ambitious Idoll, without once taking leaue, conueyed himselfe into the ship, which also, together with him, hee made to arriue at Alexandria in three dayes, where this Temple was built to him, in the place wherein sometime had stood Isis Chappell. Some o esteemed him Æsculapius for his cures, some Osiris, some Iupiter, p some Pluto: but Serapis was his Egyptian appellation. q Ptolomeus Philadelphus, his Sonne, bestowed cost in that famous Library at Alexandria before related, by r Cæsars Souldiers casually burned. Cornelius Tacitus s telleth no lesse Miracle of Memnons stony Image at Thebes, or as others say, at Abidus, which being striken with the Sun-beame, at the Sun-rising yeelded a vocall sound. This Image was halfe cut off by Cambyses: Pausanias t sayth that he saw it, and largely describeth it. Augustus, hauing destroyed Anthony and Cleopatra, brought u Egypt into a Prouince, and scowred all the trenches of Nilus. Hee caused the body of x Great Alexander to bee brought forth, which he crowned with a Crowne of Gold, and strewing with flowers, worshipped it. Hee built Nicopolis in memory of his Actian Victory: instituted there Quinquennall Games; enlarged Apollos Temple: and consecrated the place where he had pitched his Tents to Neptune and Mars, adorning it with spoyles.

Onias y one of the Iewish Priests (according to the Iewish manner) literally interpreting Esaies z Prophesie of the Altar in Egypt, built a Temple at Bubastis in fashion of that at Ierusalem, but lesse, by the permission of Philometer, and furnished it with Priests and Leuites after the Iewish Religion. At a Alexandria also the Iewes were free and had their Synagogues, as at Leontopolis likewise, and other places. b Procopius sayth, that Diocletian the Emperour bestowed Elephantina and the parts adioyning on the Blemi and Nobatæ, whose Religion was a mungrell of the Greekish, Egyptian, and their Owne: but he caused them to cease humane Sacrifices which they vsed to offer to the Sunne.

And thus was the state of Religion in Egypt during the conquests of the Persians, Greeks and Romans, each rather seeking to settle heere their Empires then Opinions. But when the Sunne of Righteousnesse, the Sonne of God, the Sauiour of Man, appeared to the World, he honoured Egypt with his infancy, as after with a Religious conquest, by weapons (not carnall) casting downe the holds which these Hellish spirits had heere so long possessed; thus fulfilling truely what Esay had prophesied, and Mercury foretold. Alexandria became a Patriarchall Sea (the first Bishop whereof was Saint Marke) enioying in Libya, Pentapolis, and Egypt, the same power that the Romane Bishop had in Italy, by Decree of the c first Nicen Councell. Heere also liued the first Heremites (the d first and chiefe of which was Anthony, an Egyptian Inuenter of this Order) in the sandy Desarts, by occasion of those bloudy persecutions wherein many thousand lost their liues. Of these Heremites reade Io. Cassianus, and Seuerus Sulpitius de vita Martini. 3. But when as the Mahumetan Religion and Armes began first to peepe into the World, Egypt e was made a slaue to those Superstitions vnder which it groneth till this day.

§. IIII.

Of the Moderne Ægyptians, & of Cairo and Alexandria.

THe Saracens diuided Egypt into three parts; Errif, from Cairo to Rosetto; Assahid, the Land part from Cairo to Bugia; Maremma, or Bechria, as Nilus runneth to Damiata. It was [q] subdued vnder the conduct of Hamrus the sonne of Hasi Generall of the Arabian forces to Homar or Ammar the second Caliph. Hee onely exacted Tribute, permitting freedome of their Conscience to all. He built vpon the bankes of Nilus a Towne called by the Arabian Fustato, that is, Tabernacle, because in the Desart places, through which he passed, he was constrained to lye in Tents. The common people call this Towne Mesre Idatichi, the Ancient Citie: for so it is in respect of Cairo, [r] which was after built two miles from hence, by one Gehour, who of a Dalmatian slaue had beene aduanced to be a Counsellor vnto Elcain the Mahumetane Calipha, and was Generall of his Army about the foure hundred [s] yeere of their Hegira. Hee called it Elchahira, which signifieth an imperious Mistresse. Hee walled it round, and built in it that famous Temple called Gemib Hashare, as Hamrus had done before at Fustato. In this Towne of Fustato standeth the Sepulchre of a famous Saint of their Sect called Nafissa, of the Line of Mahomet, whose beautifull Shrine the Schismaticall Patriarches of Egypt adorned with siluer Lampes, Carpets of Silke and other precious ornaments. No Mahumetan commeth to Cairo eyther by Water or Land, but he adoreth this Sepulchre, and offereth thereat, insomuch that the yeerely Oblations and Almes heere offered for the reliefe of the poore kindred of Mahomet, and maynt enance of the Priests that keepe it (which want not their counterfeit Miracles to delude the peoples zeale) amount to one hundred thousand Saraffi. And when Zelim conquered Cairo, the Ianizaries rifling this Sepulchre, found in it fiue hundred thousand Saraffi in ready Coine, besides other riches. Some report that this Nafissa being a Dame of honour, yeelded her body, without reward, to any that required the same, [t] bestowing (as she said) this Almes for the loue of the Prophet Mahomet. Lettice sutable to such lips: Like Propher, like Saint. But Leo would haue you thinke her an honester woman.

Fustato is reckoned as a Suburb to Cairo, containing (in Leo's time Anno one thousand fiue hundred twenty sixe) fiue thousand Families: besides many Sepulchres adored of the fond people, which couer the pauement with rich Carpets. Hither resort euery Friday great multitudes for deuotion, and bestow liberall Almes: [u] They heere sprinkle cold water with sweet herbes and leauy boughes.

Bulach is another Suburb of Cairo vpon the bankes of Nilus, of like distance, and hath in it foure thousand Families with stately Temples and Colledges. Beb Elloch [x] standeth a mile from Cairo, and hath about three thousand Families. Gemeh Tailon was adorned by Tailon sometime Gouernour of Egypt with a sumptuous Temple and Palace. Beb Zuila, another Suburbe, containeth twelue thousand Families. Cairo, it selfe within the Walles, hath not aboue eight thousand Families, and is full of stately and magnificent Temples. Heere is an Hospitall built by Piperis, the first Soldan of the Mamalukes Race: the yeerely reuenues whereof amount to two hundred thousand Saraffi, or as some reckon, fiue hundred Ducats a day. It is open to all sicke and diseased persons, and heire to all that die there. The Plague is sometime so hot at Cairo, that there dye twelue thousand persons daily. This was the state of Cairo in Leo's time. Solomon [y] Schweigher affirmeth, that at his being in Cairo, Anno a thousand fiue hundred eighty one, there died daily betweene seuen and ten thousand: nor is any place more plagued with the French Disease. Besides that Hospitall, and Nafissa Sepulchre, are three other famous, Zania della Inachari, Imamsciafy Giamalazar. This is the generall Vniuersitie of all Egypt. [a] In this place, Anno one thousand fiue hundred threescore and sixe, in the moneth of Ianuary, by misfortune of fire were burned nine thousand written Bookes of great value, wrought with Gold, worth three or foure hundred Ducats a piece one with another. This was interpreted as an ominous token of their ruine. They thinke also that Mecca will in short time be conquered by the Christians, and her deuotions shall bee remooued to Rosetto. Neander [b] his conceit is ridiculous, that Cairo should hold as much people as all Italy, and that there are two and twentie thousand Temples. Iohn Eneſham out of their owne Registers [b] numbreth but two thousand foure hundred: and though Cairo considered together with these Suburbs is great, yet it is not all the way continued with houses and buildings, [c] but hath Gardens also and Orchards betweene. Iodocus à Meggen reporteth, that a man can hardly walke the streets by reason of the multitudes of people [d] and beasts. They bring their water from Nilus into the Citie on Camels: on Mules, and Horses

r The Arabians and Turkes doe call Cairo, Miscir; the reuenue whereof amounteth to aboue a Million, & runneth into the Hasnad or priuate Treasurie of the Great Turke, and not into the publike Treasurie: Lazora Soronzo. And although the Temples and some Houses are faire, yet the greater part of the Towne is ill built. Because they may not by their Law drinke wine, they compound a drinke of drie Raisons steeped in water and other mixtures; yea, and secretly will make bold with the former. He saith, that (besides other calls from their steeples to deuotion) they ascend at mid-night to call, that the people may encrease and multiply, and therewith their Religion.

Beniamin Tudelensis numbred in Cairo 2000. Iewes in his time (440. yeeres since) in two Synagogues and Sects of the Hellenists and Babylonians. He saith that there then raigned in Misraim or Cairo Amir Almumanin Eli sonne of Abitalib, all whose subiects were called Moredim or Rebels, for their difference from the Bagdad Caliph. His Palace was called Soan. And he came forth but twice a yeere, on their Easter solemnitie, and then when Nilus ouerfloweth, which extendeth fifteene dayes iourneyes when it ascendeth twelue cubits on their measuring pillar, and but halfe that way is watered, if it ascenderh but sixe cubits. An Officer euery day signified the increase, with proclamation of praise to God therefore. The water of Nilus serueth for drinke and medicine against repletions. Old Misraim (he saith) is two leagues from new Misraim, but altogether waste. Baumgarten thinks there are in Cairo 8000. which liue onely by carrying water. And there are diuers which either of their owne vow, or by some Testators charitie offer freely to all that will drinke in siluer vessels: and sprinkle the streets twice a day because of the heate and dust. There are more in Cairo (hee reporteth such a rumour) which want houses to dwell in, then Venice hath Citizens. There are esteemed to be 15000. Iewes: 10000. Cookes which carry their cookerie and boile it as they goe, on * their heads. In nine or ten houres one can scarcely compasse it. But you must know that this was in the time of the Soldan, before the Turke had conquered it.

* Like such as sell Godlings, &c. in London.

Now though I haue beene alreadie tedious, yet for the Readers fuller notice of this Countrey and Citie, I haue here added some of the later and exacter Obseruations of that learned Gentleman, Master George Sandys, to whom wee haue elsewhere beene indebted. Hee relateth, that trauelling from Alexandria to Cairo, they paid at the gate a Madeyne a head, indifferently for themselues and their Asses: they passed through a Desart, producing here and there a few vnhusbanded Palmes, Capers, and a weede called Kali * which they vse for fuell, selling the ashes to the Venetians, who mixing them equally with the stones brought from Pauia by the Riuer Ticinum, make thereof their Christalline glasses. On the left hand they left the ruines of Cleopatras Palace, and beyond that of Bucharis an ancient Citie: and passing a guard of Souldiers, and after that ferried ouer a Creeke of the Sea, they came to a quadrangle arched, and built by a Moore for the reliefe of Trauellers, and there reposed themselues on the stones till mid-night, and then passed alongst the shore, before day entering Rosetta; where they repayred to a Caue belonging to the Frankes, in an vnder, darke, mustie roome, where they were entertayned on the hard floore. This Citie stands vpon the principall branch of Nile, called heretofore Canopus, which about three miles thence entereth the Sea, hauing the entrance crossed with a barre of sand (as at Damiata) changeable with the windes and surges, the Ierbies or Boates being therefore made without keeles, flat and round in the bottom, a Pilot sounding all the day to direct for the Channell. The houses are of bricke, flat-roofed (a thing generall in these hotter countries) jetting ouer to shaddow the narrow streets, exceedingly furnished with prouisions, built by a slaue of an Egyptian Chalife. Neere to this stood Canopus, that Citie famous in the worst sense, if we beleeue Iuuenal; where, to eschue vice, saith Seneca, was to incurre infamie. Here had Serapis a Temple, visited in his Often festiuals by a world of luxurious people from Alexandria, in painted boats, downe the artificiall Channels.

Luxuria, Iuuen. S. 15.

Here hyring a Ierby, the next day but one they came to Cairo. This arme of Nilus is as broad as the Thames at Tilburie, slow, often troublesomely shallow, and euer thicke: hauing on each side many meane Townes, seated on Hills of mud throwne vp, to preserue them in the ouerflow. Ten miles from Rosetto is that Cut which runneth to Alexandria. Vpon the bankes along as they passed, were infinite numbers of deepe and spacious Vaults into which they let the Riuer, from whence they conuey it by trenches into their seuerall grounds, being drawne vp into higher Cisternes with wheeles set round with Pitchers, turned about by Buffoloes. The Moores had much labour in drawing vp the Boate, wading often aboue the middle, at euery stronger hale crying Elough, thinking by this name of God to finde his assistance, and to chase away Deuils and impediments. Many of these Moores are broken by reason of their hard labour, and weake foode. They are descended of the Arabians, and vnderstand their language: a deuout, ignorant, laborious people, tawnie, meane statured, nimble-footed, shrill tongued, spare of dyet, reputed base by the Turkes, not suffered to weare weapons in Townes, not admitted to Souldierie or Magistracie. In Cities they practise merchandiſe, little differing in habite from Turkes. There dwell alſo in Egypt Arabians, Iewes, Chriſtians, both Greekes, Armenians, and the trueſt Egyptians, the Copties. The Countrey people follow husbandrie, are wrapt in a ruſſet Mantle, both men and women; theſe hiding their faces with beaſtly clowts, with holes for their eyes, hauing eaſie trauell (thoſe which are borne in the eighth moneth liuing, elſewhere deadly) to that purpoſe ſetting a plant in the roome, which growes in the Deſarts, low, leafeleſſe, browne, branched like Corall, and ſet in water, doth then ſtrangely diſplay it ſelfe. A naſtie people cruſted with dirt, and ſooted with ſmoke by reaſon of their fuell and want of chimneyes in their baſe cottages. The women thinke it a great comelineſſe to bee fat, and therefore in the Cities being wrapt from the crowne of the head to the foot in linnen Robes, they ſpreade their armes vnderneath to appeare more corpulent. They couer their faces with blacke Cypres beſpotted with red. The better ſort weare hoopes of gold and ſiluer about their armes, and aboue their ankles; others of copper, with pieces of coine halfe couering their foreheads, and plates about their necks. Both men and women brand their armes for the loue of each other, diuers women ſtayning their chinnes with knots and flowers of blue, made by pricking of the skinne with needles, and rubbing it ouer with inke, and the iuyce of an herbe, which will neuer out.

Cairo. Cairo (which wee had almoſt forgotten in this generall view of the moderne Egyptians) is ſeated on the Eaſt ſide of the Riuer, repreſenting the forme of a Creſcent, ſtretching South and North with the adioyning Suburbs fiue Italian miles, in breadth ſcarce one and a halfe where broadeſt: the walls (if it bee walled) rather ſeeming to belong to priuate houſes; the ſtreets narrow, the houſes high built, more faire without then inwardly commodious and moſt of ſtone neere to the top; at the end almoſt of each ſtreet a gate, which ſhut (as euery night they are) make them defenſiue, as ſo many Caſtles. Their locks and keyes be Their Moſques of wood euen to doores platted with Iron. The Moſques are magnificent, the ſtones of many being carued without, ſupported with pillars of marble, adorned with what Art can deuiſe, and their Religion tolerate. Yet differ they in forme from thoſe of Conſtantinople, ſome being ſquare, with open roofes in the middle of a huge proportion, the couered circle tarraſt aboue; others ſtretched out in length, and many fitted vnto the place where they ſtand: adioyning to which are lodgings for Santons, Fooles, and mad men, whom their deuotion honoureth. Here be alſo diuers goodly Hoſpitals both for building, reuenue, and attendance. Next to theſe in beautie are the great Mens Seraglios, by which if a Chriſtian ride, they will put him from his Aſſe with indignation and contumelie. The ſtreets are vnpaued and exceeding durtie after a ſhowre (for here it rayneth ſometimes in winter, and then moſt ſubiect to plagues) ouer which many beames are laid athwart on the tops of houſes, and couered with mats, to ſhelter them from the Sunne. The like couerture there is betweene two high Moſques in the principall ſtreet, vnder which when any great Man paſſeth, they ſhoote vp arrowes that ſticke there in abundance. The Nile, a mile diſtant, in the time of the inundation flowes in by ſundrie channels, which growing emptie or corrupted, they haue it brought on Camels: their Well water being good for no other vſe but to waſh houſes or cleanſe the ſtreets. In the midſt of the Towne is a ſpacious Caue, called the Beſeſtan, in which are ſold all finer wares, and old things as at out-cryes, by the Call, Who giues more? There are three principall gates, neere to the Northermoſt of which ſometime ſtood that ſtately Palace of Dulcibe wife to Caitbeus the Sultan, which had the doores and jawmes of Iuorie, the walls and pauements checkered with diſcoloured marble; Columnes of Porphyre, Alablaſter and Serpentine; ſeelings flouriſhed with Gold and Azure, inlaid with Ebonie: but ruined by Zelim the Turke, and the ſtones and ornaments tranſported to Conſtantinople. Neere to this is the lake Esbiky, ſquare and large; then onely a Lake when Nilus ouerfloweth, frequented with barges of pleaſure: at other times as profitable as then pleaſant, affoording fiue haruefts in a yeere. Within and without the Citie are a number of delicate Orchards watered as they doe their fields; in which grow varietie of excellent fruits, as Oranges, Limons, Pomegranates, Apples of Paradiſe, Sicamor figs, and another kinde (growing on Trees as bigge as Oakes, boared full of holes, the fruit not growing amongſt the leaues, but out of the bole and branches) Dates, Almonds, Caſſia fiſtula (leafed like an Aſh, the fruit hanging downe like Sauſages) Apples no bigger then berries, Galls growing on Tamariskes; Plantains, that haue a broad flaggie leafe growing in cluſters, and ſhaped like Cucumbers, the rinde like a Peaſe-cod, ſolide within without ſtones or kernels, to the taſte very delicious (holden by the Mahumetans the forbidden fruit in Paradiſe) and many other Trees, ſome bearing fruit all the yeere, and almoſt all their leaues. To theſe adde whole fields of Palmes, and yet no preiudice to the vnder growing Corne: theſe are naturall (others planted, and onely Orchards) pleaſant in forme, in fruit profitable: of body ſtrait, high, round and ſlender (yet vnfit for buildings) creſted about, and therefore eaſily climbed: the branches like Sedges, slit on the neather side and euer greene, growing onely on the top as plumes of feathers, yeerly pruned, and the bole at the top bared. There are Male and Female, both bearing Cods, but this onely fruitfull, yet not without the Males neighbourhood, towards whose vpright growth shee enclines her crowne, hauing in the beginning of March, her seedes commixed with his. Their Dates grow like fingers, whence they haue their name; ripe in the end of December, which began to Cod in Februarie: the tops of such as are fruitlesse, they open, and take out the braine which they sell for a Sallad, better then an Artichoke: of the branches they make bedsteds, Latices, &c. of the webbe of the leaues, Baskets, Mats, Fans, and the like; of the outward huske of the Cod good cordage, of the inward, Brushes: all this they yeerly affoord without empayring the Tree.

Castle of Cairo.

At the South end of the Citie stands the Castle, once the Mansion of the Mamaluke Sultans, ascended vnto by one way onely, and that hewen out of the Rocke by the easie steepes on horse-backe to bee ascended. From the top the Citie and Countrey yeeld a delightfull prospect. It is so great, that it seemes a Citie of it selfe, immured with high walls diuided into partitions and entered by doores of Iron, wherein are many spacious Courts, in times past the places of exercise. The ruines testifie a quondam sumptuousnesse; many pillars of solide marble yet remayning, so huge, that they cause iust wonder, how they were thither conueyed. Here hath the Bassa his residence, and herein the Diuan is kept on Sundayes, Mundayes, and Tuesdayes: the Chaules as Aduocates preferring the suites of their Clients. The Bassa commandeth as absolute Soueraigne, hath vnder him sixteene Sanziacks, and a hundred thousand Spacheis. The reuenues of this little Countrey amount to three millions of Shariffes, one to the Great Turke, the second to the Bassa, the third for payes and sending forth the Carauan to Mecca. The present Bassa is Mahomet, a man well in yeeres, and of seuere conditions. He cut off the heads of foure thousand Spacheis at his first entrance for insolencies, and sent the great men to Constantinople, strangling such as refused, vsing the Arabians which hated the other, in his executions. Drunkennesse is punished with death. If a robberie bee committed, they which are appointed to guard that quarter, suffer for it, which makes them (to saue themselues) sometimes apprehend innocents, who with holes boared through their armes stretcht wide on staues, in which are candles stucke burning downe to the flesh, are led to execution. His rigour made him confine himselfe to the Castle, yet so approued of the Grand Seignior, that he hath giuen him his daughter in marriage (a childe of foure yeeres) solemnized with all possible ceremonies. He will hardly suffer a Christian to turne Mahumetan, thinking, perhaps, they doe it rather for preferment then deuotion.

No Citie can be more populous, nor better serued with prouision of all sorts, then Cairo, the faireſt Citie in Turkie, yet now as it were withered by age and sickneſſe, in comparison of her yonger and more flourishing times. Most of the Inhabitants are Merchants or Artificers. All of a trade keepe their shops in one place, which they shut about fiue a clocke (except Cookes) solacing themselues the rest of the day. Few but such as haue great families, dresse meate in their houses, which the men buy readie drest, the women being too fine fingered to meddle with huswifery. These ride abroad vpon pleasure on easie-going Asses, and tie their husbands to due beneuolence, otherwise procuring a diuorcement. Many Physitians are in Cairo, by reason of the many Simples brought hither. They haue a kinde of Rue, wherewith they perfume themselues in the morning, as a preseruatiue against both Infection and Deuils. There are many which get their liuings by shewing feats with Birds and Beasts: which teach Rauens to vse their throats and tongues together, so that they will make a man admire at their speech: Dogs and Goats to goe and turne on the tops of little pillars, not aboue the breadth of a mans hand; Camels taught to daunce when they are yong, by setting them on a hot hearth, playing meanewhile on an Instrument, the heat then and musicke after, causing this motion. Asses are not Asses, but beyond Bankes his Horse in trickes, taught by their suttle Masters. But Cairo hath carried vs too farre, an Imperious Mistris indeed to our Readers patience. Yet will we further adde this short note out of the two Marcnites Translators of the Nubian Geographers.

Cairo. Gab. Sionita & Io. Hesronita.

Metsr is the name of Cairo and all Egypt, so called of Mesraim the sonne of Noa, as saith Mohamed Sirazita. This Citie is gouerned by a Bascia and twentie fiue thousand Spahies and Ianizaries. It is rich in Cassia Trees, Sugar Canes and Corne, many Lands adioyning yeelding haruest twice a yeere, Hay foure times, Herbs and Pulse in manner alway greene. Adde store of Salt very white, the water of Nilus inclosed in pits, and by the onely heate of the Sunne in three dayes being turned into it. In former times it was famous for Balsam plants, now remooued to Mecca by command of the Othomans; and none are found in all Egypt but seuen shrubs * in the Bassa's garden, kept with great diligence. The leaues are like Alexandria [b] is very vnwholeſome, as the graue of that Alexandria wee before mentioned. Vnder the foundations are great habitations, as if they were two Alexandria's built one vpon another. Vnder the houſes of the Citie are Ciſternes ſuſtayned with mightie Arches to receiue the inundation of Nilus, belonging (ſaith G. Braun) to euery houſe: the cauſe of much ſickneſſe to the Inhabitants, eſpecially ſince the diminiſhing and decay of the Citie, moſt of the Ciſternes now being fennie for want of vſe. When the Saracens had ſpoyled it, it remayned long deſolate, vntill a ſubtile Caliph proclaymed that Mahomet had left great indulgences to ſuch as would here inhabite. And thus he repleniſhed the Citie with Inhabitants, building houſes for them, as hee did Colledges for the Students, and Monaſteries for the Religious. Here yet remayneth a little Chappell, wherein they ſay that the high Prophet and King, Alexander [c] the Great lyes buried: to which reſort many Piigrimes that adore the ſame, and beſtow there their almes. The Arabians and their Alcoran alſo call Alexander, Two-horned, the reaſon whereof ſeemeth to be that his ambitious ſeeking to bee accounted the ſonne of Iupiter Ammon: neither doe the vulgar Arabians know him by the name Alexander, but by that title of Two-horned. And ſuch was his Image in the Cyrenaike coynes. This body was taken from Perdiccas by Ptolemæus Lagi, and there intombed in gold: which Cybioſartes taking away, it was couered with glaſſe, ſo remayning till the time of the Saracens. In old time they had a cuſtome, mentioned by [d] Gallen, of executing condemned perſons which they would quickly deſpatch; to apply to the breſt an Aſpe, and then cauſe him to walke a few paſes: and ſuddenly he is at his long home. This he there ſaw: a practice not much vnlike the Athenian draught of Hemlock. There is in Alexandria (as Maſter Eneſham relateth) a pillar of marble, called by the Turkes, King Pharaos needle, foure ſquare, in height ninetie foote. Maſter Sandys ſaith, there lyes another by it, like vnto it, halfe buried in rubbidge: both Hieroglyphicall Obeliskes of Theban marble, almoſt as hard, and of a deeper red then Porphyr: in the ſame place where Alexanders Palace ſtood. And without the ſaid Citie foure hundred paſes, another round, called Pompeys Pillar, ſtanding on a ſquare ſtone fifteene foote high: the compaſſe of the pillar is ſeuen and thirtie foote, the height, an hundred and one, cauſing no ſmall wonder how it ſhould be erected on that ſtone. This happily was ſet vp in memorie of Great Pompey, who by the Egyptian treacherie was ſlaine at Peluſium, almoſt in the ſight of Ieruſalem (as [e] Eberus noteth) and that Countrey of the Iewes which he had vniuſtly wronged and ſubdued to Romane ſeruitude; although his hands were purer touching the holy places and treaſures, which his curious eyes would needes behold, then thoſe of perjured Craſſus, which before had ſuffered deſerued vengeance by Parthian execution. Iodocus à Meggen [f] ſaith, that the Channell which bringeth water from Nilus continueth fiftie miles: the Ciſternes which receiue it, are as you haue heard: and it is thought (as this our Author affirmeth) that thoſe parts of Alexandria which the ground hideth, coſt more then that which is open to the view. Yet doe theſe Ciſternes now much decay. The Citie ſheweth faire without, but within (they are Baumgartens [g] wordes) like a heape of ſtones: few houſes are whole. The Cuſtome is farmed by the Iewes at two hundred thouſand Madeins a day (a coyne of ſiluer trebling the value of an Aſper, thirtie of them amounting to a Riall of eight) the Port is free to friend and enemie. Ten in the hundred is paid in kinde of all thing for cuſtome, onely money payes but one and a halfe, whereof they take an exact account, that they may gheſſe at the value of returned commodities; then paying eleuen in the hundred more, euen for ſuch Goods as are in propertie vnaltered. The places anciently famous in Alexandria, beſides the Muſæum and Serapium before mentioned, as their Vniuerſitie and Librarie, were the Iſæum and other their Temples, which with the Palaces are ſaid to take vp the fourth part of their Citie. Beniamin Tudelenſis ſpeaketh of a faire building without the walls in his time, called Ariſtotles Schoole, wherein were twentie Schooles, and betweene them marble pillars: ſometimes much frequented (as he ſaith, but I thinke, deceiued) [h] to heare Ariſtotles Reading. He mentions Vaults a mile long. He found there three thouſand Iewes. Thebes, that ſometime was ſo famous a Citie, contayneth not now aboue three hundred Families: and ſtill retayneth ſome bones of the carkaſſe of old Thebes, many pillars, walls, inſcriptions in Latine, Greeke, and Egyptian characters. Memphis, her next ſucceſſor, is vtterly ruinate.

§. V.

Of the Saracens, their Acts and Sects: of the Mamalukes and Copties.

THe Mahumetanes entred Ægypt about Anno 637. After, their state sinking vnder the weight of it selfe (which is the ordinary sicknesse of Greatnesse) they growe to dissentions and Sects, as is said in our Saracen History. For the seate of the Saracens call Calphas beeing by Mucamar remoued to Bagdat, which hee had builded, there arose new Caliphs in Damasco; in Egypt (whose seate was after at Cayro) in Cayroan, to whom the Africans yeelded subjection, and after at Marocco. But in Elcaims time, while hee sought to winne the East from the Caliph of Bagdat, his Lieutenant rebelled against him, and hee was faine to liue in Egypt, where Gehoar had built Cayro. The Sect of Hali had before also preuayled in Egypt, for which cause Nasissas father was forced to flee the Countrey, yet this sect after was restored by Asmulinus, and Solinus his sonne, first Caliph of Egypt. But when the Westerne forces, vnder Godfrey of Bullen, grew terrible to the East, the Egyptians payd tribute to the Christians, which Dargan the Sultan detayning, was by Almericus King of Ierusalem ouerthrowne in battell. Noradine of Damasco sent Saracon his sonne to helpe Sanar the Sultan against this Dargan, which Saracon was by the Caliph appointed Sultan, who before had slaine the Sultan, and Saladine his Successour slew the Caliph (for comming to him with pretence of doing him reuerence, hee smote him to the ground with an Iron Mace) and rooted out his Posteritie to settle his owne. This History is diuersly reported. Peucerus maketh the Egyptian Caliphs to bee Schismaticall from their first entrance, which was (as hee saith) in Anno 703. which raigned in Egypt foure hundred forty and seuen yeeres, of the profession of Hali. Curio writeth otherwise, as in their History wee haue shewed. So also doth Leo, dissenting from them both, a man learned in his owne Religion. Hee saith that the Caliph of Cayro had continued two hundred and thirty yeeres, when as Saladine slew him, and subjected himselfe to the Caliph of Bagdet, the onely Caliph then remayning. This Saladine was nephew to Saracon, who chased the Christians out of Syria. His Children raigned after him, of which Melechsala was last, who first inuented the Order of the Mamalukes, which were Circassian slaues bought in their youth, and trayned vp to Armes, Artes, and Religion of the Saracens, whom hee made of his Guard. But they slew their Master, and vsurped the Kingdome to themselues, alwayes electing one of their Company, the first of which Mamaluke Kings was Turquemenius, who was slaine of his fellow Cothus, and hee of Bendocader, who was also poysoned, &c.

Leo sayth, that Saladines Family raigned an hundred and fiftie yeeres, and Piperis was (sayth hee) the first Mamaluke King. Campson Gaurus, and Tomumbeius, the last of these Kings, were ouerthrowne by Zelim the Turke, Anno 1517. whose Successours still hold Ægypt, and haue a Bassa resident at Cayro, from whence was carried by water many Ornaments to Constantinople. The Caliph was at Bagdet, so heere, retayned some spirituall preeminence, much like the Rex sacrorum i amongst the Romanes, whose Title was Royall, and his Office in their superstitious ceremonies to performe those Rites which the Kings had vsed personally to doe: but this titular King was subject to higher Powers of the Pontifex People, and Senate. Banmgarten saw him in white attire with a forked Diadem or Mitre, a blacke and long beard, with a great retinue comming to salute Tongobardinus a great Mamaluke (which sometimes had beene a Deacon in Spaine, and now had embraced the world, and the world him, possessing Honours, Wealth, and fiue and thirtie Wiues) in Cayro.

Peter Martyr sayth, that the k Caliph selleth the Soldan this Dignitie at a price, and ascending the Throne, doth giue and commit vnto the Soldan there standing on foote, the absolute power of life and death, and then descending, disrobeth himselfe, attiring the Soldan with the same Robes. So it appeareth, that the name and power of the Caliph, all the time of the Mamalukes (as the Ghost of it selfe) had some almost breathlesse shadow left: the life and substance being in the Soldan.

There is (sayth Leo) in Cayro, and in all Ægypt foure Sects, differing from each other in Canon and Ciuill Lawes, all Mahumetans. Hee which professeth one of these Sects, cannot at his pleasure betake him to another, except being learned hee shew reasons therefore. Each of these Sects hath his peculiar Iudge, from whom yet lyeth an appeale to a higher Iudge, being Gouernour of the Sect called Essafichia. Whosoeuer attempteth ought against the Precepts of his owne Sect, is secretly punished by the Iudge thereof: And although the Priests of these seuerall Sects vse differing Liturgies and Rites, l yet doe they not take one the other for Enemies, with hatred or mutinies: but if any question arise, Learned men by conference debate the same. No man vpon paine of grieuous punishment may reproach any of the foure Doctors, first Authors of those foure Sects. There is one sort of religious men in Cayro, called Cheneſia, which liue vpon Horſe-flesh: therefore a number of Iades bought and set vp a fattening, and sold to these Cheneſians, which Sect is rife in all Egypt. There goe certayne Women vp and downe the Citie crying, whose office is to Excise or Circumcise the women, which is obserued in Ægypt and Syria, both by the Mahumetans, and Iacobite-Christians. Neither haue the Turkes (although in superstition by themselues acknowledged short of the Arabians and Ægyptians) beene altogether idle in their Deuotion, which they testifie by their Pilgrimages, and Almes-workes. Bellonius telleth of one Turke that caused water to bee brought daily on Camels backes for the ease of Trauellers in that desart space betweene Alexandria and Rosetto. Egypt hath in it many Iewish Synagogues, who speake the Spanish, Italian, Turkish, Arabian, and Greeke languages, and are great Merchants. Thus wee see the iudgements of God by the Persians, Grecians, and Romanes for their Pristine Idolatrie, and a greater iudgement for their Heresie, hatched by Arrius, punished by a Saracenicall Apostasie.

m Good works amongſt Turkes.

Amongst the differing Sects of the Mahumetans (of which wee haue spoken in the third booke) Africa, and especially Egypt, and herein Cayro most of all is pestered with them; which may bee called the Naked, or the Wicked Sect, rogning vp and downe naked, and practising their fleshly villanie, in the open sight of the people, who yet hold them for Saints. The iust hand of Diuine Iustice, that when men forsake God, not Religion and Truth alone, but Reason, but Sense shall also forsake them.

n Leo, lib. 3.

Before wee leaue those Soldans of Cayro, or rather because you haue stayed so long heere, let vs bestow some spectacle on you worthy the sight, as a refreshing to your wearied eyes. They are the same which the Soldan in ostentation of his magnificence made to the Turkish Embassadour, Anno 1507. from Baumgartens relations, which was an eye-witnesse thereof. There were assembled threescore thousand Mamalukes all in like habite: the Soldan himselfe all in white, with a mitred Diadem, and not farre from him their Pope or Caliphа in a lower seate: and beneath him the Turkish Embassadour. The place was a spacious Plaine, in which were three heapes of sand, fiftie paces distant, and in each a Speare erected with a marke to shoote at, and the like ouer against them, with space betweene for sixe Horses to runne a-breast. Heere did the younger Mamalukes gallantly adorned, vpon their Horses running a full carreer, yeeld strange experiments of their skill, not one missing the marke, first with casting Darts, and after with their Arrowes, as they ranne: and lastly trying their staues. Others after this, in the like race of their running Horses, shot with like dexteritie diuers Arrowes backwards and forwards. Others in the middest of their race alighted three times, and (their Horses still running) mounted againe, and hitte the marke neuertheleſſe. Others did hitte the same, standing on their Horses thus swiftly running. Others three times vnbent their Bowes, and thrice againe bent them whiles their Horses ranne, and missed not the marke: neither did others, which amidst their race, lighted downe on either side, and againe mounted themselues: no, nor they which in their swiftest course leaped and turned themselues backwards on their Horses, and then (their Horses still running) turned themselues forwards. There were, which whiles their Horse ranne, vngirt their Saddles thrice, at each time shooting, and then againe girding their saddles, and neuer missing the marke. Some sitting in their saddles, leaped backwards out of them, and turning ouer their heads, setled themselues againe in their saddles and shot, as the former, three times. Others layd themselues backwards on their running Horses, and taking their tayles, put them into their mouthes, and yet forgot not their ayme in shooting. Some after euery shot drew out their Swords, and flourished them about their heads, and againe sheathed them. Others sitting betwixt three swords on the right side, and as many on the left, thinly cloathed, that without great care euery motion would make way for death, yet before and behinde them touched the marke. One stood vpon two Horses running very swiftly, his feete loose, and shot also at once three Arrowes before, and againe three behinde him. Another sitting on a Horse neither brydled nor saddled, as hee came at euery marke arose and stood vpon his feete, and on both hands hitting the marke, sate downe againe three times. A third sitting on the bare Horse, when hee came to the marke, lay vpon his backe and lifted vp his legges, and yet missed not his shoote. After all this they ranne with like swiftnesse (for all these things, which, where is the Vaulter that can doe on his imaginary Horse standing still? these did running) and with their staues carried away those markes, as tryumphing ouer their innocent enemy. One of them was killed with a fall, and two sore wounded in these their feats of Actiuitie. They had an Olde graue man which was their teacher. If I haue long detayned thee in this spectacle, remember that the race of Mamalukes should not bee forgotten, the rather, becauſe their name is now raſed out of the world; and this may ſeeme an Epitaph on their Sepulchre, after whom none perhaps are left able to doe the like, nor in all Franciſcus Modius his Triumphall Pandects to be paralelled.

As for the Chriſtians in Ægypt, yee may reade in the Hiſtories [a] of the Holy-land-warres, what attempts were often made by the Weſterne Chriſtians againſt theſe vnbeleeuers. Concerning the preſent ſtate of Chriſtianitie there, Leo, Boterus, [b] and Maſter Pory in his Additions to his Engliſhed Leo, may acquaint you; and better then others Maſter George Sandys. Beſides the forreine Chriſtians, which reſort to theſe parts for traffique there, are thought to bee fiftie thouſand Natiue of the Countrey, which haue Churches, and Monaſteries, whereof there are three Chriſtian Churches at Alexandria. They are called Coſti, and Chriſtians from the Girdle, becauſe of their Circumciſion, which together with Baptiſme they admit. In their Liturgie they vſe the Chaldæan language. But they reade the Goſpell againe, in the Arabian. They are accounted of Eutiches Hereſie. Their Patriarchall Seate is Alexandria: which [c] from Saint Marke to this day hath had a continued ſucceſſion, as appeareth by the late Letters of Gabriel to the Pope, calling himſelfe the foureſcore and ſeuenteenth of the Patriarchs from Saint Marke. Thus writeth Baronius with a great many ſwelling words, which may puffe vp his Romane Sea.

But how credulous is Superſtition? and that neuer-erring Sea hath (how often?) beene gulled this way, or ſought to gull and coozen others with ſuch Ieſuiticall fictions of I know not what conuerſions, and ſubmiſſions, as Baronius would make you beleeue of this Gabriel. Thus had Mahomet his Gabriel, and thus our age hath another Gabriel obtruded vpon the vulgar ſimplicitie: (farre fetched belike is good for their Lady-mother) But Alexandria hath knowne no Gabriel in theſe times, Patriarch there. George Douſa held good acquaintance with Meletius, and his Predeceſſour was Silneſter; ſo that this Romiſh Gabriel which aſcribeth ſo much to that Sea, was a Romane Gabriel indeed, which Alexandria neuer knew. Neither did Meletius the Patriarch know any ſuch Papall Supremacie, but writeth learnedly againſt the ſame, as in an Epiſtle of his to Iohn Douſa (whereof in hee maketh mention of our Engliſh [d] Embaſſadour) extant with George Douſas Iournall may appeare.

How Chriſtian Religion was firſt planted in Ægypt by Saint Marke, and the Apoſtles, and their Succeſſours, and how perſecuted by the Ethnikes; after by the Arians; and how Ethnike Religion was againe by Valens permitted to all that would embrace it, the fore-named Eccleſiaſticall Hiſtories make mention: how it was perſecuted by the Perſian inuaſions, and after by the Saracens in time brought to this preſent paſſe, and how it now continueth, wee may reade in many both old [e] and new Authors. Zaga Zabo an Ethiopian Biſhop ſaith, that the Patriach of Alexandria reſideth at Cairo: where their Ethiopian Metropolitane [f] receiueth of him his Confirmation. And in their Ethiopian Liturgie, they mention them, both in this ſort: Pray for our Prince, the Prince of our Archbiſhops, the Lord Gabriel, and the chiefe of the Church of Alexandria, and for the chiefe of our Countrey, our venerable Archbiſhop Marke, &c. And thus much of this Egytian Prelate, as a taſte of that which is to bee declared in our Chriſtian Relations. Adrianus Romanus, [g] in his Theatrum Vrbium, ſayth, that beſides the Patriarch of the Coptites, heere is alſo a Patriarch of the Greekes and Arabians, which haue their Liturgie in Greeke, but ſcarce vnderſtand the ſame. The Coptite Patriarch hath his title of Alexandria, but his reſidence in Cayro. But it is more then time to leaue this the firſt and worſt of Nations in Superſtition: Zealous in all, but not according to knowledge: as elſe-where ſhall appeare, in their Chriſtianity folded in manifold Iewiſh ceremonies; and heere hath beene manifeſted in their preſent Mahumetan, and ancient Ethnike bloudy, beaſtly, ſtinking Deuotions, ſo eagerly purſued (let this bee our Concluſion) that [h] Iuuenal in his time writing of a Religious quarrell irreligiouſly bandied betweene the Combites and Tentyrites, at the end of a ſeuen dayes Feſtiuall obſerued Day and Night: after many wounds and blowes, One in flight falling downe, and ſo into the Enemies hands, was preſently plucked in pieces and eaten rawe: that euen their ſacrifices of Men, in reſpect of this were milde, as morſels to their Gods; but this in deſpight of Deuotion, or deſpightfull Deuotion, became a humane Sacrifice to inhumane, beaſtly, diuelliſh Men. Onely let vs obſerue the Ægyptian Chronologie, and ſo make an end.

CHAP. VI.

The Ægyptian Chronologie, out of Manetho high Priest of the Ægyptians, and others.

AFter this so long a Historie of Ægyptian affaires, I haue heere added the order of times, wherein those things happened, that this our Relation might bee the more compleat, although perhaps it may seeme to some more then tedious already. Varro diuided Times into three sorts; the first hee called Vncertaine; the second Fabulous; the third Historicall. Ioseph. Scaliger, a man happely more studious in this subject of Times, then all Times before haue yeelded vs, reckoneth the two former for one, as not easily to bee distinguished. He hath also published to the world not onely his owne learned Obseruations on Eusebius Chronicle, but such Fragments a as out of Cedrenus, Syncellus, and others, hee could finde both of Eusebius Chronicle in Greeke (for before we had onely the Latine Translation of Hierome, much whereof also is vtterly lost) as also of Africanus, from whose store-house Eusebius tooke his Chronicle, both for matter and words, almost by whole-sale. And whereas Annius had before couzened the world with counterfeits of Berosus, Manetho, Metasthenes, with other fabulous tales, falsely fathered on the Ancients: hee hath helped likewise to some Reliques of those Histories, which others haue inserted into their workes; the very bones of such carkasses being worthy of admiration, if not of veneration. The true Manetho therefore in three Tomes wrote the Ægyptian Historie vnto Ptolomeus Philadelphus: his Greeke Epistle Dedicatory being but short, I haue thus translated:

a Excerpta Barbaro-Lat. Manusc. Chron. Causab. collectanea hist. &c.

To the Greeke King Ptolomeus Philadelphus. b Augustus, Manetho High Priest and Scribe of the sacred Sanctuarie throughout Ægypt, of the Sebennite Family, a Heliopolitan, to my Lord Ptolomeus, Greeting. It behoueth vs (mightie King) to giue account of all those things which you counsell vs to search out. The sacred Bookes, written by our fore-father Trismegistus Hermes, which I haue learned (according as you, enquiring what things shall come to passe in the world, haue commanded me) shall be declared: Farewell, my Lord King.

b Σεβαστὸς, i. Venerable, appropriated after to Augustus and his successours.

Hence appeareth the time of Manetho, and his pontificall Dignitie, with the originall of his Antiquities borrowed of Hermes, and the occasion of his writing in the Greeke, as to a Græcian King.

Hee c first setteth downe the yeeres of the raigne of their Gods. Vulcan, Sol, Agathodæmon, Saturne, Osiris, and Isis, Typhon. Then of the Demi-gods: Orus, who raigned fiue and twentie yeeres: Mars, three and twentie: Anubis, seuenteene: Hercules, fourteene: Apollo, foure and twentie: Ammon, thirtie: Tithoes, seuen and twentie: Sosus, two and thirtie: Iupiter, twentie. Things both false in themselues, and in the Copie imperfect. After these hee reckoneth in order two and thirtie d Dynastiæ, Lordships, or gouernments in Egypt.

c Patricius out of a holy booke setteth downe this Genealogie: Horus the sonne of Osiris, he of Thus, and he of Cham or Chamephes.

d Ægyptian Dynasties.

1 The first of the Thinites; of eight Kings, whose names and yeeres of raigne are, Menes, threescore and two: hee was slaine of an Hyppopotamus, or Riuer-Horse. Athothis his Son, seuen and fiftie. He built a Palace in Memphis, and wrote of Anatomie. Cenicenes his sonne, one and thirtie. Enephes, his sonne, three and twentie. In his time was a great famine. Hee built the Pyramides in Cochom. Saphadus, his sonne, twentie: Semempsi, his sonne, eighteene: Bienaches, his sonne, sixe and twentie. Sum. tot. two hundred threescore and three. Of Menes, the first of these, it is reported e that hee first inuented the vse of money: for which long after hee was solemnely cursed by a Councell of Priests in the time of Cnephatus, and at Thebes a pillar was erected in the Temple to testifie the same.

2 The second Dinastie of the Thinites; vnder nine Kings. Whose names and yeeres of their raigne are in order as followeth, Bæthus, eight and thirtie yeeres. Catechos, nine and thirtie: in his time was ordayned the worship of Apis, at Memphis, and Mneuis at Heliopolis. Binothris, seuen and fortie: Tlas, seuenteene: Sethenes, one and fortie: Chaires, seuenteene: Nephercheres, fiue and twentie: in his time Nilus is said to haue had his waters mixed with honey. Sesochris, eight and fortie: Cheres, thirtie: Summe, three hundred and two.

3 The third, of the Memphites. Echerophes, eight and twentie: Tosorthros, nine and twentie. He is supposed to be Æsculapius, for his skill in Physicke; studious of Painting and Architecture. Tyris, seuen: Mesochris, seuenteene: Zoyphis, sixteene: Tesertasis, nineteene: Aches, two and fortie: Siphuris, thirtie: Herpheres, sixe and twentie.

4 The fourth Dinastie of the Memphites. Soris, nine and twentie: Suphis, threescore and three: he made the greatest Pyramis. Suphei, threescore and sixe: Mencheres, threescore and three: Ratoeses, fiue and twentie: Bicheres, two and twentie: Zebercheres, seuen: Tamphthis, nine: Sesochris, eight and fortie,

5 The

5 The fifth, of the Elephantines. Vsercheres, eight and twentie: Sephres, thirteene: Nephercheres, twenty: Sisiris, seuen: Echeres, twenty: Rathuris, one and forty; Mercheres, nine: Tacheres, forty and foure: Vnos, three and thirty.

6 The sixt, of the Memphites. Othoes, thirty: Phios, three: Methusuphis, seuen: Phiops, a hundred: Mentbesuphis, one: Nitocbris, twelue; she built the third Pyramis.

7 The seuenth, of seuenty Kings, that reigned so many dayes apiece.

8 The eight, of seuen and twenty Kings, which reigned an hundred forty and eight yeers. Their names are not expressed.

9 The ninth Dynastie, was of the Heracleopolitans: of which, were nineteene Kings, 10 that reigned foure hundred and nine yeeres. The first of them was Achthoes, a cruell Tyrant, deuoured by a Crocodile.

10 The tenth, was of nineteene Kings: whose reigne endured an hundred fourescore and fiue yeeres.

11 The eleuenth, of the Diospolitans: whose sixteene Kings reigned three and forty yeeres. Here endeth the first Tome of Manetho: whose second Tome containeth the twelfth Dynastie of the Diospolitans; The first of which was Cesongoses, six and forty: Ammamenes, eight and thirty: Sesostris the great Conquerour, eight and forty: Lacbares, eight: Ammares, eight: Ammenenes, eight: Semiophris, foure. Dynast.12.

13 The thirteenth, of threescore Kings, which reigned foure hundred fifty & three yeeres.
20 14 The fourteenth, of threescore and seuenteene Kings, contayned an hundred fourescore and foure.

15 The fifteenth, of Phœnicians, Shepherds, the first of which was Saites, nineteene: Anon, three and forty: Pachnan, threescore and one: Staan, eight: Arcles, forty nine: Apbobis, threescore and one: In all two hundred forty and two. And the totall summe of the yeeres of these fifteene Dynasties is three thousand three hundred and seuenteene.

16 The sixteenth Dynasty was of other shepheards, whose thirty two Kings reigned fiue hundred and eighteene yeeres.

17 The seuenteenth, was of other shepherds vnder thirty three Kings, and the Theban Diosophites, an hundred fifty and one yeeres.
30 18 The eighteenth of the Diospolites. Amos, fiue and twenty: Chebros thirteene: Amenophthis, foure and twenty: Amersis, two and twenty: Misphris, thirteene: Misphragmuthosis, six and twenty: Thuthmosis, nine: Amenophthis, one and thirty. This is supposed to be Memnon, and the speaking Statue. Oros, seuen and thirty: Acherres, two and thirty: Rathos, six: Chebres, twelue: Acherres, twelue: Amerses, fiue: Rammeses, one: Ammenoph, nineteene: in all, two hundred fourescore and seuen.

19 The nineteenth: Sethos, one and twenty: Raphsaces, threescore and one: Ammenephthes, twenty: Rameses, threescore: Ammenemes, fiue: Thuoris, six.

20 In the third Tome. The twentieth Dynasty lasted one hundred and fiue and twenty yeeres. The Kings were twelue.
40 21 The one and twentieth, of the Tanites: Smerdes, six and twenty: Psusennes, two and forty: Mephelcheres, foure: Amenophtis, nine: Opsochon, six: Psinaches, nine: Susennes, fourteene; called Sesac in Scripture: in all, one hundred and ten.

22 The two and twentieth, of the Bubastites: Sesonchis, one and twenty: Vsorthon, fifteene. The third, fourth, and fift, are not named: to them are ascribed fiue and twenty yeeres: In this space Zara the Ethiopian ouer-ran these parts. Tokellothis, thirteene: his successor, two and forty: in all, one hundred and sixteene.

23 The three and twentieth, of the Tanites: Petubastes, forty: Osorchos, eight: Psammus, ten: Zet, ——— one and thirty: in all, fourescore and nine.

24 The foure and twentieth, of Bocchoris the Saite, who reigned foure and forty yeeres, 50 was taken and burned of Sabbacon.

25 The fiue and twentieth, of the Ethiopians: Sabbacon, eight: Senech, fourteene: Tarach, eighteene: in all, forty. This Tarach perhaps was he which built Tarracona in Spaine, if we beleeue Taraphas [n] Collection out of Eusebius. n F. Tarap de Reg. Hisp.

26 The six and twentieth, of the Saites: Stephmates, seuen: Nechepsos, six. Thus farre out of Manetho; here followeth out of Herodotus: Psammeticus, forty foure: Nechao, seuenteene; he slue Iosias: Psammis, sixteene: Vaphres, fiue and twenty; with him Zedekiah entred league. Herodotus calleth him Apues. The Masorites, by their Hebrew points (through ignorance of forreine Historie, as Scaliger saith) haue made it Hophra, of whom Ieremie [o] pro- o Ier.44.30.
60 phesied that destruction which Amasis executed (as Herodotus reporteth) who reigned foure and forty yeeres. The summe of the yeeres of this Dynasty, is one hundred fifty and nine.

27 Here followeth againe out of Manetho: The seuen and twentieth Dynasty of the Persians: Cambyses, foure: Darius Hystaspes, six and thirtie: Xerxes, twenty: Artabanus, seuen moneths: Artaxerxes Longimanus, forty: Xerxes, two moneths: Sogdianus, seuen: Darius Nothus, eleuen, in all, one hundred and thirteene.

28. The eight and twentieth, of the Mendesians: Amyrtæus Saites, six.

29 The nine and twentieth, Nepherites, six: Acheris, twelue: Psammites, one: Nepherites, two moneths.

30 The thirtieth, of the Sebennites: Nectanebis, eighteene: Teos, two: Nectanebos eighteene.

31 The one and thirtieth, of the Persians: Artaxerxes Ochus, ten: He recouered Egypt in the seuenteenth yeere of his Reigne: Arses, foure: Darius Codomannus, six: subdued by Alexander. Hitherto Manetho. The whole summe of whose one and thirty Dynasties amount to fiue thousand three hundred fifty and fiue yeeres.

32 The two and thirtieth Dynastie, of the Macedonians: Alexander Mag. fiue: Ptolemeus Lagi, forty: Ptol. Philadelphus, eight and thirty: Ptol. Euergetes, sixe and twenty: Ptol. Philopator, seuenteene: Ptol. Epiphanes, foure and twentie: Ptol. Philometor, fiue and thirty: Ptol. Euergetes 2. nine and twentie: Ptol. Physcon, seuenteene: Ptol. Alexander, ten: Ptol. Cleopatra, eight: Ptol. Dionysius, thirty: Cleopatra, two and twenty: in all, three hundred and one. Some of these Ptolemeys made incestuous Marriages with their owne sisters; which it seemes was not vnusuall in Alexandria: whereupon Seneca scoffeth, Athenis dimidium licet, Alexandriæ totum. Whereupon Turneb. affirmeth, That at Athens they might marry their owne sisters by ther father (as Lycurgus permitted only the sisters by mothers side, and forbad to marry with the fathers daughter) but at Alexandria, all sisters were permitted to their licentious beds. Thus Cleopatra was wife to Ptolemey Philometor her elder brother, and after that to her younger brother, by whom she was cast off, and her daughter taken in her stead.

If the former Catalogue doe not agree with the Relations of Iosephus, * Theophilus, or others, who haue cited some parts of Manetho in their Workes, it is not much maruell; the Grecians being alway audacious, readie to peruert Authors to their own purposes; besides the ouersights of Writers, through negligence or ignorance in forreine names. Neither is Manethoes Word an Oracle, who reckoneth so long time before any time was: but either it is to be ascribed to the arrogancy of the Egyptian Priests, desirous to bee accounted no lesse ancient then the Chaldeans: for Berosus and Manetho (as if they had beene agreed) deriue their Histories from the like Antiquity (saith Scaliger out of Syncellus) which would better appeare, if we had the entire bodies, and not a few scattered bones of their Histories: or else wee may ascribe it to their confounding of Histories; applying to an order of Succession, the diuers reignes of seuerall Dynasties, which happily gouerned at the same time in seuerall parts of Egypt; as in so small a Region as Canaan, Ioshua destroyed 31. Kings. This Scaliger [a] coniectureth; Lydiat [b] affirmeth. Neither yet is Scaliger to be blamed, for acquainting the World with these fragments of Manetho; considering, that the middle part therof holdeth not onely likelihood in it selfe, but in great part correspondence with the Scriptures. If the Egyptians deuised otherwise to Herodotus and Diodorus, it was easie for them to deceiue strangers, or bee deceiued themselues. The like History of prodigious Antiquities, Augustine [c] relateth of an Egyptian Priest, that told Alexander of the continuance of the Macedonian Kingdome eight thousand yeeres, whereas the Grecians accounted but foure hundred and fourescore. Yea, the Scriptures themselues haue not escaped that mis-reckoning of Times; almost all Antiquitie being carried downe the streame of the seuenty Interpreters, which adde many hundred, yeeres to the Hebrew Text, either of purpose, as some [d] suppose, or as Augustine [e] thinketh by errour of him that first copied the Scriptures out of Ptolemeys Library.

Sir Walter Raleigh, in that his laborious and learned Worke, called The History of the World, supposeth, That Egypt first tooke that name, at such time as Ægyptus or Rameses chased thence his brother Danaus into Peloponnesus, which some reckon 877. yeeres after the Floud; some, more. As for the prodigious Antiquities which they challenge, hauing refuted Mercator and Pererius, he enclineth to this opinion touching their ancient Dynasties, that they are not altogether fabulous: but that Egypt being peopled before the Floud two hundred yeeres after Adam, there might remayne to the sonnes of Mizraim some Monuments in Pillars or Altars of stone, or metall, of their former Kings or Gouernours: which the Egyptians hauing added to the List and Roll of their Kings after the Floud, in succeeding time (out of the vanitie of glory, or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inserted. Petrus Alexandrinus (lately set forth in Greeke and Latine by Raderus) writes, That Mizraim hauing giuen beginning to the Egyptian Nation, did after goe into the East, to the Persians and Bactrians, and is the same that was called Zoroastres by the Greekes, Inuenter of Iudiciall Astrologie and Magicke. He hauing giuen order for the keeping of the ashes of his burned body, as the pledge of the Empire so long to continue with them, called vpon Orion (which he saith was Nimrod, by the Persian Superstition beleeued, thus honoured after his death) and was consumed with Lightning, the Persians reseruing his ashes to this day; the cause (saith the Note on that place) why the Persians worship the fire. Yet the Author mentions another cause, from Perseus, which kindled fire by Lightnings and preseruing the same, built a Temple to it. Hee saith also, That Picus or Iupiter, his father, taught Perseus to diuine by a Cup (like to that which is mentioned of Ioseph in Egypt) and the same Picus was father to Hermes, or Mercurie, King of Egypt, with other Legends, too long for this place: This Mercurie) he maketh the same with Faunus, the first finder (he saith) of Gold, and that in a golden Vesture he foretold diuers things, and that the Egyptians worshipped him, hauing before made him their King; which place he held thirty nine yeeres. After him reigned Vulcan, 1680. dayes; for at that time the Egyptians knew not to number by yeeres. He first made a Law against Adulterie; and that the Egyptian women should haue but one husband. He was Inuentor of Iron and Armour, Stones and Clubs being before that time the only Weapons. His sonne Sol succeeded, a great Philosopher; after him, Sosis; and next, Osiris; then, Orus; Thules, Conqueror of Africa; and after that, Sesostris, of the race of Cham, the same as he supposeth with Trismegistus. Thus much I haue thought here to adde out of him, where the Reader may further satisfie himselfe; if that can satisfie any, which can nothing certifie, or make certaine, in these Antiquities; wherein we may find many opinions, scarcly any truth, but in the Word of Truth, the Scriptures.

That which we read of the Dynasties of Shepherds, Scaliger interpreteth of that baser seruile sort, which Moses [g] saith were abominable to the Egyptians, and seeme to haue beene strangers, that inhabited some fenny places which Nature had fortified, if we beleeue Heliodorus; [h] and thence made forrages into the Countrey (the custome of Bordeters) and were called therefore Robbers. These (it seemeth) driuen to their shifts, by the hard and tyrannous vsage of the Egyptians, procured (as wee reade of the Tartars) their owne Freedome, and thraldome of their Lords. The Romanes in their times were forced to maintaine a Garrison against them, therefore called βυκολικοι. And Ierome mentioneth [i] the Bucolia, where no Christians dwelled, but onely a fierce Nation. Iosephus [k] and Eusebius thinke them to bee the Israelites; which is vnlikely, because they liued in seruitude, and neuer raigned there. Lydiat supposeth the Philistims vnder Abimelech and Phicol to be the men.

Nothing is more obscure in the Egyptian Chronologie, then the time of the departure of Israelites thence vnder Moses, whom Iustin [l] Martyr affirmeth out of Diodorus to haue bin the first that wrote the Egyptian Lawes. Tatianus [m] Assyrus (who after became an Heretike) saith (and alledgeth Ptolemey Mendesius, a Priest, for his Author) That this departure was in the dayes of Amasis, King of Egypt, who liued in the time of Inachus; Theophilus and Iosephus, [n] out of Manetho, in the Reigne of Tethmoses; Eusebius, [o] in the reigne of Cenchres; Cedrenus saith, Petisonius: Others, otherwise; according to the diuers interpretation of Manetho. The Scripture sheweth, it was foure hundred and thirty yeeres, from the promise first made to Abraham, as all that I know, both elder and later, Greeke and Latine [p] Chronographers, except Genebrard and Adriehomius, reckon it. Lydiat thinketh, That the drowning of the Egyptian Pharo was the cause of those tumults in Egypt, about Succession, which are ascribed to Egyptus and Danaus. Orosius [q] reporteth, That the prints of the Chariot-wheeles of the Egyptians, then pursuing the Israelites through the Sea, did yet in his time remayne in the Sands on the shore, and vnder-water; which no curiositie or casualtie can so disorder, but that Diuine Prouidence doth re-imprint them in their wonted forme.

Hard it is to apply the yeeres of the [r] Egyptian Chronologie, to the true account of the Worlds generation, by reason of the disagreement of Authors, touching the Egyptian Kings, vntill Sesacs time; which (after Lydiat) was in the yeere of the World 3029. although euen from hence we haue but slippery footing. Augustus (after the same Author) made Egypt a Prouince, in the yeere 3975. Vnder which Roman gouernment it continued, vntill the Saracens conquered it, in the time of Omar the third Chalipha, who began his reigne, after Scaligers computation, in his Catalogue [s] of the Chaliphaes, in the yeere of Christ 643. The names of the Cæsars belong to another place; and it were tedious here, to relate the yeeres of their seuerall Reignes. Otmen, the fourth Chalipha, beganne in the yeere of Christ 645. whom the rest succeeded in order, vntill the yeere 869. And then the Chaliphaes were diuided; Mutamed reigning in Bagded, [t] and Tolon in Egypt, who dyed in the yeere of Christ 883. and of the Hegeira 270. whom succeeded Hamaria his sonne: and after him, his sonne Aharun, whom Muchtaphi the Bagdet Chalipha slue, about the yeere 907. Afterwardes, about the yeere 943. Achishid Muhamid, sonne of Tangi, reigned in Egypt, to whom a few yeeres after succeeded his sonne Abigud, whom Meaz Ledin Illahi, of the posteritie of Phetima, Mahumets Daughter, depriued in the yeere of our Lord 971. To him succeeded Asareddin Shirachoch, of the Family of Aiub (which were Curdi:) after his death, Iusaph Tzelat Eddin was constituted King by the Chaliphа; and the Bagded Chaliphaes were againe acknowledged in Egypt. The Turkmen conspired against him: he fled into a Tower of Wood; which they fired: and halfe burned, he leaped into a streame that passed by, and there perished: Turcoman Azeddin Ibib was made King in his place, in the yeere of our Lord 1245. Heere beganne the Reigne of the Mamalukes, or slaues. Hee being slaine, another slaue succeeded, whom they called Melich Elmustaphar. This seemeth to be he, that Leo calleth Piperitis. Thus farre out of Scaliger, collected by him out of Abraham Zacuthi, which addeth much light to the Egyptian Historie of these times, wherein I could neuer before satisfie my selfe concerning the erection and alteration of the Schismaticall Egyptian Chaliphaes, which with much labour (little auayling) I had sought. Iacobus à Vitriaco Bishop of Accon, or Ptolemais, aboue foure hundred yeeres since, and a Roman Cardinall, in his Orientall Historie [x] affirmeth, That Haly, disdayning to be accounted the successour of Mahomet, whom hee thought inferiour to himselfe, began a new Sect of his owne, which he established in Egypt; the other Mahumetans erecting another at Baldac; but Baldac was of a later erection, and these things haue no probabilitie.

x Orient. Hist. cap. 5.

These Kings were not called Chaliphaes (as the posterity of Phetima or Fatima) but Sultans. A certaine Catalogue of the Names, Times, and Affaires of these Mamaluke-Sultans, I cannot perfectly exhibit. Peucerus [y] nameth in order these names; Turquemenius, Cothus, Bendocader, Melechsait, Elpis, Melechseraph, Melechnasar, Melechadel; and after many others, Caithbeius, a stout enemy of the Turkes [z]. This Caithbeius was chosen Sultan in the yeere of our Lord 1465. and reigned three and thirty yeeres. Two of his principall Mamalukes, Achardin and Campsous, full of emulation, were a principall cause of the ruine of that Dynastie. For whereas the Sultan was alway chosen out of the Mamalukes, by most voyces amongst themselues, Campsous fearing lest Achardin should haue succeeded after Caithbeius, fained, That his Master had taken order on his death-bed, that his Sonne Mahomet should obtaine the roome; and vsed meanes to effect it, both by the voyces of those Mamalukes he could suborne, and confirmation of their Chalipha, whose hornes these Soldans had shortned, abridging his power (as before is said.) This Mahomet proued so cruell a Tyrant, and those two Mamalukes so banded themselues in Factions, that all became confused; and within six yeeres after Caithbeius his death, the Sultans Throne was fiue times vacant. Tomumbeius kils Mahomet; Campsous Ciarchesius is chosen; Zanballat, President of Damascus, rebelleth, and by Tomumbeius meanes imprisoneth him, and vsurpeth the Scepter: but for his crueltie, soone after is depriued and captiued by Tomumbeius, and after, strangled; He also succeding in Authority, Tyranny, and Destiny.

After Tomumbeius, was elected Campson Gaurus, whom Zelim [a] the Turke ouerthrew, and slue in battaile; in whose place, another Tomumbeius was chosen: but soone, together with his whole State, came into the Turkes power. Thus being diuided in many Factions among themselues, and exercising all cruelties and pillages vpon the people, [b] they made themselues a prey to their Neighbours, who like Æsops Vulture, watched this opportunity to seize on these Lions, hauing now bled out their strength in mutuall and ciuill conflicts, in the yeere of our Lord 1517. The Egyptians affirme, [c] That a little before Selim besieged Cairo, for the space of eight dayes together, a great number of Crocodiles were seene in all parts on the banks of Nilus, and much dispersed abroad in the fields, taking and tearing great store of prey, as a presage of this Turkish seruitude. Solyman succeeded, in the yeere of our Lord 1519. (or 1520. as others say.) Selim the second, 1566. Amurat the third, 1574. & in the yeere 1595. Mahomet the third; to whom, Achmet, who now is the Egyptian and Turkish Soldan. Of these you may be more fully informed in M. Knolles his Turkish Historie, as also in our former Relations.

Of the Oracle of IVPITER AMMON; and of Cyrene: and diuers Peoples adioyning, mentioned by the Ancients.

ALl that lyeth betweene Africa Minor and Egypt, [a] Pomponius Mela doth call Cyrenaica, including vnder that title Marmarica, which Plinie [b] reckoneth by it selfe: who also calleth the former Pentapolitana, and saith, it is renowmed by the Oracle of Hammon, which is fiftie miles distant from Cyrene; by the Fountayne of the Sunne, and those fiue Cities, Berenice, Arsinoe, Ptolemais, Apollonia, [c] Cyrene. This Region is now called Barca and Mesrata: [d] of which, this is inhabited, and rich; the other is most-what desart, and poore. Their Religion was like the Egyptians in times past. The Arabians that liue there now, attend on their purchase, being the greatest Theeues in Afrike. But this is vsuall to the Arabians in all places of their abode (or wandring rather:) for which cause, it seemeth, Hierome saith, the word Arabi signifieth Theeues, and is therefore taxed of Drusius, in his Obseruations; Arabi no otherwise signifying Theeues, then Chanaeus a Merchant, or Chaldeus a Mathematician; because such commonly were their studies and courses. Berenice [e] was sometime sacred, famous for the Garden of the Hesperides; neere to which, is that Riuer of Lethe, so much chaunted by the Poets. Nigh to this place also, are the Psylli, a people terrible to Serpents, and mediciable against their poysons, both by touching the wounded partie, and by sucking out the poyson, and by enchanting the Serpent.

The Oracle of Iupiter Ammon is famous among the Ancient. The place where this Temple was, hath on euery side vast and sandie Desarts; in which, they which trauelled, as wee finde in Arrianus [f] and Curtius; seemed to warre with Nature: for the Earth was couered with sand; which yeelded an vnstable footing, and sometime was blowne about with the windie motions of the Aire: Water was heere banished, neither Cloudes nor Springs ordinarily affoording it. A fierie heate did possesse and tyrannize ouer the place, which the Sands and Sunne much encreased. Neither was here Tree, or Hill, or other marke for Trauellers, to discerne their way, but the Starres. In the middle of this Desart, was that sacred Groue (which Silius Italicus calleth a lucus fatidicus,) not aboue fiftie furlongs in circuit, full of fruit-bearing Trees, watred with wholsome Springs, seasoned with temperate Aire, and a continuall Spring. The Inhabitants, called Ammonians [h], are dispersed in cottages, and haue the middest of the Groue fortified with a triple wall. The first Munition containeth the Kings Palace; the second, the Serail, or lodgings for his women, where is also the Oracle; the third, the Courtiers inhabite. Before the Oracle is a Fountayne, in which the Offerings were washed, before they were offered. The forme of this God was deformed with Ramshornes, crooked, as some paint him: according to Curtius, without forme of any creature, but like a [i] round Bosse, beset with jewels. This, when they consult with the Oracles, is carried by the Priests, in a gilded ship, with many siluer Bells on both sides of the ship. The Matrons follow, and the Virgins singing their diuerse Procession, by which they prouoke their god to manifest what they seeke. These Priests were about fourscore in number. Alexanders ambitious pilgrimage to this Oracle, is sufficiently knowne by the Relations of Curtius and Arrianus. This we may adde out of Scaliger, [k] That after that, the Cyrenæans, to sooth this prowd King, which would needes bee taken for the sonne of Ammon, stamped his shape in their coynes, with two hornes of a Ramme, and without a beard: whereas before they had vsed the forme of Iupiter, with a beard and hornes; wherein the other Easterne people followed them. The Syrians vsed the like stampe with the name of King Lysimachus, which Scaliger (who hath giuen vs the pictures of these Coynes) thinketh to be Alexanders.

Rammes-hornes are said to bee ascribed to him, because Bacchus wandering in these Desarts with his Armie, was guided to this place by a silly Ramme. Likewise Pausanias [l] in his Messenica saith, that one Ammon (which built the Temple) a Shepheard, was author of this name to their God. Plutarch, [m] reason of Amus we haue before shewed. Others [n] deriue this name from Ammos the Sand; which may well agree with all idoll-deuotion, as being a sandie foundation, although it is here intended to the situation. [o] But that which I haue before noted of Ham the sonne of Noah, soundeth more probable, as being Progenitor of all these Nations; and of this minde also is [p] Peuerus. This [q] Strabo in his time saith was not in request, as no other Oracle besides. For the Romanes contented themselues with their Sybils and other diuinations. This Oracle was not giuen by word, but by signes. This defect of of Oracles in generall, and especially of this, occasioned that Treatise of Plutarch [r] of this subiect, enquiring the cause of the Oracles fayling. Neuer had he read, that [f] the Gods which had not made heauen and earth, should perish out of the earth: nor had he eyes to see that Sunne of Righteousnesse, the Light of the world, whose pure beames chased and dispersed these mists of darknesse. And therefore are his coniectures so farre from the marke, as not able with a naturall eye to see the things of God. The [t] antiquitie of this Oracle appeareth, in that Semiramis came to it, and inquired of her death; after which, the Oracle promised to her diuine honours. Perseus also and Hercules are reported to haue consulted the same in their aduentures against Gorgon and Busiris. Besides this Groue, [u] there is another of Ammon, which hath in the middest a Well, they call it the Fountayne of the Sunne; whose water at Sunne-rising is luke-warme, and cooleth more and more till noone, at which time it is very cold: and from thence till mid-night, by degrees exchangeth that coldnesse with heate, holding a kinde of naturall Antipathy with the Sunne; [x] hottest in his furthest absence, coldest in his neerest presence. Plinie and Solinus place this Fountayne in Debris, a Towne not very farre from those parts amongst the Garamants. Lucretius mentions it, and Philosophically disputeth the cause thereof.

The Ammonian women haue such great brests, that they suckle their children ouer their shoulder; their brest not lesse, if Iuuenal be beleeued, then the childe;

In Meroe crasso maiorem infante mamillam.
In Meroe, the monstrous Pappe

Pausanias [y] reckoneth an Ammonian Iuue among the Libyan Cities, as well as this Iupiter. He addeth, the Lacedemonians had this Ammon in much request, and built to him diuers Temples, as at Gytheum one, which had no roofe: and the Aphytæans did him no lesse worship then the Libyans.

z In Typo Expeditionis, Al. Mag.

Ortelius, [z] who hath bestowed a Description of this Temple, supposeth that his Image was painted with hornes, but that Vmbilicus was accounted the Deitie it selfe, or the signe of his presence, which shapelesse shape he lampleth by many like in other Nations. The ship he coniectureth to signifie, that the Religion was brought from some other place. But if Ammon be that sonne of Noah, it might rather bee a memoriall of the Arke, wherein Noah and his sonnes were preserued: as that also of Ianus, (who is imagined to be Noah,) may more fitly be interpreted, then according to the Poets glosse:

a Pub. Ouid.

So well-dispos'd Posteritie did frame
A ship, to shew which way their strange God came.

b Seu. Sulpit. Dialog. Filesacus de Pœnit. Orig. cap. 4.

The ancient frugalitie of the Cyrenians is commended in Authors. [b] Sulpitius bringeth in Postumianus, in his Dialogues, telling, That landing there by force of weather, hee went with the Priest vnto the Church, which was very homely, couered with base twigs or boughs, not much better then the Priest (their hoste) his Tent, in which a man might not stand vpright. Enquiring after the disposition of the people, they learned, that they were vtterly ignorant of buying and selling, of fraude and stealing. They neither had, nor cared to haue, gold or siluer; and when he offered ten pieces of gold to the Priest, hee refused it: onely was content to accept a little rayment.

The Hammientes are not much distant in place, or differing in name, from the Ammonians: which build their houses of Salt, digging the salt-stones out of the Mountaynes, which they with morter apply to their buildings. Mela ioyneth to these aforesaid the Atlantes, which curse the Sunne at the setting and rising, as bringing damage to them and their fields. A practice not vnlike to the women of Angola at this day, who (as Andrew Battle, which liued there, testifieth) salute the New Moone when they first see her, by holding vp their hinder parts naked against her, as the cause of their troublesome menstruous purgation.

These Atlantes haue no proper names, nor feede of such things as haue life. He affirmeth of the Garamantes, that they had no wiues, but liued in a beastly communitie. The Augilæ acknowledge no other Gods but Ghosts, or Soules departed, by which they sweare; with which

which they consult as Oracles; to which they pray at their Tombes, receiuing answeres by dreames. The women the first night of marriage are prostituted to all that will see them, the more the greater honour, but after, must obserue their owne husbands. The Troglodytæ dwell in Caues, and feede on Serpents, and rather make a sound or noyse, then humane voyce: they vsed Circumcision: they named not their Children by their Parents names; but by the names of sheepe, or other beasts which yeeld them nourishment. Their wiues and children (saith Agatharchides) are common: onely the Kings wife is proper; yet if any had lyen with her, his punishment was but the losse of a sheepe. In their Winter they liue on bloud and milke which are mixed and heated together at the fire. In their Summer they kill the scabbed and diseased of their Cattell. They entitle none with the name of Parents, but the Bull and Cow, the Ram and Ewe, and the Male and Female of the Goates, because of these they receiue their nourishment, and not from their Parents. They goe naked all but the buttocks. Such as want that skin which others circumcise (κολοβοὶ) they depriue of the whole flesh, so farre as the circumcision should haue extended. Their funerall Rites were, to tye the necks of the dead to their legs, and couer them with heapes of stones, setting a goates horne on the top, with laughter rather then mourning. Their old men which can follow the flockes no longer, they strangle with an Oxe-taile, which medicine they minister likewise to those that haue grieuous diseases, or maymes. And vnto these doth Plinie adde the Blemyæ, with faces in their brests, the Satyres, Ægypanes, Himantopodes, and other monsters, scarce worthy Relation or credit. These parts I haue thus ioyned in one Discourse, as liuing (for the most part) a wilde life, as the Arabians and Tartars doe at this day: and for Religion hauing nothing notable that I finde, but as you haue heard. Procopius [c] writeth of the Blemyes and Nobatæ, that Iustinian placed them in Egypt, about Elephantina; that they before obserued the Greekes deuotions, Isis also and Osiris, and Priapus, and sacrificed to the Sunne; which Rites the Emperour prohibited. But hee mentions no such Monsters. The Arabians which vnder Elcain about the foure hundred yeere of their Hegeira, gaue a Ducat a man to passe into Africke, are Lords and Inhabitants of the Deserts to this day, liuing (as wee say) a dogs life, in hunger and ease, professing Mahumets sect.

The Adrimachidæ [d] liued neere to the Egyptians both in situation and custome. The Nasamones had many wiues, with which they had companie publikely. The first night of the marriage, all the guests had dealing with the Bride, and rewarded her with some gift. The Gnidanes had a more beastly custome, whose women glorying in their shame, ware so many fringes of leather as they had found Louers. The Machlyes ware the haire on the hinder part of their head, as the Iaponians now doe. The Ausæs vsed the contrarie: whose Virgins in the yeerly feast of Minerua, diuided themselues into two companies, and skirmished with staues and stones. If any Virgins dyed of the wounds, they accounted them false Maides. The most martiall Virago of the companie, they arme and crowne, and place in a Chariot, with great solemnitie. They vsed not marriage, but had women in common: the childe being reckoned his with whom shee chooseth to liue. To adde a word of the Cyrenians, they held it vnlawfull to smite a Cow, in honour of Isis, whose Fasts and Feasts they solemnely obserued: and in Barca they abstayned both from Beefe and Hogs flesh. They feared [e] the crownes or temples of their children, to preuent the distilling of the rheume.

d Io. Boem. G Draudius in Solinum. Celius Rhod. lib. 18. cap. 38.

e The like doth Villamont report of the Turkes.

In their sacrificing, they first cut off the eare of the beast, as first fruits, and hurled it ouer the house. Their gods were the Sunne and Moone. The Maxes shaue the left side of their heads, leauing the haire on the right side. The Zigantes feede on Apes, whereof they haue plentie.

The Megauares make no account of Sepulchres, in stead whereof they couer the corps with stones, and set vp a Goates horne on the stone heape. They haue many skirmishes for their pastures, which are ended by the mediation of old Women, who may safely interpose themselues, and end the fray (or battell, if you will so call it.) When men are so old that they can no longer follow the herds, they strangle him with a Cowes taile, if he will not preuent them by doing it himselfe. The like medicine they administer to such as are dangerously sicke. Of the Macæ, Celius thinkes the Roman Priests borrowed their shauen crownes. Other things which our Authors adde of these people and others adioyning, as seeming too fabulous, I list not to expresse. Silius Italicus in his Poems, and Aldrete in his Antiquities of Spaine and Afrike, expresse diuers of their ancient Rites and Names, and that which seemes to vs most fitting, shall in this Historie be inserted. This part of the World, as least knowne to the Ancients, yeelded both Poets and Historians most matter of their Fables, in explayning whereof Aldrete hath written in Spanish very learnedly, as also of the later times, when the Romans, Vandals, and since the Arabians, haue preuayled.

ALl the Tract of Land, betweene Atlas and the Sea (ſtretching in length from Egypt to the Straits) is * called Barbaria, either of Barbar (which ſignifieth to murmure) becauſe ſuch ſeemed the ſpeech of the Inhabitants to the Arabians, or of the word Bar, which ſignifieth a Deſart, doubled. It comprehendeth * both Mauritania's, Africa inmor, Libya exterior, beſides Cyreniaca and Marmarica, whereof wee haue ſpoken. The Inhabitants ſome fetch from Paleſtina, ſome from Arabia. It was conquered by the Romans, and taken from the Greeke Emperors by the Vandals, and from them againe by the Saracens and Arabians, and is now partly ſubiect to the Turke, partly to the Xeriffe. It is vſually diuided into foure Kingdomes, Marocco, Feſſe, Tremiſen, and Tunis; for of Barca is ſaid alreadie: The Cities of Barbarie (it is *Ioſ. The Kingdome of Tunis contayneth all that which the Ancients called Africa, Propria, or Minor, and Numidia Antiqua: the Romanes (perhaps vaine-gloridully vaunting, or ambitiously ayming at the Empire of the Vniuerse) stiling their first footing and possession in Asia and Africa, by the name of the whole; which others haue beene forced to distinguish by adding Propria or Minor. So they called Attalus his Legacie, Asia, and this Prouince (yea Carthage it selfe had that name) Africa. The soyle is fertile, especially the Weast-part. The Inhabitants are sound and healthfull, seldome vexed with any sickneſſe. Hereof are reckoned fiue parts; Bugia, Constantina, Tunis, Tripolis and Ezzab. This Ezzab is the most Easterly part, hauing many Townes and Regions, amongst which, some account Mesrata. From these parts vnto Capes, is the Tripolitan Region. The chiefe Towne is Tripolis, wherein the great Turke hath his Bassa, or Vice-roy, a receptacle of the Pyrats, which rouse and rob in those Seas; in the yeere 1551. wonne from the Knights of Malta by Sinan Bassa. From Capes to Guadilbarbar is the Tunetan Territorie. From thence vnto the Mountayne of Constantina is that Region, hereof bearing name: and from thence [h] to the Riuer Maior, about an hundred and fiftie miles space, doth Bugia extend it selfe, so called of Bugia [c] the principall Citie, sometime adorned with Temples, Hospitals, Monasteries, and Colledges of Students in the Mahumetane Law. Here is also Necaus a very pleasant Citie; and Chollo, very rich. Constantina is an ancient Citie, containing eight thousand Families, & many sumptuous buildings, a great [d] Temple, two Colledges, and three or foure Monasteries, much resorted to by Merchants. Euery trade hath their peculiar streetes. A little from the Citie is a hote Bath, hauing in it abundance of Crabfishes, or little Tortoyses, which the women take for euill spirits, and ascribe vnto them the cause of their sickneſſe, or ague, if any befall: and therefore kill white Hens, and set them on an earthen vessell, with their feathers, enuironing the same with little Wax-candles, and so leaue them neere to this Bath, or Fountayne. How euer it fare with their Feuer, their meat shall not stay long, but some or other that see the womens deuotion, will enuy the euill spirits so good cheere, and for that time will be the spirits themselues, to dresse and eate their prouision. Not farre hence is a Marble building, with Images grauen therein: the people haue a conceit, that it was sometime a Schoole, and those Statues the Schollers, by Diuine judgement so transformed for their wickednesse.

In this Region is situated Bona, sometime called Hippo, famous through our Christian World for the most famous of the Fathers, that since the Apostles dayes haue left vs their writings, Aurelius Augustinus a name fitting to him, which indeed was Aureus & Augustissimus, Bishop of the See, while hee liued; and yet liuing (in his Workes) a Bishop, not of Hippo, but of the Westerne Church. Witty, Learned, Wise, and Holy Father, that hast with Thee carryed these Titles from Hippo! where, after Thee, the Arian Vandals, and since, the Saracens haue liued and Lorded; and at this day, is possessed of such as haue no possession of Wit, Learning, Wisedome, or Holinesse: but haue testified their banishment of all these, by ascribing them to Fooles and Mad men, whom they honour and admire as Saints. [e] This Bona (then brooking this name better) contayneth now three hundred Herthes, and a sumptuous Mosque, to which is adjoyned the house of the Cadi.

Tunis is now a great Citie, since the ruines of Carthage, neere vnto which it standeth. Carthage [f] (as the more ancient) deserueth first Relation: of which, wee may yet say with [g] Sallust, Silere melius puto, quàm parum dicere: wee may not say much, and a little will bee too little for such Greatnesse. It was built threescore and twelue yeeres before Rome, as the common account goeth, by Dido and her [h] Phœnicians: an emplous competitor with Rome for the Empire of the World. It contayned (saith [i] Orosius) in the circuit of the walles twentie miles; Liuies Epitome sayth, foure and twentie; all engirt with the Sea, except three miles space, which had a wall of squared Stone, thirtie foot broad, and fortie cubites high. The Tower Byrsa enuironed aboue two miles, and had in it the Temples of Iuno, Æsculapius, and [k] Belus. Of the greatnesse of their name and power, those three Punike warres are witnesses; in the second of which, Annibal (whom his father Hamilcar, then Generall in Spaine, had caused to sweare at the Altar of Iupiter, neuer to hold friendship with the Romans, he then being but nine yeeres old, as Æmilius Probus, or as other will haue it, Cornelius Nepos reporteth:) he, I say, passed ouer the Pyrenæan Mountaynes, through France, and ouer the Alpes, into Italy, with an Armie of an hundred thousand foot-men, and thirtie thousand Horse. The Riuers Ticinus and Trebia, the Lake Trasimenus (running with Roman blood, by three ouerthrowes of Scipio, Sempronius, and Flaminius the Romane Consuls) witnessed the Punike [l] might. But the victory at Cannæ against Varro did pierce the brest, and had rent the heart of Rome, had Annibal known to haue vsed the victory as well, as to haue gotten it. There did Rome seeme to breath her last: the Sunne, the Wind, the Dust helping the Carthaginian ginian with Natures forces; yea, the Riuer Gellus, against Nature, stayed it selfe, as congealed indeed, whether with wonder, feare, or necessitie, accepting a Bridge or Dammer rather of Roman bodies for a passage to the African Armie. Those were golden dayes to Carthage, when three c bushels of Gold-Rings, taken from the fingers of the slaine enemies, were sent hither as a d present. A woune meane-while did Rome sustaine; and easily in fiue dayes might Hannibal haue dined in the Capitoll: and poore helpe could shee finde when she reuiued, had not Capua, with feasting the Conquerour, detayned Rome from Conquest, when they despoyled the Temples for Armour, armed their slaues, and bestowed their priuate state on the publike Treasure: all which could not make Fabius e fight with Annibal, but by not fighting he learned to ouercome, knowing, that a shield was better weapon then a sword in that case. Scarce f in seuenteene yeeres could Italy shake off this burthen, till Scipio by new policie warred against Hannibal, not in g Italy, where he was, but in Africke and Carthage, whence his force was; thereby procuring Annibals returne, as the outward members are forced to yeeld their bloud, to succour any sudden oppression of the heart.

But how is my heart oppressed with sudden passion, thus to transport the Reader, with my selfe, from Africke into Spaine, France, Italy, there to behold this Tragedie? Let the matter it selfe answere: and now we are returned to Carthage, and finde the Tragedie heere. For in the third Punike warre the Romans (sayth h Florus) rather fought with the Citie it selfe then with Men. And alas, what could that Hermophrodite-armie doe, wherein were fiue and twentie thousand armed i Women? Yet had women then the greater courage: Hasdrubal the King yeelded. His wife, with her two children, and much people, burned themselues in the Temple of Æsculapius, that could not cure this disease of his Citie and suppliants the like fate befalling the first and last Queenes of Carthage. Seuenteene dayes together did Carthage burne, seuen hundred yeeres after the first building.

In this last warre, after they had deliuered vp their Naue and weapons, being commanded to remoue ten miles from thence, Anger kindled new forces, and taught them to supply the want of Iron, with Siluer and Gold, in making weapons, with pulling downe their houses to build a Naue, the Matrons giuing their haire (the feminine Ornament) to make bands for their manly and warlike Engines; their priuate glory, for publike necessitie; all which serued but to augment the pompe of this funerall of Carthage. Cæsar did after restore it with a Roman Colonie, neuer attayning the Tyrian l glory, afflicted with Vandals and Gothes, and by the Saracens made desolate, vntill the time of Elmahdi, an hereticall Caliphe, who procured the inhabiting hereof. But not aboue the twentieth part was inhabited: The rest remayneth as scattered ruines, dispersed bones, of the carkasse of old Carthage. Master Pounteſſe, a friend of mine, told me, That hee hath beene rowed in his Boat ouer the walls of Carthage, or their ruines, the Sea hauing made the last conquest by eating into the Land. The Conduits are whole (saith Leo) which bring water from a Hill thirtie miles from Carthage, twelue miles vnder the Earth; the rest aboue. And now (saith he) are not aboue fiue and twentie shops, and fiue hundred houses therein, one faire Temple, one Colledge, but without Schollers, the inhabitants poore, proud, and superstitious. Master m Eueſham saith, That this Citie is now ruinated and destroyed. Hee mentioneth those Arches wherein water was hither conueyed, and one street three miles long.

As for the Sea-discoueries attempted by the Carthaginians; Hanno compassed n all Africa from the Spanish to the Arabian Straits, and committed his discoueries to writing: Himilco at the same time was employed in the search of Europe. Diodorus Siculus o writeth a whole Chapter of their discouery of a pleasant and fertile Iland Westward, in the Ocean, which cannot more fitly agree with any other Region then some part of the West-Indies, as may seeme at the first view. But a man shall haue much to doe to finde that Iland, a harder discouery now, then it was then to the finders, at least as the Storie lies. And some p thinke, that the Indians of America were a Colonie of the Carthaginians. Aristotle hath also the like Relation in his Booke De admirandis Auditionib. In the beginning of the Warre q they had three hundred Cities in Libya, and seuen hundred thousand persons in their Citie.

The Carthaginians (as all acknowledged, and their very name Pæni doth proue) were Phænicians: which Countrey wee haue before shewed to bee famous, as for many other things, so for the first letters and the first (that is, the Hebrew) language. The letters which the Hebrewes since the Babilonian Captiuitie haue vsed, Postellus r would haue to bee the first, but secret till those times, and then by Esra made common: but s others more probably hold the Phœnician or Samaritan the first: and that the present Hebrew were the Assyrian or Chaldæan Characters, which the Iewes brought thence with them. Now for proofe that their ancient Language was Phœnician, and consequently Hebrew: Dido is but the feminine, saith Scaliger, to Dauid: and Eliſa is the Hebrew Eliſha. Iosephus relateth out of Theophrastus, that the Tyrians and Sydonians might not vse other but their owne Countrey oathes, of which hee reckoneth Corban, which the Scriptures also mention. And Scaliger saith, that the Punike Scene in Plautus his Penolus (although they had then much declined from the Hebrew puritie) is neerer the Hebrew then the Syriake, and that hee could for the most part restore it to the right Punike, which also hath happily beene attempted by Master Selden in his Dis Syris, and by Bernardo Aldrete a Spaniard in his Varias Antiquedades de España, Africa, Y Otras prouincias lib. 2. cap. 2. Where he in a large Catalogue compareth the Hebrew, Syriake, Phœnician, and Punike termes together. Of their Baalsamen and other notes of this language, we haue spoken before in our first Booke. The name Carthago, as Genebrard and Aldrete obserue, in Syriake, signifies the middle Citie, Kartha a Citie, Go, middle: Solinus saith, New Citie.

Wee haue alledged the testimonie of Procopius for the Chanaanites fleeing before Ioshua; and the Punikes (layth * Augustine) called themselues (euen in his time) Chanani. Salust ascribeth to the Phœnicians, Hippo, Hadrumetus, Leptis and other Cities on the Sea-coast, besides Carthage, which they built either to enlarge their Empire, or to preuent a fulnesse at home.

Concerning the Religion of the Africans: in Ancient times, Leo saith, That they worshipped the Fire and the Sunne, as did the Persians (erecting, in honour of each of these, faire and sumptuous Temples, in which the Fire was continually kept burning, as in the Temple of Vesta at Rome. The Numidians and Libyans sacrificed to the Planets. And some of the Negroes worshipped Guighimo, which signifieth the LORD of Heauen. These afterward (hee sayth) were of the Iewish Religion, and after that, of the Christian, till the 268. yeere of the Hegira, that some Negro Kingdomes became Mahumetane, although there remaine some Christians to this day: those which were Iewish, both by the Christians and Mahumetanes, were vtterly destroyed. But those of Barbarie (whereof wee especially entreat) remained (saith hee) Idolaters, till two hundred and fiftie yeeres before Mahomets birth, when they became Christians. This must be interpreted of the vniuersall and publike profession about the time of Constantine: For otherwise Africke had in it Christians before. Dorotheus in Synopsi saith, That Epæneius, one of the seuentie Disciples, was a Bishop of Carthage; and that Simon the Apostle preached in Mauritania, and among the Africans, as Matthias also in Æthiopia. But the Gothes soone corrupted Christian Religion with Arrianisme, the forerunner of Mahumetanisme, both heere and else-where. The Moores (saith [a] another) worshipped Iuba as a God: and the Pœni Uranus; the Libyans, Psaphon. This Psaphon (otherwise a base fellow) had taught Birds to sing, Psaphon is a great God, and let them flie into the Woods, where chanting their lesson, they inchanted the rude people with this superstition. Ælianus [b] telleth the like Historie of Annon a Carthaginian, whose birds, at libertie in the Woods, forgat this their Masters Lesson. The Pœni [c] being (as is said) Phœni or Phœnicians, brought (in all likelihood) the Phœnician Religion with them from thence. Yee may reade in our first booke of Moloch: whence come the Carthaginian names of Milicus, Imilce, Amilcar, Bomilcar. Yea, Athenodoros reports of Amilcas a Carthaginian Deitie, which is like to be this Moloch or Milcom, in a little differing Dialect. Some are of opinion that these sacrifices had their beginning from a diabolicall imitation of Abrahams offering his onely sonne Isaac. For so Porphyrius and Philo Biblius relate out of the Phœnician Annals, that an ancient King called Israel, in great danger of warre, offered his onely sonne. Porphyrius cals him Ieud, as Moses also, Gen. 22. 2. Iehid. that is, vnigenitum, which hee had by Anobreta: whom Scaliger interpreteth Sara. Neither is it any great maruell, that the names and Story should bee thus peruerted, to any that reade what relations, Iustin, Strabo and others write of the Iewes, or how the Deuill is the great Seducer of the world, bringing darkenesse out of light it selfe. Silius mentioneth these their damnable Rites of humane Sacrifices.

Carthage, t'appease the offended Deities,
Was wont to offer humane Sacrifice:
And tender Babes (abominable shame)
Were made the fewell of the Altars flame.

So Ennius in that verse of his, cited by [d] Nonius Marcellus; Ille suos Diuis mos sacrificare puellos. Tertullian writes, that this custome continued till the time of Tiberius, who being Proconsull, crucified the Priests authors of this villanie, on the very Trees which shadowed the Temple in this bloody groue: yet this continued to Tertullians dayes, but more closely:

Sed & nunc in occulto perſeuerat hoc ſacrum facinus. Ipſi parentes ſui offerebant, & libentes exponebant, & infantibus blandiebantur, ne lachrymantes immolarentur. Theſe are the words of Tertullian. To Saturne (ſaith e Sardus) were humane Sacrifices offered by the Rhodians, Phœnicians, Curetes, and Carthaginians: the Sardi their f Colonie, offered the fayreſt of their Captiues, and ſuch as were aboue threeſcore and tenne yeeres olde, who to ſhew their courage, laughed; whence grew the Prouerbe, Sardonius riſus: this was done alſo to Saturne. The Carthaginians in time of plague, offered their Children to Saturne, which Gelo cauſed them to leaue. Yea ſuch was their zeale in this ſuperſtition, that if they had no Children of their owne, they bought for this purpoſe of the poore, the Mother aſſiſting this Butcherly ſacrifice, without once ſighing or weeping, for then ſhee had loſt the price, and her Child neuertheleſſe. And leaſt the crying of the Children ſhould bee heard, all reſounded with Inſtruments of Muſicke. Thus Plutarch in his treatiſe of Superſtition. Being ouercome by Agathocles, they ſacrificed two hundred of the chiefe mens Children, to Saturne. Clitarchus and others write, cited by Suidas, That in their ſolemne ſupplications at Carthage, they put a childe into the armes of Saturnes Brazen Image, vnder which was ſet a Furnace or Ouen: which being kindled, the childe in his burning, ſeemed to laugh. This cuſtome might haply bee the occaſion of that deſperate act before ſpoken of in the deſtruction of Carthage by the Romanes, ſo many periſhing in Æſculapius Temple. Other their Rites are likely to bee the ſame with thoſe which we haue reported of the Phœnicians, ſomewhat perhaps in time inclining alſo to the Greekiſh ſuperſtition. Their deuotion to Venus, the Phœnician Goddeſſe, Auguſtine g mentioneth in theſe words, Regnum Veneris quale erat Carthagini, vbi nunc eſt regnum Chriſti?

Tunis i was a ſmall Towne, till after the deſtruction of Carthage it grew in ſome reckoning (as before is ſayd). It hath in it about ten thouſand Houſholds. Abdal Mumen ioyned it to his Kingdome of Marocco. And when that Kingdome declined, k the Vice-Roy (which before was ſubiect to Marocco) now vſurped the State to himſelfe, calling himſelfe King of Africa. In our Fathers l dayes, Muleaſſes, ſonne of Mahomet, King of Tunis (by murther of his elder brother Marmon, and either killing or putting out the eyes of twenty other his brethren) obtayned the Crowne. But Roſette the onely brother remayning, when with his Arabians he could not gaine the Kingdome, he went with Barbaroſſa to Solyman the Turke, who ſo vſed the matter, that Muleaſſes was chaſed out of his Kingdome, and Tunis ſubiected it ſelfe to Solyman. But Muleaſſes craued and obtained ayde of Charles the fift, who in the yeere 1535. paſſed m with an Armie into Africke, and repoſſeſſed Muleaſſes of his Kingdome, who became the Emperours Vaſſall.

Muleaſſes, about the yeere 1544. croſſed ouer the Sea into Sicily, leauing his ſonne Amida in the gouernment n. The coſtlineſſe of his dyet was admirable, and of his Perfumes. He was a ſuperſtitious obſeruer of his Religion, and of the Starres which portended to him the loſſe of his Kingdome, and a miſerable end. To auoyd this, he departed out of Africa (for feare of Barbaroſſa) but ſo fell into the danger. A rumour was ſpred at Tunis, that hee was dead; whereupon Amida poſſeſſed himſelfe of the Kingdome. Muleaſſes haſted home to recouer it, and loſt himſelfe: for hee was taken Captiue, and after both his eyes put out with a burning knife, and of his two ſonnes Nabaſar and Abdalas he was committed to Priſon. But Abdamelech his brother got the Kingdome from Amida, and ſoone after dyed, to whom ſucceeded Mahomet his ſoone, a childe: whoſe Tutors were ſo tyrannicall, that Amida was againe ſent for by the Tunetans, and Muleaſſes is brought to Sanctuary, whence by the Spaniards meanes hee was conueyed to Guletta, and thence to Sicilia, where he was maintayned at the Emperours charge o. He deriued his Pedigree from the Chorean Family, in right line from Homar, Mahomets Diſciple. Amida obtayned the Kingdome, thus toſſed betwixt Moores, Turkes, and Chriſtians, but was after taken and ſent priſoner to Sicilia. Mahomet (brother of Amida, now a ſlaue in Sicilia) was made King of Tunis, vnder the Spaniard, 1573. by Don Iohn of Auſtria: but the next yeere after Selym the Turke tooke Guletta, holden by the Spaniards almoſt fortie yeeres; and at laſt tooke Tunis alſo: Mahomet the new King was ſent to Conſtantinople priſoner.

CHAP. II.

Of Cairaoan, and the Kingdome of Tripolis.

CAiraoan hath beene a City famous, built by Hacha, Generall of the Moores of Ottoman, or Otman, the third Caliphe, thirty six miles from the Sea, and from Tunis, one hundred, to secure themselues from any sudden inuasion, where the commoditie of the Sea might cause them. He built therein an admirable Temple, on Pirats of Marble. To Hacha in this gouernment succeeded a Muse, to whom Iulianus Earle of Ceuta offered his seruice b for the conquest of Spaine, and being found faithfully vntaithfull with some few Souldiers sent him, was after employed with Tarif of whom the hill was called Gebel Tarif, now Gibraltar, who with an Army of twelue thousand tooke Seuill, and after that ouerthrew King Rodericus, and being enriched with spoyle, was dispossessed thereof by Muse, who by this newes of his successe was mooued to follow him into Spaine, as the Spanish Writers c (though not altogether agreeing herein) declare, and subdued the same in thirty moneths space. When Musa or Muza departed with Tarif out of Spaine, the Moores there fell into such contentions, that in twenty yeeres space there were no lesse then fifteene Kings: and one of them setled his Throne in the bloud of three hundred Competitors. Iezid the sonne of Muza, and after him his Brother, and Nephew, succeeded each other in this gouernment, which Elagleb (that followed them) turned into an independent and free Signory, by occasion (as is said) of the Chalifa's leauing Damasco, and remouing the Seat Royal, or Popedome to Bagdat. This House here ruled a hundred and seuenty yeeres, at which time Mahdi an hereticall Chalifa deprined them. These Saracens wan Sicilia in those times to the Cairaoan Dominion. a Macin de Muza. b Io. Vasæus Chron. Hispan. Rod. Tolet l.3.19 c *Rod. Lantius hist. Hi. p.2.c.37. Alfons. à Carthagena c.44. About the foure hundred yeere of the Hegira, Elcain was Chalifa in Cairaoan, whose Captaine Geboar conquered vnto him Barbary, Numidia, and as farre as Sus Westward: and after being employed in the East, subdued Egypt and Syria. Hee, for securing himselfe and his Army, built Cairo. After this he sent to his Lord Elcain to come hither in person, assuring him, That the Calipha of Bagdat was not able to abide his presence and puissance. Elcain listening to Geboar, appointed a Lieutenant in Cairaoan, and went to Cairo. But his Lieutenant of Cairaoan rebelled and offered his obedience to the Chalifa of Bagdat, who therefore gaue him large Priuiledges, and made him King of all Africa. Elcain in these Straits knew not which way to turne him, till by counsell of his Secretary he tooke this course: The Arabians at that time were exceedingly multiplyed, insomuch that the Country otherwise barren, could not sustaine them and their Cattell. To these hee gaue leaue to passe into Africa, paying for euery Poll a Duckat, and taking an oath of them, to bee enemies to his Rebell. These in short time sacked Tripolis and Cabis, and after eight moneths siege, Cairaoan also; and remayned Lords of Africa, till Ioseph the first, King of Marocco, who gaue aide to the Kinsmen of that Rebell, wonne the Cities from the Arabians, which still kept possession of the fields. The Lord of Cairaoan fled Westward, and reigned in Bugia, and the parts adioyning; and others of his kindred ruled in Tunis, till the Kings of Marocco swallowed all: that City being built presently after the Arabians had destroyed this, in the yeere foure hundred twenty foure of their Hegira, as Leo d reckoneth. Cairaoan e hath in it an ancient Temple, and Colledge of Priests. Hither the great men among the Moores and Numidians are brought to be buried; hoping by the Prayers of those Priests to climbe to Heauen. For this cause (Boterus sayth) they enter into this City vnshod, with great reuerence. d Leo l.2. e Surius Comment.

The Arabians haue filled Africa with themselues, their Armes, Arts, and Language. Arabike Letters, as f Postellus affirmeth, were borrowed of the Chaldees; and first with Mahomet and his Law, began to bee called Arabike. Hee findeth in the same, I know not what Cabalisticall Mysteries, yeelding more certaine predictions, then from the Heauens, or Oracles; and is much studied (he saith) in Tunis, Marocco, and Cairo. f Postel. de Orig.

Tripolis of Barbary (for there is another of that name in Syria, so called, because the Arcadians, Tyrians, and Sidonians inhabited it) was so named of three Cities, whose Colonies planted it, Abratonum, and Tophia, and Leptis magna, or as b others, Gera, or Tapsa, or Oea, Sabrada, and Leptis. It was built by the Romans, conquered by the Gothes, and Master by the Saracens. And after the destruction thereof, the Arabians built a new Tripolis, wherein were many faire Temples, Colledges for Students, and Hospitals. Corne is alwaies deare, because their fields are Sand. c It was subiect vnto the King of Tunis, till the King of Fez carried away the King of Tunis prisoner. At which time the Genouese Fleet of twenty Sayle tooke Tripolis, and sold it to the Fezan for fifty thousand Duckats. But the Kings of Tunis recouered it after. Zacharias being King, played the Tyrant, and therefore was expelled, and a certaine Citizen was aduanced to the Throne; who at first gouerned modestly, but declining to tyrannie was murdered: And a Courtier of Prince Abubacer, who had made himselfe an Heremite, was forced to be their King, who ruled Tripolis, till Ferdinando sent Peter Nauarre, who came thither in the Euening, and the next day tooke it: and the King remayned captiue till Charles the fift freed him. Charles gaue the Citie to the Knights of Malta, whom the Turkes dispossessed by force, Anno 1551. and there haue their Beglerbeg or Vice-roy to this day. This was one and forty yeeres after Nauarre had taken it.

The Kings of Tunis liued in great delicacie among their women, Musicians, Players, and such like, committing the gouernment to the Munasid, or high Steward, and other Officers. When he calls for a Musician, he is brought in hood-winked like a Hawke. The Inhabitants are exceeding prodigall in Perfumes. They haue a compound called e Libasis, one ounce whereof being eaten, causeth laughing dalliance, and makes one as it were drunken, and marueilously prouoketh to lust. In the Kingdome of Tunis is placed the Lake Tritonis, where Minerua is said to haue shewed her selfe the Inuenter of Spinning, and of Oyle, and therefore worshipped.

Ezzab is the most Easterly part of the Tunetan Kingdome, the chiefe Prouince whereof is Mesrata. The Inhabitants are rich, and pay no Tribute. There grow Dates and Oliues, and they traffique with the Numidians, to whom they carry the Wares which they buy of the Venetians. The Great Turke swayeth with his Ottoman Scepter, at this present, this Kingdome of Tunis, and all Africa, from Bellis de Gomera, to the Red Sea (except that little which the Spaniard hath.) At this day they f are Mahumetan, and haue beene about these nine hundred yeeres past, from the time of Hucba. The Inhabitants of the Cities differ much from the Mountayners and ruder Rustickes. For they are studious, especially in matters of their Law, as in times past they were also in Philosophy and the Mathematickes. But these last fiue hundred yeeres their Princes and Doctors haue prohibited many Sciences, as Astrologie and Philosophy: according to the Mahumetan custome they vse much washing and resorting to the Temples. They are very faithfull in their promises, and exceeding iealous. They goe through the World as Merchants, and in many places are entertayned as Readers and Masters in diuers Scienees, and are well esteemed in Egypt, Æthiopia, Arabia, Persia, India, Turkie. The younger sort yeeld much reuerence to their Elders and Parents: and will not hold discourse of loue, or sing loue-songs, in their presence. But these Citizens are very proud and reuengefull. The Lords esteeme more of their beasts, then of their common people. The Country people in the fields and mountaynes liue hardly in labour and want. They are beastly, theeuish, ignorant, vnfaithfull. Their women before they bee married, may liue as wantonly as they list: yea, the father maketh hatefull loue to the daughter, and the brother is g vnlouingly louing to the sister. The Numidians are trayterous, homicides, theeues, and for reward, will doe any thing. Such also are the Libyans; without any kind of Letters, Faith, or Law, without Heauen or Earth; liuing (if that may be called a life) like wild beasts, for ignorance; like Deuils, for wickednesse; like Dogges, for pouerty. These things reporteth Leo of them, who liued among them: which may prouoke vs to thankefulnesse to that Great God, who hath giuen Vs such abundance for body and soule, in things present and future, temporall and eternall.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Kingdome of Tremisen, Algier, and other places, anciently called Mauritania Cæsariensis.

§. I.

Of Tremisen, and of the ancient Maurusij.

THE Kingdome of Telensin or Tremisen, [a] beginning Westward from the Riuer of Zha and Muluia; Eastward, it bordereth on the Great Riuer; Southward, vpon the Desart of Numidia; and Northward, vpon the Mediterran Sea. It was by the Romans called Mauritania Cæsariensis: the name came of the Inhabitants called Mauri, and of the Greekes, Μαῦροι: some say [b] of their colour, because it is obscure and darke. They were supposed to come hither first with Hercules out of India. More likely it is that they [c] descended of Phut, the sonne of Cham, Gen. 10.6. Plinie mentions a Riuer named Fut in these parts, descending from Atlas. Salust saith [d] they came with Hercules, who being dead in Spaine as the Africans report, his Armie being gathered of many Nations, was diuersly diuided. The Medes, Armenians and Persians of that number, sayled into Africa, of which the Persians dwelt neere the Sea, their ships with the keeles turned vpwards seruing them for houses, and mixed themselues with the Getuli, entitling themselues Numidians. The Libyans adioyned themselues to the Armenians, and to the Medi, whom by corruption of Language they called Mauri. These Getulians and Libyans, he saith, were before very rude, wandring vp and downe without Law or Ciuility, liuing like beasts, lying and feeding on the ground: which testimony of Salust, Mela in like words confirmeth. But of these and other African people, let them which please learne of that Author, and of such as haue written Notes vpon him, as Gruterus, Glareanus, Rinius, Ciacconius, Putschius, and others. Vitruuius [e] nameth Mauritania, Mauritsia. Ortelius [f] testifieth, That in ancient Coines it is read Mauretania, and so [g] Tacitus readeth. Ptolemey diuideth it into Mauritania Cæsariensis, which [h] Victor Vticensis calleth Maior, and Tingitania. [i] Pliny ascribes this diuision to Caligula; Dion, to Claudius Cæsar: of whom it was sirnamed Cæsariensis of the Mother Citie Cæsarea, where hee planted a Roman Colony, before called Iol, the Royall Seat of Iuba, a man famous, for that hee first reigned ouer both these Mauritania's; but more famous for his Learning, whereby he still liueth in the learned Monuments of Pliny and others; Authour of much of our African report. Hee in his childhood was led in triumph at Rome; his father [k] Iuba, the successour of Bochus, had before slaine himselfe in the Ciuill Warres. Augustus restored him to his Fathers Kingdome, to which he left his sonne Ptolemey, borne of the daughter of Antonius and Cleopatra, whom Caligula slue, and then diuided Mauritania into two Prouinces, whereof this is called, as is said, Cæsariensis, of the Colonie of Claudius Cæsar. That which Procopius [l] hath written of the originall of these Maurusij, as he termes them, although in our first Booke mentioned, here also may seeme to deserue Relation.

When Iosua or Iesus, the sonne of Nun or Naue, had inuaded the Land of Canaan, the people fled into Egypt, and there multiplying, pierced into Africa, replenishing with people all that Coast, vnto the Pillars of Hercules, vsing a semi-Phœnician Dialect; For all the Sea-coast from Sidon to Egypt, was anciently called Phœnicia: They built the Towne Tinge in Numidia, where they erected two Pillars of white stone neere a great Fountayne, wherein was ingrauen in Phœnician Letters, Wee flee from the face of Iesus the Thiefe, the Sonne of Naue. These are supposed the first Inhabitants of Africa, and for that cause Antæus their King, which encountred in single combate with Hercules, was said to bee the Sonne of the Earth. Afterwards, when the Phœnicians came hither with Dido, they were here receiued for kindreds sake, and permitted to build Carthage; which after grew so mighty, that it subdued and expelled the Maurusij themselues. The Romans made the Carthaginians, and other Africans Tributaries, and caused the Maurusij to inhabit the furthest parts of Africa: but in processe of time, they obtayning many victories against the Vandals, seated themselues in Mauritania, till Iustinian remooued them. Thus faire Procopius. Paulus Diaconus [m] recordeth also the same History, sauing that he sayth, the Egyptians would not receiue them, and there-therefore they paſſed into Africa. The Mauruſij in the time of Inſtinian were deſtroyed, and captiued in ſuch multitudes, that a Mauruſian ſlaue was valued at the price of a ſheepe. The Author of this was Salomon, an Eunuch, according to a Propheſie which they had amongſt them, that one without a beard ſhould deſtroy them. But captiuity could not much empare their happineſſe, whoſe very freedome was miſery. [o] For they liued in ſmall baſe cottages, expoſed to the Summer Sunnes, and Winter ſhowes, ſleeping (except a few of the better ſort) on the bare ground, alway wearing the ſame garment, howſoeuer the ſeaſon differed, and that torne and ragged: wanting bread and all other neceſſaries, neither grinding nor boyling that Corne they had. Thus miſerable were their bodies, and their ſoules more. For they had neither feare of God, nor reuerence of Men, nor reſpect of pledge, nor regard of oath, nor peace with any, but where feare conſtrained them. They had their women Propheteſſes, which diuined by their Sacrifices; a thing vnlawfull for their Men to attempt. Of the numbers of their wiues they bragged, that [p] the Chriſtians which had but one wife, might feare the loſſe of their children, they which might haue fifty wiues, need not miſdoubt Iſſue and Poſterity. And yet they were by many warsbrought to ſmall numbers, and a few Tribes or Families.

[q] Leo ſayth, that after the Romanes were expelled, the ancient Gouernours called Beni Habdalgnad of the Family of Magrawa repoſſeſſed theſe parts, who were after diſpoſſeſſed by Chamrazen, Sonne of Zeiyen, whoſe Poſterity reigned here almoſt three hundred and eightie yeeres. But they were much vexed by the Kings of Fez, and Tunis. It was in later times called the Kingdome of Telenſin, or of Tremiſen; ſtretching in length from Eaſt to Weſt three hundred and eighty miles, in breadth not aboue fiue and twenty. The Kings could neuer ſatisfie the Numidians couetiſe, whoſe friendſhip they haue with great coſt ſought. It hath two frequented Hauen-townes, Oran and Merſalcabir, both taken and holden by the Spaniards. They were taken in the time of Ferdinando King of Spaine; for which cauſe Abuchemmen the Telenſin King was expelled by his owne Subiects, and Abuzeiyen placed in his roome, which he could ſcarcely warme, before he was ſlaine by Barbaruſſa the Turke, who conquered this Kingdome. [r] But Abuchemmen ſought to Charles the fift for aide, by whoſe helpe he recouered his Kingdome, and payed a Tribute to the Emperour. But Habdalla his Succeſſor detayned the Tribute, and ſubmitted himſelfe vnto Soliman the Great Turke. Algier remayned to Barbaruſſa.

§. II.

Of BARBARVSSA, of Algier and the parts adioyning.

THis [s] Barbaruſſa or Barbaroſſa, was a meane fellow of baſe condition, who in his youth ſold Cheeſes in Spain for his liuing, & by his induſtry attained to great matters. There were [t] of them two Brethren, born at Mytilene in Leſbos, their Mother a Chriſtian, their Father a Renegate Grecian, Horucius Barbaruſſa, and this Hariadenus Barbaruſſa. They firſt ſtole a Galliot, and ſo committing themſelues to Sea, by Piracy vnder Camales, a Turkiſh Pirate, they grew rich: and from one Galley, came to haue a Nauie of their owne, with which they ſcoured the Coaſts of Barbary. At the ſame time [u] two brethren contended for the Kingdome of Algier, one of which requeſted ayde of Horucius, who ſo helped him againſt his brother, that he helped himſelfe to the Kingdome, by the murther of the King his Patron and Alley, which he did not long enioy, being taken and ſlaine of the Spaniards, and his head ſent into Spaine. But his Brother Hariadenus ſucceeding him, became mighty both by Sea and Land, to the great dammage both of the Mores and Chriſtians; and Soliman moued by his fame, ſent for him, and made him Admirall of all the Turkiſh Seas, and Sea forces, vnder whom hee grew dreadfull, not to theſe parts of Barbary alone, which he ſubiected to the Turke, but to thoſe Countries of Chriſtendome which are waſhed with the Mediterran: euen Rome it ſelfe quaking for feare of a ſecond Hannibal, who after ſo many ages ſhould by Sea from Africa auenge the angry Ghoſt of old Carthage.

[u] Surij Comm. in Annum 1534 P. Iouius lib. 33.

In the yeere 1538. the Pope, Emperour, and Venetians, had with ioynt forces ſet forth a Nauy of aboue two hundred and fifty Sayle againſt him, but by mutuall diſcords the wonted aduantage of the Turkes againſt the Chriſtians) they made themſelues both ſport and ſpoyle to this Turkiſh Pyrat. The Sea could no longer endure the ſucceſſe of this Barbarian, but mad to ſee the Chriſtians vnchriſtian madneſſe, and vnwilling to ſubmit his proud waues to the baſe thraldome of this baſe Turke, ſwelling with indignation, conſpired with the Neighbour Element, which pretended equall quarrell for ſo often darkening his light, and poyſoning his breath with thoſe helliſh ſmokes, and for vſurping thoſe thunders, which had wont to be the ayrie priuiledge of his middle Regions: these both agreed in their disagreeing, with tempestuous furie to spoile the Spoilers: the windes from the Acroceraunian Hills, and the Seas on the Dalmatian shore, so girt in the Turkes, with their equall vnequall siege, that twentie thousand of them were captiued and shut vp in Neptunes prisons, to become foode to his Familie; and the new Conquerors on euery shore, made their markets of Turkish commodities, and by wracks testified to the Earth, that they had wrecked themselues on her and their enemies. And yet did Barbarussa recouer himselfe by new forces, and hauing won Rhegium, came to Ostia, where he rode three dayes; the Romanes trembling meanewhile, and readie to leaue Saint Peter alone to locke out the Turks if they came. So much more fortunate were his proceedings, then of Haly Bassa, who in the fight at Lepanto, lost his life and Naule, whereof fiue eightie fell to the Seas share, and an hundred and thirtie saile to Don Iohn and his Partners: the greatest blow that euer the Turke at Sea receiued, and had the greatest a Homer to sing it. But me thinkes I feele some Cnidius pulling me by the eare, and asking if the Pirats haue robbed me of my Religion, the most proper subiect of my Discourse. Truly that irreligious Crue, while they seeke to win other things, care not to lose that. But this Algier hauing beene of old, and still continuing a receptacle of Turkish Rouers, could not be passed ouer, especially in these Piraticall times, without some obseruation, being also the gate whereby the Turkish forces first entred into Barbarie. b Iohn Leo writeth a little otherwise of Barbarussa and Algier.

to

The Moores call this Citie Gezeir, the Spaniards Algier: and of old was called Mesgana of that African Familie which founded it. It containeth c about foure thousand Families; the buildings very sumptuous; Innes, Bath-stones, and Temples very beautifull: euery Occupation hath a seuerall place by it selfe. It hath adioyning Playnes very pleasant and fertile, one whereof is fiue and fortie miles long, and almost thirtie broad. For many yeeres it was subiect to the Kingdome of Telensin: but hearing that Bugia was gouerned by a King, they submitted themselues to him, paying him a Tribute, otherwise in manner free. Then did they build themselues Gallies, and molested with Piracies the Spanish Ilands of Majorica, Minorica, and Ieuiza. Ferdinando therefore prouided an Armada against them, and built a Fort within shot of the Towne: whereupon they requested peace, and promised Tribute. But Barbarussa, when Ferdinando was dead, was sent for by the Citizens, and made Captaine ouer all their Forces. Hee soone after murthered Selim Ettemi, an Arabian Prince, which had beene created Gouernour of Algier, when Bugia was taken by the Spaniards: and possessed himselfe of the gouernment, and there coyned money, calling himselfe King; the neighbouring people yeelding him obedience and tribute. This was the beginning of Barbarussas greatnesse: and at the most part hereof Leo was present, and lodged in his house which had beene Embassadour from Algier to Spaine, from whence he had brought three thousand books written in Arabike. And whiles I was at Tunis, I heard that Barbarussa was slaine at Telensin, and his brother d Cairadin succeeded. It was told me also, that the Emperour Charles the fift had sent two armies to surprise Algier, the first whereof was destroyed in the Playne, the second sl[illegible]ine, and made slaues by Babarussa, in the yeere of the Hegira 922. Thus farre Leo. In the yeere 1541. e Charles himselfe with his Imperiall Naule passed the Seas, to like both purpose and effect, more ouer-comming himselfe in the patient bearing his losses, then his enemies whom he sought to assaile. He was moued to this Expedition by the complaints of his Subiects, against the Turkish Pirats, which vnder Asanaga, Barbarussa's Lieutenant, infested all those Seas. But the tempestuous weather both at Land and Sea disappointed him, and after the losse of many, both men and ships, was forced to returne, and to make roome for his Souldiers, caused his Horses (their gallant breede, notwithstanding) to bee cast ouerboord. Thus doth Algier f still continue a sinke of Pirats; and now, saith Maginus, there are in it not many lesse then fiue and twentie thousand Christian slaues, which in likelyhood at this time are increased.

Tripoli is also a seate of a Turkish Viceroy or Beglerbeg, and of Turkish Rouers. In the Kingdome of Telensin is the Desart of Angad, wherein are store of Roes, Deere, and Ostriches, Arabian Theeues and Lions. The Castle of Izli was sometime stored with Inhabitants, and stately walled. Since, it was inhabited with Religious persons, much reuerenced by the Kings of Telensin, and the Arabians; which giue free entertainment for three dayes vnto all Trauellers. A little off runneth a Riuer, out of which they water their fields, which else would yeeld them no fruit. Guagida betwixt two stooles had vnquiet sitting, paying tribute both to the Kings of Telensin, and the Arabians. Ned Roma was built by the Romanes, as the name testifieth, for Ned signifieth Like; and like it was, if Historiographers faile not, vnto Rome. Here, and at Tebecrit dwelt great store of weauers. Haresgol was sometime famous, but being destroyed by a King and Patriarch of Cairaoan, it bequeathed, as it seemeth, the greatnesse thereof to Telensin, which after grew in renowme. This Towne giues name to this Kingdome. When Abu Teſſin raigned, it had in it ſixteene thouſand Families. Ioſeph King of Fez beſieged it ſeuen yeeres together, and almoſt famiſhed them: but he being ſlaine by treaſon, they found victuals enough in their enemies campe (which they aſſailed and ſpoiled) for their reliefe. Fortie yeeres after, Abulheſen King of Fez after thirtie moneths ſiege tooke it, and beheaded their King. Here are many and beautifull Temples, hauing their Mahumetan Prieſts and Preachers. Likewiſe here are fiue Colledges moſt ſumptuouſly built by the Kings of Telenſin and Fez, curiouſly wrought with muſaike worke, for the Arabian Muſes and Students, which haue their maintenance there. Their Bathes and Innes I omit. A great part of this Citie is inhabited with Iewes, diſtinguiſhed by their yellow Turbants from the other Citizens, which being very rich, in the yeere of the Hegira 923. were robbed and brought to beggerie. The Turkes g are now Lords thereof, betweene whom and Charles the fift, who had vndertaken their protection, the Citie is much impayred; as alſo by the warres betwixt the Seriffe and the Turke. Barbaruſſa ſubiected it. Batha is a great Citie, or rather was ſuch: now ruined by warres. Not farre hence in Leo's time kept a famous Heremit, much eſteemed for his holineſſe: who in ſhort time grew ſo rich in Horſes and other Cattell, that none in that Region were comparable to him. He payd nothing, nor any of his to the King, or to the Arabians, becauſe they ſuppoſed him a Saint. I was told by his Diſciples (ſaith Leo) that the tenth of his Corne is eight thouſand buſhells a yeere. d He hath fiue hundred Horſes and Mares, ten thouſand ſmall Cattell, and two thouſand Oxen, beſides that, he hath yeerly ſent him from diuers parts of the world, of almes and offering, betweene foure and fiue thouſand duckats. His fame is ſpred ouer Aſia and Africa, his diſciples are fiue hundred, which dwell with him, and liue at his charge, to whom hee enioyneth neither penance nor labour, but to reade ordinarie prayers: and giues them ſome names of God to obſerue in their prayers, which they are to mumble ſo many times a day: for which cauſe multitudes reſort to him to be his diſciples, which after ſuch inſtruction he ſends home againe. He hath an hundred Tents, ſome for Strangers, ſome for Shepheards, and others for his Familie. This good and luſtie Hermit hath foure wiues, and many ſlaues, and by them many ſonnes and daughters gallantly attyred. His children alſo haue wiues and children, in ſo much that the whole Familie of this Heremit and his ſonnes exceeded fiue hundred. Hee is honored of the Arabians, and the King of Telenſin is afraid of him. I, being deſirous to know him, was entertayned of him three dayes, and ſupped with him euery night in ſecret roomes, where hee ſhewed me among other things, bookes of Magicke and Alchymie: and would haue proued to me that Magicke was a true Science: whereby I thought him to be a Magician, becauſe I ſaw him ſo much honored, and yet vſed neither ſayings nor doings, but thoſe Inuocations of God by certayne names. Thus farre Leo, lib. 4.

Concerning their marriages in theſe parts, we reade l that the Bride is carryed, not on her feet, but in the armes of two yong men, with her eyes cloſed, and being marryed, is in like ſort, without ſtirring her eyes or feet, conueighed to the Bridegroomes houſe; where ſhe enters firſt with the right foote, in token of proſperitie (the left foote firſt touching ground, would portend ſiniſter ſucceſſe, as proceeding from a certayne Conſtellation and ineuitable deſtinie) with muſicke ſhee is entertayned and conducted to the Bride-chamber, where ſhee ſits downe, as taking poſſeſſion of her houſe, all the other women ſtanding about her: after which ſhee is led with great pompe by women to the Hall, the men accompanying the Bridegroome to another roome. The Bride is ſet on a bed couered with a white veile, the women ſtanding by, and many gifts and preſents are offered to her: two women being her inſtructers in the rites and ceremonies which ſhee is to obſerue, called Magitæ, to whom the Bride giueth the money which is offered. The men which offer, if they bee of neere kinne, may vpon requeſt ſee her face, her eyes ſtill cloſed. Neither may ſhee ſpeake, but by thoſe Magitæ is ſhifted and gallantly adorned, and brought to banquet with the women. They haue a dinner and a ſupper, furniſhed with exceeding varietie of diſhes, of Honey and Rayſins diuerſly compounded: their fleſh is not taſted before oyle be powred on it. There are neere as many many pots boyling, as guests, and much superstition is obserued in killing their flesh towards the Sunne, with pronouncing certaine wordes, or else all is cast on the dunghill. The Bride being conueyed to bed, may not signifie any griefe for smart or losse there sustayned. The next morning before day, the husband riseth, not saluting his wife, and taking a pot for water, and a vessell for meate, at his returne beates vpon the doore with a stone many times, till shee (then first) speakes to him, and ordering the said meate and water, beginnes to looke to her houshold-charge. The Magite presently come and congratulate her last nights dalliance, and desire issue thereof: and then cut her haire hanging downe on her backe, euen with her neck, that it should not hinder her husbands embraces.

The gouernment of these parts is, as is said, Turkish. The Beglerbeg hath chiefe title, but the Diuano hath chiefe power of Iudgements and Iurisdiction: The Coruſan or Captaine of the Ianizaries, being in many matters as great as the Beglerbeg. The Beglerbegs of Algier and Tunis make their principall profits of their places (which they hold three yeers, hauing first bought them at a deare rate) by their piracies, which with ioynt consent they exercise on these Seas, all in manner being fish that comes to net, if they meete them conueniently, notwithstanding any league or peace holden with the Grand Signior. They also giue entertainment to such Pirats of other places, as resort to them, either to sell their ill-gotten goods, or to ioyne their strength with them. As of late [m] Dansker and Warde haue beene famous in this infamie; the first, after his seruice with them and for them, receiuing his reward, by them suddenly kill'd at Tunis (where he was knowne, notwithstanding his disguising himselfe, with purpose to haue surprised their fleet:) the other (a shame to our Country, of which he was) grew so rich by his Piracies, that hee shewed at one time to (the Authour of these reports) Iohn Pounteſſe, a bagge of Iewels, containing almost halfe a bushell, besides his other purchases: And at last, that the end might manifest the wickednesse of these proceedings, [n] he became an Apostata and Renegado from his faith; and soone after (as some haue reported, for others say he is still aliue, and Captaine of the Turkes Gallies) dyed at Tunis: leauing his goods (for his goodnesse he had left before) vnto the Turks, his body vnto a forren sepulchre, and his soule, let pirats and robbers (if they think they haue any soule) say whither.

m Pirats: of these two Pirats there is a speciall Treatise, set forth 1609.

n Many English Christians vnworthy either of these names turn from that faith (which they neuer had but in profession) to professe themselues (for hell) Turkish.

Algier was by Barbaruſſa subiected to the Turke, about the yeere 1534. Tunis An. 1574. Three and twentie yeeres after that Tripoli, in Barbarie, another Cage of like birds, and seat of a Beglerbeg, was taken from the Knights of Malta by Sinan Baſſa. These Kingdomes the Turke hath in Africa, besides the great kingdome of Egypt, and what hee hath taken from Prester Iohn.

In Egypt [o] are said to be an hundred thousand Timariots, or Horse-mens fees, which for that tenure of their Land, without any charge to the great Turke, are to serue where it pleaseth him to employ them. In this kingdome of Algier are fortie thousand.

Of the Kingdome of Fez, part of Mauritania Tingitana.

§. I.

Of the Poeticall and Hiſtoricall Antiquities, and part of Temeſma.

MAuritania Tingitana (so called of Tingis, now Tanger, at the mouth of the Streits) is by Ptolemey [a] bounded on the West, with the Westerne and Atlantike; on the North, with the Mediterran Seas; on the East, with the Riuer [b] Muluia or Malua, which diuideth it from Caſarienſis; on the South, with the inner Nations of Libya. Niger [c] saith, it was after called Setinenſis, of the Citie Setia: more truly, Sitiphenſis, of Sitiphis, which Procopius saith was the mother Citie of Tingitana. In this Prouince are now the famous kingdomes of Fez and Marocco. [d] The ancient Inhabitants besides the Mauruſij (of which wee haue spoken) were [e] the Maſſæſuli, Autololes, Banuarri, and the Getulians which liued here, and in other parts of Africa, as the Tartars doe in Asia, and the Arabians in Africa, remouing their dwellings (if Tent-wandring may bee so called) as their pastures faile them. So Silius writeth of them:

The westerly point of Mauritania Pomponius beginneth at the Promontorie, called of their
g Pompon. Mela lib. 1. cap. 5. cum Oliuarii annot. store of Vines, Ampelusia, & now Cabo de Cantero, as Oliuarius affirmeth. In it was a Caue sacred to Hercules, and beyond the same, Tingi, supposed to bee built by Anteus, for proofe whereof they shew his Target made of an Elephants hide, too huge and vnweildy for any man of later times, and holden in great veneration. Next to this Tingi (which gaue name to the Countrey, after by Claudius Cæsar, who sent a Colonie thither, called Traducta Iulia) was a high Mountayne called Abyla, to which on the Spanish coast was opposed Calpe, which two Hills bare the name of Hercules pillars; Hercules himselfe (if wee beleeue fabulous antiquitie) making there a passage to the Ocean and Mediterran Seas, for mutuall view and entertainment. They are now called Seuta on that side, and Gibraltar on this side. A little hence was Iulia Constantia, a Colonie of Augustus; and Lixus, a Colonie of Claudius.
h Natal. Comes Mythol. l. 7. c. 2. In this h was Anteus his Palace, and his combate with Hercules, and the Gardens of the Hesperides, which some (as is said) place neere Bernice. Anteus, if his legend bee true, was i Some say threescore and ten, and that Sertorius found him in his sepulchre of that length. I can easily beleeue both alike. i threescore and foure cubits long, a cruell and inhospitall Tyrant, who in his encountring with Hercules, was three times hurled dead to the earth, and so many times by his mother (the Earth) reuiued: which Hercules perceiuing, held him vp in the Aire till he had strangled him. Whereby they intend, that the Sunne reuiueth the earth, signified by Anteus: and Hercules, but with his excessiue heat doth kill it. The Hesperides were the daughters of Hesperus, brother of Atlas; Ægle, Arethusa, Hesperusa. In their Gardens grew those golden apples (the dowrie of Iuno to Iupiter) kept by a Dragon, engendred of Typhon and Echidna, which had an hundred heads, and many voyces, attended by the Priest of the Hesperides: these Hercules fetched away. This was the poeticall tale; the truth whereof is said to bee, that the daughters of Atlas were by Pirats and Theeues, sent from Busiris King of Egypt, stolne; and redeemed by Hercules, who slue those theeues. These were borne to Atlas of Hesperia, daughter of Hesperus his brother, called therefore Atlantides and Hesperides, sixe in number. Atlas had an excellent kinde of sheepe, with yellow fleeces, which for this exploit he bestowed on Hercules: and taught him also the knowledge of Astronomie: in regard of which Science, Atlas is said to haue borne vp the Heauens with his shoulders, and Hercules to haue vndertaken his burthen. Whereas Natalis k Comes placeth these gardens with Plinie, neere to Lixus, and yet nigh to Meroe and the Red Sea, betwixt which places is such a world of distance, it argueth how great errours great Schollers may fall into by want of that so-much-neglected studie of Geographie, without which, Historie that delectable studie is sicke of a halfe-dead palsie: one cause that hath mooued me to ioyne in my studies and in this worke, the Historie of Time, l with her manifold changes and chances and of Place together. Besides the Altar of Hercules, and wilde Oliues, there remayned nothing in Plinies dayes of that Hesperian garden. Niger m findes there a tree Mallow, twentie foote high, and aboue a fathom about. Of Mount Atlas they tell wonderfull tales, of the selfe-fertilitie thereof, the Inhabitants neuer seene by day, the desart-like silence, the fires therein shining by night, the musicke and misse-rule of the Ægypanes and Satyres, and the labours of Hercules and Perseus there. Iohn Leo shall better acquaint vs with the truth, then those fables of credulous antiquitie. Out of him therefore and other later writers, wee will take view of the present face of Africa, there being little that can bee said of their ancient Rites, more then is alreadie obserued. The Romans brought hither their Language and Religion. The Vandals vnder Gensericus passing out of Spaine, made conquest of all in manner which the Romans had in Africa, of whose crueltie Victor n Vticensis, an eye-witnesse, hath written three bookes. The manifold battels and alterations of estate betwixt them, the Romans, Mauritanians, and others, Procopius o hath diligently recorded. It would bee harsh and tedious here to relate. The soyle, saith Mela, is more noble then the people: of the miraculous fertilitie whereof, Dionysius p Halicarnassæus, Munster, Boemus, and others haue written, I know not how truly, That their corne yeelds an hundred fold encrease, and in some places an hundred and fiftie; That there are seene Vines as great as two men can fathom, and grape-clusters a cubit long, &c. It is q thought that Christian Religion was here preached in the Apostles time.

Leauing those things of more age and vncertaintie, wee will come now to the kingdomes of Fez and Marocco, which haue beene of Saracenicall erection in this Prouince of Tingitana. r That of Fez stretcheth from Azamor to Tanger, and from the Atlantike Ocean to Muluia. This Riuer is the Easterne border, on the North it is washed with the Sea, on the South is the kingdome of Marocco, on the West, the Riuer Ommirabih. The Riuers Subu, Luccus, and others water it. Therein are numbred seuen Prouinces, Temesna, the Territorie of Fez, Azgar, Elhabet or Habat, Errif, Garet, and Chaus or Elchauz: euery of which, saith Leo, had in old time a seuerall Gouernour. Neither was the Citie of Fez the royall seat, but was built by a schismaticall Rebell, in whose Familie the gouernment continued 150. yeeres. And then the Marin familie preuayling, gaue it first the title of a kingdome, setling their abode and strength therein.

Temesna

Temesna beginneth at Ommirabih, thence stretching Eastward to Buragrag, betweene Atlas and the Ocean. It is a playne Countrey, eightie miles in length, containing in it fortie great Townes, besides three hundred Castles. In the yeere of the Hegira 323. Chemim the sonne of Menol, an Heremiticall Preacher, perswaded them to pay no tribute, nor yeeld subjection to Fez, because the Lords thereof were vniust. Hee bearing himselfe for a Prophet, in small time gate into his hand the Spirituall and Temporall Sword, holding the same by force and Armes. But after that Ioseph had built Marocco, hee sought by Catholike Doctors of the Mahumetane Religion, to reduce them from their Heresie, but they slew them, and with an Armie of fiftie thousand marched towards Marocco, to expell thence the House of Luntuna, but by this meanes brought destruction to themselues; Ioseph getting the better, and spoyling their Country, tenne moneths together, with great crueltie.

It is thought that a million of people by Famine, Sword, Rockes aad Riuers, were consumed: and Temesna was left to bee inhabited of Wolues, Lyons, and Ciuit-Cats, a hundred and fiftie yeeres: at which time King Mansor gaue the possession of Temesna to certaine Arabians, who fiftie yeeres after were expelled by the Luntune Family, recouering the Kingdome from the House of Mansor; and after, the Marin Family preuayling, gaue it to the people of Zenete and Haora, in meede of their seruice, which they had done to the Marins against the King and Patriarch of Marocco. From which time they haue enioyed the same almost two hundred yeeres.

Anfa was a Towne of great Trade with the English and Portugals, and by these vtterly razed: and so the Arabians serued the next Citie Mansora. Nuchaila, sometimes famous for their plentie of Corne, of which it is recorded, that they would giue a Camels burthen for a paire of Shooes, hath now but a few bones left of her carkasse, namely, a piece of the wall, and one high Steeple, where the Arabians after they haue ended their Tilth, lay vp their instruments of Husbandrie, none daring to steale his neighbours tooles, in reuerence of a Saint of theirs, there buried.

Rebat, is a Towne furnished with Colledges, and Temples, the modell of Marocco. At Sella was King Mansor buried, where hee had built a stately Hospitall, and Palace, a beautifull Temple, and a Hall of Marble cut in Mosaike worke, with glasse-windowes of diuers colours, wherein hee and his Posteritie were buried. I saw, saith Leo, the Sepulchre, and copied out the Epitaphs of thirtie of them.

Madur Auuan, by the ruines testifieth her sometime proud buildings, Hospitals, Innes and Temples. In Thagia is visited the Sepulchre of a holy Man, which liued in the time of Habdul Mumen the Calif or Patriarch, who wrought great miracles against the Lyons, wherwith the Towne is much molested. Ettedle, a Mahumetane Doctor, wrote a Legend of his miracles, which Leo saith hee had read, and supposed that they were done either by Naturall or Diuelliſh Magicke. The Fessans after their Easter, yeerely resort to his Tombe, with such numbers of Men, Women and Children, and their Tents, that they seeme an Armie. It standeth from Fez an hundred and twentie miles, so that their going and returning in this Pilgrimage lasteth fifteene dayes. My Father carried mee yeerely thither when I was a Childe, and since, I haue beene there many times, by reason of many vowes which I made, being in danger of Lyons. Where Zarfa stood, the Arabians now [m] sow Corne.

m Seges est, vbi Troia fuit.

The Territorie of Fez hath on the West the Riuer Buragard; the East, Inaven; on the North, Subu; and Atlas on the South. Sella was built by the Romans, sacked by the Gothes, subiect since to Fez. The buildings are of Mosaike worke, supported with Marble Pillars: euen the Shops are vnder faire and large Porches, and there are arches to part Occupations. All the Temples are beautifull. In this Towne the Genowaies, English, Flemings, and Venetians, vsed to trade. The Spaniards tooke it in the 670 of the Hegira, but lost it againe within ten dayes. Fanzara was destroyed by Sahid, who with certaine Arabians besieged Fez seuen yeeres together, and destroyed all the Villages in the Countrey about. Mahmora was made famous by the slaughter of the Portugals, whose bloud dyed the Sea three dayes together, blushing to see the barbarous Barbarian spill so much Christian bloud. Leo was there present, and numbreth the slaine Christians at ten thousand, besides the losse of their Ships and Ordnance, whereof the Moores tooke vp foure hundred great Brasse Peeces out of the Sea, in the yeere of the Heg. 921.

§. II.

Of the Citie of Fez, as it was in LEO's dayes, and the Customes of the Inhabitants.

THe Citie Fez, or Fesse, was built in the time of Aron the Caliph, in the 185. yeere of the Hegira, or Mahumeticall computation. It had this [a] golden Title, because on the first day of the Foundation, there was found some quantitie of Gold. Gasper Varerius and Aldrete are of opinion, That the Riuer Phut (so called of the sonne of Cham, before mentioned) is this Riuer of Fez, by the Arabians thus altered: and that this Riuer gaue Name to the Region and the Citie; which opinion is also recited by Leo. The Founder was named Idrù, Arons neere kinsman, to whom the Caliphaship was more due: For he was nephew of Hali, Mahumets cousin, who married [b] Faleroa, daughter of Mahumet, and therefore both by Father and Mother of that kindred; whereas Aron was but in the halfe-blood, being nephew to Habbus, the vncle of Mahumet. Howbeit, both these Families were depriued of the Caliphate; and Aron by deceit [c] vsurped: For Arons Grandfather fained himselfe willing to transferre that dignitie to Hali, and caused the house of Vmeue to lose it; and Habdulla Seffec became the first Caliph, who persecuted the House of Hali openly, chasing some into Asia, and some into India. But one of them remayned in Elmadina, of whom (because hee was old and religious) he had no great feare. His two Sonnes grew in such fauour with the people, that they were forced to flee; and one being taken and strangled, the other, which which was this Idris, escaped into Mauritania; where hee grew in such reputation, that in short time he got both Swords into his hand, and dwelt in the Hill Zaron, thirtie miles from Fez, and all Mauritania payed him tribute. Hee dyed without issue, onely hee left his Saue with Child; she was a Goth, become Mahumetan, and had a sonne, which after his father was called Idris. Hee succeeded in the Principalitie, and was brought vp vnder the discipline of a valiant Captaine, named Rasid; and began to shew great proweſſe at fifteen yeeres. He afterwards, encreasing in power, built on the East side of the Riuer a small Citie, of three thousand Families. After his death, one of his sonnes built another Citie on the West side; both which Cities so encreased, that there was small distance betweene them. And a hundred and eighty yeeres after, there arose ciuill Warres betwixt those two Cities, which continued a hundred yeeres. And as Æsops Kite serued the Mouse and Frog, so Ioseph, of the Luntine Family, apprehending this aduantage, tooke both their Lords, and slew them, and thirty thousand of the Citizens. He brake downe the walls which parted the two Cities, and caused many Bridges to be made, and brought them both to be one Citie, which he diuided into twelue Wards.

The Citie is now, or at least in Leos time was, both great and strong. It seemes, that Nature and Art haue played the Wantons, and haue brought forth this Citie the fruit of their dalliance: Or else they seeme Corriuals; both, by all kind Offices, seeking to winne her loue: So doth the Earth seeme to dance, in little Hillocks and pretie Vallies diuersifying the Soyle: so doth the Riuer disperse it selfe into manifold Chanels; no sooner entring the Citie, but it is diuided into two Armes, wherewith it embraceth this louely Nymph; and these subdiuided, as it were, into many Fingers, in variety of Water-courses, insinuating it selfe vnto euery Street and Member thereof: and not contented thus in publike to testifie affection, findes meanes of secret intelligence with his Loue by Conduit-pipes, closely visiting euery Temple, Colledge, Inne, Hospitall, (the speciall Chambers of his Spouse:) Yea, and almost euery priuate house; from whence, with an officious seruice, he carrieth the filth that might offend either sight or sent of his Bride; which still enjoying, he wooeth; and euer wooing, enjoyeth. Only in hot Seasons he hath a cold suit: for the Riuer is dry; but then he hath six hundred Fountaynes to speake for him in his absence. Neither is Art behind in his proffered courtesies, but still presents her with Mosaike workes, as Chaynes and Iewels to adorne her; with fine Brickes and stones framed into most artificiall Fabricks, both louely for delight, and stately for admiration. The roofes of their houses are adorned with Gold, Azure, and other excellent colours, which are made flat, for the Inhabitants vse and pleasure; whose Houses are richly furnished, euery Chamber with a Presse, curiously paynted and varnished. And who can tell the exquisiteneſſe of the Portals, Pillars, Cisternes, and other parts of this Cities furniture? Which, if they be not now so excellent, as when Leo liued here; yet, it is worth the sight, to looke vpon it with his eyes, as then it flourished, before the Court was remoued thence to Marocco, or the deuouring bellies of Time and Warre had impaired her Beauties. Once, let the Temples therein a while detayne your eyes; whereof there were in Fez, together with smaller Chappels, or Moschees, about seuen hundred; fifty of which great and faire, adorned with Marble Pillars, and other ornaments; the Chapiters thereof wrought with Mosaike and carued workes. Euery one had his Fountaines of Marble, or other Stones, not knowne in Italy. The floores are couered with Mats, closely joyned, and so are the walls a mans height lined therewith. Euery Temple hath his Steeple after the Mahumetan manner, whereon they, whose office it is, ascend and call the people at the appointed houres to Prayer: there is but one Priest thereunto, who sayth their Seruice there, and hath charge of the reuenew of his Church, taking accounts thereof, to bestow it on the Ministers of the said Temple; namely, those which keepe the Lampes light in the night, the Porters, and them which cry in the night-time, to call them to Church. For he which cryeth in the day-time, is onely freed from Tenths, and other Payments; otherwise, hath no Salarie or Stipend. There is one Principall, and (if wee may so terme it) Cathedrall Church, called the Temple of Garuien, so great, that it contayneth in a circuit about a mile and halfe. It hath one and thirty Gates, great and high. The Roofe is a hundred and fifty Tuscan [b] yards long, and litle lesse then eighty broad. The Steeple is exceeding high. The Roofe hereof is supported with eight and thirty Arches in length, and twenty in bredth. Round about are certayne Porches, on the East, West, and North, euery one in length forty yards, and in bredth thirty. Vnder which Porches, or Galleries, are Magazines, or Store-houses, wherein are kept Lampes, Oyle, Mats, and other necessaries. Euery night are lighted nine hundred Lamps; for euery Arch hath his Lamp, especially that row of Arches which extends through the mid-Quire, which alone hath a hundred and fifty Lamps; in which ranke are some great Lights made of Brasse, euery of which hath sockets for one thousand fiue hundred Lampes: And these were Bells [c] of certayn Cities of Christians, conquered by Fessan Kings. About the walls of the sayd Temple within, are Pulpits of diuers sorts; wherein many learned Masters reade to the people such things as pertayne to their Faith and Spirituall Law. They begin a little after breake of day, and end at [d] one houre of the day. In Summer they reade not, but after foure and twenty houres, or Sun-set, and continue till an houre and halfe within night. They teach as well Morall Philosophie, as the Law of Mahomet. Priuate men reade the Summer-Lectures; onely great Clarkes may reade the other; which haue therefore a large stipend, and Bookes, and Candles, are giuen them. The Priest of this Temple is tyed to nothing but his Mumpsimus, or Seruice. Also he taketh charge of the Money and Goods which are offered in the Temple of Orphans, and dispenseth the reuenewes that are left for the poore. Euery Holy-day he dealeth to the poore of the Citie, Money and Corne, according as their necessitie is more or lesse. The Treasurer of this Church is allowed a Duckat a day. He hath vnder him eight Notaries, each of which haue six Duckats a moneth: other six Clarkes gather the Rents of Houses and Shops, which belong to the Church, retayning the twentieth part thereof for their wages. Moreouer, there are twenty Bayliffes of the Husbandry, that ouer-see the Labourers. Not farre from the Citie are twenty Lyme-Kils, and as many Brick-Kils, seruing for the reparations of the Temple, and the houses thereto belonging. The reuenewes of the Temple are * two hundred Duckats a day. The better halfe is layd out on the premisses. And if any Temple of the Citie or Moschee be without reuenew, they are hence furnished with many things; that which remaines, goeth to the common good of the Citie.

* This may be reckoned as old Rent with vs, which now may bee exceedingly improued: for Leo wrote this, An. 1526.

In the Citie are two principall and most stately Colledges of Schollers, adorned with Mosaikes and carued workes, paued with Marble and Stones of Majorica. In each of them are many Chambers; in some Colledges are a hundred; in some more; and in some lesse. They were all built by diuers Kings of the Marin Family. One is most beautifull, founded by King Abu Henon. It is adorned with a goodly Fountayne of Marble, and a Streame continually running: there are three Cloysters, or Galleries, of incredible beautie, supported with eight square Pillars of diuers colours, the arches adorned with Mosaike of Gold and fine Azure. The Roofe is of carued worke. About the walls are inscriptions in Verse, expressing the yeere of the Foundation, and prayses of the Founder. The Gates of the Colledge are of Brasse, fairely wrought, and the doores of the Chambers carued. In the great Hall where they say their Prayers is a Pulpit, that hath nine stayres to it all of Iuorie and Ebonie. This Colledge cost the Founder 480000. Duckats. All the other Colledges in Fez hold some resemblance with this, and in euery of them are Readers or Professors in diuers Sciences prohibited by the Founders. In old time the Students were wont to haue their dyet and rayment allowed for seuen yeeres, but now they are allowed onely their Chamber; for the warres * of Sahid consumed their Possessions: So that now there remaines but little wherewith they maintayne their Readers; and of them, some haue two hundred Duckats, some a hundred yeerely, and some lesse. And there abide in the said Colledges onely a few Strangers maintayned by the Almes of the Citizens. When they will reade, one of the Auditors readeth a Text, and the Reader then readeth his Comments, & brings some exposition of his own, and explaineth the difficulties. And somtimes in his presence the Students dispute of that Argument which he handleth.

* Bellona, enemie to the Muses.

There are many Hospitals in Fez, not inferiour in building to the Colledges aforesaid. In them, strangers were entertayned three dayes at the common charge. But in the time of Sahids warre, the King sold their Reuenues. Now, onely Learned men and Gentlemen receiue entertainment, and poore persons reliefe. There is another Hospitall for diseased strangers, which haue their dyet, but no Phisicke allowed them. Here also Mad-men are prouided for. In this Hospitall, Leo, in his youth, had beene a Notarie.

There are in Fez a hundred Bath-stoues, well built, with foure Halls in each, and certaine Galleries without, in which they put off their cloathes. The most part of them pertaine to the Temples and Colledges, yeelding them a great rent. They haue a yeerely Festiuall, wherin all the seruants of the Bathes, with Trumpets and great Solemnitie, goe forth of the Town, and gather a wild Onion, which they put in a brazen Vessell, and bring it solemnely to the Hot-house doore, and there hang it vp, in token of good lucke. This, Leo thinkes to be some Sacrifice, obserued by the ancient Moores, yet remaining. Euery African Towne had sometimes their peculiar Feast, which the Christians abolished.

Innes heere are almost two hundred, built three stories high, and haue a hundred and twenty Chambers a-piece, with Galleries afore all the doores. But here is no prouision of Bed or Board for Strangers. The Inne-keepers of Fez (in Leo's dayes) were all of one Family, called Elchena, attyred like women, shaue their beards, become womanish in their speech, yea degenerate euen to the Wheele and Spindle. They are so * odious (except to base villaines that resort thither) that the better sort of people will not speake to them; and may not enter the Temple, Burse, or Bath, nor into those Innes next the great Temple, where Merchants are entertained. There are thousands of Mills, all almost pertaining to the Temples and Colledges reuenew. Each Trade in Fez hath a peculiar place allotted thereto, the principall whereof are next the great Temple; as Scriueners, Booke-sellers, &c. euery Trade by themselues.

The Christian captiues rest only vpon Fridayes; and eight other dayes in the yeere Festiual to the Moores. There are six hundred Fountaines walled about, the waters whereof are conueyed by Conduits to the Temples, or other places, because the Riuer is sometimes dry. They haue in Fez a Iudge for Criminal Causes, and another for Questions of Religion; a third, that deales in Matrimoniall Cases: From these there lyeth an Appeale to the high Aduocate.

The Iudges of Mahomets Law, in matters of conscience, haue no allowance for the same. Their Marriages are thus: When the Father of the Maide hath espoused her to her a Louer, they goe with their friends to Church, and haue with them two Notaries, which draw the Couenants agreed betwixt them, into writing. The Father bestowes a Dowrie or Portion of Money, Apparell, and such like; seldome, of Land. When the Bridegroome fetcheth her home, she is set in a Cabinet, couered with silke, and carried by Porters, accompanied with her kinsfolkes, and much Minstrelsie; and the Bridegroomes friends goe before with Torches, and her kinsmen after, toward the great Church. Then hee hasteth home, expecting his Bride in his Chamber; whom her Father, Brother, and Vncle, bring and deliuer to his Mother; and he setting his foot on hers, shuts the Chamber doore: at which a woman standeth, and receiueth of him a Napkin stayned; which she sheweth to the Assembly, as a testimony of the Brides Virginitie: But if shee bee not found a Maide, shee is returned to her Friends with shame, and the guests goe home without their Feast. They hold great feasting also at the Circumcision of their male-children, which is the seuenth day after they are borne. The Barber or Circumciser is presented with gifts of all the inuited guests. Then followeth mirth and iollity. They vse dancings; but the women apart by themselues without men.

a The man neuer seeth his Bride before Marriage: but sends his Mother, or some other Woman, to see her; and vpon that report agreeth with the Father.

There is a remaynder of Holidayes instituted by the Christians, which themselues vnderstand not. On Christmas Euen they eat a Sallet made of diuers herbes, and seethe all kinds of Pulse which they feed vpon. On New-yeeres day, the children goe with Maskes on their faces to the houses of Gentlemen, and haue Fruits giuen them, for singing certaine Songs. On the Feast of Saint Iohn Baptist, they vse to make Bone-fires. They make a Feast called Dentilla (when their childrens teeth begin to grow) vnto other children. When a man dyes, the women put on Sack-cloth, and defile their faces with dirt. They call to them those wicked men in womens attire, which haue foure-square Drummes, to the sound whereof, they sing mournfull Ditties, in prayse of the dead party. At the end of euery Verse the women vtter most hideous shrikes and out-cries, tearing their haire, and beating their brests and cheekes, till they be all embrued with bloud. And thus they continue seuen dayes, and then intermit their mourning forty dayes; after which space, they resume the same for three dayes, as before. But the better sort behaue themselues more modestly. At this time all the Widdowes friends come about her to comfort her, and send her diuers kindes of meats; for in the mourning-house they may dresse no meate at all, till the dead be carried out. The woman which loseth her Father, Brother, or Husband, neuer goes forth with the Funerall. At some Festiuals, the Youths of one Street will fight with Clubs against the Boyes of another Street, and sometimes betake them to other Weapons, and kill one another. Sometimes they vse these bloudy Frayes without the City, the Officers forcing them to better order. There are many Poets, which pen amorous Sonets: and on Mahomets Birth-day, make Verses in his commendation, resorting early to the Palace, and there ascending the Tribunall, reade their Verses to the people; and he whose Verses are best, is pronounced that yeere Prince of Poets. The Marin King on that day vsed to entertaine the learned men; and to reward the best Poet with a hundred Ducats, a Horse, a Woman-slaue, and the Kings Robes which hee wore that day.

In Fez are two hundred Grammar Schooles, built like great Hals. Euery day they learne one lesson of the Alcoran. They reade and write not in Bookes, but in great b Tables. In seuen yeeres they learne the whole Alcoran by heart. And then the Father inuiteth his Sonnes Schoole-fellowes to a Banquet: and his Sonne rides through the street in costly apparell, both which are lent by the Gouernour. The other Boyes ride and sing Songs in prayse of God and Mahumet. On Mahumets Birth-day euery Boy must carry a Torch to Schoole curiously wrought, some weighing thirty pound, which they light before day, and let them burne till Sun-rising, singing all the while the prayses of Mahumet. The Schoolemasters haue the remnant of the Waxe, which sometimes they sell for a hundred Ducats. They are free Schooles anciently built. In the Schooles, and also in the Colledges, they haue two dayes of recreation euery weeke, wherein they neither teach nor studie.

b These tables are boords like Horn-bookes: when one lesson is learned, that is wiped out, and another written; & so throughout the Alcoran, till all bee learned.

§. III.

Of their Diuiners and Sects, and other parts of the Fezan Territorie.

THere be three kinds of Fortune-tellers or Diuiners. One of which vseth Geomanticall figures; others, powre a drop of Oyle into a glasse of water, which becommeth cleere as a Seeing-glasse, in which they say they see strange sights, rankes of Deuils, like Armies, some trauelling, some passing ouer a Riuer, &c. When the Diuiner seeth them quiet, he demandeth such questions of them as he will, and the Deuils with gestures returne answere. The third sort are Women-witches, which make the people beleeue, that they are acquainted with Deuils of diuers sorts, red, white, blacke: and when they will tell any mans fortune, they perfume themselues with certaine Odours, whereby (as they say) the Deuill entreth into them, and their voyce is presently altered, as if the Deuill spake within them. And then they that come to enquire, aske their questions, and so hauing left their present for the Deuill, depart.

a A female filthinesse.

These [a] women vse vnlawfull lusts betweene themselues in mutuall filthinesse: & if faire women come to them, they wil demand the Deuils fee, that they may haue such dealing with them. Yea, some addicting themselues to these abominable practices, will faine themselues sicke, and send to one of these Witches, which will affirme, That shee is possessed with a Deuill, and cannot be cured, except she become one of their Societie. The foolish Husband beleeues, consents, and makes a sumptuous Feast at her Deuillish Admission. Others will coniure this Deuill with a Cudgell out of their Wiues: others fayning themselues to bee possessed with a Deuill, will deceiue the Witches, as they haue deceiued their Wiues. There are Exorcists, or Diuiners, called Muhazzimi, which cast out Deuils; or if they cannot, they excuse themselues, and say it is an ayrie Spirit. They write Characters, and frame Circles, on an ash-heape, or some other place: then they make certaine signes on the hands or foreheads of the possessed party, and perfume him after a strange manner. Then they make their Inchantment, and demand of the Spirit, which way he entred, what he is, and his name; and then command him to come forth. Others there are that worke by a Cabalisticall rule, called Zairagia, and is very hard; for he that doth this, must be a perfect Astrologer and Cabalist. My selfe (it is Leo's report) haue seene a whole day spent, in describing one figure onely. It is too tedious here to expresse the manner. Howbeit, Mahomets Law forbids all Diuination; and therefore the Mahumetan Inquisitors imprison the Professors thereof.

There are also in Fez some Learned men, which giue themselues the sirnames of Wisemen, and Morall Philosophers, which obserue Lawes not prescribed by Mahumet: some account them Catholike; others, not; but the vulgar hold them for Saints. The Law forbiddeth Loue-songs, which they say may be vsed. They haue many Rules and Orders, all which haue their Defenders and Doctors. This Sect sprang vp fourescore yeeres after Mahumet; the first Authour thereof was Elhesen Ibnu Abilhasen, who gaue Rules to his Disciples, but left nothing in writing. About an hundred yeeres after, came Elharit Ibnu Esed, from Bagadet, who left Volumes of Writings vnto his Disciples; but by the Lawyers was condemned. Fourescore yeeres after, vnder another famous Professor, that Law reuiued, who had many Disciples, and preached openly. But by the Patriarke and Lawyers they were all condemned to lose their heads the giddie Receptacles of such phantasticall Deuotions.) But hee obtayned leaue of their Chaliph, or Patriarch, that he might try his Assertions, by Disputations with the Lawyers; whom he put to silence: and therefore the Sentence was reuoked, and many Colledges built for his Followers. An hundred yeeres after, Malicsach the Turke destroyed all the maintayners thereof, some flying into Cairo, some into Arabia. Not long after, Elgazzuli a learned man compounded the Controuersie; so reconciling these and the Lawyers, that the one should be called Conseruers, the other Reformers of the Law. After the Tartars had sacked Bagdat, in the yeere of the Hegeira 656. these Sectaries swarmed all ouer Asia and Africa. They would admit none into their Societie, but such as were learned, and could defend their Opinions: but now they admit all, affirming [b] Learning to be needlesse; for the Holy teacheth them that haue a cleane heart. Therefore they addict themselues to nothing but Pleasure, Feasting, and Singing. Sometimes they will rend their garments, saying, They are then rauished with a fit of Diuine loue. I thinke rather superfluitie of belly-cheare is the cause; for one of them will eate as much as will serue three: Or else it is through wicked lust; for sometimes one of the Principals, with all his Disciples, is inuited to some Marriage-feast; at the beginning whereof, they will rehearse their deuout Orizons and Songs: but after after they are risen from Table, the elder beginne a Dance, and teare their garments; and if through immoderate drinking, any catch a fall, one of the youths presently take him vp, and wantonly kisse him: Whereupon ariseth the Prouerbe, The Heremits Banquet; signifying, that the Scholler becomes his Masters Minion: for none of them may marry, and they are called Heremites.

Among these Sects in Fez are some Rules esteemed Hereticall, of both sorts of Doctors. Some hold, That a man by good Workes, Fasting, and Abstinence, may attaine to the nature of an Angell, the Vnderstanding and Heart being thereby so purified (say they) that a man cannot sinne, though he would: But to this height is ascended by fiftie steps of Discipline; and though they fall into sinne before they come into the fiftieth Degree, yet will not God impute it. They vse strange and incredible Fastings in the beginning, but after, take all the pleasures of the World. They haue a seuere forme of liuing set downe in foure Bookes, by a certaine learned man, called Esschrauer de Sehrauard in Corasan. Likewise, another of their Authors, called Ibnul Farid, wrote all his Learning in witty Verses, full of Allegories, seeming to treat of Loue. Wherefore one Elsargano commented on the same, and thence gathered the Rule and the Degrees aforesaid. In three hundred yeeres none hath written more elegant Verses; which therefore they vsed in all their Banquets. They hold, that the Heauens, Elements, Planets, and Starres, are one God; and that no Religion is erronious, because euery one takes that which he worships, for God. They thinke, that all knowledge of God is contained in one Man, called Elcorb, elect by God, and wise as he. Forty among them are called Elauted, which signifieth Blocks. Of these is Elcath or Elcorb elected, when the former is dead; threescore and ten Electors make the choice. There are seuen hundred threescore and fiue others, out of whom, those threescore and ten Electors are chosen. The Rule of their Order binds them to range vnknowne through the World, either in manner of Fooles, or of great Sinners, or of the vilest man that is. Thus some wicked persons of them goe vp and downe naked, shamefully shewing their shame, and like brute beasts will sometimes haue carnall dealings with women in the open streets; reputed neuertheless by the common people for Saints, [c] as we haue shewed elsewhere. There is another sort called Caballists, which fast strangely, eate not the flesh of any liuing creature: but haue certaine meates and habits appointed ~~for euery houre of the day~~, and of the night; and ~~certaine~~ set ~~Prayers according to~~ the dayes and monethes, strictly obseruing the numbers of them; and carry square Tables, with Characters and Numbers engrauen in them. They say, that good Spirits appeare to them, and talke with them, instructing them in the knowledge of all things. There was amongst them a famous Doctor, called Boni, which composed their Rule and Orders, whose Booke I haue seene, seeming more to sauour of Magicke then the Cabala. Their notablest works are eight. The first, called Demonstration of Light, contayneth Fastings and Prayers. The second, their square Tables. The third, fourescore and nineteene Vertues in the Name of God contayned, &c.

They haue another Rule among these Sects, called Suuab, the Rule of Heremits; the Professors whereof inhabite Woods and solitary Places, without any other sustinance then those Desarts affoord. None can describe their life, because they are estranged from all humane Societie.

He that would see more of these things, let him reade the Booke of one Elefacui, who writeth at large of the Mahumetan Sects; whereof are threescore and twelue principall, each mayntaining his owne for Truth, and the way to Saluation. Two are most predominant in these dayes; that of Loshari in Africa, Egypt, Syria, Arabia, and Turkie and the other of Imamia in Persia, and Corasan, more lately broched. Although I haue spoken before of the Saracen Sects, yet could I not but follow Leo in his reports of them heere. As for those Coniurers, which by Art Magicke professe to find Gold, which indeed lose Gold to find it: and the Alchymists, which seeking to turne other metals into Gold, turne their Gold into other metals, and the Bookes that both these haue of their Sciences: likewise the Snake-charmers, and other baser people, I passe ouer.

[d] Gold-finders and Alchymists.

In the Suburbs of Fez are an hundred and fifty Caues, hewne out of excellent Marble, the least of which will hold a thousand measures of Corne. This is the sinke of Fez where euery one may be a Vintner and a Bawde. Another Suburbe hath two hundred Families of Lepers, which are there prouided for: and all of that quality forced to keepe there.

In new Fez the Iewes haue a street, wherein they haue their Houses, Shoppes, and Synagogues: and are maruellously encreased since they were driuen out of Spaine. They are Goldsmiths for the Mahumetans may not bee of that Trade, because they say it is Vsury to sell things made of Gold or Siluer for more then their weight; which yet is permitted to the Iewes. They liue in exceeding contempt, not being permitted to weare shooes, but in stead thereof vse sockes made of Rushes. They weare a blacke Turbant, and if any will weare a Cap,

A note for Vsurers.

Cap, he must fasten a red cloth thereunto. They payed to the King of Fez monethly in Leo's time one thousand and foure hundred Ducats.

The Mahumetan temporall Lords are not by their Law to hold any other reuenue, then of euery subiect which possesseth an hundred Ducats, two and a halfe for Tribute, and of Corne the tenth measure yeerely. Yea, this is to be payed into the Patriarch or Califs hand, who should bestow that which remayneth ouer and aboue the Princes necessitie, on the common profit; as, for the poore, and maintenance of Warres. But now the Princes haue tyrannized further, especially in Africa, where they haue not left the people sufficient for their needments. And therefore Courtiers are odious (no lesse then the Publicans sometimes among the Iewes) no man of credit vouchsafing to inuite them to their Tables, or receiue gifts from them; esteeming all their goods theft and bribery. Nor may any Mahumetan Prince weare a Diademe, which yet it seemes is now broken.

In Gualili a Towne of Mount Zarhon is Idris, of whom before is spoken, buried; all Barbary religiously visiteth his Sepulchre. Pharao is the name of a Towne, by the vulgar supposed the worke of Pharao, which fond conceit grew from a Booke, entituled, The Booke of the words of Mahomet, taken out of an Author, called Elcalbi, which sayth with Mahomets testimony, that there were foure Kings which ruled all the World; Two faithfull, and two vnfaithfull: the two former, Salomon and Alexander Magnus: the two later, Nimrod and Pharao. The Latine Inscriptions there seene, shew it was the worke of the Romans.

Tame Lions. In Piatra Rossa a Towne by, the Lyons are so tame, that they will gather vp bones in the streets, the people not fearing them. The like Lions are in Guraigura, where one may driue them away with a staffe. At Agla, the Lions are so fearefull, that they will flee at the voice of a child; whence a Coward Braggart is Prouerbially called a Lion of Agla.

Shame is the name of a Castle, so called of their shamefull couetousnesse; which, when they once requested the King (then entertained amongst them) to change, he consented. But the next morning, when they had brought him vessels of Milke, halfe filled vp with water, hoping the King would not perceiue it, hee said that none could alter nature, and so left them, and their name to them.

§. IIII.

Of the fiue other Prouinces of this Kingdome, and some later Obseruations.

WE haue now passed two Prouinces of the Kingdome of Fez: the third is named Azgar, which hath the Riuers Buragrag, on the West; Bunasar, on the South, the Ocean, on the North; and Eastward, the Mountaines. Here standeth Casar Elcabir, which King Mansor gaue to a poore Fisher, who had giuen him kinde entertainment in his Cottage one night when he had lost his company in hunting. In it are many Temples, one Colledge of Students, and a stately Hospitall. Habat, the fourth Prouince or Shire of this Kingdome, is next hereunto, and contayneth almost an hundred miles in length, and fourescore in breadth. Ezaggen, a Towne of Fez, are permitted by an ancient Priuiledge of the Kings of Fez to drinke Wine, notwithstanding Mahomets prohibition. Arzilla, sayth Leo, was taken by the English, then worshippers of Idols, about nine hundred yeeres after Christ. The Religion, I thinke, deceiues him. He addes, that the Towne remayned without habitation thirty yeeres, and then one of the Mahumetan Patriarches of Cordoua, then Lord of Mauritania, reedified it. Of the acte of the English is not vnworthy the rehearsing, m. That Seut or Ceuta (there written Sunt) was taken by the Portugals, through the assistance of English Merchants, Anno 1415. Iulian, the Earle of Seut, brought the Moores first into Spaine, in the yeere of the Hegeira 92. In it were many Temples, Colledges, and learned men.

m Walsingham hist. Hen. 5.

Errif begins at the Straits of Gibraltar, and stretcheth Eastward to the Riuer Nocor an 140. miles. The Inhabitants are valiant, but are excessiue drinkers. Mezemme and Bedis, or Velles de Gumera, are chiefe Townes in it. On Mount Beni Ierso was built a faire Colledge, and the Mahumetan Law publikely taught therein: the Inhabitants therefore freed from all exactions. A Tyrant destroyed this Colledge, and slue the learned men. The Books therein were valued worth foure thousand Ducats. This was Anno 1509. In Mount Beni Guazeual is a hole, that perpetually casteth vp fire; Wood cast in, is suddenly consumed to ashes: some thinke it Hel-mouth. In Mount Beni Mesgalda, were maintained many Mahumetan Doctors, ctors, and Students, which would perswade the people to drinke no wine, which themselues will not abstaine from.

Garet, the sixt Shire of this Kingdome, lyeth betweene the Riuers Meluia and Muluia. The seuenth is Chauz, reputed the third part of the Kingdome, betweene the Riuer Zha and Guruigara. Herein standeth Tezza, adorned with Colledges, Temples, and Palaces. A little Riuer springing out of Atlas runnes thorow the chiefe Temple, which is greater then that at Fez. There are three Colledges, and many Bathes and Hospitals. Each Trade dwelleth by themselues, as at Fez. I was acquainted (saith Leo) with an aged Sire in this Citie, reputed a Saint, and enriched exceedingly with the peoples offerings. From Fez did the people resort to visit him with their offerings, which is fiftie miles: he seemed to me to be a deceiuer. In Mount Beni Iesseten are many Iron mines, and the women in great braueric weare Iron rings on their fingers and eares. Ham Lisnan was built by the Africans, and borrowed the name from the Fountayne of an Idoll, whose Temple was neere the Towne: to which at certayne times in the yeere resorted men and women in the night: where, after sacrifices, the candles were put out, and each man lay with the woman hee first touched. Those women were forbidden to lye with any other for a yeere after. The children begotten in this adulterie, were brought vp by Priests of the Temple. The Moores destroyed this holy-stewes, and the Towne, not leauing any mention thereof. In Mount Centopozzi are ancient buildings, and neere thereto a spacious hole, or drie pit, with many roomes therein: they let men downe into the same by ropes with lights, which if they goe out, they perish in the pit. Therein are many Bats which strike out their lights. In the Mountaynes of Zuz there are Serpents so tame, that at dinner time they will come like Dogs and Cats, and gather vp the crummes, not offering to hurt any.

Thus much of the kingdome of Fez out of Leo, a learned Citizen of Fez, and great Trauueller, both in the Places and Authors of Afrike: whom Ortelius, Maginus, Botarus follow, commended by [a] Bodinus, Possevinus, and others, as the most exact Writer of those parts, and translated into English by Master Pory, from whom if I swarue in diuers things, impute it to the Italian copie of Ramusius, which differeth not a little, especially in these things I haue here set downe, from the English.

I thought good here also to adde out of others some such customs and rites as they obserue in Fez, and other parts of this Kingdome: [b] Their Circumcision is vsed in their priuate houses. Women may not enter the Moschee for their often vncleanesse, and because Eue first sinned. The eight day after a childe is borne, the parents send for a Talby or Priest, and some old men and women, where after a few prayers said, the women wash the childe all ouer with water, and giue the name, making a banquet. But sometimes the circumcision is deferred diuers yeeres after this ceremonie, as the Fathers thinke.

Their Fasts they obserue very strictly, not so much as tasting water till the starres appeare. Yea, diuers haue beene seene, by their rigour, in this superstition to faint, and some to die. A certayne Moore in the time of their Lent (which continueth thirtie dayes) in the companie of an English Gentleman, being thirstie with heat and trauell, went to a conduit in Marocco (where the same Religion is professed as in Fez) and there drinking, was so reuiled of the people, that in a desperate anguish hee slue himselfe with his dagger. Yet doth their Law allow an exchange some dayes of this Lent, with other dayes in the yeere following, if trauell then hinder. Their Feasts and Fasts are at the same times, and in the same maner that the Turkes obserue, of which is before spoken. Their Easter they call Rumedan: their Whitsuntide, Lidlaber: their Michaelmasse, Lashour: their Candlemasse, Lidshemaw: (if it be lawfull I thus to paralell those vaine superstitions with Christian obseruations. In this last Feast, which seemeth to bee the same which Leo calls Mahomets birth-day, euery one must haue a candle for himselfe, and for euery sonne in his house. The King hath that day candles carried to him, some like May-poles, other like Castles, sixe or eight men carrying one of them: so artificially composed, that some are in making six moneths. That night the King doth heare all the Law read: the like is done in all other Churches. The Talby that cannot reade all their Law in a night, is held insufficient for his place. They goe (saith my Author) sixe times in foure and twentie houres (which is once oftner then is written of the Turkes, except on their Sabbath) to their prayers, first washing themselues, as they doe also after the offices of nature, and after companie with their wiues, thinking thereby to be washed from their sinnes. Their times of prayer are, two houres before day, the first, when the Mouden, or Sexten cryeth in the Steeple (as you may reade in our Turkish Relations) and then may no man touch his wife, but prepare himselfe to pray (with washing or other deuotion) either in his owne house or at Church. After their publike prayers, the Talby sits downe, and spends halfe an houre in resoluing the doubts of such as shall moouе any questions in matters of their Law. The second time of prayer is two houres after, when it is day. The third at noone. The fourth at foure foure of the clocke in the afternoone. The fift at the twi-light. The last, two houres after. In the first of these they pray for the day; in the second they giue thankes for it; in the third time they giue thankes for that it is halfe passed; in the fourth they desire the Sunne may well set on them; at twi-light they giue thanks after their daily labours, the last time, they desire a good night. They thinke it vnseemely to eate meat with their left hands, and hold it vncleane, and doe all with their right hand. Their Sabbath or Friday is not exempted from worke: Onely they are then more deuout in going to Church.

Their Churches are not so faire generally as in Christendome, nor haue seats in them, ornaments, or bells: (onely the floores are matted) they are also poore for the most part, as are their Church men. Their Lyturgie is very short, not so long as the Pater noster and Creede: other set forme they haue not, but euery one prayes after his owne pleasure. Although the Moore may haue foure wiues, and as many concubines as hee can purchase, yet few marry foure, because the wiues friends will haue a sufficient bill of dowrie for her maintenance, which none but rich men can performe: and againe, the wiues challenge his nights companie, and that in course: if any be neglected, shee complaines to the Magistrate, and he forceth the husband to his dutie, or else to send her home with her Dower, and a Bill of diuorce. The Concubines are embraced with more stolne pleasures. That bill of Dower holdeth the husband in awe, which else would make a slaue of his wife, or still change for yonger flesh. The Bride is bedded before her husband see her: and if hee finde her not a Virgin, hee may turne her home and keepe her portion by Law. For their funerall Rites; when one is dead, they presently wash him, and speedily put him into ground (the heat so requiring) and after that, the women at conuenient times haue a custome to meete, and make memoriall of their deceased friends, with remembrance of their vertues, which they thinke caused men to haue more respect to their good name. Their other obsequies are before declared. The King vseth to sit in Iudgement on Fridayes in the afternoone: and the Mufti sitteth with him at other times in Iudgement: but on the Friday he sits alone by himselfe. Of these Mufties are three, one at Marocco; another at Fez; the third, at Taradant in Sus, another part of this Seriffian Kingdome. Other Iudges sit all the yeere long two houres before noone, and as many after. Before these euery one pleades his owne cause: and if the witnesses can bee proued to bee infamous of life, or not to say their prayers fixe times a day, their testimonie is disabled. The Scriuanos are Falbies, which assist the Iudge, and in his absence supply his place. The Fokers or Saints (Leo before calls them Heremites) dwell in the best places of the Countrey, keepe great hospitalitie for all trauellers, whither any man may come for a night, and be gone in the morning. They giue great example of morall liuing, and almes to the needie, comprimising matters of difference betwixt parties, and repressing disorders. They are much loued and respected, and their houses are holden Sanctuaries, whose priuiledges the King will not breake, but vpon waightie reasons.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Kingdome of Marocco, with a Discourse of the Kings thereof, and of the Seriffe, Xarif, or Iarif, and his posteritie, now reigning in Barbarie.

§. I.

Of the Kingdome, Kings, and Citie of Marocco.

THE Kingdome is situate * betweene Atlas and the Atlantike Ocean, bearing name of the chiefe Citie thereof; fruitfull of Corne, Oile, Grapes, Sugar, Honey, and Cattell. They make fine cloth of Goats haire, and of their hides that leather * which hence is called Marocchine. This Kingdome is diuided into seuen Prouinces, through which we intend our next perambulation, taking Leo b for our guide: beginning at Hea, which on the North and West hath the Ocean, Atlas on the South, and the River Essimal on the East. The people feede on Cakes of barley, and on a pappe or hastie-pudding of barley-meale, which being set in a platter, all the familie compasse about, and rudely with Natures spoones claw forth those dainties. Naperie they vse none, a Mat laid on the ground, serueth for table and cloth, and stoole too. Caps are the priuiledges of age and learning. Linnen shirts are almost banished their Countrey:

Countrey: and so are Arts liberall and mechanicall, except some simple Lawyer, which can make some shift to reade, and a Surgeon to circumcise their children: Their physicke is cauterizing as men deale with beasts. They are alway in mutuall warres one with another, yet will not they iniurie a stranger, who if he would trauell amongst them, must take some harlot or wife, or religious man, of the aduerse part with him. At Tedneſt, one of their Cities, such respect is had to strangers, that if a Merchant come hither, and hath no acquaintance, the Gentlemen of the Citie cast lots, who shall be his Host, and they vse him kindly, looking only for some Present at his departure, in token of thankfulnesse. And if he be a meaner person, he may choose his Host, without any recompence at all. In the midst of the Citie was a great and ancient Temple, with many Priests attending their deuotions; besides other meaner Oratories. This Citie hath since been ruined and desolate. In Teculeth were a thousand households, foure Hospitals, one beautifull Temple, and a house of religious persons: destroyed it was by the Portugals, An. 1514. as Hadecchis had beene the yeere before. Ileusugaghen is another Towne of Hea, or of Hell rather, so full is it of confusion, bloud, and murthers, besides the want of Learning, Ciuilitie, Iudges, Priests, or whatsoeuer else may detayne those men from a beastly or deuillish metamorphosis. The Seriff, being made a Prince of Hea, brought me thither to be a Iudge, but for feare of treason amongst them, we were glad to leaue them. How farre off in manners is their neere neighbour Telegdelt? where a guard is set at the gates not so much to keepe out enemies, as to entertayne strangers, whom at his first comming they aske if he haue any friends in the Citie: if not, they must prouide him entertainment at free-cost. They haue a most beautifull Temple, furnished with Priests. Tagleſſe, the next Towne, is a den of theeues and murtherers. When I was there, such a swarme of Locusts ouer-spred the Countrey (that scarce might a man see the earth) eating vp their fruits.

Culeihat was built of a certaine Sectarie in our time, first a Preacher, attended with troupes of disciples, after, a cruell and mercileſſe Tyrant, murthered at last by one of his wiues, for lying with her daughter: and then his villanies being manifested, the people put all his followers to the sword. Onely a nephew of his fortified himselfe in a Castle, which he held maugre all their might, and burying his grand-father, caused him to be adored as a Saint. Homar Seÿf was the name of that Rebell. The other parts of Hea are like the former, some exceeding hospitall and courteous, some brutish, without diuine or humane learning or liuing. Great store of Iewes liue here, and in Mount Demensera are of those Iewes which are called * Carraum, of the rest accounted Sectaries. These reiect the Traditions, and hold them onely to the written Scriptures (as in our Iewish relation yee haue read.) In Mount Gebel Ihadih are many Heremites, which liue on fruits of trees, and water, so reputed of the simple people, that all their doings are accounted miracles.

Homar, a Preacher, Tyrant and Saint.

Sus is the second Region of this Kingdome, lying Southward from hence on the other side of Atlas, so called of that Riuer which is the Easterne border thereof, otherwhere bounded with the Sea and the Desarts. At Messa neere the Sea side is a Temple holden in great veneration. Many Historians affirme, that from this Temple shall come that iust Califa, of whom Mahumet prophecied. There also they say the Whale vomited vp Ionas. The rafters and beames of the Temple are of Whales bones, which vsually are left there dead on the shore. This the common people esteeme to proceede from some diuinitie of that Temple: but the true cause is certaine sharpe Rocks a little off in the Sea. I my selfe was inuited by a Gentleman, who shewed me a Whales ribbe, so huge, that lying on the ground in manner of an arch, vnder it, as it were thorow a gate, we rode on our Camels, our heads not reaching to touch it. It had beene there kept an hundred yeers for a wonder. Amber is there found in abundance, which some thinke proceedes from the Whales, as either the ordure, or the sperme, and seede thereof. Teiient is a Citie of Sus, wherein is a great Temple, and an arme of a Riuer passeth thorow the same. There are many Iudges and Priests, whom in their Ecclesiasticall affaires they obey. Tarodant hath three thousand Families: sometimes the place where the Kings Lieutenant or Deputie resideth. Tedsi is much greater, adorned also with a Temple, and furnished with Priests and Ministers: Iudges and Lecturers payed at the common charge. In Mount Hanchisa it snowes in all seasons of the yeere, and yet the Inhabitants goe thinly clothed in the sharpest winter.

The Region of Marocco is three-square: confined with the mountaynes Nefisa, on the West; and Hadimeus, on the East; betweene the Riuers Tensift, and Esifinuall. The Countrey in fertilitie of soile resembleth Lombardie. Marocco (which some thinke to be Bocanus Hemerus of Ptolemey) was built (saith Leo) by Ioseph sonne of Tesfin, King of the people of Lontuna, by the aduice of excellent Architects, and cunning workmen. In the time of Hali sonne of Ioseph, there were in it ten thousand Fires or Families, and more. It had foure and twentie gates: was strongly walled: furnished with Temples, Bathes, Colledges, Innes, after the African manner. One moſt ſtately Temple was built by Hali, and called by his name. But a ſucceſſor of that kingdom, called Abdul Mumen, cauſed it to be razed, and built againe, and called after his owne name, howbeit the name of Hali is ſtill continued in the Title, all that his coſt notwithſtanding. This Abdul Mumen, who was the ſecond that by rebellion ſucceeded in the kingdome, built another Temple, which Manſor enlarged fiftie yards or elles on euery ſide, adorning it with many pillars fetcht out of Spaine. He made a Ciſterne or Vault built vnder it, as large as the Temple it ſelfe; and couered the Temple with lead, with leaden pipes from the roofe, to conuey the raine-water that fell thereon, into the Ciſterne. He built thereon a ſteeple like the Coliſeo or Amphitheatre at Rome, of great hewen ſtone. The compaſſe of this ſteeple or tower is an hundred Tuſcan yards or elles, higher then the ſteeple of Aſenelli at Bononia. There are ſeuen lofts one aboue another, very faire and light-ſome. Vpon the top of this tower is built a little turret, the top whereof is as a needle or ſpire; and it contayneth fiue and twentie yards in compaſſe, and is as high as two great lances, with three lofts therein, one higher then the other. On the top of this ſpire is a broach with three globes of ſiluer one vnder another, the greateſt below, and the leaſt higheſt. From the top hereof the Mountaynes of Azafi may bee eaſily ſeene, an hundred and thirtie miles off; and a tall man on the ground ſeemes as little as a childe of a yeere old. The plaine Countrey fiftie miles about is hence diſcerned. It is one of the greateſt Temples in the world; and yet not frequented; the people aſſembling thither to their deuotions, but on Fridayes: the Citie it ſelfe neere this Temple is ruinate, ſo that the paſſage is difficult by the ruines of houſes. Vnder the porch or gallerie of this Temple were ſometimes an hundred ſhops of Booke-ſellers, and as many ouer-againſt them, but now * there is not one in all Marocco: Scarcely is the third part of the Citie inhabited (vnderſtand it of the time when Leo writ this; for ſince that time Marocco by reſidence of the Kings there, hath flouriſhed, as Fez hath contrariwiſe decayed) the reſt being planted with Vines and Trees, the Arabians not ſuffering them to exerciſe any husbandrie without the walls. It was built An. 424. of the Hegira. After Ioſeph the Founder, and Hali his ſonne, Abraham ſucceeded, in whoſe time, a rebellious Preacher called Elmaheli, borne and brought vp in the Mountaynes, rebelled: and with an armie encountred King Abraham, and ouerthrew him. The King fled, and was ſo hardly purſued by Abdul Mumen, whom Elmaheli had ſent after him, whiles himſelfe beſieged Marocco, that the poore King, in danger to bee ſurprized at Oram, mounting on his horſe, and taking his wife behinde him, ſet ſpurres to his horſe, and ſo came all three downe together on the mereileſſ Rocks. Abdul Mumen returning victorious, found this addition to his happineſſe, that Elmaheli was dead, and himſelfe was choſen King and Prelate (or Chalipha) by the fortie Diſciples, and ten Secretaries of Elmaheli; a new cuſtome in the Mahumetan Law. He maintayned the ſiege, and at the yeeres end, entred by force, and tooke Iſaac, the little and onely ſonne of Abraham, and ſtabbed him with his owne hands, killing moſt of the Souldiers hee there found, and many of the Citizens. His poſteritie reigned after him, from An. 516. of the Hegeira, to the 668. at which time the Familie of Marin depriued them, in which the Kingdome continued till the 785. yeere. Then the ſame decreaſing in power, Marocco became ſubiect to certaine Lords of the old Hill, neere to the Citie. But of none receiued they ſo much damage, as of the Marin Familie, which held their Court in Fez, and had a Lieutenant onely in Marocco; Fez being made chiefe Citie of Mauritania.

* An. Dom. 1526.

Let me borrow of *Cæl. Sec. Curio in his Hiſtorie of the Kingdome of Marocco, which (for the moſt part) is taken out of Leo. He ſaith, that Abdul Mumen ſubiected to his Empire all Barbarie, from Meſſa to Tripolis; his Empire in Africa comprehending fourſcore and ten dayes iourney in length, and fifteene in bredth. He alſo poſſeſſed the kingdome of Granada in Spaine, ſometime called Betica, and from Tariffa to Tarracon, and a great part of Caſtilia and Portugall. Neither had he alone this large Empire, but his * ſonne Ioſippus after him, Iacobus Manſor his nephew, and their poſteritie, till Mahumet Enaſir, who, Anno 1212. in the kingdome of Valencia was ouerthrowne of Alphonſus (as I take it) the ninth King of Caſtile, in that place which is called Las nauas di Toloſa; loſing in the battell threeſcore thouſand men. In memorie of which battell and victorie, that Alphonſus adorned his Scutchion with a Caſtle Or, in a field purple: which cuſtome his ſucceſſors doe ſtill obſerue, becauſe that day that golden kingdome, as a ſtrong Caſtle, confirmed to him by the bloud of his enemies, was deliuered from thoſe Miſcreants. And thereupon, that kingdome of the Baſtitanes (ſo it was before that time ſtiled) was intituled Caſtile. Moreouer, hee inſtituted that knightly Order of Saint Iames, who haue in their habit purtrayed a purple ſword, in token of bloud. This Mahumet our Hiſtorians call Miramulinus. For Abdul Mumen intituled himſelfe Miralmumim, the name ſignifying, The Prince of beleeuers, which others corrupting, call Miramulin, as they did him Abed Ramon. Howſoeuer, it ſtanderh for the Name and Armes of Caſtile; certainly Curio was not curious, nor carefull enough in adding, that this Abdul Mumen was in the time of Rodericus the Gotish King, about seuen hundred yeeres after Christ, as also in his Saracenicall Historie he relateth, and wee before haue obserued, seeing that Marocco was long after built, and diuers hundreths of yeeres were interposed betwixt Rodericus, and this Abdul Mumen; Curio herein [b] differing not onely from Leo, his best guide in the rest of his Historie, but from himselfe, as will easily appeare to any that list to compare his Saracenicall Historie with the Marochian. And for that notable victory against the Moores, Rodericus Archbishop of Toledo was there present [c] in the field, and saith that the King ware a blacke Cap, which had belonged to Abdul Mumen, the first of the Almohades, and had by him the Alcoran. This Abdelmon or Abdel Mumen was (he writeth) the sonne of a Potter, to whom Auentumerth, a great Astronomer, foretold his Royaltie. To this Auentumerth [d] did one Almohadi ioyne himselfe, who interpreted the Alcoran contrary to the Bigdat Catholocisme, and the interpretations of the Almoranides which then ruled in Africa; whose helpe Abdel vsed to obtaine the Kingdome both of Africa and Spaine. Hee buried Almohadi being dead, very Royally, not farre from Marocco, where he is had in great veneration, and prayers made to him: and the followers of his sect called of him Almohadis. To Abdel Mumen succeeded his Sonne Auen Iacob, who being slaine in Portugall, his Brother Aueninseph succeeded; and then his Sonne, this Auen Mahomath; with whom, [e] he saith were slaine two hundred thousand Moores, the carkasses lying so thicke, that they could scarce ride ouer them; and yet in all the field no signe of bloud to be seene. For two dayes space the Spanish Armie burnt no wood for any vse, but the Arrowes, Launces and Pikes of the Moores, burning of purpose, and not onely for necessitie; and yet scarcely consumed halfe. With him perished the Almohades. Thus farre Rodericus an eye-witnesse, not much differing from Leo.

* Leo reckons them in this Order. Abdul, Ioſeph Manſor, Iacob Manſor, and this Mahomet Enaſir: whereas Curio ſeemes to inſinuate a longer line of poſteritie: theſe being all, directly and immediatly ſucceeding.

I cannot omit that which Mathew Paris [f] hath written of Iohn King of England about these times, and in his owne dayes. He sent, saith he, Thomas Herdinton and Radulph Fitz Nicolas Knights, and Robert of London Clarke, to Admirall Murmelius, King of Marocco, Africa, and Spaine, whom they commonly call Miramumelius, to make offer vnto him of his Vassalage, and that he would not onely hold the Land of him with payment of Tribute, but would also change his Religion, and accept the Mahumetan. The Embassadours hauing declared their message, the King (or Emire Elmumenin to call him rightly) shut vp the Booke whereon they found him reading, and after a little deliberation thus answered, I was now reading a Greeke Booke of a certaine wise man, and a Christian, called Paul, whose wordes and deeds well please me; this onely, I like not, that hee forsooke the Religion wherein he was borne, and vnconstantly embraced another: and the same I say of your Master. God Almightie knowes, that if I were without the Law, and now to chuse, This aboue all other should be my choise. And then, by diuers questions enforming himselfe better of the state of the Kingdome and of the King, he grew into great passion and indignation against the King, protesting that he thought him vnworthy to bee his Confederate, and commanded the Embassadours neuer more to see his face. The Author heard Robert of London, one of those which were sent, relate these things.

But to returne to our Marocchian buildings. In it is a great Castle, in the midst whereof is a faire Temple, and thereon a goodly Tower, and on the coppe of the same an iron broach, with three golden Globes weighing a hundred and thirtie thousand Barbarie Duckats, in forme like those before mentioned. Diuers Kings haue gone about to take downe the same, but alway some strange misfortune hath befalne them, whereby they haue beene forced to leaue their attempt. Insomuch that it is holden a signe of ill lucke to take them from thence. The vulgar conceit is, that some influence of the Planets is cause hereof. And also that Shee that set them there, by Art Magicke inchanted certaine spirits to a perpetuall Station there for to guard them. The people indeed are the spirits which in our time kept the Kings fingers from them, who else would haue aduentured all those phantasied dangers to haue possessed himselfe of the Gold for his Warres against the Portugals. The Wife of King Mansor is reported to haue set them there as a Monument of her memory, hauing solde her Iewels to purchase them. Adrianus [g] Romanus saith, that the Talosi Numidians, and all Barbary, come to Marocco, to study and learne Grammar, Poetry, Astrologie, and the Lawes. There is also in the said Castle a Colledge for the receit of Students, which hath thirtie Chambers, and beneath, a spacious Hall, where in old times Lectures were read: and all the Students had their expences allowed them, and rayment once a yeere: and the Readers for their stipend had, some a hundred Duckats, some two hundred, according to the qualitie of their profession. No man might be admitted into that Colledge which was not well instructed in the principles of Arts. The excellency of the matter and workmanship might well detaine vs longer in the view thereof, but that it is now rather become a Sepulcher of Sciences, then a Theater, there being not aboue fiue Students vnder a senceless Professor, left in Leos time, as the ghosts of those sometimes renowned numbers of Schollers. There were built also by Mansor twelue ſtately Palaces in the ſaid Caſtle, for his Guard, Officers, Armories, and other purpoſes fitting both Mars and Venus. There were alſo goodly and ſpacious Gardens, and a Parke with many kindes of wilde Beaſts, as Giraffes, Lyons, Elephants, &c. There was a Leopard made of Marble, the ſpottes not borrowed, but Natures handy-worke. But alaſſe, Deuouring Time, that ſwalloweth his owne off-ſpring, was not content to haue ingluted his inſatiable paunch with the fleſh of thoſe beaſts, and men, branded with Natures ſtampe of mortalitie; but euen thoſe curious and coſtly ſtones are now become graue-ſtones to themſelues, prouoking the beholders at once to haue compaſſion and amazement; the Reliques of laborious Art ſtill contending with Time, to teſtifie what greater excellence hath beene. The Garden is now become the Citie dung-hill, the Librarie in ſtead of Bookes is furniſhed with neſts of Doues, and other fowles. That ouerthrow which Mahomet the King of Marocco receiued in Spaine, was the occaſion of the ruine of that Family, which was furthered by his death, leauing behind him teene ſonnes which contended amongſt themſelues for the Kingdome, and ſlew one another. Hereupon the people of Marin entred into Fez, and poſſeſſed themſelues of that Kingdome: the Habdulud Nation ſeized on the Kingdome of Telenſin, and remouing the Gouernour of Tunis, made whom they pleaſed King. After the ruine of the Manſors Progeny, the Kingdome was tranſlated to Iacob, ſonne to Habdulach, firſt King of the Marin Family. Laſtly this Kingdome declining, the Arabians by continuall outrages haue further diſtreſſed it, forcing the people to what pleaſed them. Thus farre Leo: who ſaw not the influence of a Starre, euen in his dayes, in his eyes, and of his acquaintance, ariſing, which after in his exaltation brought a new alteration to Marocco, reſtoring it to the former ſplendour and all thoſe parts of Barbary: I meane the Seriffo, a name vſually giuen vnto ſuch as profeſſe themselues descended of Mahomets kindred, from whence also this wee speake of his deriued Pedegree. The historie I thinke here worthy to be inserted: the rather because this Western Starre is now declining, and by his fierie gleames, seemes to be neere his setting. And thus in effect doth Botterus [h] relate the same.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the Seriffian Familie.

ABout the yeere 1508 began to grow in name, through Numidia, a certaine Alfaique, borne in Tigumedet in the Prouince of Dara, beeing a subtill man, and no lesse ambitious in minde, then learned in those Sciences, whereunto the Mahumetanes are most addicted. Hee, by confidence of his bloud (descended of their Prophet), and of the diuisions of the States of Africa, and the exploits there dayly atchieued by the Portugals, attempted to make himselfe Lord of Mauritania Tingitana. For this cause hee sent his three Sonnes Abdel, Abnet, and Mahomet, to visit the Sepulchre of Mahomet. Much was the reuerence and reputation of holinesse, which they hereby acquired amongst that superstitious people, which now beheld them as Saints, and kissed their garments as most holy Reliques. These failed not in their parts of the play, to act as much deuotion, as high contemplatiue lookes, deepe fetched sighes, and other passionate interiections of holinesse could expresse. Ala, Ala, was their verntull note, their food was the peoples almes. The old Father ioying to see his projects thus farre proceed, and minding to strike whiles the Iron was hote, sent two of them to Fez, Amet, and Mahumet; where one of them was made Reader in the Amoderaccia, the most famous Colledge of Fez, and the younger was made Tutor to the Kings young sonnes. Aduanced thus in fauour of the King and People, by their Fathers aduice, they apprehended the present occasion of the harmes sustained by the Arabians and Moores vnder the Portugals Ensignes: they demanded Licence of the King to display a Banner against the Christians, putting him in hope easily to draw those Moores to him, and so to secure the Prouinces of Marocco. In vaine were Mulley Nazer the Kings brother his allegations, not to arme this Name of Sanctitie, which being once victorious, might grow insolent, and forget dutie in minding a Kingdome. They obtaine their desires, and with a Drum and Banner, with Letters of commendations to the Arabians and people of Barbary, they are so attended with forces and fortunes, that Ducala, and all as farre as Cape de Guer stoupes to their command: the people willingly yeelding their Tenths to this Holy warre against the Portugals, enemies of their Faith. Hereunto was added the ouerthrow which they gaue to Lopes Barriga, a famous Portugall Captaine, the brightnesse of that sun-shine being somewhat eclipsed with the losse of their elder brother, if rather a Monarchie were not hereby furthered. By faire words they entered into Marocco. The Arabians of Ducala and Xarquia, about this time trying their quarrels by dint of Sword in mutuall conflicts, presented a fit occasion to the Seriffs, to prey vpon them both; their strength hauing made them weake, and their weakenesse making the other strong. And now did they begin to vsurpe soueraignetie, presenting their Fessan King, with sixe Horses, and sixe Camels, and those but simple, whom before they had acknowledged their Soueraigne, with payment of the fifths of their spoile. The King of Fez before applauding his owne victories in theirs, began now to distaste, and to distrust: hee sends to them to demand his fifths, and the tribute also formerly paide him by the Kings of Marocco. Death, the common enemie of Mankinde, here interposed her selfe on the Seriffian part, and tooke the King of Fez out of the world; the Scepter descending to his Sonne Amet, the Scholler of the young Seriff: who not onely proceeded not in his Fathers demands, but confirmed Amet in the Signiorie of Marocco, so that in some small matters hee would acknowledge the soueraignetie of Fez. But now the Seriffs, whose hearts continually encreased with their fortunes, sent him word; that being lawfull successours to Mahomet, they owed no man tribute, and had more right in Africa then he: if hee would respect them as his friends and Allies, so it were, if otherwise, they which had power to offend the Christian, should not bee destitute in defending themselues. The sword, the vnequallest arbiter of equitie, is now made vmpire; the Fessan proclaimeth warres, besiegeth Marocco, is dislodged, and in his returne vanquished. Thus haue the Seriffs acquited themselues of that yoake, and now intend new conquests on the other side of Atlas, and in Numidia, and in the mountaines, which happily they atchieued. Yea, the Portugals wearied with the warres, which they were forced to maintayne in defence of those places they held in Africa (the expences so much surmounting the reuenue) abandoned them to the Seriffs. And now the want of enemies procured enmitie betwixt the Brethren, who trying that valour against each other, which before they had exercised ioyntly against their enemies, the issue was, that the younger, in two battels hauing ouercome the elder, and at the second, which was Anno 1544. hauing taken him prisoner, confined him to Tafilete. Hee now sole Monarch of Marocco, conuerts his forces against the King of Fez, to try if he could bee his Master in the field, as hee sometimes had beene in the Schoole, and failed not of his attempt, but hauing once taken and freed him, the second time because he had broken promise, he depriued him and his sonnes of estate and [a] life. He also by meanes of his sonnes took Tremizen, which soone after was recouered from them by Sal Araes Vice-roy of Algier, and Fez also added, by an ouerthrow of the Seriff, to the Turkes conquest, who gaue the gouernment of Fez to Buasson, Prince of Velys. But he in an vnfortunate battell with the Seriff, lost his life and state. Mahomet going after to Taradant, was by the way slaine in his Pauilion, by the Treason of some Turkes suborned thereunto by the King of Algier, of whom all (but fiue) in their returne were slaine by the people: Anno 1559. Mulley Abdala, the Seriffs sonne, was proclaymed King.

a The end of the Raigne of Marins.

Some [b] write, that by occasion of a Rebellion in Sus, hee sent to the bordering Turkes for aide, who first helped, after murthered him, and hauing sacked Taradant, and ouer-runne the Countrey two moneths together, were in their returne, by the Mountainers cut off. Mully Abdala hauing raigned fifteene yeeres, dyed, leauing behind him thirteene sonnes; the eldest, Abdala, commanded the rest to be killed: but Abdelmelech the second brother escaped into [c] Turkie, and Muley Hamet, the third brother, esteemed of a simple and quiet spirit, not any way dangerous to the state, was spared. The other tenne were put to death in one day at Taradant, where they had beene brought vp. This Abdela dying, left behind him three sonnes; Muley Mahomet, Muley Sheck, Muley Nassar: the two younger escaped into Spaine, where Sheck is yet liuing and turned Christian. Nassar returned in the foureteenth yeere of Muley Hamets Raigne, and had almost driuen Muley Sheck, then Gouernour of Fez vnder his Father, to his heeles, had not superstition more preuayled with Nassars followers, then Allegeance. For when Lent came, his Souldiers would needs home to keepe their Easter at their owne houses: for feare whereof Nassar hastily giuing battell, was there slaine, and Abdelmelech before fled into Turkie, now came backe with Turkish forces, and got the Kingdome from Mahomet, who fleeing, or as others write, sending for succour to Sebastian King of Portugall, obtained it. In the yeere [d] 1578. Fiue thousand Germans were entertayned in the Portugall pay for the expedition, and great forces were leuyed, the Pope sending Stukely, that English Traytor (falsely termed Marquesse of Ireland) with fixe hundred Italians, to Sebastian, [e] who the foure and twentieth of Iune tooke Sea, and the next day with a Fleet of one thousand and three hundred sayle; or as Doglioni [f] hath it, setting in order his Armada of fiue hundred sayle, and blessing his Royall Standard, with thirtie sixe thousand Footmen, and foure thousand Horse, set forth towards Africa: Where Abdelmelech being sickly, had assembled an Armie of fifteene thousand Footmen, and foure and fortie thousand Horsemen. On the fourth day of August, they joyned battell, and the Duke of Auero, with his Portugals, made a great impression into the Moores host; which Abdelmelech labouring beyond his naturall force to withstand, saued his people, but lost his life, not by the Sword of the enemy, but by the weakenesse of his body, deliuered vp to death. His brother Hamet [g] ruled the Armie (as yet ignorant of what had befalne) and made such slaughter of the Portugals, that the Duke of Auero, the King of Portugall, and other great Personages there fell, and Mahomet himselfe was drowned, in fleeing ouer a Riuer. Thus remayned Hamet victorious, and at one time had the dead corpes of three Kings in his Tent. Such is the furie of Warre, the force of death trampling vnder foot the meanest, and triumphing ouer the greatest. Stukely among the rest receiued due wages for his treacherie, and disloyaltie to his Countrey, slaine out of his Countrey by the barbarous Barbarian. To Abdelmelech [h] was Master Edmund Hogan employed in Embassage, by the Maiestie of our late Soueraigne, Anno, one thousand fiue hundred seuentie seuen, and with all good Offices entertayned. To Hamet his Successour, was from the same Sacred Maiestie, sent Ambassadour, * Master Henry Roberts, Anno one thousand fiue hundred eightie fiue, who was there Lieger three yeeres. This Muley Hamet in a Letter to the Earle of Leicester, thus begins. In the name of the mercifull and pitifull God. The blessing of God light vpon our Lord and Prophet Mahomet, and those that are obedient vnto him. The seruant of God both mightie in warre, and mightily exalted by the grace of God, Myra Momanyn, the sonne of Myra Momanyn, the Iarif, the Hozeni, *whose Kingdomes God maintayne. into England, [b] Anno a thousand sixe hundred and one, performed by Abdala Wahad Anowne.

His people did so feare him, that Abdala [c] Creme his Customer, hauing one onely Sonne, (who in an idle businesse and busie idlenesse, would needs feed his curious eyes with the sight of the Palace where the Kings Concubines were) caused him to bee strangled before his face.

He gouerned the Alarbes (which are supposed to bee of Arabian Race, and said to vse the Arabike Language, Inhabitants of the plaine and Champaine Countries of Marocco, Fez, and Sus) in peace and subiection receiuing their tenths duly paid. The Brebers or Mountaineers are the Natiues and ancient Inhabitants, chased by the former into strong Cities, and the Naturall Forts of Hils (as our Progenitors serued the Britaines, forcing them to the Mountaines of Wales and Cornwall) a people of another Language (called Tamaset) and disposition, which hee could not so easily tame, and therefore in policie hee drew them into forreine Expeditions, especially against the Negros, thereby extending his Empire so farre that way, as by Camell it was sixe moneths iourney from Marocco, to the extremest bounds. Likewise he vsed them to goe with the [d] Carauans to Gago to fetch home his yeerely Tribute. He conquered Tombuto and Gago, about the yeere 1594. as appeareth by the Letters of [e] Lawrence Madoc, who saw thirty Mules laden with Gold come from thence to Marocco; and sayth that Tombuto rented threescore Quintals of Gold. He was much delighted in Astronomie; as M. Thomas Bernhere hath written in a Letter [f] to Master Edward Wright, to whom hee sent for Mathematicall Instruments to be vsed in that yeerely Voyage to Gago ouer the sandie Sea, where they vsed Needle and Compasse.

His prouisions for his Ingenewes or Sugar-gardens, for his buildings, maintenance of his women (rather for the pompe then the sinne) I let passe. For passed they are now, and gone, together with himselfe, his three Sonnes, by Ciuill Warres, leauing scarce hope of good, or place for worse state then is now in Barbary, and hath beene these many yeeres. Hee dyed of the Plague, which was so violent in these parts, that by Wilkins [g] report there dyed aboue foure thousand and seuen hundred in one day and night thereof in Marocco, and in one yeere seuen hundred thousand Moores, and seuen thousand seuen hundred Iewes. In the Citie of Far (I thinke he meaneth Fez) dyed the same yeere fiue hundred thousand, besides those which perished in the Countrey and other places: so many (sayth hee) as if Barbary had beene the common buriall place of the World; and the liuing were not able to burie the dead, neither did the earth couer and bury them, but they buried and couered the earth, the high-wayes being strowed with dead, infected, and infectious carkasses. A plentifull Harueſt found not Labourers to inne it, but shed it selfe on the ground; and the cattell mourned for want of Milkers. Here was no want of store, and soone after (the plague ceasing) no store but of want: Famine succeeding in place, and exceeding the others cruelties. And lest a third furie should be wanting, the warres betweene the late Hamets Sonnes, followed the former at the heeles, that as with a threefold cord, Barbary is welnigh strangled and dead.

§. III.

Of the Ciuill Warres in Barbary: And of some other parts of that Kingdome.

THe Sonnes of Hamet were Mahomet, commonly called Sheck, a title proper to the Kings eldest Sonne; Boferes his Brother by the whole bloud: Sidan, by another woman; as Nassar and Abdela. Muley is a title of honour, giuen to the Kings Children, and all of the bloud Royall. Muley Sheck was made Gouernour of Fez in his Fathers life time, Boferes of Sus, and Sidan, of Tedula, in the mid-way betweene Fez and Marocco. Muley Sheck so displeased his Father by his vnbridled courses, that hee went with an Army to Fez to displace him, and to set things there in order, leauing Boferes (lately returned from Sus, because of the plague) in the gouernment of Marocco. Sheck tooke Sanctuary with fiue hundred of his best Souldiers, from whence his Father caused him to bee brought by force, and sent him prisoner to Mickanes: but before he could finish his purposes, the fourteenth of August 1603. he died. Sidan had followed his Father in this Expedition, and taking aduantage of his presence, seized on the treasures, and proclaimed himselfe King of Barbary, and heire to his Father. What Sidan had done at Fez, the like did Boferes at Marocco, and at Taradant. Nassar made some stirres, but soone after died of the Plague. Boferes sendeth Bashar Indar to encounter with Sidan, who was now come with his forces a-gainſt him, and becauſe himſelfe had not the heart, to hazard his perſon in battell, knowing that it would be no ſmall diſcouragement, if there were none his equall in bloud, hee on certaine conditions, freed his elder brother Muley Sheck, who the ſixt of Ianuary 1604. chaſed Sidan out of the field. Hence all old quarrels, and feuds, and robberies, and a world of other miſchiefes now * began to fill all the parts of Barbary. Muley Sheck in Fez proclaimes himſelfe King. Thus is all inuerted, many Kings and few Subiects: none now in this vncertainty paying their accuſtomed tenths, intending rather mutuall feuds and battles betwixt their ſeuerall Tribes and Kindreds, then common fidelitie and allegiance. Sidan by aide of the Great Foquere, or Heremite, obtayneth Sus, the people yeelding obedience to none but whom that Religious perſon ſhall appoint them: by meanes of him alſo, a peace was concluded betwixt Boferes and Sidan in Auguſt, 1604. Thus was the warre continued betweene Sheck and Boferes. Abdela, Shecks ſonne, driueth Boferes out of Marocco, in the latter end of the yeere 1606. vſing his victory with bloudy cruelty, beſides the rifling and pillage of the goods in the City. Bloud is a ſlippery foundation, and pillage a pill'd wall: ſo fell it out to Abdela, who ſoone loſt the City to Sidan; which he had taken from Boferes, after a bloudy field fought betwixt them in April after. Here Sidan puts to the Sword three thouſand Feſſans, which had taken Sanctuary, and came forth diſarmed, vpon promiſe of Pardon, which Boferes after with like perfidiouſneſſe, and breach of promiſe, requited on three thouſand Morochians. The Shracies (which are Mountayners neere to Algier, but no more reſpecting the Turkes there, then the Brebers doe the Serif) fell at variance, and began to mutinie in the Army of Sidan, whom they ſerued; and cut off the Baſhas head, who was their Generall, which cauſed Sidan to execute vniuſt cruelties againſt all of that Tribe in Marocco, giuing the Shracies goods to the Murtherer whomſoeuer. On the twentieth ſix of November 1607. Abdela ioyneth in battle with Sidan, prouoked by thoſe Shracies who thirſted for reuenge of Sidans tyrannies, where many Engliſh, vnder Captaine Giffard, and other Captaines were ſlaine, Sidan chaſed, and Marocco recouered.

But whiles theſe brethren contend, Muley Hamet Boſonne their Couſin, rich in treaſure, richer in hopes, thought it fit time to take vp that Kingdome, which theſe with warring for it loſt. He gathered together whatſoeuer forces he could make, and came towards Marocco. Abdela heard and feared, and hauing ſpied a man vpon a Hill with a Speare in his hand, with white linnen like a flagge vpon it: his feare (an vntruſty Meſſenger, told him, that all Boſonnes Armie was behind the Hill, although it were then a full dayes march from thence and) lent him wings to flye to Fez. The man was but a ſilly Moore, which had waſhed his Linnen, and dryed it on his Speares point. Boſonne entreth Marocco, and proclaymes himſelfe King, but loſeth both City and Kingdome in Aprill following, 1608. and after a ſecond ouerthrow receiued by Sidan now Maſter of Marocco, hee was by Alkeid Azus his meanes poyſoned. Muley Sheck, loth to leaue Marocco to Sidan, ſendeth Etina an Italian Merchant into Spaine, with promiſe to the Catholike King, of Allaroche, Saly, Alcaſar, and other Townes to turne Spaniſh, if he would helpe him to his right in Afrike. This Negotiation was well entertayned, and the Spaniard now hath [a] Allaroche. Since this time rare accidents haue hapned by certaine Religious perſons, after the Moores account, which Hiſtory is thus reported.

A certaine Foquere, Talbie, Heremite or Saint (names giuen by diuers to the ſame) called Side Hamet Ben Abdela, liued in Wed Sowre, forty dayes iourney beyond Marocco Eaſtward, where ſometime hee entertayned Sidan to his great content, fleeing then to his [b] Horne or defence in time of diſtreſſe. This man the Moores report to be a great Magician, that he could feed three hundred Horſe at one pit of Barley, and the ſame no whit diminiſhed, that he had foretold of plenty the laſt yeere, which came accordingly to paſſe, that hee could by his Art ſecure men from the danger of Gunſhot. Hee being of great reputation for Wealth, Learning, and Holineſſe, gathered a band of men, and conducted them to Marocco. Sidan with an Armie of ſixteene thouſand, giues him battle at Marocco, the [c] tenth of May 1612. and was ouerthrowne. For he went himſelfe, and led his Company on the mouth of the Ordnance without harme; he cauſing (as the Moores report) that the bullets ſhould ſtill remayne in the Peeces when they were diſcharged, [d] as he had often for the confirmation of his people made triall before, ſetting fortie Gunners to ſhoot at as many others without harme by the like Art. Thus hee loſt none of his owne, and many of the other were ſlaine. Sidan fled to Safia, and embarques his two hundred women in a Flemming: his riches, in a Marſilian: This was taken by Don Luys the Spaniſh Admirall, wherein were thirteen cheſts of Gold (or as Maſter Ioſeph Keble then at Saphia reported to mee, fifty fardels of Arabike Bookes, valued at a Million of treaſure; he ſaw ten of thoſe fardels.) The other ſhip at Santa Cruz, met Sidan, and deliuered him his women. Men were more neceſſary, which he wanted, and yet (worſe then their want) ſome offered their ſeruice for pay, and receiuing it, forsook him, whereby he was forced to flee into the Mountayns, where he is said yet to remaine. Side Hamet, now called Mully Hamet Ben Abdela, placed a Gouernour in Marocco, another at Taradant, the cheife City of Sus.

Since I published these [e] Relations, certaine Letters haue beene printed, and entituled Newes from Barbary, which more largely discourse of this Saint: That hee is about thirtie sixe yeeres, very ciuill and plaine in habit, his Turbant of course Calico, his Alheik or loose Gowne of Lile Grogram, a plaine Sword by his side, hanged with a plaine leather thong, a man of great Wisdome and Learning, an Astrologer and Politician. He hath drawne to him Alcaid Azus aforesaid, the principall Counseller of the Land, and many other Saints and principall men, and since his comming hath married the Widdow of Muley Boferis. He alledgeth certaine Prophecies which foretell these his proceedings in reuiuing their Law, rooting out the Xeriffes, and establishing peace in his Reigne, which shall continue fortie yeeres, after which Christ (as hee saith) shall come to iudgement. The Talbies and learned men doe confesse, that they find these Prophecies of him in their Bookes: to wit, both his name, his beginning at Missa, his course, and certaine bodily characters, as a Wart aboue his right eye, a blacke or gray tooth before (which Master Keble saith he saw) a Ring in the palme of his right hand, and a Spurre in his right foot, a bunch of haire betweene his shoulders, and others to the number of seuen; all which agree to him. At his beginning he put forth onely one Tent and a Kitchin, and then resorted to him the Shrokies, a Saintish people in their Law, but otherwise in behauiour very Sauages, of which a hundred and fiftie, or two hundred serued him without pay, with whom he brake Alhadge Lemiere his forces (seruants to Sidan) being fiue hundred strong. His Shrokis encreased to fiue hundred, with whom and others that added themselues by the way, he ouerthrew Sidans forces three times before the battle. Then did he subdue certaine Mountayners, which Sidan (nor his Father) could neuer bring vnder. By the way to Marocco hee was to passe a Riuer, and warned his people that none should take vp water in their hand to drinke, which some doing, anon after dyed. Comming to Dets, where hee found a great Power to withstand him, hee comforted his fearefull followers, with promise, that to morrow they should see more with him, then against him: and remooving his Tents that night, there seemed another Armie greater then theirs, till they came at Dets, and then vanished, the enemies first with sight thereof hauing fled, and left all to the spoyle. This, saith our Authour, [f] our Countriman M. W. with diuers others, sweare they haue seene (if any credit, or the name of our Countriman bee to be giuen to a Renegado) He himselfe with some other of our Nation went to see him, and receiued kinde entertainment, with promise of fauour to the English, willing them to take knowledge that hee was sent by Gods appointment to releeue all of all sorts, and to aduertise what they had seene, saying they should see more strange matters come to passe: meaning, as they ghessed, the conquest of Spaine, France, and Italy, with which opinion he possesseth the foolish Moores. For when hee hath set peace in those parts, hee tels them of a Bridge (recorded in their Writings to haue beene in former times) which shall appeare in the mouth of the Straits, to carry them ouer. But what will bee the issue is vncertaine, the people soone after beginning to disobey, the Shabenites and Brebers robbing to the gates of Marocco. Another [g] reporteth that euery day they flee from him more and more, and Muley Sidan is expected againe. Him yee last left at Santta Cruz, from whence (as by later intelligence [h] I haue receiued) he went to Side Hia, another famous Foquere in the Mountaines of Atlas, at whose Zowia (or Religious House) being arriued, hee sate downe on a stone, nor would enter till he had obtayned conference; where they agreed on conditions, that Sidan should leaue his tyrannies, and proclayme pardon to the aduerse party, Hia promising accordingly his best assistance.

This the next yeere 1613. was performed. Sida [i] Hia gathering an Armie of 50000. men, most of which were Brebers of the Countrey of Hea or Haha, with which hee marched towards Marocco. Mully Sydan in the meane while had giuen diuers battles or slighter skirmishes to Mully Hamet, with losse to himselfe, notwithstanding his promise of seuen dayes sacke of Marocco to his Souldiers, if they could recouer it. Mully Hamet was neere Azamor [k] at this approch of Hia, from whence he made more haste then speed (being then about fifteene thousand strong) with a thousand Horse riding before, and leauing the rest of his Armie to follow. With this handfull of men, and heart full of manly courage, he set vpon the great Armie of Side Hia, three times preuayling, but at last with multitudes was ouerthrowne; his Horse first, and himselfe after, being slaine with a shot, his wonted Deuill, or Imposture, now failing, Hia falling, and many of his followers vpon him; till a certaine Alcayde knowing him, cryed that Bomohali, that is, the King of clouts or rags was slaine; whereupon all forsooke him and fled, his other troupes now also comming to the flight, which before his indiscretion and impatience would not suffer him to vse in the fight.

Thus died this glorious vainglorious Saint, a man of great valour, which hee had tryed in thirty seuerall [f] Battailes and skirmishes: in which he obtained the better, both against Sidan and the Mountayners, whose Corne-fields he burnt, destroyed their Vineyards, and in two or three daies had cut down sixty thousand Oliue-trees. The place of this battle betwixt Hamet and Hia, was in or neere the Gardens (which are said to extend foure miles from Marocco) the time in October, 1613. Alcaid Azus was then in Marocco, with the Sonne of Hamet: both which vpon this disaster fled with abundance of Treasure, but by the Larbies were taken, and Azus his head presently smitten off, as the supposed contriuer of many policies to their detriment: Hamets Sonne was carried to Marocco, and presented to Sidan, where after diuers contumelies, opprobriously carried on an Asse diuers dayes, he was at last slaine. When Side Hia had slaine Hamet, hee grew suspected to Sidan, because hee did not then presently proclaime him, nor durst he aduenture to the City, till Hia had remooued his forces further. The City meane while sustayned diuers abuses by the Souldiers; as before by the Vsurper, in so much that Sidan wept when hee entred and saw the beauty of his Palace defaced (which some say is comparable in greatnesse and statelinesse to the best in Christendome) and kept within doores three moneths or more. After this comming forth, hee brake his Couenant with Hia; and those which before he had pardoned, were now put to death, and some also grieuously [a] tortured. Whereupon Hia tooke armes againe, and came neere to Marocco with a great Power, which suddenly he was forced to disperse, and to returne home for feare of Treason by Side Lassan a great man in his Armie, which was reported to hold intelligence with Sidan, and to haue written to him.

Thus barbarous and miserable is the present State of Barbary, Sidan (the only Suruiuer of the Brethren) possessing Marocco; Fez acknowledging no Souereigne, but the City gouerned by the Magistrates thereof, and in the Countrey each Cast or Tribe by it selfe; Mully Abdela, the Sonne of Mully Shek, liues sometimes at Mucanes, sometimes at Alcasar, little respected, maintayning himselfe by spoyle and robbery; and Side Hia enioying the Royall profits of the Kingdome of Sus. He liues commonly at Taradant, holds the Countrey subiect, but arrogates not the title of King: His word is Lanserel hoc layenore Side Hia, that is, Let the Truth liue, and Side Hia flourish. A late Letter from thence signifies the feare that Sidan had of Hia's third approch to Marocco, in which respect he sent two thousand Souldiers into the Countrey of Draa, thence to enter into Sus, if such inuasion happened. But we haue beene too tedious Actors of this Barbarian Tragedie. Wee must forward on our Pilgrimage: and now hauing glutted our eyes with bloud, let vs take more quiet view of the other parts of this Kingdome.

Agmet was sometimes called a second Marocco, [b] from whence it standeth foure and twenty miles. The Hils and Valley about it, adorned with Gardens and Vineyards, a faire Riuer, and fertile fields, yeelding fiftie fold encrease, haue assembled Natures Forces to ioyne with Arte (if Magicke may be so termed, and the Histories write true) for the common good of Agmet, and Marocco. The Riuer runneth (as is thought) to Marocco vnder the ground: which secret passage is attributed to the Wizards of Ioseph, Founder of Marocco, lest the water course should be cut off from the City. This fruitfull Agmet in Leo's time was peopled onely with Foxes and wild beasts, sauing that a certaine Heremite held the Castle with a hundred of his Disciples.

The [c] Mountaynes are very rude, according to their rough and cold places of habitation, many of them couered continually with Snow. In Nisisa they gaze and wonder at strangers: in Semede they forced Leo to play the Iudge and Notarie (accepting no excuse) eight dayes; and then set him in a Church-porch, and after a certaine Prayer, presented themselues with their presents before him, Cockes, Hens, Nuts, Garlike; and some of the better sort a Goat, which all he gaue his Host; money they had none for him.

In Secsina there is at all times of the yeere, Snow. There are many great Caues, wherein they winter their beasts in Nouember, Ianuary, and February. They weare no shooes, but certaine Sandals, and are lustie men at ninety or a hundred yeeres old. Temnella is an Hereticall Hill and Towne, which hath a faire Temple. They are of Elmaheli his Sect, and challenge any stranger which comes amongst them to dispute. In Hantera are many Iewes of the [d] Carraim Sect.

The fourth Region of this Kingdom is Guzzula, confining with the Hill Ilda on the West, Atlas on the North, Hea on the East. They haue no walled Townes, but great Villages: neither haue they King or Gouernour; the cause of Ciuill Warres amongst them: yet doe they obserue three dayes in a Weeke truce, when euery man may trauell or barter safely. A certaine Heremite, who was reputed a Saint, was Authour of this three dayes truce in each weeke. Hee had but one eye. I my selfe, sayth Leo, saw him, and found him to bee trustie, courteous, and liberall.

Duccala the fifth Region lyeth betweene Tensift and the Ocean, Habib and Omirabih. At Azaphi the Prince was (in Leo's time) murthered at Church, while he was in his deuotions, by a subiect, who was chosen Gouernour; but the Portugals obtayned the place. Azamur, a Citie exceedingly addicted to Sodomie, was also punished with Portugall slauerie, and most of the Countrey thereabouts. In the Hill, called Greene-hill, liue many Heremites, of the fruits onely there growing. Here are many Altars and Saints after the Mahumetan fashion.

Mahumet King of Fez, in the yeere of our Lord 1512. passed this way with his Armie, and at euery Altar made a stand, and there kneeling, would thus say; My God, thou knoweest that my intent of comming to this wilde place, is onely to helpe and free the people of Duccala from the wicked and rebellious Arabians, and from our cruell enemies the Christians: and if thou doest not approue it, let thy scourge light onely on my person; for these people that follow me deserue not to be punished. Hence he sent me Ambassadour to Marocco.

Leo an Ambassadour.

Hascora the sixt Region of Marocco, is situate betweene the Riuer Tensift and Quadelhabid. Alemdin in Hascora was conquered to the King of Fez by a Merchant, whose Paramour the Prince had taken away; for which adulterie he was by the Iudges condemned to be stoned. The Prince of Temcenes was so addicted to Arabian poetrie, that hee gaue Leo, then a youth of sixteene yeeres old, fiftie ducats for certaine verses hee had made in his praise, and twice as much he sent to his vncle for the same, with a horse and three slaues.

Tedles is the seuenth Prouince of this Kingdome, lying betweene Guadelhabid and Omirabih. Tefza the chiefe Towne is beautified with many Temples, and hath store of Priests. The Towne walls are built of a kinde of marble called Tefza, which gaue name to the Town. Mount Dedes is in this Prouince, where the people (for the most part) dwell in Caues vnder the ground: they haue neither Iudges nor Priests, nor honest men among them. For other places, if any thinke vs not more than tedious alreadie, let them resort to Leo, whom all follow in their Relations of these parts. When any Christian * will turne Moore, it is their custome to signifie it to the Christians in those parts: and in place and time appointed, an equall number of both sorts being assembled, and sitting the one ouer against the other, the partie in the middle and presence of both, is demanded of which he will be, and the Christians may vse what arguments they can to dissuade him: which is done three seuerall times. Thus did one of our Nation, who hauing thus killed his owne soule, after murthered anothers body, and was therefore adiudged to wander like Cain, none releeuing him, in which state he pined and dyed.

Of the Arabians populations, and depopulations in Afrike, and of the naturall Africans; and of the beginnings and proceedings of the Mahumetan superstition in Africa: of the Portugals forces and exploits therein.

HAuing often mentioned the Arabians in our former Chapters, it seemes fit to speake somewhat of the comming of that Nation, and their Religion, into Africa from the East, as also of the Armes of the Portugals (before often spoken of) which from the West haue made some impressions in these parts. The Arabian Mahumetisme, euen almost in the infancie thereof, pierced into Africa. In the yeere * of our Lord 637. Omar inuaded Egypt, and Odman in the yeere 650. passed further with fourescore thousand fighting men, and defeated Gregorius Patricius, and imposing a tribute on the Africans, departed. In Leontius time, in the yeere 698. They inuade and possesse Africa, and appoint Gouernours of their owne: in the yeere 710. They pierced into Numidia and Libya, and ouerthrew the Azanaghi, and the people of Galata, Oden, and Tombuto. In 973. hauing passed Gamben, they infected the Negros; and the first that dranke of their poyson, were those of Melli. In the yeere 1067. Iasaia sonne of Ababiquer, entred into the lower Ethiopia, and by little and little infected those people which confine vpon the Desarts of Libya and the rest, and pierced into Nubia and Guinea.

tenth, Emet; the eleuenth, Esipe; the twelfth, Musel; the thirteenth, Ticrit. But when as Africa shooke off the yoke of the Amerus of Bagdad, and had an Amera of her owne, afterwards by occasion of the weakenesse of the Amera of Bagdad, the Amera of Persia or Chorasan freed himselfe also, and called himselfe Amerumnes, wearing the Alcoran hanging down his necke in Tables like a chaine, and saith, hee is of the kindred of Alem: and the Amera of Egypt (to whom the Amera of Arabia fœlix, had alway beene subiect) became also his owne man, calling himselfe Amerumnes, and deriuing his pedigree from Alem. This as it giues light to the Saracen Historie in generall, so it sheweth the greatnesse of the Arabian or Saracenicall power in Africa, where first they made head against their Masters, in the time as is said before of Elagleb then Deputie or Amera in Cairaoan, whose example became a president to the Amera's of Persia and Egypt: and (which is more to our present purpose) was occasion of further spreading their superstition through Africa; the fountayne or sinke thereof being now not farre off in Damasco or Bagdad, but in the heart of Africa, Satan there choosing his Throne for these his Vicars or Calipha's (for so the word, saith * Scaliger, signifieth) which as you haue heard, were too faithfull in that their infidelitie. And because I haue mentioned Scaligers interpretation of the word Chalipha, it should not be amisse to adde out of the same place, that the first Gouernours or Generalls after Mahumet (or as hee calls him, Muhammed) were called Emirelmumenin, that is, Captaines of the Orthodox or right beleeuers. Afterwards, because vnder colour of Religion, they sought, not onely a Priestly primacie, but a tyrannicall Monarchie, they chose rather to bee called Chalipha. The first Emirelmumenin was Abubecher. When his successors sent their Lieutenants into Africa and Spaine, they gouerned a while vnder them, doing all in the name of the Emirelmumenin, although nothing in a manner but a Title was wanting of the fulnesse of power to themselues. But after, they entitled themselues Emire Elmumenin, and of Deputies became Kings: which was done by the petit Kings of Spaine and the Gouernours of Africa. And now the King of Marocco and Fez vseth it. For it is not a proper name, but as the French King is called Christianissimus, and the Spanish Catholicus. Thus farre Scaliger: which serueth as a Glosse for those former names of Amera, Amerumnes, Chalipha, Miramuldinus, and many other hence corrupted.

* Ios. Scal. Can. Isagog. l 3. Chalipha est Vicarius, quo nomine vocati sunt, qui post Muhammedem rerum potiti sunt, qui & diuinis & humanis præessent.

The meanes of these and other Saracens enlarging their Sect, haue beene principally by Armes: and where they were not of force, by traffique and preaching, * as on the other side of Ethiopia, euen to Cabo de lor Corientes in the Kingdomes of Megadazo, Melinde, Mombazza, Quiloa, and Mosambique, besides the Ilands of Saint Laurence, and others. But the greatest mischiefe that hapned to Africa, by the Arabians, was about the foure hundreth yeere of the Hegeira. For before that time, the Mahumetan Chalipha's, or Amera's, had forbidden the Arabians to passe ouer Nilus with their Tents and Families, that so the Countrey was still peopled by the ancient Inhabitants, howsoeuer it was gouerned by them. For such multitudes of vnbridled and barbarous Nations were not likely to proue dutifull subiects to the Empire. About that time, one Elcain, the schismaticall Calisa of Cairaoan, as is before in part shewed, hauing by his Generall Gehoar conquered all the westerne parts, as farre as Sus, employed the same mans valour for the conquest of the East. And Egypt being now together with Syria subdued; Elcain himselfe seeing the Calipha of Bagdet, made no preparation to withstand him, by the aduice of Gehoar (which at that time founded Cairo) passed into Egypt, thinking to inuest himselfe with the Saracenicall soueraignty, committing the gouernment of Barbarie to a Prince of the Tribe Zanhagia, who in this absence of his Lord compacted with the Chalipha of Bagdet, and acknowledged his Title in Barbarie, receiuing in reward of his treason from that Bagdet Prelate, the Kingdome of Africa. Elcain hauing lost this morsell, to snatch at a shodow, was in great perplexitie what course to take, till a Counsellor of his perswaded him that he might gather great summes of gold, if hee would let the Arabians haue free libertie to passe through Egypt into Africa: which, though hee knew, that they would so waste it by their spoiles, as it should remayne vnprofitable, both to himselfe and his enemies, yet incited by two vehement Orators, Couetousnesse and Reuenge, at last he granted; And permitted all Arabians which would pay him ducats a piece, freely to passe, receiuing their promise, that they would become deadly enemies to the rebell of Cairaoan. Whereupon ten Tribes or Kindreds of the Arabians (halfe the people of Arabia deserta) and a multitude also out of Arabia fœlix (as writeth Ibnu Rachu, a famous Historian, out of whom Leo hath drawne a great part of his African historie) accepted the condition, and passing the Desarts, they tooke Tripolis, sacked Capes, and after eight moneths siege, entred into Cairaoan, filling with bloud, and emptying with spoile, all the places where they preuayled. Thus did those kindreds of Arabians settle themselues in these parts, forcing the Prouinces adjacent to tribute: and remayned Lords of Africa, till Ioseph founded Marocco, who aided the posteritie of the rebell against them, and brake their yoke, from the tributarie cities.

* About two hundred yeers after the death of Mahomet, all Barbarie was infected with that pestilence, Leo, lib. 1.

But Mansor the fourth King and Calipha of the sect of Muoachedin, begun, as is said, by Elmabeli and Abdul Mumen, preferred the Arabians, and induced them to make warre vpon those their enemies, whom easily they conquered. He also brought all the chiefe and principall of the Arabians into the westerne Kingdomes, and assigned them more noble places for habitation, to wit, the Prouinces of Duccala and Azgar: to those of meane condition hee appointed Numidia, which at first were, as it were, slaues to the Numidians, but after recouered their libertie, and obtayned the dominion of that part of Numidia assigned them, euery day encreasing in power: those which inhabited Azgara and other places in Mauritania, were all brought into seruitude. For the Arabians out of the Desarts, are as fishes out of the water: Atlas on the one side, and the other Arabians on the other side, suffered them not to passe into the Desarts, and therefore they laid downe their pride, and applyed themselues to husbandrie, dwelling in their Tents, and paying yeerely tributes to the Kings of Mauritania, from which those of Duccala, by reason of their multitudes, were free. Many Arabians remayned still in Tunis, which after Mansors death, they tooke and made themselues Lords of the Regions adioyning; where some of them bare great sway till Leo's time: the other depriued of their wonted pay at Tunis, committed great robberies and slaughters of Merchants and Trauellers.

The Arabians, which inhabited Africa, are diuided into three peoples, Hutel, and Chachin, which are said to descend of Ismael, therefore by the Mahumetans esteemed more noble: the third is termed Machil, deriued from Saba, and came thither out of Arabia fœlix. The diuisions and subdiuisions of these into their seuerall Tribes and Families, which Leo hath done, would perhaps to our nice Readers seeme but an harsh heape of strange names, and for their sakes I will referre the studious hereof to that our Author.

The Tribe Etheg, which Mansor placed in Duccala, and in the Playnes of Tedles, in later times suffered much damage by the Portugals on the one side, and the Kings of Fez on the other: they are about one hundred thousand men of warre, halfe horse-men. The Sumaites in the Desarts neere Tripolis can arme fourescore thousand men: Sabid in the Desarts of Libya, can bring into the field almost an hundred and fiftie thousand of their Tribe. The Ruche are not rich, but in agilitie of body miraculous, and account it a shame if one of their foot-men be vanquished of two horse-men: nor is any amongst them so slow, that he will not out-goe any the swiftest horse, be the iourney neuer so long. The Vode dwell betweene Gualata and Guading, and are esteemed about threescore thousand warriours. The other kindreds of them are exceeding many, dispersed through Africa, some-where commanding, other-where subiect. And as they liue in diuers places, so doe they obserue differing customes. Those which dwell betweene Numidia and Libya liue miserably: they make merchandize of their Camels with the Negros, and many Horses which are sold into Europe, termed horses of Barbarie. They are much addicted to Poetrie, and make long Poems of their warres, huntings, and loues, with great elegance, and that in rithme, like the vulgar Italian Sonets. They are (the destinie of Poets) courteous, but poore. The Arabian Inhabitants betweene Atlas and the Sea, are more rich in corne and cattell, but more base and barbarous in conditions. Amongst the Arabians neere Tunis, a good Poet is highly esteemed, and amply rewarded of their great men, neither can the neatnesse and grace of their verse easily be expressed. When they goe to warre, they carry their wiues with them on Camels, and that (to make vp the wonder) to incourage them. The Arabians betweene Barbarie and Egypt leade a wretched life in those barren Desarts, forced, not onely to exchange their cattell for corne, but to pawne their sonnes in great numbers to the Sicilians, who if they breake day, make slaues of them: and therefore they exercise all robberies, and sell any stranger (they can lay hold on) to the Sicilians for corne.

Now for the naturall and natiue Inhabitants of Africa, the white men (so they are in comparison of the Negros) are diuided into fiue peoples, Sanhagia, Musmuda, Zeneta, Haoara, and Gumera. The Musmuda inhabit the Regions of Hea, Sus, Guzula, and Marocco. Gumera inhabiteth the Mountaynes alongst the Mediterranean, from the Streits to Tremizen. These two dwell seuered from the others, and maintayne continuall warres one with another. As Authors say, they were wont to haue Tents, and the wide fields for their habitation, and those that were conquered, were sent to inhabit Cities; the Conquerors were Lords of the fields. The Tribes or Peoples Zeneta, Haoara, and Sanhagia, inhabit Temesne. The Zeneti chased the Familie of Idris from the dominion of Africa and Fez: and were againe themselues, after that, depriued by the Zanhagian families of Luntuna, and of Abdul Mumen. The Benemarini a Zenetan familie recouered the Empire long after.

They are in these times * diuided into Brebers and Alarbies. The Brebers inhabit the Mountaynes: the Alarbies, the Playnes. Both of them maintayne deadly feuds, and will fight sorer battels in such quarrels, then in seruice of their King. Insomuch, that vpon losse of any great man, cruell battels haue beene fought, and ten thousand men slaine at a time.

* Ro. C. Hist. of Barbarie.

The

The Alarbies haue their faireſt Virgin riding on a Camell, with a flagge in her hand, decked in all pompe to ſollicite her kindred to reuenge, and goeth formoſt in the field incouraging them to follow. The kindred ſpareth no bloud to ſaue their Virgin, which the other ſide ſtriueth to winne, holding that a continuall glory to the ſeuenth generation. When a man is killed, his Tribe ſeeketh not reuenge on the murtherer onely, but on the firſt man of the Tribe he meets with. The Brebers doe likewiſe. Their women follow them in their battels, with a certaine colour in their hand called Hanna, which will ſtaine, and therefore they throw it vpon ſuch as offer to run out of the field, the baſeſt ignominie that can befall them.

The Larbie and Breber doe differ as much in language, as Welſh and Engliſh; the one is giuen to Husbandry, the other very much to Robbery. Mully Sidan in theſe late warres, ſeeing the Larbees alſo become robbers, cauſed the next Dwarre (a Towne of Tents) belonging to that Tribe which herein had faulted, to bee deſtroyed Man, Woman, Child, Kine, Sheepe, and whatſoeuer belongeth to them, by his Souldiers. But after hee had loſt the field in the battell with Muly Sheck, they foraged vp to Marocco gates, truſting to the ſtrength which that Tribe could make, beeing fifteene thouſand Horſe. This Tribe or kindred was called Weled Entid.

b Leo, lib. 1. In Africa they are much ſubiect to the Cough: inſomuch b that on the Fridayes when they are in their Mahumetan Sermons, if one fall a coughing, another followes, and ſo from hand to hand all take it vp, and hold on in that ſort, till the end of their Sermon, no man hearing what hath beene ſaid.

c The generall vices of the Africans, cha 8. For their morall c conditions, Leo thus deſcribeth them, as wee haue ſomewhat mentioned before; The inhabitants of the Cities in Barbary are poore and proud, irefull, and writing all iniuries in Marble: vntractable and vnfriendly to Strangers: ſimple, and credulous of impoſſibilities. The vulgar is ignorant of nature, and eſteeme all workes thereof diuine and miraculous. They are irregular in their life and actions, exceedingly ſubiect to choler, ſpeake aloft and proudly, and are often at buffets in the ſtreets. Thus baſe is their diſpoſition, and no leſſe is their eſtimation with their Lords, who make better account of their beaſts. They haue no chiefe men or Officers to rule or Counſaile them. They are ignorant of merchandize, being deſtitute of Bankers and money-changers, and euery Merchant is conſtrained to attend his wares himſelfe. No people vnder Heauen more couetous; few amongſt them, which for loue of God or man will entertaine a ſtranger, or requite a good turne: alwayes encombred with melancholy, they addict themſelues to no pleaſures; the reaſon whereof, is their great pouertie and ſmall gaines.

The Shepheards, both in the mountaynes and fields, liue a laboutſome and miſerable life, a beaſtly, theeuiſh, ignorant kinde of people, neuer repaying any thing committed to them. The young Women before they marry, may haue their Louers in all filthineſſe, none of them beſtowing her virginitie on her Husband: if they bee once married, their louers doe no more follow after them, but betake them to ſome others. The brutiſh Father makes this odious loue to his Daughter, and the beaſtly Brother to his whooriſh Siſter. The moſt of them are neither Mahumetans, Iewes, nor Chriſtians, but without faith, and without ſo much as a ſhadow of Religion, neither making any prayers, nor hauing any Churches, but liue like beaſtes. And if any hath any ſmacke of deuotion, yet hauing no Law, Prieſt nor any Rule to follow, hee is forced to liue like the other. Many of them, both in Cities and fields, are found ſauoring of better things, both for Arts, Merchandize, and Deuotion, as the ſame Leo ſheweth: but thus are the moſt inclined.

* Ant. Gueuara Epiſtol. Io. de Barros Aſia dec. 1. lib. 1. Now, to adde ſomewhat further of the Mahumetan Religion in Africa, Anno 714. (as ſome * doe reckon) the Saracens, by the incitement of Iulius Earle of Suta, as in our third booke is related, inuaded and conquered Spaine. Leo in his fifth booke attributeth this to Muſe Gouernour of Africa, vnder d Qualid the Calipha of Damaſco, whoſe next ſucceſſour depriued Muſe, and ſent Iezul to Cairaoan to ſucceed in his roome, whoſe poſteritie there gouerned till that Houſe was depriued of the Caliphſhip, and the ſeate thereof remooued from Damaſco to Bagdet. Then was Elagleb made Lieutenant of Africa, and held it with his poſteritie after him 170. yeeres. After which time El Mahdi an hereticall Calipha diſpoſſeſſed them. Of this El Mahdi and Elcain, and their ſuppoſed hereſies, I haue no certaine Hiſtorie. Certaine it is, that the Mahumetanes from the beginning were diuided, as appeareth of Idris in our Hiſtorie of Fez: and more fully in the Catalogue of Mahomets next ſucceſſours, which were the next not in blood, but in power. So did Bubac or Abubacer challenge it, and after him Homar and Ottaman: contrary to the Teſtament of Mahomet, who appointed Hali his heyre. Muauias alſo murthered Hali and his ſonne, to obtaine the Soueraigntie. Thus were they diuided about the true ſucceſſour of their falſe Prophet; which fire is not yet extinct. Another diuiſion was about the interpretation of their Law. e Abubacer gaue foundation to the Sect Melchna or Melici, embraced by the Africans: Homar was author of the sect Aneſia, which the Turkes and Zaharans in Africke receiue. Odman or Ottoman left behind him the Baneſia, which hath also his followers. Hali was head of the Imemia, which is followed by the Persians, Indians, many Arabians, and Gelbines of Africa.

Curio calleth these sects, embraced of the Africans, Melici, and as hee affirmeth, Asophy of the Syrians and Arabians, Alambeli of the Persians, and Buaniſi of the Alexandrians and Assyrians. Forreine names can scarcely bee translated, but withall are traduced, and of diuers diuersly called. Of these foure grew threescore and eight Sects of name, besides other more obscure. Amongst the rest were the Morabites, who ledde their liues (for the most part) in Hermitages, and make profession of morall Philosophie, with certaine principles differing from the Alcoran. One of these was that Moabite, which certaine yeeres past shewing Mahomets name imprinted in his breſt, being done with aqua fortis, or some such thing, rayſed vp a great number of Arabians in Africa, and layd siege to Tripolis, where being betrayed by his Captaine, hee remained the Turkes prisoner, who sent his skinne to the Grand Seignior. These Morabites affirme, that when Alle or Hali fought, he killed ten thousand Christians with one blow of his Sword, which they say was an hundred Cubites long. One writes [a] that these Moabites deuoted themselues to a solitary life, and strict penance for certaine yeeres, which being expired, by the merits thereof, they may after loosen the reynes of their lusts to all impuritie without any impuritie, as beeing beyond possibilitie of sinning: (The like wee haue obserued before of the Indian Gymnosophists) and then to enable Nature to vnnaturall degrees of beastly lusts, they eate certaine Herbes, which may melt the heart in and into those flames, for which purpose they vse also in Barbarie a Composition called Lafis. The Cobtim is as foolish a Sect, one of which shewed himselfe, not many yeeres since, at Algier, mounted on a Reede, with a Bridle and reynes of leather, affirming that hee had ridden an hundred miles on that Horse in one night, and was therefore highly reuerenced: Somewhat also is said before of these African Sects in our Chapter of Fez.

a See 3. part. Th. Pol. pag. 163.

Another occasion diuided Africa from other of the Mahumetane superstition. For when Muauia and Iezid, his Sonne were dead, one Maruan seized on the Pontificalitie, but Abdalam the sonne of Iezid, expelled him. Hee also had slaine Helem the sonne of Halea a little before, whom the Arabians had proclaimed Caliph, and therefore made the Maraunian stocke, of which hee descended, odious to the Arabians. They therefore at Cufa chose Abdimely for the Saracenicall Soueraigne, who was of Hali's posteritie, which they call the Abazian stocke or family. Hee sent Ciafa against Abdalan who fledde and was slaine; Ciafa exercised all cruelties against all that Maraunian kindred, drew Iezid out of his Sepulchre, and burnt his carkasse, and slaying all of that house, cast their bodies to the Beasts and Fowles to be deuoured. Whereupon one Abed Ramen of that familie, (some suppose him the Sonne of Muauias) fled into Africa, with great troupes of followers and partakers, where the Saracens receiued him very honourably, Barrius [b] tels that Ciafa himselfe was Caliph, and that he descended of Abaz, of whom that stocke was called Abazian; and that he tooke an oath at his Election, to destroy the Maraunians; which hee executed in manner as aforesaid by Abidela his kinsman and Generall. To Abed Ramon resorted the Mahumetans in Africke, who equalling his heart to his fortunes, called himselfe Miralmuminin, which is mis-pronounced Miramulim, and signifieth the Prince of the beleeuers; which he did in disgrace of the Abazians. Some attribute the building of Marocco to him, which others ascribe to Ioseph, as before is said, and some to some other Prince, built (as they say) in emulation of [c] Badget, which the Easterne Calipha builded for the Metropolitan Citie of their Law and Empire. Barrius addeth that he became a Nabuchodonoſor, to whip and scourge Spaine, which Vlit his Sonne, by Muſa his Captaine wholly conquered in the time of Rhodericus. But Pelagius soone after wich his Spanish forces began to make head against the Moores, and recouered from them some Townes: which [d] Warre was continued with diuersitie of chance and change three hundred yeeres and more, till [e] Alphonſus the sixt tooke Toledo from them: and for diuers good seruices which Don Henry [f] had done him in these warres, gaue him his Daughter in marriage, and for her portion, those parts which hee had taken from the Moores in Lusitania, since called the Kingdome of Portugall, with all that hee or his could Conquer from them. Thus was the Kingdome of Portugall planted in the bloud of the Moores, whereby it hath beene so fatned, and hath so batned euer since, that all their greatnesse hath risen from the others losse. For they not onely cleered those parts of that Kingdome of them by an hereditary Warre, but pursued them also into Africa, where Iohn the first tooke Scuta from them, so making way to his Posteritie to pierce further, which happily they performed.

rabians not refusing the Portugals seruice, till the Seriff arose in Africa, as euen now was shewed, and chased the Portugals thence.

Thus Spaine hath reuenged her selfe of the Mahumetan iniuries by her two Armes: of Castile (which at last draue them out of Granada, and tooke diuers Townes in the Maine of Africa from them, and King Philip now in our dayes hath expelled the remainders of that Race quite out of Spaine:) and Portugall, which thus freed it selfe, and burthened them, by another course did yet more harme to the Mahumetan profession. For Henry sonne of Iohn the first, set forth Fleets to discouer the Coasts of Africa, and the Ilands adiacent, diuers of which were by the Portugals possessed, and made way to the further discoueries and conquests of that Nation in Africa, and India, to these our dayes, where they haue taken diuers Kingdomes and Cities from the Moores. Of which other places of this Historie in part, and the larger Relations of [i] Barrius in his Decades, of Osorius, Maffæus, Marmol, Arthus, Iarric and others, are ample witnesses.

CHAP. XIII.

Of Biledulgerid and Sarra, otherwise called Numidia, and Libya.

WEe haue now, I suppose, wearied you with so long discourse of that part of Africa on this side Atlas, but such is the difference of the Mindes wearinesse, from that of the Body, that this being wearied with one long iourney, if the same be continued with a second, it is more then tired: the other after a tedious and irkesome way, when another of another nature presents it selfe, is thereby refreshed, and the former wearinesse is with this varietie abated, yea although it bee, as this is, from a better to a worse. Euen the mounting vp this cold hill, and thence to view the Atlantike Ocean on the West, Southward and Eastward the Desarts, will neither make the Soule breathlesse with the steepe ascent, nor faint with so wide prospects of manifold Wildernesses; this of barren Earth, and that of bare Waters; a third seeming to bee mixt of both, a Sea without waters, an Earth without soliditie, a sand not to hazard Ships with her priuie ambushments, but with open violence swallowing men, and disdaining to hold a foot-print as a testimony of subiection; a winde not breathing ayre, but sometimes the higher Element in fiery heates, and sometimes the lower in sandie showres: once a Nature mocking Nature, an order without order, a constant inconstancie; where it is Natures pastime to doe and vndoe; to make Mountaines and Valleyes, and Mountaines of Valleyes at pleasure. Strange is the composition of these places, but stranger is that of the Minde, which feedes it selfe with the cruell hunger, and satiates thirst with insatiable thirstinesse of these Desarts. And whereas the body feareth to be drowned, euen there, where it as much feareth to want water, in this sandie iourney: the Soule (modell of Diuinitie, life of Humanitie) feares no such accidents to it selfe, but in a sweetnesse of varietie delights to suruey all that her first and Ancient inheritance (howsoeuer since by sinne mortgaged and confiscated) and being sequestred from all societies of Men, can here discourse with GOD and Nature in the Desarts. Hither now, after so long a Preamble, we bring you, and at first present vnto your view Numidia, where you shall bee feasted with Dates. which haue giuen the name Biledulgerid (that is, Date-Region) thereunto, and before is made one entire part of seuen, in our [k] diuision of Africa. Ludouicus [l] Marmolius writes it Biledel Gerid. Obserue by the way with Aldrete, that this Numidia is that of the Ancients, which is part of Barbary, but more Southerly; nor hath this Libya of Leo the same bounds with that of the ancient Geographers.

The Easterne border is Ehoacat, a Citie distant one hundred miles from Ægypt; the Westerne is the Atlantike Ocean; the Northerne, Atlas; the Southerne, Libya. This is the basest part of Africa; [m] the Cosmographers not deigning it the name of a Kingdome, the inhabitants thereof are in many places so farre distant from any other. As for example, Tesset a Citie of foure hundred Housholds is seperated from all other habitations three hundred miles. Some places thereof are better peopled. The Numidia described by [n] Ptolomey, Mela, and Plinie, is of a farre lesse bounds, and is rather a part of Barbary, then of this which wee heere describe: called (saith Plinie) Metagonitis, and famous for nothing but Marble, and wilde beasts: The Numidæ called Nomades of their Pastorall life, and change of Pastures, carrying their houses on their Carts. The Cities whereof were Cyrtha, called now Constantina, and Iol, now, as some write, Bugia. The Numidians are notorious for excessiue Venerie. For the Religion of these, whom Leo tearmeth Numidians, hee saith, That in olde time they worship-worshipped certayne Planets, and sacrificed to them; and were like to the Persians, in worship of the Sunne, and the Fire, to both which they built Temples, and like the Vestals in Rome, kept the fire continually burning. Christian Religion began to quench this Fire (as is thought) in the Apostles dayes, which after was peruerted by Arrianisme, subuerted by Mahometisme. Iewish Religion had heere some footing also, before that Christianitie was Preached to them. * Mercatoris Theatrum.

The Numidians liue long, but lose their Teeth betimes (sowre sauce for their sweet Dates) and their eyes also pay vntimely tributes to the Sands, which the windes very busily and often send as their Searchers and Customers, till at last they can see to pay them no more. In all Numidia the French disease (as wee terme it) is vnknowne, and in Libya. I haue knowne saith Leo, an hundred persons that haue beene cured of that maladie, onely by passing ouer Atlas and breathing this ayre. This disease was not heard of in Africa, till King Ferdinand expelled the Iewes out of Spaine, and the Moores by lying with the Iewes wiues got the same; and generally infected Barbary, calling it therefore the Spanish disease. The Plague also infecteth Barbary once in ten, fifteene, or fiue and twentie yeeres, and destroyeth great multitudes, because they haue little regard or remedie for it. In Numidia it is scarce knowne once to happen in an hundred yeeres, and in the Land of Negroes neuer. Worse diseases then Pox or Plague possesse the Numidians, namely, ignorance of Diuine, Morall and Naturall knowledge, Treason, Murther, Robberie, without all respect of any thing. If any of them are hired in Barbary, they are employed in base Offices, Scullians, Dung-farmers, and what not? Neither are the Libyans or Negroes much better.

Of the Numidians and Libyans, are fiue peoples, Zenaga, Guenzaga, Terga, Lemta, and Berdeua, and liue all after the same manner, and order, that is, without manners or order at all. There garments of base cloath, scarce couer halfe their bodie. The Gentlemen (Gentlemen must pardon me the abasing of the Name) to bee distinguished from the rest, weare a jacket of blew Cotton with wide sleeues. Their Steeds are Camels, on which they ride without Stirrops or Saddles, and vse a goad in stead of Spurres, and a leather fastened in a hole bored thorow the gristles of the Camels nose, serues them for a Bridle; Mattes made of Rushes are their Beds, and Wooll growing on their Date-trees, yeelds matter for their Tents. Their food is often-times patience with an emptie belly: which when they fill, bread or meate after any sort is absent: Onely they haue their Camels milke, whereof they drinke a dish-full next their heart: and certaine dry flesh sodde in Butter and Milke, euery one with his hands raking out his share of these dainties, after drinking the broath; and then drinke vp a cup of Milke, and Supper is done. Whiles Milke lasteth, they care not for water, especially in the Spring-time, all which season, some neuer wash hands or face, because they neuer goe to the places where they may haue Water. And the Camels haue ioyned with their masters in this neerenesse, not regarding water, whiles they may feed on grasse.

All their life (or that space rather, before they dye, not worthy the name of life) is spent in Hunting, and robbing their enemies; not staying aboue three or foure dayes in a place, as long as the Grasse will serue their Camels. They haue ouer euery Tribe One, in manner of a King, whom they honour and obey. Very rarely is a Iudge found amongst them, and to him such as are litigious, ride sometimes fiue or sixe dayes iourney. Him will they amply reward with a thousand Duckats more or lesse by the yeere. As for Letters, Arts, Vertue, they dwel not in these Desarts. They are very jealous, which is the death of many. Yet are they liberall after their manner to Strangers, as I my selfe (it is Leos report) can testifie. For going ouer the Desarts with a Carauan of Merchants, the Prince of Zanaga encountred vs with fiue hundred men on Camels, and caused vs to pay our Customes: and then inuited vs to his Tents. There did hee kill many Camels to feast vs, both young and old, and as many gelded, and Ostriches, which they had taken in the way. And when the Merchants shewed themselues loth, that hee should make such slaughters of them, he said, That it were shame to entertaine them with small Cattell onely, being strangers. So wee had Roast, and Boyled; and Bread of Panike, very fine; and Dates great plentie. Hee honoured our companie with his presence; but he ate together with his Nobles, seperate from vs: and had with him certaine Religious and Learned men, to sit with him, which all the Meale-time touched no Bread, but onely Flesh and Milke: the reason, the Prince gaue vs, because they were borne in the Desarts, where no Corne grew. Onely they ate Bread on certaine solemne Feasts; as, at Easter, and day of Sacrifices. Thus did this liberall Prince spend on vs ten times the value of his Customes. After this manner also liue the Africans, called Soana.

The Tracts of [a] Numidia, most in name, are these: Data, which extendeth it selfe two hundred and fiftie miles in length; where are great store of Date-trees, whereof some are male, and some female; the first brings forth onely Flowers; the other, Fruit. And they take a knotted bough of the male, and engraft it in the female; otherwise, the Dates proue nought and almoſt all ſtone. They feed their Goates with the ſtones of the Dates beaten, and therewith they grow fatte, and yeeld ſtore of Milke. Segelmeſſe was built (if any liſt to beleeue Bicri, an African Coſmographer) by Alexander the Great. Heere were certaine Colledges and Temples. The people of the Countrey liued on Dates. They haue no Fleas: a ſmall priuiledge; for they haue infinite ſtore of Scorpions.

b Bicri, an African Coſmographer, his errour.

Fighig hath induſtrious and wittie people; whereof, ſome become Merchants; others, Students, and goe to Fez; where hauing obtayned the degree of Doctors, they returne into Numidia, and are made Prieſts and Preachers, and ſo become rich. Tegorarin hath Traffique with the Negros. They water their Corne-fields with Well-water, and therefore are forced to lay on much ſoyle. In which reſpect, they will let Strangers haue their houſes Rent-free, onely the Dung of Themſelues and their Beaſts excepted. They will expoſtulate with that ſtranger, which ſhall in ſome nicer humour goe out of doores to that buſineſſe, and aske him, if hee know not the place appointed thereunto. Heere were many rich Iewes, which by meanes of a Preacher of Telenſin were ſpoyled, and moſt of them ſlaine, at the ſame time that Ferdinand chaſed them out of Spaine.

Techort is a Numidian Towne, exceeding courteous to Strangers, whom they entertaine at free-coſt, and marrie their Daughters to them, rather then to the Natiues. Peſcara is exceedingly infeſted with Scorpions, whoſe ſting is preſent death: wherefore the Inhabitants in Summer time forſake their Citie, and ſtay in their Countrey-poſſeſſions till Nouember.

Libya extendeth it ſelfe from the Confines of Eloachat vnto the Atlantike, betwixt the Numidians and Negros. It is one other of the Seuen parts, into which wee haue diuided Africa: the Arabians call it Sarra; that is, a Deſart. Plinie c in the beginning of his fift Booke, ſayth, That all Africa by the Græcians was called Libya. Taken in a more proper ſence, it is diuerſly d bounded by the Ancients, and therefore wee will heere hold vs to Leo's deſcription. The name Libya is deriued from Libs, a Mauritanian King, as ſome e affirme. Herodotus f ſaith, of a woman named Libya. Among the Libyans are reckoned g the Libyarchæ, Lebiophænices, Libyægyptij, and diuers other Nations, euen of the h Ancients accuſed, for want of inward and outward good things, cunning onely in Spoyle and Robberie. The Libyans worſhipped one Pſaphon i for their God, induced thereunto by his ſubtiltie. For he had taught Birds to ſing, PSAPHON is a great God: which being ſet at libertie, chaunted this note in the Woods, and eaſily perſwaded the wilde people to this deuotion; which Ælian ſaith, Annon had endeuoured in vaine. It was the cuſtome of Women to howle in their Temples, k whence ſome of the Bacchanall Rites were borrowed by the Græcians. Vnto the Libyans are reckoned thoſe Nations, whoſe barbarous Rites are before related in the ſeuenth Chapter of this Booke. Wee will now come to later Obſeruations. l Men may trauell eight dayes, or more, in the Libyan Deſarts ordinarily, without finding any water. The Deſarts are of diuers ſhapes, ſome couered with grauell, others with ſand, both without water: heere and there is a lake, ſometime a ſhrub, or a little graſſe. Their water is drawne out of deepe pits, and is brackiſh, and ſometimes the ſands couer thoſe pits, and then the Trauellers periſh for thirſt. The Merchants that trauell to Tombuto, or other places this way, carrie water with them on Camels; and if water faile them, m they kill their Camels, and drinke water which they wring out of their guts. Their Camels are of great abilitie to ſuſtaine thirſt, ſometimes trauelling without drinke twelue dayes or more. Otherwiſe they were neuer able to trauell thorow thoſe Deſarts.

In the Deſart of Azaoad there are two Sepulchres of Stone, wherein certaine letters engrauen teſtifie, that Two Men were there buried; one a very rich Merchant, who tormented with thirſt, bought of the other, which was a Carrier or tranſporter of wares, a cup of Water, for ten thouſand Duckats, and dyed neuertheleſſe; both buyer and ſeller with thirſt.

Their liues for lewdneſſe reſemble the Numidians before mentioned, but for length come much ſhort of them, few attayning to threeſcore yeeres. n They are (as little need as they haue thereof) often plagued with thoſe clouds of Graſhoppers, which couer the ayre, and deſtroy the earth.

The Libyan Deſart of Zanhaga beginning at the Weſterne Ocean, extendeth it ſelfe farre and wide betweene the Negros and the Numidians, to the Salt-pits of Tegaza. From the Well of Azaoad, to the Well of Araoan, an hundred and fiftie miles ſpace, is no water; for lacke whereof, many both men and beaſts there periſh. Likewiſe in the Deſart Gogdem, for nine dayes iourney no drop of water is found. In the Deſart of Targa is Manna found, which the Inhabitants gather in little veſſels, and carrie to Agadez to ſell. They mingle it with their drinke, and with their pottage: It is very wholſome. Tegaza is an inhabited place, where are many veynes of Salt, which reſemble Marble, they digge it out of pits, and ſell it to Merchants of Tombuto, who bring them victuals. For they are twenty dayes iourney from any habitation, the cause that sometimes they all die of famine. They are much molested with the South-east winde, which maketh many of them to lose their sight. Bardeoa was found out lately by one Hamar, a guide vnto a Carauan of Merchants, who lost his way by reason of a maladie that fell into his eyes; yet blind as hee was, hee rode on a Camell; none else being able to guide them: and at euery miles end caused some sand to bee giuen vnto him, whereon hee smelled, and thereby at last told them of an inhabited place, forty miles before he came at it: where, when they came, they were denied water, and were forced by force to obtaine it.

The Riuers that arise out of Atlas, and by the vnkindnesse of their Kinde, fall this way, finding these thirsty Wildernesses to yeeld them the readiest channels, are trained alongst by the allurements of the sands, stouping and crouching to them, till being further from witnesses, they are either swallowed vp of great Lakes, or else whiles they hold on their pursuit for the Ocean, lose themselues in the search, and whiles they are liberall to the thirstie sands in the way, at last dye themselues (I cannot say, diue themselues, as else where in the World) for thirst in the Desarts. And yet through these wayelesse wayes, doth couetousnesse carry, both the Arabians in their rouings, and Merchants with their Carauans to the Negros for wealth: whither: I thinke, at last you expect the comming of this our Carauan also.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the Land of Negros.

§. I.

Of the Riuer NIGER, Gualata, Senaga, and Guinea.

Igrataram terra, or the Land of Negros, [a] either is so called of the Riuer Niger, or of the blacke colour of the Inhabitants: some thinke the Riuer is named Niger of the people: it hath on the North those Desarts which we last left; on the South, the Æthiopike Ocean, and the Kingdome of Congo; on the East, Nilus; on the West, the Atlantike. Leo makes Gaogo in the East, and Gualata in the West, the limits thereof. On the side of the Riuer Canaga it is sandie and desart, beyond, it is plentifull, being watered with Niger, which runnes thorow the middest of it. There are no Hils neere the bankes of Niger, but wooddie places diuers, receptacles of Elephants. Raines doe neither good nor harme: onely Niger ministers them plenty, as Nilus in Egypt: Their encrease is likewise alike; fortie dayes together after the middest of Iune doth Niger encrease, at which time the Negro Townes are Ilands, and the way to them by Boats; and as many it deceaseth. The Merchants in July, August and September, trade in Boats made of a hollowed tree (like the Indian Canoas.) [b] This Riuer some thinke, ariseth out of a Desart called Seu, from a great Lake: some with lesse likelihood, thinke it an arme of Nilus: [c] and some with no truth, thinke it to be deriued from Paradise. It is by Geographers [d] brought from a Lake, which they call Niger, within two degrees of the Equinoctiall, and running thence Northwards, hides himselfe from the violence of the Sunnes furie, vnder a Mantle of Earth, sixty miles together, and then the Earth discouering him, hee runnes not farre, but in reuenge he couereth a great part of the Earth, and drowneth the same in a Lake called Borneo, till the Earth againe with her strong Armes claspes him in straiter bankes, and forceth him to turne his streame Westward, in which way hauing gotten Fresh helpe of some other streames, that send in their succours, he againe preuayleth, and quert hrowes the Earth in the Lake Guber: but shee getting vp againe, makes him flee to the Ocean for ayde, with whose tide-forces assisted, he rends the Earth into many Ilands, which hee holds as Captiues betweene his waterie [e] armes of Senaga, Gambra, and diuers others, which euer let slip their hold, and yet euer hold them in euerlasting captiuitie. In this combate whiles both parts sweate in contention a fatter excrement is left behind, which all this way heartens the Earth with admirable fertilitie: especially then when the Cloudes in the Summer time take Nigers part, and daily marshall their mighty showres to the Riuers ayde, shooting off continually in their march their Airie Ordnance, with dreadfull lightnings, whereat the amazed Earth shrinkes in her selfe, and the insulting waters for three monethes space trample ouer all, and send Colonies of fishes to inhabit the soyle, engirting meane-while all the Townes with a strait siege. But when the Sunne, in his Autumne Progresse, sends forth the Winds to summon the Clouds to attend on his fiery Chariot; The Earth by degrees lookes vp with her dirty face (bemired with washing) and makes vse of the slime, which cannot runne away with the fleeting waters, to serue her all the yeere after, as Treasurer of her plenty and abundance.

m Leo lib. 7. Bichri and Meshudi, ancient African Writers, knew little of these parts: m but a Mahumetan Preacher in the 380. yeere of the Hegeira, made the people of Luntuna, and Libya, of his faithlesse faith: and after that, they were discouered. They liued, saith Leo, like beasts, without King, Lord, Common-wealth, or any gouernment, scarce knowing to sow their grounds: clad in skins of beasts: not hauing any peculiar wife; but lye tenne or twlue men together, each man chusing which he best liked. Warre they wage with no other Nation, nor are desirous to trauell out of their Countrey. Some worship the Sunne at the rising: Others, as the people of Gualata, the Fire: and those of Gaoga are Christians like the Egyptians: Ioseph King of Marocco subdued them: and after that the fiue peoples of Libya, of whom they learned the Mahumetane Law, and other Artes, and the Merchants of Barbary frequented those parts. The Libyans diuided them into fifteene parts, each third part of those fiue peoples possessing one.

n Anno 1526. But the n present King of Tombuto, Abuaci Izchia, being made Generall of the Forces of Soni Heli the former King, which was a Libyan, after his death slue his Sonnes, and brought the Kingdome to the Negros, conquering many Prouinces. After which he went to Mecca on Pilgrimage, and thereby set himselfe in debt an hundred and fifty thousand Ducats. A great part of those Parts by their difference of Language and Religion, is yet vnknowne to vs.

Gualata was subdued by the King of Tombuto, a beggerly Countrey. This Region adioyneth to Cape Blanco. The Portugals, when they discouered these Coasts for Henry the Infanta, traded heere for slaues as farre as Canaga, or Senaga (to which our Nation • hath since traded) and is an arme, as is said, of Niger. Heere begins the Countrey of Guinea or Ginny, in which we will first giue description of the Kingdomes and Nations alongst the Coast: next, we will set downe some obseruations of former times: in the third place, those of the Dutch, and lastly, of the Iesuits.

o Ric. Rainolds. Hack. Iarric. Thes. Rer. Indic. tom. 3. l. 1. c. 44. The Portugals reckon all to Guinea, from Sanaga, in sixteene degrees to the North, and the Angolan limits in thirteene degrees of Southerly Latitude: so called of Genus situate on the said Riuer: All the Kingdomes of Congo and Angola they terme the Lower, the Northerly part, the Higher Guinea: Senaga, Sanaga or Zanaga, the Ancients called Stachiris or Darat. From hence Southward is Cape Verd or the Greene Cape, anciently called Arsinarium, against which are twelue Ilands, which beare name of this Cape, which being desart were first inhabited by the Portugals.

Anno 1446. On the Coast (for wee must leaue these Ilands to their due place) the first Kingdome is that of the Ialophs or Ialoeses bounded with Zanaga on the North, the Sea on the West, on the East the black Ialoeses, called Fulli Galalli, on the South the Berbecines; a Region contayning a hundred and fiue and twenty leagues in length. The Countrey is rich in Fruites and Gold, whereof in p Tobucato is great store. In these parts are many Portugals turned wilde and barbarous after the fashion of the Natiues, hauing in manner put off all Christianity: in nakednesse, in figuring their skinnes with indelible Characters and formes of diuers creatures, and in like behauiour conforming themselues to the Negros. They are called Tangos maos, and through all Guinea procure such Commodities as they may sell to European Merchants. Southwards from hence are the Kingdomes of Ala and Brocall, inhabited by the Berbecines: these worship the New Moone, and sacrifice to certaine Trees, which they embrue with the bloud of the slaine Sacrifices, and with meale of Rice. When the King of Ala goes to Warre, hee assembleth his chiefe men into a Groue neere the Palace: where they digge a Ditch in a round Circle, and there euery man declareth his opinion: after this consultation the Ditch is closed, and vnder paine of Treason, all which hath beene spoken must bee concealed, and as it were thus buried. The Maydens beautifie themselues with such skinne-figures as yee haue heard, on their bodies and faces, cut and pounced, with the iuyce of Hearbes made to endure: they also bore their lips, especially the lower, inserting in the holes bones and peeces of Wood; and weightie things to make it hang from the vpper lip: Opinion can giue lothsomenesse the prize of Beautie. The Kingdome of Brocall extends to Gambea, which Riuer is so great, deepe, and strong, that the Sea in thirtie leagues from the mouth (which opens it selfe fiue leagues in disgorging his full stomacke) can scarcely subdue it vnto his salt qualitie: Some thinke it proceedes from the same Fountayne with Niger, whence these peoples are called Negros.

gros, some, that this and Zanaga procted from the same head. Midway betwixt both is the Greene Cape.

Alongst both sides of this Riuer dwell the Mandingæ, a perfidious and Idolatrous Nation, which haue certaine Inchanters called Bexerini to performe their Priestly Holies. The Riuer is sayled vp a hundred and threescore Leagues, horrible Precipices and Cataracts, forbidding further passage by water: they call this fall a Bow, for the obliquitie of the fall, suffering men to passe vnder without wetting. Many fertile and pleasant Ilands are contayned in the diuided armes of this streame. The Inhabitants haue Shippes of good bignesse and strength. Not farre hence to the South is Cape Saint Marie, from which to the Riuer of Dominico is thirtie leagues, peopled by the Arriari and Falupi. Here is also the Riuer Casamanqua, inhabited on the North by the Iabundi, on the South the Benhumi, to whom on the East adioyne the Casangæ; the King is subiect to the King of Iarem, and hee to another more within Land, and so in degrees vnto the Monarch of Mandinga, whose chiefe Citie is Songus, aboue a hundred leagues Eastward from the Cape of Palmes: to this King the most of the former are subiect. The Casangæ worship an Idoll called China, which is nothing else but a bundle of staues or poles pitched into the ground, and fastened together with paste made of the meale of Rice and Millet, which they sprinkle with the bloud of sacrificed Kine and Goates. Some hang on the top thereof two or three skuls of Dogges. The Temple to this goodly Deitie is some shadie Tree, and there they offer also Millet, and the Wine of Palmes. To secure their Seede they sticke one of these poles in the ground. The Portugals buy slaues in these parts, sold by reason of the Kings vnreasonable tyrannie.

The Burami adioyne to the Casangæ on both sides the Riuer Iarim or Dominico; as farre as Rio Grand. Here also they buy slaues. The men and women file their teeth: the women to keepe their tongues in order, euery morning take a draught of water into their mouthes, and there hold it till Dinner or Breakfast time, meane-while doing their houshold businesse, not spitting, eating, or talking. The chiefe Towne of the Burami is eight leagues from the Hauen, where the chiefe King to whom the rest are subiect, resides. Their Houses are of Earth: couered with leaues. The Bijags inhabit neere the great Riuer, a fierce warlike robbing people, possessing also seuenteene Iles: the Portugals haue there the Towne of the Crosse. The Beafares also in these parts are dispersed, of whom the King of Guinala carrieth the greatest state and pompe, at whose death all his Wiues and Seruants, and dearest Clients, and the Kings Horse, are slaine and intombed with him to serue him in the other life. The like vsage is in very many of these Guinean Kingdomes, to which they adde further cruelty in the manner: for they cut off their toes and fingers, and beate their bones as it were in a Morter three houres (longer then which they could not out-liue this torture) and then in the sight of those which were to vndergo the like fate, thrust them into the neck with a sharpe stake, so finishing their blinde Martyrdome. On the other side the Riuer is Biguba a Portugall Towne, the best they haue in these parts: the Natiues are Beafares, whose King being dead, the strongest is his Heire, the cause of much Warre. Betweene this and Cape Sierra Liona (so called of the Lyon-like roring made there by the waues, if not of the Thunders and dreadfull storme) are the Mallisians, Bagasians, and Cozolines. In these parts Grapes and Sugar-canes grow wilde: store also of Cotton, Brasill Wood of seuen colours, Graines called Malegetta of the name of the Region, long Pepper, Millet, besides Waxe and Iuory. Out of their Palmes they draw Wine and Oyle, and a certaine excellent Sope, forbidden (as is also the long Pepper) for the excellence to bee carried into Portugall.

They haue Apes called Baris exceeding great, and so industrious, that being brought vp in the house, they supply the roome of a seruant; going on their hinder feete, beating things in the Morter, fetching water home in Vessels, which yet if none bee ready to take from them, they will cast downe and breake, and then howle. Heere is store of Iron better then ours, but their best Commoditie is Gold, but no Forreiners know the Mines whence they haue it. The Portugals called their Castle here [m] built, Saint George of the Mine, in the fift degree of Northerly latitude. In Sierra Liona are thirteene Riuers which fall into the Sea. On the Riuer Das Piedras the Portugals haue a Towne. Capor and Tambassire two other Riuers, fall from the Hils Machamala, in which is a great Rocke of most pure Chrystall. Two of these Riuers, Tagaris on the North, and Bangua on the South of this Lion-hill, make it a Peninsula in some places so neere, that they carry their Boates by Land from one to the other. The Inhabitants are the Cumbæ, and the Natiues called Capi; these more ingenious then other Guineans. They haue their Kings which administer Law, hauing to that purpose round Galleries not farre from their Palaces called Funkes, where is a high Throne for the King, and lower Seates on both sides for his Counsellors called Solatequis.

In the Creation of a Solatequis the rite obſerued is this: they place the perſon to be created in a faire ſeate of wood, and then the King ſtrikes his face with the inwards of a Goat, that the bloud and filth runnes downe his breſt, then ſprinkles him with meale, and after puts a Capon his head. When the King dies, his Sonne, Brother or next Kinſman ſucceeds: but before his full Regalitie, they bind him at his houſe, and lead him bound to the Palace, there whip him; after this they looſen him, attire and leade him to the Iudgement Seat, where the eldeſt Counſellor makes an Oration concerning his right and dutie, which ended, he puts a Hatchet into his hand which they vſe in Executions, and after this all acknowledge ſubiection. No leſſe ſtrange is their cuſtome for their Maydens.

In euery City or Village they haue a houſe, ſeuered like a Monaſticall Cloyſter from the reſt, in which all the Martiageable Virgins are kept and inſtructed a yeeres ſpace by ſome old man of beſt eſtimation. This done, they are brought forth well apparelled with Muſicke and Dances: there the youngmen make their choice and bargaine, with the Father, paying alſo the Old man for his yeeres ſchooling. Obſeruations of thoſe parts out of CADAMOSTA, and other Ancient Nauigators.

a Cadamoſto. NOw for further particulars of the Guinean Nation, we will begin with the Nauigations of former times. The people inhabiting on the Riuer Sanaga, Aloiſe a di Cadamoſti, a Venetian, calls Azanaghi, and ſaith, that when firſt the Portugals ſayled thither, their ſimplicity, was ſuch, hauing neuer before ſeene a ſhip that they tooke the ſhips for great Birds with white wings, out of ſome ſtrange place comming thither: but when they ſaw them ſtrike ſayle, they changed their opinion, and thought them to be fiſhes, ſeeing them afarre off: but when they ſaw them the next day ſo farre off from that place, they tooke them for night-goblings or ſpirits.

This did he learne of diuers of the Azanaghi, ſlaues in Portugall. They hid their faces no leſſe then the priuities, eſteeming the mouth vnmeete to be ſeene, whence they belched ſuch ſowre breath. They had a kind of Muffler to hide it, and part of the noſe onely diſcouering the ſame at meate. Other Gouernours they then had not, only more reuerence was done to the moſt rich. A beggerly, theeuiſh, lying, trecherous Nation, as any in the World. They anoint their haire euery day with fat of fiſh for great gallantry, whereof they ſtinke exceedingly. And leſt you ſhould thinke better of their Eyes then of their Noſe, their women eſteeme it the greateſt part of goodly feature, to haue large Breſts, which by Art and induſtrious ſtretching of them, they enlarge, and ſome of them haue them hanging to their Nauell.

Neere vnto thoſe are certaine Negros, which ſuffer not themſelues to be ſeene of any, nor to be heard ſpeake: but haue excellent Gold which they exchange with other Negros, which bring vnto them Salt, ſuch as the Minerall Salt of Tagazza, and leauing the ſame, they goe away from thence halfe a dayes iourney: the Negros come downe in certain Baſkets, and lay at euery heape of Salt a quantity of Gold; and goe their wayes. When the Salt-Merchants returne, if they like the summe, they take it; if not, they leaue the Gold still with the Salt, and goe their wayes: and then the other returne, and what heapes of Salt they find without Gold, they take for their own: the other, either they leaue more Gold for, or els leaue altogether. This seemeth hard to beleeue, but many of the Arabians and Azanhagi testified it to our Author for truth. The Merchants of Melli affirmed to mee, that their Prince had once by a plot taken one of them, thinking to haue learned the condition of that people, but either of sullennesse, or because hee could not, hee neither ate nor spake, and within three dayes dyed. Their statute, they which had taken him, affirmed to bee a hand higher then themselues: and that their nether lip was thicke and red, and so great that it hung downe to their brest, and it together with their Gummes bloudie: their teeth great, and on each side one very large: their eyes standing out: terrible they were to looke vpon. And because they had apprehended this man by their ambushment, they returned not in three yeeres: but after forced by the need of Salt to cure their diseases (whence haply that deformitie proceeded) they renued that Traffique.

To leaue these farre within Land, and come to the [a] Riuer Senaga. Cadamosto iustly maruelled at the partition which that Riuer caused: for on the one side the Inhabitants were well proportioned, very blacke, and the soyle very fertile: on the other side, the Inhabitants, meagre, small, swart, and the ground barren. The people, that dwell on the bankes of Niger, are called Gilofi. The Kings name in my time (which was [b] almost an hundred and threescore yeeres since) was Zuchali. He had thirty Wiues. When Richard [c] Rainolds was there 1591. the Kings name was Amar Melik. All that Region betwixt Sanaga and Gambea is called by one generall name, Gualof: of which Maffæus [d] and Barrius write, That in an accident of ciuill warres Bemoin came to the King of Portugall for aide, and was there royally entertayned and baptized with his followers; of which, some were of such admirable dexteritie and nimblenesse of bodie, that they would leape vpon a Horse as hee galloped, and would stand vpright in the Saddle, when he ranne fastest, and turne themselues about, and suddenly sit downe, and in the same race would take vp stones laid in order on the ground, and leape downe and vp at pleasure. This Bemoin was shametully murthered by Peter Vaz, the Portugall Generall, and the hope of Christianity in those parts disappointed. This was Anno 1489.

a Barrius dec. 1. l. 3. c. 8. & Maffeus hist. Ind. l. 1. saith, that Senaga and Gambea were by the Ancients called Stachiris and Daradus. This name Senaga was giuen by reason that the Prince was so called.

From thence [e] Cadamosto went to Budomel; the Prince whereof was had in great respect by his people: which when they come into his presence, kneele on both their knees, and bowing their heads to the ground, cast sand ouer their shoulders, and on their heads, with both hands, and then to goe towards him on their knees; and when they speake to him, cast sand ouer their shoulders still, with their head bowed downe, the Prince scarcely deigning them a looke, or word. For euery light offence hee would sell their Wiues and Children. He suffered our Authour to goe into his Moschee, where his Arabian Chaplaines, after their manner, mumbled their Mattens ten or twelue times in halfe an houre; all the company rising and falling againe to the Earth, and kissing it. He also heard him willingly confute the Mahumetan, and approoue the Christian Faith: but said, hee thought it was harder for a Christian to bee saued then a Negro, because God was a iust God and Lord, who had giuen vs to many good things in this World; to them nothing in comparison, who should therefore in the other World haue their Paradise, which heere they wanted. Easily might he haue beene turned to Christianity, but for feare of losing his State. His Wiues prouide him his dyet, as it is vsuall among the Negros, and none but his Priests and some principall men eate with him; which is after a beastly sort lying on the ground, the dish set in the middest, and all taking out the meate with their hands. They eate little at once, but eate often, foure or fiue times a day.

From October to Iune it raines not there. They haue great Serpents, and many, which they vse to charme: and the Prince when hee would poyson his Weapons, did (as was reported) make a great Circle, and enchanted by his Charmes all the Serpents thereabouts thereinto, and then killed that which seemed to him most venemous, letting the rest goe: with the bloud thereof, and the Seed of a certaine Tree, he tempered a poyson for that purpose, with which a Weapon infected, drawing neuer so little bloud, did kill in a quarter of an houre. They haue great store of Parrats, which are instructed by a maruellous naturall cunning to preuent the Serpents, which would else destroy their nests. They build therefore on high trees, and on the end of some tender bough thereof they fasten a Bul-rush, which hangs downe two spannes, thereunto weauing and working their nest in such sort, that the Serpents for feare of falling, dare not aduenture to deale therewith. The Negros came about Cadamosto, with wonder to see his apparell, and the whiteneſse of his colour (neuer before had they seene any Christian) and some of them with spittle rubbed his skinne, to see whether ther his whiteneſſe were naturall, or no: which perceiuing it to bee no tincture, they were out of meaſure aſtoniſhed. They would then giue nine, or ſometimes fourteene ſlaues, for a Horſe furniſhed. And when they buy a Horſe, they wil bring ſome of their Enchanters, which make a fire of herbes, and ſet the Horſe ouer the ſmoke, vttering certaine words; and after that anoint him with a thin oynt ment, and ſhut him vp twenty dayes, that none may ſee him, hanging certaine trumpery about his necke, thinking that hereby they are more ſecure in battle. Gunnes ſeemed to them, for their hideous noyſe, to be of the Deuill. Bag-pipes they thought to be a liuing creature, that thus ſang in variable accents. But when they were ſuffered to handle them, they thought them to bee ſome heauenly thing, that God had made with his owne hands, to ſound ſo ſweetly. They beheld the Shippe with great curioſitie; and eyes that were carued in the Prow of the Shippe, they tooke to bee eyes indeed, by which it ſaw how to direct the courſe at Sea. They ſaid, the Chriſtians that could thus make Voyages by Sea, were great Enchanters, and comparable to the Deuill, themſelues had enough to doe to trauell by Land. Seeing a Candle burne in the night, they which knew not to make any light but their fires, eſteemed it wonderfull. Honey they haue, which they ſucke out of the Combes, but the Waxe they hurled away, till they were inſtructed how to make Candles thereof.

Senega (Boterus ſaith) comes from the Lakes Chelonidi. Sanutus affirmeth that Senega is the ſame which Ptolemey cals Darandus, Gambea or Gambra, that which hee cals Stachir, and Rio Grande is Niger.

Cadamoſto doubled the Promontorie, called Cape Verde, or the greene Cape, becauſe of the greene trees which the Portugals (which had firſt diſcouered it in the yeere before) found there growing in abundance; as [h] Cape Blanco, or the White Cape, was ſo called of the White Sands there. The Inhabitants they found were of two ſorts, Barbacini, and Serers. They haue no Prince. They are great Idolaters, and haue no Law: but are very cruell. They poyſon their Arrowes; with which, and the ſituation of their Countrey, they haue preſerued themſelues from the Kings of Senega.

In Gambra they were, ſome Idolaters of diuers ſorts, ſome Mahumetans. They were alſo great Enchanters. Their liuing as at Senega, ſaue that they eate Dogges fleſh. Heere the Prince hunted an Elephant, and gaue them to eate: the fleſh is ſtrong and vnſauoury. The Elephants delight in mire like Swine. They hunt them in the Woodes: for in the Plaines an Elephant would, without running, ſoone take and kill the ſwifteſt man (whom yet they hurt not, except they be firſt prouoked) if with comming and often turning, hee bee not diſappointed.

Here was a kind of fiſh Cadomoſto [i] calleth it Cauallo, and his Latine Interpreter, Piſcis Caballinus; I take it for the Hippopotamus, or Riuer-horſe) which is (ſayth he) as bigge as a Cow; his legges ſhort, with tuskes like to a Bores, but ſo great, that I haue ſeene one of two ſpannes, and longer, clouen-footed, and headed like a Horſe: hee liueth on both Elements, ſometimes in the Water, other-whiles on the Land. The women vpon their breſts, neckes, and armes, had certaine workes, done with a Needles point, heated in the fire, in manner as with vs they worke hand-kerchiefes. This being done in their youth, would neuer out. The like fleſh-branded workes they vſe at Cape Sagres, as Pietro [k] de Sintra, a Portugall, obſerued vpon their bodies and faces. The Inhabitants there are Idolaters, and worſhip Images of Wood, to whom they offer ſome of their Meate and Drinke, when they goe to their meales. The goe naked, couering their priuie parts with the barkes of trees. This is [l] in Guinea.

A little from thence they found men who vſed as great brauery in their eares, which they bored full of holes, and weare therein Rings of Golde in rowes or rankes. They weare one great Ring in another hole bored thorow their Noſe, like to Buffles in Italy: which when they eate their meate, they tooke away. The men and women of ſort weare ſuch Rings alſo in their lips, in like ſort as in their eares, an Enſigne of their Nobility and greatneſſe, which they put in and out at pleaſure. Beyond the Riuer of Palmes they found others thus beringed, and for greater gallantry weare about their neckes certaine Chaines of teeth, ſeeming to bee the teeth of men. They tooke a Negro, whom they carried into Portugall, who affirmed, if a woman which onely could vnderſtand him, did interpret him rightly, that in his Countrey were Vnicornes.

h Likewiſe Cape Sierra Lionа is ſo called of the Lion-like terrour thereof, alwayes couered on the top with cloudes, which yeeld dreadfull thunders and lightnings It ſeemes to be the ſame that Ptolemie and Hanno call the Chariot of the Gods. G. Bot. Ben.

l The Hollanders were entertained of a King in Guinea, but very miſerably: an old woman naked, three times went about the Captaine, with certaine murmuring words, & caſt aſhes on his clothes. The Nobles about the King were naked. Hol. Nauig. 1599.

Other Obseruations of later times by Englishmen and others.

AND these Countreyes haue since beene sought to u by French, Flemish, and many of our English Merchants. In the yeere 1553. x Thomas Windham, and Anthony Pinteado, a Portugall, in two English ships traded alongst those Coasts, as farre as Benin, where they presented themselues to the King, who sate in a great Hall, the wals whereof were made of Earth without windowes, the roofe of thinne boards, open in diuers places. His Nobles about him neuer looke him in the face, but sit cowring vpon their buttockes, with their elbowes vpon their knees, and their hands before their faces, not looking vp till the King command them. And when they depart out of his presence, they turne not their backes vpon him. Such reuerend regard doth that Negro King receiue of them.

The next yeere y Master Iohn Lock went for Captaine into those parts, to trade for Gold, Graines, and Elephants teeth. And after that, diuers Voyages were thither made by William z Towrson, who obserued at the Riuer of Saint Vincent, strange trees, with great leaues like great Dockes, longer then that a man could reach the top of them: and a kind of Pease by the Sea-side growing on the Sands like trees, with stalkes seuen and twentie paces long. Diuers of the women had brests exceeding long. At the Cape Tres puntas they made him sweare, by the water of the Sea, that hee would not hurt them, before they would trade with him. King Abaan a Negro entertained our men kindly; hee caused to bee brought a pot of Wine of Palme, Palme, or Coco, which they draw forth of trees, as we haue elsewhere obserued; but their Ceremonies in drinking are thus: First, they bring forth their pot of drinke, and then make a hole in the ground, and put some of the drinke into it, and after that cast in the Earth againe, and thereon set their pot, and with a little thing made of a Gourd, take out of the same drinke, and put it vpon the ground in three places: and in diuers places they haue certaine bunches of the pils of Palme-trees set in the ground before them, and there they put in some drinke, doing great reuerence in all places to the same Palme-trees. All these Ceremonies done, the King tooke a cup of Gold, in which they put Wine; and whiles hee dranke, all the people cryed Abaan, Abaan, with certaine other words; and then they gaue drinke to euery one. The like Ceremonies they vse in all the Countrey.

a Iames Welsh. In Benin a the people goe naked till they be married, and then are clothed from the waste to the knees. Their bread is a kind of Rootes, called Inamia, which when it is well sodden, may be preferred before ours. They haue here great spouts of water falling out of the Aire, which if they light on a ship, doe endanger the same. They fall like the pillars of Churches. As for those Voyages to those parts, made by b Rutter, Fenner, Ingram, or others, I referre them to Master Hackluyts Collections. One writeth, c That the King of Benin hath sixe hundred Wiues: with all which twice a yeere he goeth in pompe, the Gentlemen haue, some of them, fourescore; some fourescore and ten: the meanest, ten or twelue. At Cape de Lopo Gonsalues, some pray to the Sunne, others to the Moone, or to certaine trees, or to the Earth; esteeming it a great sinne to spit vpon it, from whence they receiue their food. Men and women inke their bodies, putting thereon grease mixed with colour. They will not drinke before they put out some, and drinke not when they eate. They offer their wiues to strangers. The King keepeth his Daughters, when they are growne, for Wiues; and the Queenes, with like incestuous abomination, vse their Sonnes. They paint their bodies red: vse Bananas dried in stead of bread, and lay all their meates in a dish together.

d Ant. Ienkinson. Hak. To. 1. These wormes come out of their legs, or some fleshie part.

About the Castle of Mina they are subiect to such Wormes, as Master Ienkinson d hath obserued to grow vpon men at Boghar in Bactria, by drinking the water of the Riuer there; which are an Ell long, and must be pulled out by degrees, euery day a little, if they breake by the way it is very dangerous. The torture they cause is vnspeakeable: they breed in the armes and legges, yea, sometimes in the yard and cod: one man hath had ten of them at one time.

The Inhabitants of Benin e obserue Circumcision, and some other Superstitions, which may seeme Mahumetan, but are more likely to bee ancient Ethnike Rites. For many Countreyes of Africa admit Circumcision, and yet know not, or acknowlege not Mahumetisme, but are either Christians (as the Cophti Abassines) or Gentiles: they cut or rase the skinne, with three lines drawne to their Nauell, esteeming it necessary to saluation. They will not easily doe iniury to any, especially a stranger. They haue Birds in such respect, that it is deadly to any that shall hurt them. And some are appointed to haue a peculiar care of them, and to prouide them food; which they doe in high Mountaynes, where they lay meate for them: which they come and eate.

Arthus writes, That the Inhabitants of Guinea f giue Religious respect vnto certaine trees. And in the yeere, one thousand fiue hundred ninetie eight, certaine Hollanders cutting them, and not ceasing at the perswasion of Negro's, whose Superstitions in that case they derided: it passed from words to blowes betwixt them, & the Dutchmen were forced to get them to their ships: one of their company being slaine in the chase. But the Murtherer was offered to the Hollanders to be punished; which they refusing, his Countrimen cut off his head, and quartered his bodie; bestowing the one as a monument of reuenge, ouer the slaine parties graue, the other on the Fowles, vnburied. Their trees are alway greene: some haue leaues twice a yeere. They seldome see the Sunne, either rising or going downe, by the space of halfe of an houre. Their Winter beginneth in Aprill, which yet is their time of Haruest. Mays was brought thither out of America. In Aprill, May, and Iune, they haue much raine, and the same very dangerous to the bodie, and rotting the clothes, if it bee not presently dryed. It is often as warme as if it were sodden. They haue some Snakes thirty foot long, as much as sixe men can carrie: they haue also a beast like a Crocodile, called Lanhadi (we haue spoken of the like about Pegu and Bengala) which neuer goeth into the water: Spiders as bigge as the Palme of ones hand, which doe not spinne; store of Cameleons; Dogges woolly, with sharpe snouts, of diuers colours, which cannot barke, driuen to the Market as sheepe, tied one to another; blue Parrets; many sorts of Apes; blacke Flyes which seeme to burne: In Senega some Snakes haue mouthes so wide, that they swallo a whole sheepe without tearing; they haue winged Dragons, with tayles, and long mouthes with many teeth, being blue and greene, which some Negros worship. They boare a hole in the Palme-wine tree whence issueth a white iuyce, first sweete, and after by standing it becomes sowre.

and after by standing it becomes sowre. It is somewhat like the Coco-tree. The Palmita is without branches, the fruit growes on the top, which within is like Pomegranates, full of graines, without of a golden colour. They buy Gentilitie with gifts, a Dog, a Sheepe, a Cow In their creation is obserued much solemnitie. They know not how to number their yeeres but seeme to liue long. In their Winter they haue much sickneſse and mortalitie. The goods of the deceased descend not to his Children, but to the Brethren, if he haue any: otherwise, to his Father. If it bee a Woman, her Husband deliuereth her marriage goods to her brethren. When the King dies, the Sepulchre is made like a house, and as well furnished as if they were aliue, being guarded night and day by armed men, to bring him any thing which he shall need.

Their Noses are flat, not naturally, but by pressing them downe in their Infancie, esteeming it a great part of beautie. Their hot stomackes can digest raw flesh; and therefore * Alexander Aphrodisieus, and Cœlius Rhodiginus, that thinke their naturall heate, extracted to the outward parts, to be the cause of their blackneſse, are deceiued. They eate the enemies which are slaine in the warres (which are very rife amongst those Nations) and those which are taken, are euerlasting prisoners. And in some more important warres which they vndertake, they will burne their dwellings before they goe, lest either the enemy might possesse them by conquest, or themselues become too mindfull of a returne. In these warres they prouide themselues of some good light Armour, wearing at such times no other apparell. Their Women are vnfaithfull Secretaries in Natures most hidden secrets, vsing in the sight of men, women, boyes, and girles, to be deliuered of their Children, whom after they circumcise, whether they be of the male or female sexe.
